In that year it was found that the seacoast of Atacama and the islands in the ocean were rich in guano, especially at a place called Punta Angamos, north of Antofagasta. A hasty survey put the value of this fertilizer at 60,000,000 pesos, ($20,000,000.) Here was something worth thinking about. On Oct. 31, 1842, the Chilean Congress passed a bill claiming this territory. Chile pressed her claims on the ground that Alto Peru, out of which Bolivia had been cut after the War of Independence, never came as far south as the desert. Chile's northern boundary, she declared, was at parallel 23, and produced documents to show that the Captain General of Chile in colonial days ruled all the Province of Antofagasta. Bolivia replied that her own country extended to parallel 25. While they were discussing, the further discovery of vast salitre, or nitrate, beds in Atacama and Antofagasta made the matter of boundary still more keenly argued. Without waiting for the question to be settled, Chilean financiers and labor went to the country, and, aided by British capital, began the development of the territory.

The President of Bolivia, Melgarejo, was a great admirer of Chile and things Chilean. He held a position in the Chilean Army and drew an officer's salary. As one Bolivian writer says of him,

"The atmosphere of honors and adulations in which the Government of Chile and its agents enveloped the dictator, Melgarejo, put him in the attitude of conceding whatever was demanded of him by that Government and its citizens. Things came to such a pass that he handed over to a group of these Chileans the concession of five square leagues of land and the sole privilege for fifteen years of exploiting and exploring the nitrate of Atacama."

All the countries on the west coast suddenly found themselves, or thought themselves, confronted with a war against a Spain determined to win back her lost colonies. A defensive alliance was formed in 1866 while the Spanish fleet was bombarding Valparaíso, Chile, and Callao, Peru. But the pending conflict was stopped by the intervention of the United States. Chile seized the opportunity to come to an agreement with Melgarejo and a compromise was effected, making the boundary the 24th parallel. However, all the wealth between the 23d and 25th parallels, the customs on outgoing nitrate and other minerals, were to be divided between the two countries.

BOLIVIAN-PERUVIAN ALLIANCE

Yet, in spite of the apparent friendly spirit, Bolivia was not entirely at ease. She possessed neither army nor navy. Chile had a fleet of five warships and four transports, and was building two more of each. Bolivia found Peru likewise afraid of the war preparations of Chile, and in 1873 the two nations formed a defensive alliance.

Yet the relation between Peru and Bolivia was far from smooth, and at least once, when a Peruvian fleeing from political trouble was sheltered in Bolivia, there was much open talk of war. However, they managed to calm matters, and at Peru's suggestion tried to strengthen their alliance by inviting Argentina to join them. As later events proved, they made a diplomatic blunder.

In 1874 Chile complained that Bolivia was not living up to her agreement, and the representatives talked it over, deciding on Aug. 6, 1874, that the dividing line extended back to the Cordilleras. Chile promised to recognize Bolivia's sovereignty in Antofagasta in return for the confirmation of Chilean nitrate concessions in that province. Also it was settled that no increase in export taxes was to be levied by Bolivia. Once more peace reigned.

Peru took this occasion to show her hand. She declared all nitrate beds to be a State monopoly. The Chilean companies found themselves compelled to shut down and turn over their nitrate establishments, upon which they had spent time and money. All they received in return were paper notes, which were valueless. They appealed to Chile, but nothing was done, and they had to leave the country.

Meanwhile the President changed in Bolivia, and in 1876 Hilarion Daza came into power. His Peruvian friends pointed out how the country was losing money in the nitrate district, and consequently in 1878 the President imposed a heavy tax on all exported fertilizer. At first it was to have been a 10 per cent. tax, but later it was reduced to 10 centavos a quintal, (220 pounds.) The nitrate men objected, called attention to the treaty of 1874, and refused to pay, asserting that it would spoil their business. Chile later imposed a tax of 1.50 pesos a quintal, and the industry flourished.

When the Bolivian authorities threatened to confiscate the nitrate plants where the tax was not paid, the Chileans called upon their country to keep them from being driven out of Bolivia as they had been out of Peru. A small naval force was sent to Antofagasta. Then Peru tried to use its good offices to avert trouble, but Argentina revealed the proposed league against Chile, and the latter, disgusted with such double dealing, declared war on Peru and Bolivia on April 5, 1879.

Valdes Vergara in his history of Chile points out how sure the allies were of victory. Peru thought her fleet far stronger than Chile's. Bolivia was confident in her army. Since 1839 Chile had lived in peace, except for two brief revolutions in 1851 and 1859, while the allies, with their continual wars, were well in practice. The naval battle of Iquique finished the Peruvian fleet, while the Chilean roto soldier, primed with chicha, his national drink, was a demon, and it was not long before even the capital of Peru was in his hands.

TACNA AND ARICA

Then came the treaty of Ancon with Peru, signed March 28, 1884, and with Bolivia peace was made a week later. By the terms of the treaties Chile was given the Peruvian nitrate Province of Tarapacá. Two provinces further north, Tacna and Arica, were temporarily to go to Chile. At the end of ten years a vote was to be taken, the people having the power to decide whether they would belong to Chile or Peru. The country which gained the territory was to pay to the other the sum of 10,000,000 pesos.

(about $2,000,000.) The two provinces are really of little value, although Arica, on the seacoast, is the most beautiful port between Panama and Valparaiso, and Tacna, two hours from it by rail, is an attractive city. But the greater part of the land is desolate. Its chief value to Chile is as a buffer between Peru and the nitrate beds.

The plebiscite was to have been held in 1894, but it never took place. The terms of the treaty are largely to blame, because the manner of voting was not decided then. Peru has always insisted that only those vote who have lived for a long time in the territories. In 1910 Chile proposed that all who had resided there for six months and who could read and write be given a ballot, but this plan would permit the Chilean garrisons to vote, and Peru refused. And while they are settling upon a way Chile keeps the territory.

In the terms of peace with Bolivia, Chile received Atacama and Antofagasta, thus cutting off Bolivia from the sea. The delegates at the conference suggested that Bolivia would be given an opportunity at some future time to acquire a port, and that in the meantime Chilean ports were open to them. In the year when the plebiscite should have been held, Chile made another treaty with Bolivia, promising, in return for assurances of perpetual control of Atacama and Antofagasta, that, should Chile gain Tacna and Arica, she would turn them over to Bolivia. And if she lost them, she would give Bolivia the little port of Vitor and 5,000,000 pesos.

CHILE'S MILITARISTIC CLAIMS

Five years passed. In 1900, after Chile had settled her boundary dispute with Argentina, the Chilean Minister in Bolivia, Abraham König, handed a strange document to the Bolivian Chancellor. Among other things, it said that public opinion had changed in the last five years, and therefore Bolivia need not count on getting Tacna and Arica, even if the plebiscite were favorable to Chile. It denied that Bolivia was to have a port in return for the seacoast which she had lost, and added, "Chile has occupied the shore and has become guardian of it by the same title as that by which Germany annexed to her empire Alsace and Lorraine. Our rights arise from our victory, the supreme law of nations." Thus Bolivia lost nearly 60,000 square miles of territory occupied by 32,000 people. From one of the nitrate districts alone, Toco, Chile gets an annual income of 5,000,000 pesos. Yet Bolivia is getting a return, too. In 1904 a new treaty was signed giving Bolivia 4,000,000 pesos indemnity and promising a railroad from Arica to La Paz, recently finished at a cost of $25,000,000, which in twenty-five years will become Bolivian property. Bolivia at that time ceded all her claims to the coast.

Peru, however, is not yet satisfied with arrangements. Tacna and Arica occupy a place in Peruvian politics similar to that formerly held by the tariff or free silver issue in the United States. The papers there are full of talk now because a Presidential election comes this year, and the candidates are incorporating the "Lost Provinces" in their platforms. Then there is a hope, too, that the League of Nations will do something. From being newspaper and political talk, it has now gone further. Students in Callao and Lima made demonstrations against Chile. In Paita, Peru, the Chilean Consul was supposed to have been insulted and driven from the country. Exaggerated reports of the doings came to Chile and the incensed people started the present trouble in the country.

DANGERS OF THE SITUATION

The internal conditions of Chile are not enviable. The United States Embassy in the last few months has more than once been on the point of sending all Americans home. This is due partly to injudicious newspaper reports and partly to the underlying social unrest. The Bolshevik germ has reached South America, and the Chilean authorities fear an outbreak. Punta Arenas, in the far south, has been in open revolt, while the many demonstrations by striking workmen in all the cities give at least a hint of danger; so the Government is quite willing that the Peruvian issue should distract popular attention.

Little is known in the south of Chile of conditions in the north, for news is rigidly suppressed; but I had occasion to visit Iquique, the scene of the greatest anti-Peru disorder. In Santiago the report was given out that the Peruvians in Iquique left the city of their own accord, and the statement was backed by affidavits of the steamboat Captains who carried them to Peru. In Iquique the fleteros who row passengers from the ships to the shore, for there are no docks, say that there is a fine of a hundred pesos for any one who carries a Peruvian ashore, and we had to assure them of our nationality before we could land. One fletero told me that many Peruvians were taken out of their beds and forcibly put on board ships for Peru, and one American gentleman upon whose word I can rely, though it is obvious his name cannot be given, said he watched six mounted police guard his dwelling while a crowd looted the house of a Peruvian six doors away, completely wrecking it.

In the nitrate district also there is this same distrust of Peruvians. All have been sent away, and when I visited the American copper mine at Chuquicamata the representatives of the Patriotic League questioned me very closely because they fancied I looked like a Peruvian.

This movement, it should be noted, is against Peru, not Bolivia. The newspapers recently published a report that the Chileans at the Huanchaca mine in Bolivia had been driven out, but while there I found that the director of the mine, a Chilean, had put his friends in power, and that it was not nationality but inefficiency which made the workmen rise against them. Their places have now been filled with capable Chilean and Peruvian engineers working together. In my six weeks in Bolivia I carried a card identifying me with a Chilean newspaper, and it got me a number of favors from the authorities, and several of them remarked that they were glad to be able to do something for a person from Chile.

Of course, everything is not quiet in Bolivia. The papers are full of editorials about a port, but they do not advocate war. It is Peru that is doing the war talking, and Chile encourages her, for it takes the minds of the Chileans from internal troubles.

The educated people of both Peru and Bolivia see that war would not help them. Chile is infinitely superior to both nations together. Her army is well trained. She possesses fifty airplanes, the gift of Great Britain. Her warships are more up to date and better manned, and her submarines, three times as numerous as those of Peru, have only recently made the ocean trip from the United States to Chile, while the Peruvian underwater craft have never been outside Callao Harbor. War, therefore, would not obtain Tacna and Arica for Peru, nor get Bolivia a port. Many of the more thoughtful in both countries are hoping that a better way may be hit upon by the League of Nations.

[Official advices received at Washington on Nov. 4, 1919, stated that Chile had given Bolivia an outlet to the Pacific Ocean by ceding a strip of land north of the Province of Arica; the Bolivian Legation, however, discredited the report. Minister Calderon stated that such reports had been current in years past, but that nothing had come of them.]

The Negro in the War

How French and American Black Troops Performed Deeds of Valor on Many Battlefields

AMONG the factors which aided the allied and associated nations, including the United States of America, to fight their way to victory in the great war were the efficient services rendered by the dark-skinned Hindus from Britain's furthest dominions and the negro colonials of France—her Algerians, her Senegalese, and her Moroccans—whose fearlessness was demonstrated repeatedly on the battlefield—"black devils," the German soldiers called them, when, fighting like demons, they had forced the Kaiser's proudest shock troops to retreat before them. And America sent 80,000 negro citizens to do their part for the world's liberty. What they did was made manifest by citation after citation, the conferring by the French Government of many War Crosses, and the granting of many United States medals for distinguished bravery.

France for a long time struggled without the help of her black colonists, and the thought of the valuable man-service that was being wasted in her African and other colonial possessions, while French soldiers by millions were falling on red battlefields, was slow in coming to her. And yet, had she listened to the voice of Gallifet, Minister of War at the time of the Fashoda episode, and of Mangin, then a simple Captain, and of Gouraud, victor of Samory, she would, at the time the European war broke out, have been able to bring a large black army into the field against Germany.

In 1908 Mangin, then a Lieutenant Colonel and Chief of Staff of Western Africa, foreseeing the European conflagration which burst forth six years later, took up the idea again, but his proposals failed of acceptance; in 1910, however, a commission, headed by Mangin and composed of four colonial officials, was sent to Western Africa to study the possibilities. It stayed there nine months. On its return it reported that an annual contingent of 40,000 black troops could be depended on, and recommended the creation of seven divisions within four years. But when the war broke out France possessed only the two Algerian divisions originally planned.

TRAGIC FATE OF ALGERIANS

The history of these two divisions of black soldiers is tragic. The men went into a hell of artillery fire untested, and they proved their worth. The 2d Division, which reached the front first, came into contact with the enemy at Rheims at the end of September, 1914. The thunder of big guns seemed only to amuse them, and the carnage left them unperturbed. From Rheims they were sent to Arras. In this sector on Nov. 3 the battalion attacked "on ground as completely bare as a billiard table, cut every fifty yards by canals five yards in width and two yards deep." For three days and three nights the Senegalese went forward under a frightful fire of artillery, infantry and machine guns, wading through canal after canal, wet to the skin, decimated by the terrific hail of projectiles, and ended with a surprise attack at 5 o'clock in the morning, in which when the whole front line was mowed down by the first and last German fire, those behind rushed forward and took the German trenches after a furious body to body struggle. Of the whole battalion only 3 officers, 5 non-commissioned officers and 120 men remained alive. So the second battalion of Algeria died on the field of honor.

The end of the first battalion was equally dramatic. It happened at Dixmude, a name made famous by Charles Le Goffic in his epic of the French marines. With these fought the Senegalese. On Nov. 10 they were defending, with the Belgian troops on the left and the cemetery of Dixmude on the right, the allied trenches, which were furiously attacked. The roaring field-gray tide poured suddenly upon them from the flanks. Two solutions faced them—to surrender or to die at their posts. They chose the latter.

An extraordinary scene began. The madness of battle had seized the black soldiers, the intoxication of self-immolation. The mysterious call of their African blood was heard and hearkened to, and an elemental power, born of the barbaric life of the wilderness, lifted them above themselves. They roared forth to the amazed enemy their fury, hatred, and contempt. A hundred African dialects fused into a savage and unintelligible harmony. A vast chant of war and death, it rose and grew, became formidable, terrible, dominating all the battle, a funeral paean of the black warriors, morituri. And when the gray tide struck them they rushed forward, striking, killing, dying. The German troops could not finish with them. The German commanders brought up machine guns and from a distance of fifty yards mowed them down. Under the volleys the fierce hymn of war died away, and silence came. But history echoes with it still.

TROOPS FROM MOROCCO

Other territorial troops were raised in Morocco by General Lyautey. Some of them shared the fate of the Senegalese already described. "Imperfectly trained, but formidable fighters," went the record. Fully awakened now to the possibilities of her colonial possessions, France mobilized all available forces in Western Africa, in Senegal, Mauritania, in the Lower Sudan and sent a regiment into the furnace of battle at Champagne. The records tell of a cry used by one Captain Poupart to encourage white soldiers, who were wavering. "Come, men, another effort! See how the blacks are holding!" On Oct. 24, transported in automobile trucks to Arras, they advanced on the enemy from one parallel to another, then across open country. The red flare of a burning mill illuminated the horizon. Then from the German trenches came suddenly a roar of fire. When it died away many black soldiers strewed the ground; but when the charge resounded the survivors rushed forward and swept like a wave to the German dugouts. The Germans were too many, however; the Senegalese too few. The blacks retreated without panic, and, reinforced by their reserves, held their lines. Six times in the night the Lavenir regiment attacked the enemy, sustaining many losses. The result was made manifest by the German papers, which admitted that the blacks were "good troops," had "fought well," and that their own soldiers "had never been attacked with such fury before." As a matter of fact, the black soldiers had saved Arras.

In the hell of Gallipoli, in 1915, the black troops of France fought also, and made the same record as elsewhere. But the man power of France was waning. A French envoy to Russia, who went to ask assistance of the Czar, complained of the wastage of human material. "The Germans," he said, "make war with machinery; we, with human breasts." Realizing that their resources were weakening, the French looked again to Africa. The creation of eight Senegalese battalions was planned for 1916, but the necessary mobilization law, for some inexplicable reason, was never passed. Special decrees, however, were subsequently issued, notably that of Oct. 9, 1916, by virtue of which a recruiting limit of 50,000 men was established. Raised hastily, this force, almost untrained, reached France in mid-Winter, and was amalgamated with other corps. At least a dozen battalions shared in the military operations of this period. The press recounted in detail the exploits of the Senegalese at Barleux, at la Maisonette, before Péronne, at the time of the offensive of General Fayolle on the Somme, and before Verdun under General Mangin.

At Douaumont, in the attack of Oct. 24, the fourth battalion of the colonial infantry regiment of Morocco (the regiment which, of the whole French Army, won the greatest number of citations) sallied forth from its trenches, only to meet a terrific fire of musketry and machine guns. Wavering for a moment, the two companies at the head of the battalion swept on again. Split in the centre by an enemy force, the Senegalese rushed ahead on either side, attacking on the first lines. Thanks to this heroic action, the resistance of the Germans at Douaumont was broken after a furious struggle.

Again, on the western slope of the Fausse Côte, when the white soldiers, swept by machine-gun fire, took shelter, the 1st and 3d Companies of sharpshooters, all Senegalese, continued to progress, charged the machine-gun nest, and took it by storm. Inspired by the spirit of the black troops, the whole line renewed the attack, the Germans surrendered, and the German position was captured.

AT CHEMIN DES DAMES

The much-discussed offensive of April 16, 1917, a gigantic operation led by the British and the French from Arras to the Argonne, was disastrous not only to the French, but to the black contingents. The task of General Mangin was to take by storm the formidable position called the Chemin des Dames. Because of their achievements as shock troops, the fury of their advance under the most devastating fire, the black divisions were marked out for the first assault. At dawn they bounded forward and took the first German line within an hour, traversing a distance of from five to seven kilometers through a bewildering and formidable network of defenses. But somebody blundered. Halted at 10 o'clock in the morning before the second German line, bristling with machine guns, they were kept immovable all that day and night in trenches swept by glacial winds and clouds of snow. Their feet, unsued to European footgear and held like vices in their army brogans, became badly frostbitten, and on the morning of the 18th, when the 2d Colonial Corps moved forward, thousands of Senegalese could not follow. Whole battalions were thus put hors de combat. Then another blunder occurred. Many of these cases of frostbite were easily cured. Had the black soldiers been brought back a short distance to the rear, and only temporarily, they could have been used again in the great offensive. Instead of this, they were dispersed, and when at last they rejoined their corps, General Mangin no longer commanded his army and the offensive had been abandoned. By the end of May, 1917, the black battalions were distributed over all the front and relegated to obscure tasks. Some regained a regimental unity in quiet sectors, some participated in the few operations around Verdun in association with white colonial troops. The year 1917 was ill-omened for the black troops, as it was for all others.

THE DEFENSE OF RHEIMS

In 1918 the Senegalese, withdrawn from the front at the beginning of Winter, and reinforced by belated units, were reorganized in the camps of the south by a colonial General, who created the fine battalions whose strength the Germans experienced in the Spring of the same year. These black troops, veterans of two years' fighting, were given the task of holding the martyred City of Rheims. The Germans, planning to take the city by surprise, advanced between Rheims and Soissons, and were beating down the resistance of the French first lines when the Senegalese divisions arrived. The German soldiers, who had already tested the temper of their black adversaries, had no stomach for further fight, and withdrew. But on June 12 they began another furious assault from the east of the city, and succeeded in capturing one of its keys, the Pompelle fort. By a fierce counteroffensive the Senegalese drove them out headlong, and the Germans did not return to the attack.

These continued failures, especially in view of the fact that the German papers had divulged contemptuously the secret that Rheims was held "only by negroes and colonial troops," became serious for German prestige, and on June 18 the Crown Prince ordered his troops to take the city, at whatever cost. On a front of twenty-five kilometers from west to east, three first-line divisions assailed the circle of the French defenses, preceding the attack by a violent bombardment of asphyxiating shells. The German effort failed again. At only one point, to the north of Sillery, the enemy penetrated, but was driven out. "We were struggling," wrote a German officer, "against those negro soldiers, who hold like walls, wait for our men till they are within five yards, and throw themselves upon them."

When, by a surprise attack, the Germans finally succeeded in taking le Chemin des Dames, a capture which brought them in four days from l'Ailette to the Marne, there was panic in Chateau-Thierry, which was choked with fugitives and fleeing soldiers. All efforts to halt the rout proved vain. Only one General, renowned for his exploits in Africa, made an attempt to stem the tide of the advancing Germans. In the ruins of the castle he installed his Senegalese, with orders to defend it to the death. These orders were obeyed. Vainly the German wave beat against the old walls of the castle, while the evacuation of the town proceeded. When finally the object of the Allies was gained, the handful of Senegalese soldiers came forth, bearing their dead and wounded, under the eyes of the Germans, who were stupefied by the small number of their tenacious adversaries.

So the French blacks fought in the great European war, the first in which they had ever been allowed to share. Isolated cases of the panic of raw black troops, brought for the first time under the fire of big guns, cannot impair the record made by the black troops as a whole. They, too, were the artisans of the victory of France.

THE COLORED AMERICANS

The negro soldiers of the United States arrived late on the field of battle, but in more than sufficient time to make Germany feel the strength of their arm. In all 83,600 negroes were drafted for service in the National Army sent overseas. More than 626 of the 1,250 colored men who completed their course of training were commissioned as officers in the United States Army; nearly 100 negro physicians and surgeons received commissions as officers in the Medical Reserve Corps, and a full fighting force of 30,000 men constituted the 92d Division detailed for duty in France under General Pershing. The total number of negro combat troops was 42,000.

Like the Senegalese forces of the French Army, the black American troops held their own on European battlefields and stood the test of courage, endurance and aggressiveness in moments of the greatest stress. They fought valiantly at Château-Thierry, Soissons, on the Vesle, in Champagne, in the Argonne, and in the final attacks in the Metz region. The entire first battalion of the 367th Infantry, the "Buffaloes," as it was called, was awarded the Croix de Guerre for heroism in the drive on Metz. The soldiers of this battalion received their baptism of fire in this attack; at the start they won honors which veterans of many conflicts had failed to capture. In other engagements three black regiments as units were awarded the Croix de Guerre, which bestows on each man the right to wear the coveted badge. When the fighting stopped, it was the negro troops who were nearest to the Rhine. Whether performing individual exploits, fighting in a single regiment, or doing battle in a division made up entirely of men of his organization the negro soldier rose to every test.

In the Argonne the 368th Infantry, colored, sent a volunteer runner with a message to the left flank of an American firing line. The way led across an open field swept by heavy enemy machine-gun fire. Before he had gone far, a shell cut him down. As he fell he shouted back to his comrades that some one should come and get the message. Another member of the regiment, Lieutenant Campbell, dashed across the shell-swept space, picked up the wounded private, and, amid a hail of German bullets, carried his man back to the American lines, winning by this achievement the Distinguished Service Cross and the promotion to a Captaincy. Under the same Lieutenant Campbell a few black soldiers, armed only with their rifles, trench knives, and hand grenades, moving over a road in the Château-Thierry sector, by a clever ruse and great bravery, captured a concealed machine gun that had been doing deadly work, killed four of the Germans operating it, and made prisoners of the other three.

DEEDS OF 372D REGIMENT

Four of the negro regiments first sent over, the 369th, 370th, 371st, and 372d, afterward organized into the Provisional 93d Division, were brigaded separately with French troops. The fighting record of the 372d may be taken as typical. The men had arrived in France on April 14, and had gone into training with the French on April 28. On June 6 the 372d was sent to the trenches just west of Verdun, and occupied the famous battle-swept Hill 304 and sections at Four de Paris and Vauquois. On Hill 304 thousands of French and German soldiers had fallen as the battleline swung back and forth. This hill was given to the negroes to hold, and they held it.

In the Champagne sector, with Montoir as the objective, the negroes cheered and sang when the announcement that they were going into battle was made. From June 6 to Sept. 10, in the bloody Argonne Forest, the 372d bore the brunt of the terrific battle for weeks. They took an active part in the Argonne offensive, which lasted from Sept. 26 to Oct. 7. In the ordeal of this gigantic drive, the negro troops proved their fighting qualities in deadly striking power and stubborn resistance in moments of crisis, and made for themselves such a record that they won as a unit the coveted Croix de Guerre. The casualty list showed 500 men killed, wounded, and gassed.

Another regiment's record, that of the 369th, commanded by Colonel William Hayward, ex-Public Service Commissioner, is equally striking. The 369th was in the Champagne offensive as a part of the Fourth Army, commanded by General Gouraud, a few miles west of the Argonne Forest. The accomplishment of this regiment was described by Colonel Hayward in the opening lines of his official report:

At 5:25 A. M. the assault was launched, an assault that kept assaulting so far as our division was concerned, for twelve days, in which we crossed rivers, captured towns, cut and climbed through acres and acres of barbed wire entanglements, stormed bluffs, ridges and hills for fourteen kilometers, all the way facing stubborn and terribly effective artillery and machine-gun fire. At the end of twelve days we came out with our division, what was left of us, which included twenty officers.

At the very end of the war the 369th won another distinction, pointed out by The Stars and Stripes, the organ of the American troops in France, in the following announcement:

The furthest north at 11 o'clock [when the armistice went into effect, Nov. 11, 1918] on the front of the two armies was held at the extreme American left, up Sedan way, by the troops of the 77th Division. The furthest east—the nearest to the Rhine—was held by those negro soldiers who used to make up the old New York 15th, and who have long been brigaded with the French. They were in Alsace, and their line ran through Thann and across the railway that leads to Colmar.

NEGRO DIVISION IN ACTION

Soon after the 92d Division was thoroughly organized it took over the Marbach sector. The fury of these men's trench raids won from the Germans the sobriquet of "schwarze Teufel," (black devils.) By these raids they drove the Germans north beyond Erehaut and Voivrotte to Cheminot Bridge. To check these attacks the Germans tried to destroy the bridge, and flooded the country. Up to that time, it should be remembered, the 92d Division as a unit had never been in battle. Only the 368th Infantry had received the baptism of fire in the Argonne Forest.

The division's chance came in the drive on Metz. At 4 o'clock one Sunday morning (Nov. 10, 1918) they were notified that they were to be sent into action. Through the whole division echoed the fighting slogan of the "Buffaloes," the 367th Infantry: "See it through!"

The 92d began its advance at 7 o'clock from Pont-à-Mousson. Facing it was a valley commanded by the heavy guns of Metz, and by nests of German machine guns. The negro troops realized their first great opportunity. Fused by a species of race solidarity they plunged forward like a single man, swiftly, unflin-ingly, through a veritable rain of shell-fire, heedless of their losses. Their objective for the day was Bois Fréhaut. Picked Moroccan and Senegalese troops of the French Army, striking for the same point, in an odd competition of black races on this day, were the first to arrive. The Germans, grasping the situation, pounded Bois Fréhaut with a heavy fire, and the Senegalese and Moroccans were finally compelled to retreat.

Of the American negro troops, the 56th Regiment was forced to withdraw, but not until after heavy loss. It was the 1st Battalion of the "Buffaloes," commanded by Major Charles L. Appleton of New York, with negro company commanders and Lieutenants, that was called upon to hold the Germans at bay while the decimated 56th retreated. The iron resistance which the Buffaloes made to the Germans on this occasion, in the face of a terrific fire, won for the battalion the Croix de Guerre. A little later Bois Fréhaut was taken by the 92d. The murderous fire directed against the swiftly advancing blacks could not deter them. The Stars and Stripes said of this fight:

Probably the hardest fighting done by any Americans in the final hour was that which engaged the troops of the 28th, 92d, 81st, and 7th Divisions of the Second American Army, who launched a fire-eating attack above Vigneulles just at dawn on the 11th. It was no mild thing, that last flare of battle, and the order to cease firing did not reach the men in the front line until the last moment, when the runners sped with it from fox hole to fox hole.

Numerous officers and privates of the 92d were commended for meritorious conduct by General Orders. At the close of hostilities the negro division held the line Vandières-St. Michel-Xon-Norry. The 92d suffered a total of 1,478 casualties.

So the negro soldier, alike of Africa and of the United States, played his part in the great war. Along the northeast front, in Rheims, on the Marne, at Mont de Choisy, in the Argonne, before Metz, these troops held their ground or broke the enemy lines by their unconquerable tenacity. As a French writer put it, "they fought like demons, and they died like men."

Haiti and the American Occupation

By DR. FRANCOIS DALENCOUR

[A RESIDENT OF HAITI]

EVENTS in Haiti both before and during the period of the war have been little known in the United States. The negro republic, which traces its history back to the discovery of the island by Columbus in 1492, has passed through five political phases:

1. The Indian period. (Prior to 1492.)
2. The Spanish period. (From 1492 to 1697.)
3. The French period. (From 1697 to 1804.)
4. The Haitian period. (From 1804 to 1915.)
5. The Haitian-American period. (From 1915—.)

The first of these periods is but little known. The Spanish period was marked by cruelty and oppression on the part of the Spaniards, who exploited the Indians unscrupulously. Subsequently they imported black slaves from Africa. Under Spanish rule the Island of Hispaniola, as the discoverers had baptized their island possession, suffered rapid decline; the mines were empty and deserted, agriculture was neglected, and the incompetency and corruption of the various Spanish Governors went on unchecked.

In the year 1626 French and English adventurers came to Haiti. These new immigrants were called "Freebooters" and "Buccaneers." They established factories in the north of the island, but the French gained the predominance and drove the English away, subsequently taking possession of the whole western part of the island, which they called Saint Domingue, (Santo Domingo.) In 1697 the Treaty of Ryswick ceded all this territory permanently to France. The French colony soon became rich and prosperous. Santo Domingo was called by them the "Pearl of the Antilles." Under their rule the slave trade was actively pursued. During the American Revolution 800 young Haitians, blacks or mulattoes, took part in the expedition of Lafayette to aid the American colonists. History has preserved their names—Beauvais, Rigaud, J. B. Chavannes, Jourdain among others.

ERA OF INDEPENDENCE

Haiti, like the rest of the world, but even more strongly, was affected by the French Revolution of 1789. A Haitian who had been educated in Paris, Vincent Ogé, returned to Santo Domingo, and sought out Jean Baptiste Chavannes, who had fought at Savannah for the independence of the United States. These two Haitians initiated an uprising of the slaves, but they were defeated and executed. The ideal of liberty, however, had been spread through Haiti, and was upheld by the brilliant but brief career of Toussaint L'Ouverture; although Napoleon I. sent a military force to compel the allegiance of Haiti, his efforts ended in failure. After many struggles Haiti became independent on Jan. 1, 1804, and the national period began. Dessalines, Commander in Chief of the Haitian Independence Army, was proclaimed Emperor under the title of James I. He died in 1806, and was succeeded by Alexander Piéton, who became the first President of Haiti.

A temporary revolt by General Henri Christophe, head of the northern army, who proclaimed himself King Henry I., failed with his death, and the whole western part of the island became a single State, Haiti,* under the Presidency of Jean Pierre Boyer, who succeeded Piéton in 1818. In 1820 the whole island was under one unified control. But after the departure of Boyer in 1843, the eastern part of the island, the former Spanish colony, became an independent State. It is now called the Dominican Republic. After Boyer there came a bewildering succession of Haitian Presidents; from 1843 to 1915 no fewer than twenty-two may be counted; in the past ten years, especially, a new President has been elected practically every year.

*The name Haiti is derived from the Indian word Aiti, meaning a high and mountainous country.

Bad politics, graft, incompetency, bad faith in public business and constant revolutions brought about a deplorable state of public affairs in the Haitian Republic.

RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

For the past twenty years the American Government, well informed of existing conditions, has been watching the Haitian Republic. The public men of the negro State seemed quite blind to their country's welfare. Ambition and love of money dominated them in all their acts. At the end of the year 1914, during the Presidency of Davilmar Théodore, the American Government notified the Haitian Government that it was disposed to grant recognition on condition that a Haitian mission sign at Washington a satisfactory protocol relative to certain questions, first among which should be a customs convention along the lines of that made with the Dominican Government. The draft of such a protocol was submitted to Haiti, according to the terms of which a General Receiver and Financial Adviser were to be appointed by the President of the United States to receive and disburse all moneys received; the debts of Haiti were to be audited and controlled, and a sinking fund established and maintained.

But on Dec. 15, 1914, the Haitian Government answered that it could not accept this convention, on the ground that it meant the intervention of a foreign power in the affairs of the Administration. On Dec. 19 the Legation of the United States declared that it had proposed this agreement only with the object of giving assistance to the Haitian Government, adding that, as Haiti showed no disposition to ratify it, there would be no insistence on the part of the Government of the United States. Unhappily, the warring political factions of the country could not maintain peace among themselves; a new revolution occurred, in which the Government of Davilmar Théodore was overthrown, and General Vilbrun Guillaume was elected President.

MAP SHOWING CHIEF DIVISIONS AND CITIES OF THE NEGRO REPUBLIC OF HAITI AND ITS RELATION TO SANTO DOMINGO

Immediately the American Government sent two Americans to Port-au-Prince, Mr. Ford and Mr. Smith, on a semi-official mission. With the American Minister, Bailly Blanchard, they were received by the President of Haiti, with whom they sought to resume the conversations interrupted in December, 1914. But after discovering that these two envoys had no official letters of authority from the American Government, the Haitian officials refused to negotiate with them, and the two American representatives, after filing a protest, departed on an American man-of-war. This was in April, 1915.

In May the United States Government sent Paul Fuller, Jr., to Haiti, as Envoy Extraordinary, charged not to recognize the Government of Vilbrun Guillaume officially unless the latter accepted a new convention. This new protocol called for a close and confidential advisory connection between the United States and Haiti, to be established through the respective Presidents of the two countries and Mr. Fuller and Ulrich Duverin, Haitian Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; it also provided for the protection of Haiti by the American Government against either foreign or internal aggression; the refusal of any rights or privileges in Haiti to any foreign power or its representatives, and the settlement of American or other foreign claims by arbitration within a period of six months. In response to the presentation of this proposed convention, the Haitian Government submitted a counterdraft embodying some modifications. Mr. Fuller accepted some of these modifications, but suddenly, in the first days of June, 1915, with the outbreak of a new revolution, he took his departure.

ANTI-AMERICAN DEMONSTRATIONS

This upheaval had broken out quite unexpectedly. Civil war raged, amid scenes of bloodshed, pillage, and fire, in the north. On June 2 the American Secretary of State, William J. Bryan, informed the Haitian Minister at Washington that he had received from Cape Haitien, a town of Haiti, a telegram which said that there had been a hostile demonstration before the American Consulate, and that the rebels had threatened to burn the town if they were forced to evacuate it. The American Secretary stated that an order had been given to dispatch two men-of-war to Haiti.

On July 27, at 4 o'clock in the morning, the friends of the rebels at Port-au-Prince took arms and attacked the President at his residence in Champ de Mars, a park of the town. The President, Vilbrun Guillaume, fled to the French Legation. The Governor of Port-au-Prince, on hearing of this attack, ordered the massacre of all political prisoners. About 150 of these were executed in prison. The following day, July 28, 1915, some relatives and friends of the massacred prisoners, reinforced by a number of the rebels, went to the French Legation and seized the President, whom they killed with machetes and bayonet thrusts. Parts of the body, including the head, which was impaled on a stick, were taken out and paraded in the streets of the city by a furious crowd.

The political situation was threatening. Several factions were struggling to elect their Presidential candidates. On the same day, at 6 o'clock in the evening, the United States Marine Corps landed at Port-au-Prince, under Captain Beach, soon followed by Rear Admiral Caperton, who was in chief command. After many parleys the Haitian Parliament was convoked, and a new President, Sudre Dartiguenave, was elected for a period of seven years. Soon after this the United States Legation presented the outline of a new convention.

CONVENTION NOW IN FORCE

After many negotiations this convention was signed and ratified by the Haitian Parliament in November, 1915. It was ratified at Washington on May 6, 1916. The text of this convention is given herewith:

Preamble. The United States and the Republic of Haiti desiring to confirm and strengthen the friendship existing between them by the most cordial co-operation in measures for their common advantage, and the Republic of Haiti desiring to remedy the present condition of its revenues and finances, to maintain the tranquillity of the republic, to carry out plans for the economic development and prosperity of the republic and its people, and the United States being in full sympathy with all these aims and objects and desiring to contribute in all proper ways to their accomplishment,

The United States and the Republic of Haiti have resolved to conclude a convention with these objects in view, and have appointed for that purpose plenipotentiaries, who having exhibited to each other their respective powers, which are seen to be fully in good and true form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.—The Government of the United States will, by its good office, aid the Haitian Government in the proper and efficient development of its agricultural, mineral, and commercial resources, and in the establishment of the finances of Haiti on a firm and solid basis.

ARTICLE II.—The President of Haiti shall appoint, upon nomination by the President of the United States, a General Receiver and such aids and employes as may be necessary, who shall collect, receive, and apply all customs duties on imports and exports accruing at the several Custom Houses and ports of entry of the Republic of Haiti.

The President of Haiti shall appoint, upon nomination by the President of the United States, a Financial Adviser, who shall be an officer attached to the Ministry of Finance, to give effect to whose proposals and labors the Minister will lend efficient aid. The Financial Adviser shall devise an adequate system of public accounting, aid in increasing the revenues and adjusting them to the expenses, inquire into the validity of the debts of the republic, enlighten both Governments with reference to all eventual debts, recommend improved methods of collecting and applying the revenues, and make such other recommendations to the Minister of Finance as may be deemed necessary for the welfare and prosperity of Haiti.

ARTICLE III.—The Government of the Republic of Haiti will provide by law or appropriate decrees for the payment of all customs duties to the General Receiver, and will extend to the Receivership, and to the Financial Adviser, all needful aid and full protection in execution of the powers conferred and duties imposed herein, and the United States on its part will extend like aid and protection.

ARTICLE IV.—Upon the appointment of the Financial Adviser the Government of the Republic of Haiti, in co-operation with the Financial Adviser, shall collate, classify, arrange, and make full statement of all the debts of the republic, the amounts, character, maturity, and condition thereof, and the interest accruing and the sinking fund requisite to their final discharge.

ARTICLE V.—All sums collected and received by the General Receiver shall be applied, first, to the payment of the salaries and allowances of the General Receiver, his assistants and employes, and expenses of the Receivership, including the salary and expenses of the Financial Adviser, which salaries will be determined by previous agreement; second, to the interest and sinking fund of the public debt of the Republic of Haiti; and, third, to the maintenance of the constabulary referred to in Article X., and then the remainder to the Haitian Government for the purpose of current expenses.

For making these applications the General Receiver will proceed to pay salaries and allowances monthly and expenses as they arise, and on the first of each calendar month will set aside in a separate fund the quantum of the collections and receipts of the previous month.

ARTICLE VI.—The expenses of the Receivership, including salaries and allowances of the General Receiver, his assistants and employes, and the salary and expenses of the Financial Adviser, shall not exceed 5 per centum of the collections and receipts from customs duties, unless by agreement by the two Governments.

ARTICLE VII.—The General Receiver shall make monthly reports of all collections, receipts, and disbursements to the appropriate officers of the Republic of Haiti and to the Department of State of the United States, which reports shall be open to inspection and verification at all times by the appropriate authorities of each of the said Governments.

ARTICLE VIII.—The Republic of Haiti shall not increase its public debt except by previous agreement with the President of the United States, and shall not contract any debt or assume any financial obligation unless the ordinary revenues of the republic available for that purpose, after defraying the expenses of the Government, shall be adequate to pay the interest and provide a sinking fund for the final discharge of such debt.

ARTICLE IX.—The Republic of Haiti will not, without the assent of the President of the United States, modify the customs duties in a manner to reduce the revenues therefrom, and in order that the revenues of the republic may be adequate to meet the public debt and expenses of the Government, to preserve tranquillity and to promote material prosperity, the Republic of Haiti will co-operate with the Financial Adviser in his recommendation for improvement in the methods of collecting and disbursing the revenues and for new sources of needed income.

ARTICLE X.—The Haitian Government obligates itself, for the preservation of domestic peace, the security of individual rights, and the full observance of the provisions of this treaty, to create without delay an efficient constabulary, urban and rural, composed of native Haitians. This constabulary shall be organized and officered by Americans appointed by the President of Haiti, upon nomination by the President of the United States. The Haitian Government shall clothe these officers with the proper and necessary authority and uphold them in the performance of their functions. These officers will be replaced by Haitians as they, by examination conducted under direction of a board to be selected by the senior American officer of this constabulary, in the presence of a representative of the Haitian Government, are found to be qualified to assume such duty. The constabulary herein provided for shall, under the direction of the Haitian Government, have supervision and control of arms and ammunition, military supplies and traffic therein, throughout the country. The high contracting parties agree that the stipulations in this article are necessary to prevent factional strife and disturbances.

ARTICLE XI.—The Government of Haiti agrees not to surrender any of the territory of the Republic of Haiti by sale, lease, or otherwise, or jurisdiction over such territory, to any foreign Government or power, nor to enter into any treaty or contract with any foreign power or powers that will impair or tend to impair the independence of Haiti.

ARTICLE XII.—The Haitian Government agrees to execute with the United States a protocol for the settlement, by arbitration or otherwise, of all pending pecuniary claims of foreign corporations, companies, citizens, or subjects against Haiti.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Republic of Haiti, being desirous to further the development of its natural resources, agrees to undertake and execute such measures as, in the opinion of the high contracting parties, may be necessary for the sanitation and public improvement of the republic, under the supervision and direction of an engineer or engineers to be appointed by the President of Haiti upon nomination of the President of the United States and authorized for that purpose by the Government of Haiti.

ARTICLE XIV.—The high contracting parties shall have authority to take such steps as may be necessary to insure the complete attainment of any of the objects comprehended in this treaty, and, should the necessity occur, the United States will lend an efficient aid for the preservation of Haitian independence and the maintenance of a Government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty.

ARTICLE XV.—The present treaty shall be approved and ratified by the high contracting parties in conformity with their respective laws, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged in the City of Washington as soon as may be possible.

ARTICLE XVI.—The present treaty shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of ten years, to be counted from the day of exchange of ratifications, and further for another term of ten years if, for specific reasons presented by either of the high contracting parties, the purpose of this treaty has not been fully accomplished.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate in the English and French languages, and have thereunto affixed their seals.

After the ratification of this convention several agreements were made for the organization of public service, including a special Haitian constabulary and a coast-guard service; the annual compensation of these bodies and of the Financial Adviser and General Receiver was fixed; the telephone and telegraph systems were reorganized and similar financial provisions made. In the meantime the whole country was put under martial law, and order was preserved. The affairs of Haiti seemed at last to have been established upon a basis favorable for the prosperous development of the island republic.

DISAPPOINTED HOPES

As soon as the Haitian-American convention was accepted by both nations everybody in Haiti thought that a new era of peace, of industry, of freedom was at hand. But the Haitian officials, under the aegis of America's protection, took advantage of the situation to seek their personal profit. Malversations were committed. Journalists striving to discuss these questions were put in prison. Faithful to his promise to protect the existing administration, Rear Admiral Caperton took no measures to maintain the freedom of the press. Confronted with many protests and much opposition, the Haitian Government then took the decision to dissolve the Parliament. This was done on April 4, 1916. Rear Admiral Caperton gave his consent to this disloyal and criminal proceeding. And this marked the beginning of Haitian hostility to America. How can a democratic country, white or negro, live without a Parliament in which the vital problems of a people are discussed? No democracy without a popular Parliament is possible.

Rear Admiral Caperton ordered fresh elections, and new representatives were chosen in January, 1917. At the end of the same month a part of the American Atlantic fleet, under Admiral Mayo, came to Port-au-Prince. This was a friendly visit and a demonstration of American power in the West Indies. Europe was still plunged in war against Germany. The American fleet was received with the utmost cordiality by the Haytian people, both officially and individually. Franklin Roosevelt, sub-Secretary of the Navy Department, made an eloquent speech to the President of Haiti, who answered in cordial terms. After a three-day sojourn the American fleet steamed away, bearing with it the best wishes of the Haitian people.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION

In May, 1917, the new Parliament met to give a new Constitution to the country. But this Parliament also was dissolved in June, 1917. In its stead, a Council of State of twenty-one members was appointed. This council was endowed with legislative powers. At the beginning of 1918 a new Constitution was at last elaborated by the Haitian authorities. It contained 134 articles. For the first time in history one saw a Constitution of 134 articles and twenty-three pages submitted to a whole people, called upon to answer "Yes" or "No." Natives suggested it, which makes the case worse, and Americans approved it.

A special article of this Constitution said:

All acts of the Government of the United States during its military occupation in Haiti are hereby ratified and validated. No Haitian may be pursued civilly or criminally for any act executed in virtue of orders of the occupation, or under its authority. The acts of military courts shall not be subject to revision. The acts of the Executive Power, till publication of the present Constitution, are equally ratified and validated.

How can public acts be ratified in a lump by people who have no power to discuss and examine them? How can a ratification be made by wholesale? Public acts have to be submitted to the judgment and approval of competent men; otherwise government becomes a matter of brute force.

All intelligent Haitians know that American statesmen and leaders of opinion are not aware of what is happening in Haiti. The American Nation is too great and good to tolerate such infractions of political morality. Haiti, which in July, 1918, entered the confraternity of the allied nations by declaring war on Germany, is, with the approval of American officials, in a state of anarchy, anarchy of legislation, anarchy of administration, with no Parliament to discuss the living interests of its people, with no freedom of thought, of speech, of act, deprived of justice and legality, and so undermined by disorganization of labor and by pauperism that many Haitians are emigrating to Cuba and elsewhere to look for work.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.—Major W. W. Buckley of the Marine Corps, on furlough from Haiti, reports that the native constabulary, 2,500 strong, under American officers, has attained an efficiency never dreamed of in the old days when one politician after another massacred his way to the Presidency. The constabulary, well fed and contented, dressed in khaki uniforms and wearing shoes that match, has become a well-disciplined force, and in excursions into the mountains to put down brigandage has always shown courage and resolution. Before Admiral Caperton landed marines at Port-au-Prince in July, 1915, it was not safe for white men of any nationality to go into the interior, and even in coast towns it was well to be in touch with a legation. Now white men are seldom attacked even by bandits. The treaty with the United States does not please all parties, but the people are prospering under the American "protectorate."]

Santo Domingo's Plea for Self-Government

THE other half of the island that contains the Haitian Republic is occupied by the Republic of Santo Domingo, which also is under American military occupation. United States marines were ordered to Santo Domingo on Nov. 25, 1916, because there was a threat of revolution there. The Acting President, Dr. Francisco Henriquez, took refuge in Santiago de Cuba and has been living there in exile with other ex-officials of his country. When the Peace Conference assembled in Paris he headed a delegation to present the case of Santo Domingo to that body; his plea was heard by individual delegations, but Santo Domingo was not included in the list making up the League of Nations.

On Sept. 10, 1919, a Madrid dispatch brought a brief address signed by a number of Spanish political leaders, including former Premiers Romanones and Alhucemas, suggesting that "it would be opportune at the present moment for the Spanish Government to express to the Washington Government the desire of the Dominican Government to see restored the régime annulled by the military occupation to which the country is subjected." It was noted that this address coincided with the presence in Madrid of the Dominican diplomat, Enrique Deschamps. The next day the following statement was issued in Washington by ex-President Henriquez himself, who had returned from Paris at the head of a commission which included other former Dominican officials:

It is nearly three years now that an American military Government was established in Santo Domingo, with a military occupation by American forces and the application of military laws. This military Government supplanted the National Government of the country, which has not existed since then.

Individual liberties have been greatly diminished in Santo Domingo by the action of the American military Government. There is no freedom of the press, no right of assembly, and the people cannot take any initiative to modify the situation. Some administrative reforms of great usefulness have been introduced by the military Government, but the population desires a change in the present situation and wishes to see the National Government again in native hands. At the same time, there is a desire to reorganize national institutions in accordance with advanced ideas in order to avoid any internal disturbances and to favor economic development.

In the proclamation issued by the American military Government, the people of Santo Domingo were told that the military occupation was meant to be transitory; that there was no intention to put an end to the sovereignty of the Dominican Republic; but, on the contrary, the purpose was of helping the country to return to a situation of internal order that would enable it to fulfill its obligations as a member of the family of nations upon the termination of the great war.

For that reason Dr. Francisco Henriquez y Carvajal, who went recently to Paris with the object of presenting the case of Santo Domingo to the Peace Conference, has now come to Washington in order to present to the American Government some suggestions as to a general plan that will lead to the political and administrative reorganization of the country and to the restoration of the National Government. We are fully confident that the Government of the United States will give a favorable solution to the question of the Dominican Republic.

The United States had been virtually forced to intervene by the violent disturbances and general chaos in the island. There were bandits everywhere, and the mulatto republic had become a disturber among the nations. We landed about 5,000 marines, put naval and marine officers into the chief executive posts, and took hold of the customs duties, which furnish the bulk of the revenue. Now there are less than 200 bandits left in their last refuge, Seybo, at the eastern extremity of the island. Elsewhere murder no longer stalks abroad by night and day. Military administration is strict, but the people again live in security, and honest collection of revenue has made the country again financially solvent. The United States Government has indicated a willingness to withdraw—with some reservations—whenever the Dominican Republic again produces a competent Government.

Causes of the Caporetto Disaster

Official Italian Report

THE sudden disaster which overwhelmed General Cadorna's Italian armies in the Julian Alps and along the Isonzo, beginning Oct. 24, 1917, and developing into an Austro-German invasion of Northern Italy as far as the Piave River, has since come to be known by the one word "Caporetto," the name of the town where the Italian lines first gave way. After the close of hostilities the Italian Parliament ordered an investigation into the causes of this disaster, and the committee's report was submitted to the Chamber of Deputies at Rome on Aug. 16, 1919. It lays the blame primarily upon General Cadorna and upon the Cabinet, which, it holds, should have deposed him earlier on account of serious defects in his military methods.

Dealing with Italian preparations for the war, the committee does not spare its strictures on the methods with which some classes of young officers were recruited, and, as far as arms and ammunition are concerned, it is of opinion that the Supreme Command showed lack of foresight by not procuring adequate information about the enemy's defensive organization, which, in the initial stages, succeeded in breaking the impetus of the advance and in causing losses altogether out of proportion to the results obtained. The Supreme Command failed to make the best use of the experience gained both on the French and on the Russian fronts. And in the disaster of 1917 it failed to grasp a political and military situation that pointed to the extreme probability of an offensive by the enemy. The committee extends its criticism to the insufficient results derived from the units of machine gunners, in spite of the many instances of individual gallantry; to the deficient organization of the first-assault companies; to the defective training of the troops, due to insufficient periods of rest.

Concerning the discipline and the General's relations with the officers, the committee condemns Cadorna's policy in removing officers, a policy which he carried too far, and which resulted not only in the removal of 900 high officers but also in producing a wave of fear and antagonism among a great many more. It also calls attention to the bad treatment of the troops in the way of feeding, as well as to the overtaking of their physical energy by overfrequent rounds of trench service.

It calls attention to the insufficient work of propaganda, to the lack of uniformity in discipline, and, above all, to those dreadful though short periods of harsh discipline when capital punishment was freely resorted to, often following the cruel method of decimation when individual responsibilities could not be ascertained. The committee charges Cadorna with not having properly utilized the soldiers' combative qualities, which, indeed, he depressed by keeping the men in dangerous places for too long, and by repeatedly compelling them to attack positions which had become ill-famed through the blood which they had already exacted without results. The committee maintains that, although the Italian Army had already acquired an everlasting title of glory for its valiant resistance in eleven battles, yet the dreadful impression made on the men, added to the widespread conviction of the perfect uselessness of such efforts, reached such a climax that it would have been quite sufficient by itself to determine that mental crisis which was the ultimate cause of the Caporetto disaster.

The committee recognizes that all these other causes were additional causes. Side by side with the sentimental factors, which produced a feeling of weariness and a longing for the end of the war, there were political factors, such as the particular conditions under which the Italian intervention had taken place, the weakness of the Government toward the political parties which were opposing the war, the permission granted to supporters of the Soviet to circulate freely through Italy, the repercussion of the statement that "there should not be another Winter spent in the trenches," the effect of the Turin riots and of the papal peace note. All these causes would not alone have had great consequences. It was the fault of the Cabinet then in power not to have shown the secondary importance of these non-military factors to the Supreme Command, which was prone to exaggerate the danger of the so-called "disfattismo" ("defeatism") and not to have urged the command to adopt wiser methods in handling the troops.

To state the whole matter briefly, the committee traces the chief causes of the Caporetto disaster back to the Supreme Command. Those on whom the weight of responsibility would rest most heavily would therefore be General Cadorna, for the above-stated reasons as well as for neglecting the organization of the strategic reserves and the construction of defense lines; General Porro, vice head of the General Staff, for having disregarded the necessity of inducing General Cadorna to correct his wrong methods and for having failed in his task of gathering political and military information; General Capello, head of the Second Army, for his cruel disciplinary methods, and for his persistent prodigality in shedding blood with results out of all proportion to the losses; and, finally, the Cabinet presided over by Signor Boselli, for failing to exercise proper vigilance over the morale of the army.

STRUGGLING TOWARD PEACE

THE Peace Conference started the week beginning Nov. 30 with very poor prospects of a speedy termination of its difficulties. Germany was holding up all the allied plans by refusing to sign the protocol on which the putting into force of the Peace Treaty depended; was making efforts to save her war criminals from punishment, and was adopting in general a defiant and unyielding attitude, due in great part to the failure of the American Senate to ratify the treaty and to the announcement that the American peace delegation would depart from Paris in the first week of December. The Balkan tangle was worse than ever, neither Rumania nor Serbia being willing to sign the Bulgarian treaty; the German-Russian military raid in the Baltic States was still in progress, and the fate of Fiume, Thrace, and Turkey still hung in the balance.

By the middle of December, however, the situation looked brighter. Bulgaria signed the terms dictated to her by the Entente powers; Rumania, which had long been recalcitrant, finally assented to signing the Austrian and Bulgarian treaties, as well as the special minorities treaty prepared for her, and Jugoslavia offered prospects of signing the Bulgarian and Austrian treaties within a short time.

The great stumbling block in the way of complete ratification of the German Peace Treaty was the deadlock established in the American Senate between the Democratic forces of the Administration and the Republican Senators opposed to acceptance of the document without drastic reservations. After the treaty's rejection by the Senate on Nov. 19 President Wilson was expected to resubmit it at the December session; this, however, he refused to do, and his attitude left the Republican opposition, led by Senator Lodge, in a dilemma, as the general Republican feeling was averse to making the question of ratification with reservations an issue in the coming Presidential campaign; besides, a general desire for peace was being voiced throughout the country. Both parties were working for a compromise, and there were strong indications when these pages went to press that an adjustment on the basis of milder reservations would be reached.

Meanwhile the failure of the Senate to push the treaty through emboldened the Germans in their negotiations with the Supreme Council, whose path was beset with new and special difficulties on account of the American situation. Germany, however, finally yielded, and the possibility of securing the ratification of the whole treaty, including the special protocol articles concerned with compensation for the Scapa Flow sinkings, looked more promising by the middle of December than it had looked before.

Besides the treaty itself, and the League of Nations covenant intertwined with it, the fate of the triple pact entered into by Great Britain, France, and America was left indefinite through the Senate's failure to ratify the Versailles document. The attitude of both France and Great Britain in respect to this pact was one of waiting. Meanwhile the negotiations with Germany proceeded, uninterrupted by the departure of the American peace delegation, which left Paris on Dec. 9, and there were no signs of a definitive adjournment of the Peace Conference as long as the diplomatic issue with Germany remained acute. A supplementary conference was begun in London on Dec. 11 between the British and French Premiers and the Italian Foreign Minister, at which many subjects of great importance were discussed, including the vexed question of Fiume and the ultimate disposition of Turkey. The machinery for an international military force under Marshal Foch also was created.

AMERICAN MISSION DEPARTS

It had seemed probable in November that the Peace Conference would reach the end of its labors early in December and permanently adjourn. New complications, however, which arose over the German protocol made the continuance of the conference imperative. The American delegation, nevertheless, reiterated its intention of departing in the first week of December, and consented to remain until Dec. 9 only at the urgent request of France, supported sympathetically in this by Great Britain and Italy. The ground given for this request was the fear that the Germans would construe the Americans' departure as evidence of a lack of unity among the peace-making powers. The anticipated withdrawal of the Americans was attacked bitterly by French newspapers, including the Paris Figaro, which declared that America was continuing to follow her traditional policy of "jealous isolation," and that Germany was already preparing to resist the terms of the treaty, because of the attitude of the United States Senate and the withdrawal of the American delegation. Fears that the Ebert Government would be overthrown by the Pan-Germans and Spartacists, emboldened by the new turn of events, were variously expressed. Undeterred by these attacks, the delegation, headed by Frank Polk, left Paris on the last date fixed, reaching New York Dec. 20, and the allied powers were left to deal with the Germans as best they could without American assistance.

ASK REASON FOR DELAY

The Supreme Council had been greatly surprised toward the end of November by the sudden departure of the German Protocol Commission, headed by Herr von Simson, three days after its arrival. The attitude of von Simson, supported by Baron von Lersner, head of the German peace delegation, had been aggressive from the start, and he had attempted to use the American situation as an offset to the allied demands for the expatriation of the German war criminals. Failing in this, he suddenly left Paris with his staff. Baron von Lersner on Nov. 24 sent a note to the council explaining this action of von Simson as due to the desire to put the protocol directly before the German Assembly. Meanwhile there arrived the news that the American Senate had adjourned without ratifying the Peace Treaty.

At this juncture the council dispatched a note to Germany which had been drafted on Nov. 22, and which was provided with a postscript of date Nov. 24, when it was finally sent. This note called on Germany to make known her intentions with regard to signing the protocol, pointed out that Germany's delay laid her open to the imputation of insincerity, declared that the repatriation of German war prisoners was directly contingent on the delay in signing the protocol, and expressed great surprise over the departure of von Simson. The note concluded as follows:

The Supreme Council desires to know how the German Government stands in this matter and it throws on that Government the whole responsibility for the delay caused by it in the restoration of the state of peace.

PRISONERS IN FRANCE

The subject of German war prisoners in France had been brought up by the Berlin Government on Nov. 10, when it sent a note to the council urging a speedy return of these captives, whose retention and treatment it denounced as inhumane and unjust, since Germany had done her best to comply with the hard terms of the armistice expressly on the understanding that she would thus secure favorable action in the matter of repatriation of German prisoners.

A wireless message from Berlin under date of Nov. 25 gave the text of the allied reply to this protest. The reply, signed by M. Clemenceau, as President of the Peace Conference, was sent to the Chairman of the German delegation at Versailles, and was in substance a stern refusal to deviate from the terms of the Peace Treaty in favor of German prisoners employed in reconstruction work in Northern France. Referring to the brutal treatment meted out to the populations of this district under the German occupation, M. Clemenceau said:

The deepest sentiments of the human heart have been so cruelly injured that French public opinion cannot agree to grant the favor you request.

The allied reply further declared that Germany had systematically delayed performance of the armistice terms, and instanced the sinking of the warships in Scapa Flow, delay in the delivery of German ships, Germany's Baltic policy, and anti-Entente propaganda in Alsace and the world at large, and concluded thus:

We owe nothing to Germany except the precise fulfillment of the provisions of the Peace Treaty accepted by Germany.

SHARP REPLY TO LERSNER

A further interchange of notes between Baron von Lersner and M. Clemenceau was made public on Dec. 1. In the German note von Lersner said that Germany had made concessions in the case of the killing of Sergeant Mannheim and in the matter of coal delivery because of promised favorable treatment on the question of prisoners. He accused France of making innocent prisoners pay for pretended derelictions on the part of the German Government, and declared that the laws of war had been applied to the prisoners with pitiless severity.

In his reply M. Clemenceau said that Baron von Lersner's letter contained a series of statements "whose incisive tone cannot mask their inaccuracy." That France had given any promises in connection with either of the two matters referred to by von Lersner, M. Clemenceau emphatically denied. The charge that the German war prisoners had received any but kind and humane treatment was denied subsequently by the French Premier, who added that Germany, by her unceasing delays, was herself responsible for the retention of the prisoners.

GERMAN WAR CRIMES

Another subject which occasioned an interchange of notes was that of the extradition of the German war criminals.

Correspondence made public on Dec. 2 expressed, on the part of M. Clemenceau, indignation at the work of destruction systematically carried out by the Germans in North France and Belgium, and inability to understand Germany's hesitation to consent to reparation for these crimes. M. Clemenceau further said:

If the same impartial observer then heard from the mouths of the inhabitants the tale of the treatment to which they were subjected for four years and the violence and abominable constraints imposed on young girls brutally separated from their families, he would be unable to restrain his indignation in face of the attitude of Germany and the arrogant tone of your letters * * * Until the German public conscience understands, as all the rest of the world does, that wrong must be righted and criminals punished, Germany must not expect to enter the communion of nations or to obtain from the Allies forgetfulness of her crimes or modification of just peace conditions.

THE SCAPA FLOW SINKINGS

A German note regarding the sinking of interned warships at Scapa Flow came before the Supreme Council on Nov. 28. It held that the Allies themselves, by interning the ships in an allied instead of a neutral port, were responsible for the scuttling, inasmuch as Admiral von Reuter had been deprived of means of communicating with Germany, and believed that the armistice ended at noon on June 21; in accordance with maritime law he had then sunk the ships in anticipation of a renewal of war. Furthermore, the note declared that as a prisoner of war von Reuter had lost his naval command, and the German Government incurred no responsibility for his actions. In conclusion, the memorandum proposed that the question be submitted to The Hague tribunal for arbitration.

Official public comment on this disclaiming by Germany of her responsibility was made by the publication by Great Britain on Dec. 3 of two striking letters, one from Admiral von Trotha, Chief of the German Admiralty, the other from Admiral von Reuter. These letters had been found in July by the British in Admiral von Reuter's safe in the salvage operations on the German flagship Emden. The letter from von Reuter, dated June 17, 1919, and addressed "To Commanding Officers," gave explicit instructions regarding the sinking. Trotha's letter, dated May 9, 1919, marked "Most Secret," and addressed to Admiral von Reuter, was said by the British Admiralty, which was preparing photographs of it, to disprove entirely the German statement that orders from the Berlin Government failed entirely to reach Admiral von Reuter during the time when his ships were at Scapa Flow. Though couched in guarded phrases, the whole import of this letter, especially one phrase, "Their surrender to the enemy remains out of question," pointed to the solution which von Reuter subsequently adopted. Its transmission to von Reuter was explained by the arrival of certain German ships bringing supplies to the crews at Scapa Flow. The letter was republished in Berlin on Dec. 5 by the German Government, with a denial that it signified that Admiral von Reuter should scuttle the ships. The British Admiralty's contention that the German Government was in communication with von Reuter before the scuttling remained unshaken.

GERMAN CRISIS BEGINS

On Dec. 1, the day on which the allied powers had expected to begin putting the Treaty of Versailles into operation, Baron von Lersner notified the Supreme Council that Germany refused to sign the protocol unless the Scapa Flow demands were eliminated from the document, and suggested arbitration. His communication also declared that the clause of the protocol authorizing the invasion of Germany was impossible of acceptance.

With this downright refusal the situation became more critical than it had been at any time since last June, when the resumption of military action against Germany hung upon the action of the Weimar National Assembly. General Foch at once called Sir Henry Wilson, chief of the British General Staff, into conference at Paris. Andrew Bonar Law, Government leader in the House of Commons, said on Dec. 4 at Glasgow that Germany, profiting by the inaction of the American Senate, was trying to evade the terms. Speaking for the British Government, he declared that the Allies had the power, and would use it if necessary, to make it certain that the allied terms would be carried into effect by Germany. Both diplomacy and economic threats having failed, it was stated, the last recourse was to be had in the military invasion of Germany to bring her to terms.

VON LERSNER DEFIANT

Informed on Dec. 6 that the council was about to dispatch an "ultimatum" to Germany, von Lersner stated that the reply of his Government would depend wholly on the content of this communication and its tone. He further said that if the note was "reasonable" he would transmit it with a recommendation that the National Assembly consider it. Germany, he declared, on no consideration, would surrender the German officers accused of crimes. Two notes were finally delivered to him on Dec. 8 and transmitted by him to his Government.

The first of these two notes denied the German demands for modification of the treaty clauses relating to the surrender of Germans charged with crimes against the usages of international warfare and to the return of prisoners. It agreed to consider the economic effects on Germany of the indemnities required for the sinking of the warships at Scapa Flow "in a spirit of equity, after a hearing by the Reparation Commission." It warned Germany "for the last time" that denunciation of the armistice would give the allied armies all latitude for necessary military measures, and then added: "In this spirit we await without delay signature of the protocol and the exchange of ratification." It further waived the so-called coercion clauses of the protocol, on the ground that the signing and ratification of the treaty would make the latter effective, and that the execution of the protocol would be guaranteed by the general terms of the treaty and by ordinarily recognized methods. It rejected, however, the Germans' pretended right to modification of the treaty clauses as compensation for the absence of Americans from the commissions, and declared that it was "vain for Germany to seek to delay" the treaty's effectiveness because of the position of America in respect to membership on these commissions.

The second note dealt entirely with the Scapa Flow incident. It placed the responsibility for the sinking upon the Germans, and saw in the protest only "an attempt, difficult to explain, to delay the treaty." It cited the secret message sent in May, 1919, by Admiral von Trotha to Admiral von Reuter, and quoted, among other phrases, the one telling the latter that the disposition of the ships "cannot be decided without us, it will be finished by us, and delivery to the enemy avoided." The council's proposal of arbitration regarding the Scapa Flow indemnity had been embodied in the first note.

NOSKE TRUCULENT

On the day these two notes were delivered to von Lersner, Gustav Noske, German Minister of Defense, said boldly in Berlin that the Allies' plan meant not peace, but the prolongation of war, and that it behooved Germany to resist. His country, he declared, would never sign the protocol as drawn. Acceptance of the allied terms would rouse all Germany to vengeance. The situation could not be worse if the Hohenzollerns had remained in power. He added:

If the United States stays out, the commissions established under the Peace Treaty will be taken over by the other Allies. If that means more Frenchmen, it would be most injurious to German interests and we should not agree.

The French doubtless will march into Germany. Let that come. The Allies know that Germany is without means of resistance. Allied officers are all over the country. Spies are shuffling about everywhere. All the scare talk about German armament is a deliberate press campaign to prepare public opinion for aggression.

It was in the midst of the threatening situation thus created that the American peace delegation left Paris on Dec. 9. Despite the somewhat hostile attitude of certain papers, the departure was made under good auspices. M. Clemenceau and General Foch accompanied the American delegates to the station, and bade them farewell, while large crowds shouted "Vive l'Amérique!" Before leaving, Mr. Polk, the head of the delegation, dictated a statement to one of the leading Paris papers, expressing his regrets at the necessity for departure, likewise his conviction that Germany would sign the protocol. The French press, in bidding him farewell, voiced its belief that he and his colleagues had done everything in their power to secure ratification of the treaty.

GERMANY SURRENDERS

The German reply to the Supreme Council's note demanding the signing of the peace protocol was received in Paris on Dec. 15. After a session held the following day, the Supreme Council announced that the reply was "generally satisfactory." It was referred to the allied and German experts, who at once began the elaboration of details. Agreement was understood to be practically certain. Berlin's reply met all the allied demands unreservedly except that which concerned payment for the ships at Scapa Flow. Germany agreed to accept responsibility for payment on the warships sunk, but explained to the Allied Council that she could not at that time surrender the 400,000 tons of maritime equipment demanded. The text of the German note was as follows:

The German Government desires to dissipate the misunderstanding that, owing to the momentary absence of American delegates from the commissions provided for by the Peace Treaty, Germany claimed modifications and dispositions of the treaty concerning the extradition of persons charged with culpability in acts contrary to military law, or the repatriation of prisoners.

The German Government, previous to receiving the allied note, had already explained the reasons why it would appear necessary to modify the conditions for the execution of those clauses, but the German Government never made its assent for the putting into force of the Peace Treaty conditional upon a previous solution of that question.

The German Government maintains its opinion that the best means to reach a solution of the Scapa Flow incident would have been to submit the case to international arbitration at The Hague. Such a measure would not have delayed putting the treaty into force, or the signing of the protocol thus modified.

Desirous, however, of doing its utmost for the early re-establishment of peace, the German Government declares itself ready to make reparations for the damages caused to the allied and associated Governments by the destruction of the ships.

But the German Government is unable to effect such reparations in the manner demanded by the protocol of Nov. 1, because the execution of the demands formulated in that protocol would compromise irretrievably Germany's economic life and also render impossible of execution the other enormous obligations which the treaty imposes on Germany.

The German Government will formulate, through experts, positive detailed propositions showing a mode of reparation which, although adding a new and heavy burden on Germany in its present situation, is not altogether incompatible with its vital interests.

So the tenseness of the international situation was relaxed, and official circles in Paris, greatly relieved, looked forward to a speedy ratification of both protocol and treaty. Further obstacles in the arrangement of details arose, however, and on Dec. 19 an official statement named Jan. 1 as the nearest probable date of settlement.

A German delegation of shipping experts had reached Paris Dec. 15 with a view to adjusting details of the protocol settlement. It was presided over by Herr Seelinger, a member of the commercial department of the German Foreign Ministry, the other members being representatives of various steamship lines and shipyards, and one representative of three groups of seamen. The first sessions of this new delegation with the allied experts led to no result, as the Germans declared they had no power to negotiate for the handing over of more than 200,000 tons of shipping and docking materials, of the 400,000 tons demanded, in reparation for the Scapa Flow sinkings.

BULGARIAN TREATY SIGNED

The treaty of the allied and associated powers with Bulgaria was signed on Nov. 27 at Neuilly, just outside of Paris. The ceremony was wholly lacking in the pomp that attended the signing of the treaties of Versailles and St. Germain. The Commissioner who signed for Bulgaria was M. Stambulinski. It was this Bulgarian statesman, a man of peasant origin and the leader of the peasant party in Bulgaria, who, when Bulgaria turned on her allies and joined her fortunes with the Central Powers, warned King Ferdinand that he was signing his death warrant. The signature which he affixed to the treaty was, in a way, the justification of his own judgment.

The ceremony of signing was simple. Premier Clemenceau, addressing M. Stambulinski, said: "We are here to sign the treaty between the Allies and Bulgaria. Here is the treaty you are to sign."

Stambulinski, the incarnation of the popular conception of a Bulgar, with his heavy frame, thick black hair and upturned mustache, rose and affixed his signature to the treaty. He was followed by Mr. Polk, head of the American delegation, who looked tired and worn. A puzzled murmur among the delegates was their only comment on the apparent incongruity of America's representatives signing a treaty with a country on which America had never officially declared war. The other delegates followed.

The representatives of two of the allied powers, Serbia and Rumania, were missing, though both powers were highly important for the restoration of order in the Balkan peninsula, which the Bulgarian treaty was intended to establish. Both Serbia and Rumania, themselves enemies, had refused to sign the Austrian treaty because of their objection to the provisions for the protection of racial minorities, and the signature of the treaty with Austria was made a condition of the signing of the Bulgarian treaty by the allied powers; hence the absence of the Serbian and Rumanian delegates from the Neuilly ceremony.

TERMS OF THE TREATY

By the conditions of the Treaty of Neuilly, Bulgaria is called upon to surrender all works of art and valuables taken from allied countries during the war and to pay an indemnity of approximately $445,000,000. She is deprived of Thrace and also loses Strumitza, a small triangular section of territory, the latter being assigned to Serbia. Proposals which would give Bulgaria a corridor through Thrace to the Aegean are left to the future disposition of the allied Governments. The boundary between Rumania and Bulgaria is changed in only minor details.

Compulsory military service in Bulgaria is abolished by the treaty terms, the Bulgarian Army being limited to 20,000 men, with a gendarmerie, or police force, not exceeding 10,000. All arms and ammunition exceeding the amounts laid down by the treaty must be turned over to the Allies. A commission composed of allied representatives has power to punish crimes committed by Bulgarians during the war, and also to deal with the repatriation of prisoners.

JUGOSLAVIA AND AUSTRIA

M. Clemenceau's intimation to the Yugoslav delegates that they would not be allowed to sign the Bulgarian treaty unless they first signed the allied treaty with Austria provoked an outburst of indignation in the Belgrade newspapers, some of which even counseled the Government to refuse definitely to sign the Bulgarian treaty rather than accept the humiliating minority clauses of the treaty with Austria. Some of the comment was extremely bitter, recalling the Yugoslav victories and asserting that the minority clauses were inserted in the Austrian treaty at the instance of Italy, whose ambitions in the Adriatic were well known; by signing the treaty with these clauses, it was insisted, Yugoslavia would lay herself open to constant interference from Italy in internal affairs.

Nevertheless it had been agreed by the Yugoslav delegates that they would sign the Austrian treaty on Nov. 26, but when the day came they failed to do so on the ground that, after examination of the various annexes, they found that they did not possess the requisite powers. They were then given eight days to secure this authorization, which they expected to receive within the limit set. The annexes in question provided for the protection of racial minorities, reparations concerning Italy, and a financial arrangement regarding the sharing of the expense of liberation from the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy. Prince Alexander of Serbia, Prince Regent of Yugoslavia, arrived in Paris on Dec. 1 to discuss the difficulties in the way of his

RUMANIA AT THE CROSSROADS

The innumerable notes that passed between Rumania and the allied powers regarding her whole attitude of defiance of the Supreme Council have been reproduced or analyzed from month to month in these pages. Regarding Rumania's signing of the treaty with Austria, the council on Nov. 20 sent a note to the former country, which, after praising the services rendered by Rumania during the war, brought up anew the difficulties which Rumania had placed in the way of signing that treaty. The communication also asked whether Rumania intended to follow or to abandon the policy of the Allies; if the former, she must sign the Austrian treaty at once; if the latter, she would be considered as having withdrawn voluntarily from the alliance. Both this note and a previous note of Nov. 15 (the ninth) asked that Rumania declare her intentions regarding the withdrawal of her troops from Hungary, and the deduction of the value of the material requisitioned by her in the latter country from the total reparation due her.

Having received no reply to either of these communications, the Supreme Council on Dec. 3 dispatched a new communication, in the nature of an ultimatum, reviewing Rumania's repeated failures to comply with the allied desires in the various matters involved, and giving her a further time limit, to expire Dec. 8, in which to make full and satisfactory reply, with a strong implication that noncompliance would mean a definitive severing of relations.

RUMANIA FINALLY SIGNS

Rumania's consent to sign came as a dramatic incident of the departure of the American peace delegation from Paris on Dec. 9. It was after 7 o'clock in the evening. Outside waited the automobiles that were to take Mr. Polk and his staff to the station. There came a telephone message, saying that the Rumanians were willing to sign the minority treaty, and asking whether he would sign it before his departure. He replied in the affirmative. The treaty, which had been completed by noon, had been printed and bound; it was brought to the Hotel Crillon, and Mr. Polk, Mr. White, and General Bliss signed it. The Rumanian delegates affixed their signatures to the minority treaty on the following day, as well as to the Austrian and Bulgarian treaties. At the same time the Bucharest delegates declared their country's willingness to withdraw from Hungary to the boundary line laid down by the Peace Conference last June.

This decision of Rumania to recede from her defiance of the Peace Conference removed one of the ugliest problems of European politics, and one of the most protracted and vexatious inter-allied conflicts which the Supreme Council had had to face.

THE LONDON CONFERENCE

A series of conferences between Premier Clemenceau, Premier Lloyd George, and the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Signor Scialoja, took place in London beginning Dec. 11. Matters discussed were the situation in Russia, America's position in respect to ratification of the German treaty, and problems of European reconstruction, including Fiume and Turkey, the coal famine in France, and France's financial situation, which was considered critical. The results of the conferences were not officially given out, but semi-officially the main issues were divulged in Paris on M. Clemenceau's return. In an inspired article in the French governmental organ, Le Temps, the subjects discussed were listed one by one, and it was plainly intimated that none of these problems could be solved without the aid of America. The United States, it declared, was involved in European affairs in general, whether the Senate wished it or no, and hence possessed the right to take all the precautions necessary to protect American interests.

One definite result of the London conference was the decision to create an inter-allied army, under the direction of General Foch as Chief of the General Staff at Versailles. It will be remembered that when the League of Nations covenant was taking shape, France fought for such an international police force, and President Wilson opposed it. Later, at the Peace Conference, France sought the establishment of an international force to compel Germany to live up to the terms of the Treaty of Versailles. Again this project was opposed by the Americans, and it was temporarily abandoned. That the scheme was finally put through at London, in connection with the discussion of American participation in the Peace Treaty as the one big issue, was regarded as significant of the adoption of a middle-of-the-road policy, enabling the Allies to meet the possibility either of America's co-operation or of America's refusal to co-operate. Every indication pointed, however, to an earnest desire for the ratification of the treaty by the United States, with or without reservations; as Le Temps expressed it: "All the problems of peace are dominated by one prime necessity, and that is to obtain the ratification of the Versailles Treaty by the United States."

D'Annunzio's Adventure Drawing to an End

Fiume Problem Near Settlement

THE Fiume situation had reached a point at the close of the second week in December where a final agreement seemed to be within reach. Gabriele d'Annunzio and his irregular forces continued to hold the disputed Adriatic port, but after his raid on Zara the "poet-soldier" had refrained from further exploits and had shown a willingness to listen to the proposals of the Italian Government. At length it was announced, though not officially confirmed, that d'Annunzio and his followers had consented to evacuate Fiume and allow the city to be occupied by regular Italian Army forces pending an agreement with the Entente.

Attempts to solve the knotty problem continued both before and after this tentative step toward a solution. Premier Nitti and Foreign Minister Tittoni had formulated what they regarded as Italy's maximum concessions regarding Fiume, and had transmitted them to President Wilson at Washington. These terms were stated unofficially to provide that Italy should receive the part of Istria forming a triangle with its extreme point at Velossa, the line running through the Alps to Monte Maggiore, thence to Fisona. Fiume, with some territory to the north, together with some of the islands in the Gulf of Quarnero, was to become a buffer State, with a special status; Italy was to have no jurisdiction over its foreign affairs, but Fiume's Italianity was to be recognized and guarded. Zara was to be constituted a free city and port, represented in its foreign affairs by Italy.

This proposal failed to receive the indorsement of President Wilson, and Fiume continued to be a debated question at the important conference of Premiers and Ministers held in London in the middle of December, when the new Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Signor Scialoja, was present to aid in the discussion of this subject.

A clear idea of the American proposal and of how it differs from the line laid down by the secret treaty of London in 1915 is furnished by the accompanying sketch-map. The map was submitted to The London Times by a committee of the Serbian Society of Great Britain and was accompanied by an open letter stating that the society had passed resolutions to the effect that "the territorial solution advocated by President Wilson is the only equitable compromise between Italian and Yugoslav claims and should be upheld at all costs by the Supreme Council." Referring to the map, the communication stated:

It will be seen that the Wilson line assigns to Italy Gorizia, Trieste, and Pola, Central Istria with the railway connecting the two latter towns, and the island of Lussin, which has an Italian majority. On the other hand, it leaves to Yugoslavia the port of Fiume-Susak (which contains a Yugoslav, not an Italian, majority), the railway from St. Peter to Fiume (Slovenia's only direct access to the sea), and the overwhelming Yugoslav province of Dalmatia (in which the Italians form 3 per cent. of the population), while the town of Zara, on its isthmus, receives special autonomy.

This line has been reached as the result of exhaustive inquiry on the part of the American experts at the conference, and represents the only fair compromise between ethnography and strategy. It has the great advantage of reducing to a minimum the possibilities of aggression on either side. As it assigns over 300,000 Yugoslavs to Italy, and less than 45,000 Italians to Yugoslavia (24,000 of these in Fiume itself), it will be seen that a very severe sacrifice is being demanded of the Yugoslavs.

On Nov. 24, following the action of the United States on the Italian proposals, the resignation of Foreign Minister Tittoni had been announced in Rome, and Vittorio Scialoja had been named to take his place. Two days later the Supreme Council in Paris received a note from the Yugoslav delegation stating that the Adriatic situation was likely to oblige Yugoslavia to take military measures against further encroachments. In Yugoslav official circles it was declared that war between Yugoslavia and Italy was unavoidable if d'Annunzio attempted further advances. In Laibach a large body paraded carrying banners inscribed: "D'Annunzio must be hanged!" and "Down With Italians!" In London, however, it was said that the British Government had given Yugoslavia assurances that Great Britain's influence would be used to obtain a just settlement of the Adriatic question.

At a meeting in Milan, at which all the Socialist Deputies of Italy participated, resolutions were passed calling upon the Government to suppress d'Annunzio's enterprises in Dalmatia.

On Dec. 7 it seemed that the Fiume question was approaching a satisfactory settlement when it was stated in Rome that d'Annunzio had assured the Italian Government that he would undertake no new expeditions, and would not go beyond the armistice line. Major Giuriati, Chief of the Cabinet of d'Annunzio, accompanied by Commander Rizzo of the poet-soldier's naval forces, arrived in Rome bearing d'Annunzio's suggestions for a settlement of the Fiume and Zara questions.

Although Premier Nitti refused to make any statement regarding the Adriatic situation, it was announced in Trieste on Dec. 13 that an agreement with the Italian Government had been reached, and that d'Annunzio would leave Fiume with his troops, which were to be replaced by Italian regulars under General Caviglia, a former Italian Minister of War. The formal transfer of the city was planned for an early date, but, according to Washington advices, this occupation was to be merely in the nature of an Italian trusteeship pending a final decision by the Entente powers.

D'Annunzio was quoted as stating that all his ambitions in regard to Fiume had been attained, and that an agreement signed with Premier Nitti was a full guarantee. The poet's troops, according to the agreement, were to return to the ranks of the Italian Army. Their departure from the city was delayed, however, by appeals from the Italian citizens of Fiume, and the question of fulfilling the agreement was at length referred to a plebiscite—which was postponed and abandoned. It was generally understood, however, that the end of d'Annunzio's adventure was in sight.

CURRENT HISTORY IN BRIEF

THE FOURTEENTH CENSUS.

THE following interesting proclamation by President Wilson regarding the Fourteenth Decennial Census, which is to begin Jan. 2, 1920, was signed by him on Dec. 10:

Whereas, By the Act of Congress approved March 3, 1919, the Fourteenth Decennial Census of the United States is to be taken beginning on the second day of January, 1920; and

Whereas, A correct enumeration of the population every ten years is required by the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of determining the representation of the several States in the House of Representatives; and

Whereas, It is of the utmost importance to the interests of all the people of the United States that this census should be a complete and accurate report of the population and resources of the nation;

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby declare and make known that, under the law aforesaid, it is the duty of every person to answer all questions on the census schedules applying to him and the family to which he belongs, and to the farm occupied by him or his family, and that any person refusing to do so is subject to penalty.

The sole purpose of the census is to secure general statistical information regarding the population and resources of the country, and replies are required from individuals only to permit the compilation of such general statistics. No person can be harmed in any way by furnishing the information required. The census has nothing to do with taxation, with military or jury service, with the compulsion of school attendance, with the regulation of immigration, or with the enforcement of any national, State, or local law or ordinance. There need be no fear that any disclosure will be made regarding any individual person or his affairs. For the due protection of the rights and interests of the persons furnishing information every employee of the Census Bureau is prohibited, under heavy penalty, from disclosing any information which may thus come to his knowledge.

I therefore earnestly urge upon all persons to answer promptly, completely, and accurately all inquiries addressed to them by the enumerators or other employees of the Census Bureau, and thereby to contribute their share toward making this great and necessary public undertaking a success.

PROHIBITION IN THE UNITED STATES

PROHIBITION was substantially strengthened by a unanimous decision handed down by the United States Supreme Court sustaining the constitutionality of wartime prohibition. By this decision the sale of liquor, which had been resumed at a few points on account of decisions of District Federal Judges, became illegal everywhere in the country, and the prohibition regulations were rigidly enforced.

The Supreme Court held that Congress did not intend the wartime act to terminate on the conclusion of the war, but at the end of the period of demobilization. The "conclusion of the war clearly did not mean cessation of hostilities," the court said: "Congress, therefore, provided that the time when the act ceased to be operative should be fixed by the President's ascertaining and proclaiming the date when demobilization had terminated."

Had the President on Oct. 28, when he vetoed the Volstead act, believed that demobilization had terminated, the court says, "he would doubtless have issued then a proclamation to that effect, for he had maintained a strong conviction that restriction upon the sale of liquor should end. Only by such proclamation could the purpose of Congress be attained and the serious consequences attending uncertainty be obviated."

"In view of facts of public knowledge," the opinion reads, "some of which have been referred to, that the treaty of peace has not yet been concluded; that the railways are still under national control by virtue of the war powers; that other war activities have not been brought to a close, and that it cannot even be said that the man power of the nation has been restored to a peace footing, we are unable to conclude that the act has ceased to be valid."

The liquor interests suffered another severe disappointment on Dec. 16 when the House Agricultural Committee, by a vote of 16 to 3, tabled a resolution to recommend repeal of wartime prohibition.

In consequence of these decisions it seemed unlikely that there would be any "wet" period before the constitutional prohibition amendment went into effect on Jan. 16, 1920, unless the Peace Treaty was ratified and peace formally proclaimed by the President before the latter date.

The liquor interests instituted suits to obtain a ruling by the United States Supreme Court on the prohibitive constitutional amendment. It was stated that the value of whisky in bond in the United States exceeded $300,000,000. Suits for compensation were announced by some distillers. It was announced that if the wartime ban was not lifted by proclamation before the end of the year the stocks of liquor in this country would be exported to Cuba for storage, exports being also forbidden after Jan. 16, 1920.

GERMAN INTELLECTUALS RECANT

THE famous declaration made by ninety-three German University professors, literary men, artists, and musical composers, on Oct. 14, 1914, addressed to the learned men of other countries as a sweeping denial of the stories of atrocities charged against Germany in France and Belgium, has been refocused into public notice in Germany by the activities of Dr. Hans Wehberg, one of the best known German pacifists, who has communicated with all the signers still living to ascertain their attitude toward that manifesto after the close of the war. The essence of the original document was contained in six paragraphs, beginning with the words: "It is not true." The charges so categorically denied were that Germany had caused the war; that it had criminally violated Belgium's neutrality; that any Belgian citizen's life or property had been touched except in direct self-defense; that the German soldiers had proceeded brutally at Louvain, that the German conduct of the war had infringed the law of nations, and that "a fight against Germany's so-called militarism was not also a fight against German Kultur." This manifesto was prepared by a small group of men at Berlin, among whom were Professors Harnack, von Liszt, Emil Fischer, and Gustav Schmoller, the last three now dead; the author, Ludwig Fulda; the painter, Max Liebermann; the composer, Humperdinck, and Burgomaster Reicke.

Of all the signers, no less than 15 have died. Some of the others were ill, and could not answer Dr. Wehberg on this account, but the 23 from whom no response was received included also a number who preferred to maintain absolute silence. In all Dr. Wehberg received 55 answers to his inquiries. Of that number only 16 defended their signature of the manifesto. These included Professors Eduard Meyer, the historian, now Rector of Berlin University; Professor Lenz of the new university at Hamburg, Professor Dorpfeld, and Siegfried Wagner, the composer and son of the greater Wagner. The 39 others heard from admitted that they would now by no means stand by everything in the address. Herbert Eulenberg, the writer, declared that he was willing to withdraw his signature entirely. Carl Hauptmann, brother of Gerhart Hauptmann, declared: "In view of my deviation at that time from personal trustworthiness, for the rest of my life I take warning against the rash herd-instinct which has made fools of men for thousands of years."

PRESIDENT WILSON IN PARIS

RAY STANNARD BAKER, head of the United States Official Press Bureau, has published a small book, "What Wilson Did at Paris," giving an inside view of the President's struggle against the tortuous methods of European diplomacy. In this book he cites at least five separate crises which the President dominated, showing how Mr. Wilson waged a grim fight against hostile French criticism in the press, against all the discouragements of almost irreconcilable national interests in such matters as the disposal of the German colonies, of Fiume, and of the Shantung Peninsula, and against repeated opposition to the incorporation of the League of Nations covenant in the Peace Treaty with Germany. Ever grimmer and grayer, with nervous twitchings of his face after many hours of daily interviews and discussions with committees and deputations, he stuck to his task, deprived of all exercise, all recreation, the centre of universal attack, and attained the idealistic objects, as far at least as they could be obtained, for which he had striven. In the course of his study Mr. Baker says:

He worked everybody else to a standstill. Sometimes he would have two meetings going on at the same time. Once I found a meeting of the council of the Big Four going on in his study, and a meeting of the financial and economic experts—twenty or thirty of them—in full session upstairs in the drawing room, and the President oscillating between them.

It was he who was always the driver, the initiator at Paris; he worked longer hours, had more appointments, granted himself less recreation than any other man, high or low, at the Peace Conference. For he was the central figure there. At the same time he continued to live with a simplicity that was almost rigorous; although he occupied the very centre of the world's great stage, with the eyes of all humanity watching every move he made, he lived almost the life of an anchorite. Sometimes in the evening I used to find him in the study of his house, a dark, richly furnished room looking out upon a little patch of walled garden, with an American sentinel pacing up and down the passageway. Mrs. Wilson's sitting room was opposite this study. Some day there will be written an account of the incalculable help and comfort that Mrs. Wilson was to the President in those trying days.

The President went to Paris the great moral leader of the world, and throughout the conference he never for a moment lost sight of the ideals he came to fight for; he kept his vision clear, but he was willing to face the world as it is, a real world of imperfect human beings, torn by passion and fear, and yet a world in which, after all, we have to live.

BOLSHEVIST PROPAGANDA IN EAST

THE Bolshevik-Turco-Afghan combination in the Near East has met with a check in the case of Bokhara. Its principal emissary, the Turk Kazim Beg, barely escaped from Bokhara with his life in November, and fled to Tashkent, the capital of the Turkestan Soviet Republic, after urging the Emir of Bokhara to join the combination mentioned in bringing pressure to bear upon Persia to enter a pan-Islamic Democratic Union.

WHERE RUSSIAN BOLSHEVIKI ARE CARRYING ON AN ACTIVE PROPAGANDA

After the flight of Kazim Beg, the requests were changed virtually to threats, and the Emir on Nov. 14 was said to have torn up the railway twelve miles on both sides of Bokhara as a measure of self-protection. The Bolsheviks, meanwhile, who were firmly established at Kizil Arvat, on the Trans-Caspia Railway, threatened the road to Krasnovodsk, the terminus of the Caspian Railroad. The leading newspaper of Teheran, which had previously praised the Indian Government's action in relaxing control of Afghan foreign policy, sharply criticised the reported intention of the Afghan Mission at Moscow to go through Germany to Paris, saying:

If the Afghans are going to use their freedom in foreign relations for these purposes their diplomats are not to be congratulated. If they intend to introduce themselves as the Bolshevik vanguard in Central Asia they will lose the friendship of their co-religionists and neighbors.

According to an account published in The London Times on Nov. 21, relating the experiences of a traveler through Turkestan and Trans-Caspia, who spent several weeks at Tashkent, the people of Turkestan were for the most part heartily sick of Bolshevism, but the Soviets were strong in the towns, and the railway to Merv and the Caspian was strongly garrisoned by Red troops. The Turkestan Bolsheviks were rejoiced at the reopening of direct communication with Soviet Russia, whence they expected to receive large supplies of food. Over the Trans-Caspian line the trains were not infrequently stopped in the middle of the desert while the Bolshevik train staff robbed the passengers. Five Indian merchants from Merv were robbed of 2,000,000 rubles, and two of these were brutally murdered. In Bokhara and Khiva conditions were better, owing to the repudiation of the Bolshevik doctrines by both the people and their rulers. The Reds, however, were conscripting Turcomans and other Mussulmans by force. To avoid this many thousands of Turcomans had fled with their families into Persia and Northwest Afghanistan. In their propaganda campaign the Bolsheviks were trying to prove that the theories of Bolshevism were in accord with the teachings of the Koran. Kazim Beg, who accompanied the German Mission to Afghanistan in 1913, was one of the chief promoters of this propaganda.

Incidentally Lenin and other leaders of the Central Soviet are also intriguing in the Far East. A Korean delegation was on its way to Moscow toward the end of November, and hopes of support for Bolshevism in China were being entertained. The activity of the Reds on the Siberian-Mongolian frontier has long been known. According to Peking reports the Bolsheviks had asked the provincial authorities of Sinkiang (Chinese Turkestan, Kulja, and Kashgaria) to send them an accredited envoy. They also proposed to open negotiations with the Peking authorities, holding out the prospect of the return of the Chinese Eastern Railway.

ENGLAND-AUSTRALIA FLIGHT

CAPTAIN ROSS SMITH, the Australian aviator, began a transcontinental flight from England to Australia on Nov. 12, in competition for a prize of £10,000 offered for the first aviator who made the flight of 11,500 miles within thirty days. In this flight Captain Smith reached Cairo on Nov. 18; arrived at Delhi on Nov. 23, and thereafter touched at Rangoon, and at several points along the Malay Peninsula and the islands of Oceania. He arrived at Bima, on Sunbawa Island, near Java, on Dec. 8. Cruisers and steamers kept watch at sea on the last stage of the airman's journey, vessels patrolling between Timor and Port Darwin, which is near the northernmost tip of Australia. Elaborate preparations were made for the landing at Fannie Bay, three miles from Port Darwin, where the aviator completed his long flight on Dec. 10. The Australian Premier, William Morris Hughes, sent a congratulatory message to Captain Smith after news of his safe arrival.

Lieutenant Etienne Poulet, the French military aviator, left Paris for a similar flight to Australia on Oct. 14, nearly a month before Captain Smith's departure. The Englishman caught up with Poulet in India, and both left Bangkok on the same day. No reports have since been received from the French aviator.

THE AUSTRALIAN ELECTION

VIRTUALLY complete election returns received at Melbourne on Dec. 14 showed that the Liberal and Nationalist Labor Parties, who support the Government, had won 35 seats in the House of Representatives, and the Farmers' Party, also a supporter of the Government, 11 seats, while the anti-governmental factions and the laborites had secured only 29. William M. Hughes, the Premier, had been re-elected to the House. This result was regarded as highly significant, for the elections were virtually a test of strength between the Nationalist Party, led by Premier Hughes, and the Labor Party, under the leadership of Frank Tudor and former Premier Ryan of Queensland. In another sense the elections were also an expression of public opinion favoring the development of the country along the lines of private enterprise, as opposed to State socialism, advocated by Mr. Ryan and his party.

The Prime Minister thus confirmed and supported first gained prominence in Australia because of his forceful attitude favoring conscription, which was defeated by a very small majority, and soon became an outstanding figure due to the large part he played in the Peace Conference at Paris. The slogan of the Coalition Cabinet formed by him was "Win the War!" Mr. Hughes is a small, slender man, weighing about 100 pounds, but in mental aggressiveness no man in Australian political life can be said to equal him. This attitude of mind was said to have been frequently displayed in differences of opinion between himself and President Wilson, who found in the Australian Prime Minister a foeman worthy of his steel.

HELIGOLAND DISMANTLED

WHEN the war broke out, the whole population of Heligoland (some of whom had never before left the island) were expelled by the Imperial Government on six hours' notice and sent to Hamburg and Altona, where they were put under police supervision. A London Times correspondent who visited the island to witness the dismantling of its forts recalls the foregoing fact and continues:

Strict orders had been issued by the Island Commandant that all keys to houses, rooms, and cupboards were to be left in their locks, and only such luggage was allowed as each one could carry. And these were German citizens! It is significant that in the days of crisis they were treated as semi-English. The only two actual British subjects resident on the island, one a sailor with twenty-three years' service in the British Navy, were flung into prison three days before war was declared. "'Tain't no catch being under Prussian rule," says the sailor, still lean from his long bondage.

The people eventually returned to find their houses occupied by German naval officers, who had brought their families to share their rest cure, or ransacked by the garrison of artillerymen who had spent the war in comparative luxury—"stupefied with contentment." For from start to finish not a salvo was fired by the batteries, though their erection cost Germany £2,250,000. They found, too, their local Government still further undermined by the 600 Prussian officials and employees retained on the island. Party political conspiracy is forthcoming even here, and the autonomy stipulated by the Anglo-German Treaty of 1890 is more mythical than ever.

Meantime the islanders have reminded the Supreme Council of the years when, "under the long and blissful administration of the great British nation, all our rights and customs were always most loyally upheld." The petition adds:

"We seek neither wealth nor ostentation, but desire and hope to live our lives in our lonely home upon the rocks in peace and contentment, as our forefathers did before us."

The correspondent relates that the work of dismantling the forts is proceeding. In November several hundred workmen were employed in dismounting the batteries and shipping the displaced material to Wilhelmshaven. Stores of metal and timber lie littered about the tableland, but instruments, gun sights, and fittings of all kinds are taken as souvenirs by the departing naval garrison. Light guns, anti-aircraft batteries and searchlights have all gone, and only a few machine guns remain about the island and harbor.

GAS IN WAR HUMANE

GENERAL MARCH, Chief of the General Staff of the United States Army, on Nov. 25, authorized an announcement that, contrary to popular belief, gas was now regarded by responsible American Army officers as one of the most humane weapons of war. This conclusion had been reached only after a critical study and analysis of official figures compiled by the office of the Surgeon General of the army. In an official statement General March said:

While the number who died on the battlefield from gas cannot be separated from those who died from bullets and high explosives, it is known that in the case of the A. E. F. it was very small. This is attributed to the fact that the high concentration of gas necessary to cause death before men can be gotten to a hospital is obtained by cloud gas and projector attacks, with only an occasional death on the battlefield.

The number of deaths in the hospitals from gas was 1,194, which, added to the 206 deaths in battle, gives a total of 1,400 deaths from gas out of the total gas casualties amounting to 74,779. The total number of deaths from all battle causes is given as 48,059. Subtracting the 1,400 deaths attributed to gas gives 46,659 deaths from all other battle causes. Deducting the 74,779 gas cases from the 274,217 total battle casualties leaves 199,438 for battle casualties due to causes other than gas. The percentage of deaths from such causes is therefore 23.4 per cent.

Thus it is deduced that, while gas produced 27.3 per cent. of all battle casualties, accomplishing the prime object of all weapons of war, which is to put men out of action, the deaths were only 1.87 per cent., compared with 23.4 per cent. of deaths from other battle causes. In other words, based on the statistics, the claim is advanced that a man gassed has twelve times as many chances to recover as the man put out of action by other causes.

The casualties in the A. E. F. caused by various kinds of gas were as follows:

Asphyxiating Gas—3 officers, 124 men.
Poisonous Gas (kind not stated)—1,201 officers, 34,812 men.
Chlorine—32 officers, 1,890 men.
Mustard Gas—822 officers, 27,046 men.
Phosgene Gas—415 officers, 6,698 men.
Yperite Gas—30 officers, 901 men.
Areine Gas—30 officers, 569 men.
Total—2,583 officers and 72,040 men.

BRITISH OLD-AGE PENSIONS

IN accordance with the recommendations of a report laid on the table of the House of Commons on Nov. 8, a new scale of old-age pensions to cost £41,000,000 was offered for adoption. This report proposed that every citizen of the kingdom, irrespective of means, should become qualified to draw a State pension of ten shillings a week after attaining the age of 70. Failure to reduce this maximum age to 65 was explained on the ground that this would have cost an additional total of £70,000,000. A minority report modified the £41,000,000 outlay to the extent of £9,000,000.

TANK DESIGNERS REWARDED

THE British Royal Commission on Inventions appointed to decide what royalties and awards should be paid to the inventors of war instruments, has given credit for designing and producing the tank in a concrete, practical war shape to Sir William Tritton and Major Wilson, who claimed it jointly, and has awarded them £15,000. The commission devoted several weeks to hearing evidence in support of the various claimants. In the commission's report, issued on Nov. 27, special praise was paid to Winston Churchill for his receptivity, courage, and driving force, which made it possible to convert the idea of the use of the tank as an instrument of warfare into an effective reality, potent in the winning of the war. Mr. Churchill, it was stated, had declined reward, on the ground that all his thought and time belonged to the State.

LADY ASTOR WINS A SEAT IN THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT

LADY ASTOR was elected a member of Parliament for the Sutton Division of Plymouth, England, in the balloting held on Nov. 15, the vote standing as follows:

Lady Astor, Unionist.....	14,495
W. T. Gay, Labor.....	8,292
Isaac Foot, Liberal.....	4,139

So ended one of the most picturesque and unprecedented campaigns for a seat in Parliament ever conducted in England, and Lady Astor, formerly Nancy Langhorne of Virginia, noted for her vivacity and wit, both in America and England, thus brought to its climax a most unusual career. Married to Robert Gould Shaw, 2d., of Boston, a Harvard graduate, and son of an aristocratic New England family, in 1897, she secured a decree of divorce on the ground of desertion in 1903, obtaining the custody of her child. After her divorce she went to England with Mrs. John Jacob Astor, with whom she maintained a hunting establishment in the High Shires. Her success in British society was immediate, and in 1906 her engagement to Waldorf Astor, son of William Waldorf Astor, was announced.

In 1908 Waldorf Astor took his seat in the House of Commons, and since that time Lady Astor has had an intimate knowledge of British politics. The Astor residences in London and other parts of England have been meeting places for many of England's most important statesmen, including Arthur J. Balfour, Herbert Asquith, Winston Churchill, Sir Horace Plunkett, and the late Lord Beresford. After the death of her father-in-law, Viscount Astor, her husband succeeded to the peerage and a seat in the House of Lords.

Lady Astor then decided to become the coalition Unionist candidate to succeed her husband as a member of the House of Commons. An invitation was extended to her, after announcing her intention, to stand for Parliament from Plymouth, which offer she accepted on Oct. 25.

The campaign, which she conducted personally, was most unusual by reason of its unconventionality and the flashing wit with which Lady Astor countered all attempts at heckling. No political candidacy has stirred the interest of England so much for many years. News that she had won her seat caused a sensation in the House of Commons, all of whose venerable traditions had been shattered by this election. The tone of newspaper comment was favorable in the extreme, and Lady Astor's portrait, her history, her unique campaigning methods, and her sayings were given extended space. When finally, on Dec. 1, the first woman member of Parliament took her seat, she was greeted with cheers. She went through the ceremony of taking oath and signing her name with great composure, and was then escorted beyond the bar by Lloyd George and Mr. Balfour. The first vote which the new member cast was against premium bonds. Tickets to the public gallery of the House were in great demand, and hundreds showed their desire to see the first woman member presented to the House.

SCIALOJA A LEAGUE DELEGATE

IT was announced from Rome on Nov. 25 that Senator Vittorio Scialoja had been appointed Italian delegate to the Council of the League of Nations. The career of Signor Scialoja has been an interesting one. He has been Professor of Roman Law in the University of Rome, is a member of the Accademia dei Lincei, was for twelve years a Senator, was Minister without portfolio in the Boselli Cabinet in 1916, Minister of Justice in the second Sonnino Cabinet, Minister without portfolio in the Nitti Cabinet, and was appointed on Nov. 24 to succeed Tommaso Tittoni as Minister of Foreign Affairs. Last July he was made a member of the Commission for the Execution of the Versailles Treaty. Signor Scialoja took an important part in the council of Ministers held in London in mid-December for the settlement of certain Peace Conference problems, including that of Fiume.

American Developments

With Emergency Armies Disbanded, the Country Seeks Settlement of Industrial War

THE Sixty-sixth Congress met in its first regular session on Dec. 1. Many important domestic questions had been left unsolved when the special session adjourned ten days before. The bituminous coal mine strike had been called off, but the miners were slow in obeying. Railroad legislation was needed to protect the lines after their release by the Government. A strike was threatened by railway employees. Radicalism was rampant and existing laws were confessedly inadequate to deal with the situation.

The nation's great armies, returned from overseas, were disbanded, but the records of the years of war still remained to be completed in many details. Thus the director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, R. G. Cholmeley Jones, reported to Congress on Dec. 8 that the total expenses of this bureau for the year ended June 30, 1919, had been $269,500,000, including $191,128,900 paid as allowances to families of soldiers and sailors and $43,798,000 as insurance. Insurance premiums paid to the bureau for the year aggregated $172,557,215. Congress had appropriated $126,183,500.

A detailed report of operations of the bureau was asked for in a resolution by Senator Poindexter, Republican, Washington, adopted Dec. 8 by the Senate. The Secretary of the Treasury was requested to advise whether the bureau should be continued or its work distributed among other Federal agencies.

The following official announcement in answer to the renewed request of the American Government for the return of its fallen soldiers was published in Paris on Nov. 24:

It has been definitely decided that the Allies who fell together for the same cause should remain together in death until circumstances permit of the returning of the bodies to the families for whom they sacrificed themselves.

The proposed law forbidding the exhumation of the soldier dead for three years did not pass at the last session of the Chamber of Deputies, but the Foreign Office intimated that it would be adopted soon. Though this bill provided for a delay of three years dating from the promulgation of the law, it was stated at the Foreign Office that the exhumation would begin considerably before January, 1922. The French Government, it was explained, was anxious to hasten matters, as French families also were pressing for their dead, but there were many thousands of unidentified bodies, and transportation facilities were quite inadequate to move the 1,500,000 dead interred in French cemeteries. The British and Belgian Governments were also asking for the return of their dead soldiers, but they, together with the 65,000 American dead in France, must be left in the graves they now occupy until the French are ready to exhume their own. General March also gave formal notice on Dec. 16 that no individuals would be allowed to bring back their dead; the Government alone would bring back the American dead from abroad.

It was announced from Washington on Dec. 11 that plans for the disinterment of the bodies of American soldiers in England had reached the point where two officers and a detachment of fifty-eight men of the Graves Registration Service of the Quartermaster Corps would sail from New York on the transport Martha Washington Dec. 16 for Southampton, England, to start this work. The officer in charge is Captain W. E. Robertson of the Quartermaster Corps. Second Lieutenant Frazier McIntosh of the same corps is assisting him. The detachment consists of five masters of sections, seven supervising embalmers, ten technical assistants, sixteen inspectors, and twenty convoys.

Major Gen. Enoch Crowder, Judge Advocate General of the Army, in his annual report on Nov. 27 gave detailed statistics covering military courts-martial. During the last fiscal year 16,547 persons were tried before general courts-martial and 85 per cent. were convicted. Of the charges against officers, more than one-third comprised drunkenness, absent without leave or conduct unbecoming an officer; in the case of enlisted men, one-half the total charges recorded were for desertion, absent without leave, disobedience and sleeping on post.

The report made public for the first time an official summary of the "capital" cases occurring in the army since April 6, 1917, the beginning of the war period. Death penalties were adjudged in 145 cases from that date to June 30, 1919, and execution was consummated in thirty-five cases, ten in France and twenty-five in the United States. Murder was charged in two of these cases, murder and mutiny in nineteen, assault in eleven, and assault and murder in three.

"In no case," according to the report, "was a capital sentence for a purely military offense carried into execution."

Desertions from the army from March 1 to Nov. 17, 1919, averaged more than 800 a month, with less than 15 per cent. of the men apprehended, it was announced by the War Department. The average period of confinement in army disciplinary cases was reduced from 6.63 years to 1.85 years, clemency having been recommended in 81 per cent. of the 7,027 cases reviewed. In 2,075 cases the entire unexecuted portion of the sentence was remitted.

PEACE ARMY OF 260,000

A standing army of about 260,000 men, backed by a universal military training system to supply reserves, was advocated by General Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff, in his annual report made public on Nov. 22. So far as purely naval operations are concerned, he added, the United States had nothing to fear from "any conceivable combination" of naval powers, but must be prepared to prevent seizure of bases by an enemy controlling the sea and intent on landing troops.

"Without the possession of such bases in France," the report said, "we could not have landed our army, irrespective of the fact that the Allies had control of the sea."

General March recommended fixing the strength of the regular army at five army corps, maintained at half strength in peace times. The proposals the department presented tentatively to Congress during the special session called for 509,000 men, and the statement of the Chief of Staff was taken to indicate that this would be scaled down to 260,000.

The war produced new practices but not new principles, the report said, and "was not won, as some predicted, by a new and terrible development of modern science," but by "men, munitions, and morale." The American military achievement was possible "only because of the assistance of our allies," General March said, and in urging an adequate military policy, he added:

Surely we can never expect to prepare for defense against the attack of a powerful and determined agency again under such favorable conditions to ourselves.

Military experts are agreed that the bulwark of American power is its ability for self-sustenance. This, involving, as it does, our unlimited resources of man power and wealth, constitutes our greatest national military asset, provided, and only provided, we are prepared to prevent the landing on our shores of an enemy of the size which our own performance has demonstrated to the world can be landed by a first-class power under certain conditions. These conditions are that it shall have control of the sea and control of proper bases for debarkation.

It is, accordingly, one of the very important lessons of this war that reasonable provision and a sound military policy demand that there shall be at all times available for immediate use a sufficient trained and organized force to insure, in connection with our fixed coast defenses, that no probable or possible enemy can ever seize a great strategic base on our coast. With such a base in his possession it is not inconceivable that he could, within a short time, land a sufficient number of fully equipped troops to seize and hold, by establishing a line of defense not incomparable in length with that held by the Germans on the western front, an area including such an appreciable portion of the resources and wealth of the country as to result in consequences of incalculable moment to the nation.

SURPLUS ARMY STOCKS

The Government realized from 73 to 80 cents on the dollar during the last year on the sale of surplus army stocks held in the United States, Acting Secretary Crowell reported Dec. 2 to Congress. The total received for materials sold in this country was $476,727,874, exclusive of $61,985,421 of stocks transferred to other Government departments. The largest amount for any one commodity was $201,810,000 for wool. Other sales included textiles, other than wool, $44,540,000, railway rolling stock $70,157,000, subsistence $26,613,200, chemicals $23,045,000, and animals $21,169,000.

THE MARINE CORPS

Major Gen. Barnett, Commandant of the Marine Corps, in his report of Nov. 23 recommended a permanent enlisted strength of 27,467 men for the Marine Corps. This is approximately double the pre-war force. Opportunity to qualify for permanent commissions should be given all present temporary officers eligible for transfer, the report said, adding the recommendation that such commissions be made probationary for one year.

Attributing much of the success of the Marine Corps in the war to the system of drawing its commissioned personnel from the ranks, the Commandant said the "highest efficiency" would be served by adherence to this policy, which attracts the highest class of recruits.

General Barnett recommended that the present two, three and four year enlistment terms be made permanent, as being more attractive than the rigid pre-war term of four years, and asked increased pay for both enlisted men and officers.

Great difficulty being experienced in replacing the temporary enlisted personnel of the aviation section of the corps, now completely demobilized, General Barnett recommended that special grades be provided in order to place the three aviation services on a parity, and asked for sixty additional officers for aviation.

The report declared the taking of Mont Blanc Ridge during the war by the 2d Division, to which the marine brigade was still attached, was an "achievement the brilliancy of which rivals the record of the marines in Belleau Wood." The Commandant also paid tribute to the fighting of the marines in the Aisne-Marne offensive of 1918, declaring their early morning surprise attack in the Bois de Rit, near Soissons, on July 18, to have been one of the most brilliant achievements of the war. Their operations in the St. Mihiel offensive, he said, proved the same invincible spirit.

Four members of the corps received the Medal of Honor, four the Distinguished Service Medal, 349 the Distinguished Service Cross, 1,237 were awarded the French Croix de Guerre, and fifteen the French Legion of Honor. Total Marine Corps casualties in France, the report showed, were 11,968, with 1,514 killed.

The report described operations of Marine Corps aircraft co-operating with ground troops in Haiti and Santo Domingo. A squadron of seven water planes and six land planes now is working with the expeditionary brigade in Haiti, while six land planes are stationed in Santo Domingo.

LOSSES IN RAILROAD OPERATION

It was stated in Washington on Dec. 1 that the net loss to the Government in the operating expenses of the railroads for the ten months of 1919 ending with October amounted to $269,678,158. In July, August, September, and October, it is estimated, the net gain over expenses was more than $23,000,000. The greatest gain was in August, when it reached $16,397,112, while in October the gain was estimated at $2,000,000. In the other months of the year the report made by Director General Hines shows that heavy losses were sustained, the greatest loss being $65,430,850, in February.

The Senate devoted most of its time before the holiday recess to discussing the Cummins bill to restore the railroads to their owners. President Wilson was petitioned on Dec. 17 by a delegation representing the Federation of Labor, the four railroad union brotherhoods, and some farm organizations to defer action on the return of the roads for two years, in order to test Government ownership under peace conditions. In their petition the delegation said:

Director General Hines and members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have shown clearly that the return of the railroads will involve an increase in freight revenue of close to a billion dollars, the rates being increased 25 to 50 per cent. This increase in rates, according to these same authorities, will be reflected in an increased cost of living of at least $4,000,000,000 a year, possibly $5,000,000,000. The American people can not and should not stand such increases.

Government operation as reported by Director General Hines showed a net profit at the rate of $168,000,000 a year for the three months prior to the coal strike.

The Senate is now being asked to investigate serious charges against certain officials of railroads during the period of Federal control, that they had committed sabotage and had willfully and purposely attempted through unfair methods, while presumably serving the Government, to discredit Government operation.

We respectfully request, Mr. President, on behalf of the farmers, the American Federation of Labor and the Railway Brotherhoods, as well as the general public, that you stop the rumors that you plan to return the roads to private control, and that in view of the changed conditions and the prevalent industrial unrest you re-establish public confidence by advocating that the period of Government operation be continued for at least two years, so that under peace conditions there may be a more thorough and more consistent trial of Government operation, and that carefully considered plans for the ultimate disposal of the railroads may be worked out and adopted.

FIVE-BILLION BUDGET

Secretary Glass, on Dec. 1, in presenting the annual estimate, proposed appropriations of virtually $5,000,000,000 for conducting the peace-time activities of the Government during the fiscal year 1921. The greatest individual estimates for expenditures go to the army and the navy. The yearly interest on the war debt is $1,017,500,000, which sum alone is greater than all the appropriations for all purposes whatsoever of any peace-time Congress.

All in all, the estimates justify the predictions made on the floor of Congress during consideration of the War Tax bills, that the present generation would not see the Government conducted at an expense of less than $4,000,000,000 a year.

The estimated appropriations for the principal Government departments were presented as follows:

Legislative (Congress)	$9,025,297.25
Executive (White House and Government departments) ..	149,111,463.77
Judicial	1,634,190.00
Army	989,578,657.20
Navy	542,031,894.80
Pensions	215,030,000.00
Public works	283,921,810.17
Miscellaneous	833,717,637.96
Foreign intercourse	11,243,250.91

The total of all estimates, including some comparatively minor items not included in the foregoing, is $4,865,-410,031.62, the greatest sum ever asked of any Congress when the country was not actually at war.

The billion-dollar estimate for the army includes some $85,000,000 for the National Guard. The normal peacetime estimate for the army before the war was between ten and fifteen millions. The $542,000,000 estimate for the navy includes provision for the program of increase and is comparable to an annual estimate of some $15,000,000 before the war. The $283,000,000 public works estimate includes the Panama Canal, reclamation projects, rivers and harbors improvement, public buildings, and also military works, arsenals, and fortifications.

An item of more than $391,000,000 for postal services is reimbursable from postal revenues.

The estimates for miscellaneous expenditures contain some tremendous sums. For the Treasury Department more than $247,000,000 is asked, which goes largely to the enforcement of prohibition and the collection of income, corporation and excess profits taxes. For the Shipping Board nearly $448,000,000 is asked to wind up its program of restoring the American flag to the seas. Nearly $40,000,000 is asked for the Federal Board of Vocational Education, which, besides being expended in co-operation with the States for civilian education as the law provides, will be used in large measure for the reconstruction of disabled soldiers of the world war.

Settlement of the Coal Strike

How the Six Weeks' Conflict Between the Miners and Operators Was Ended by President Wilson

[PERIOD NOV. 23 TO DEC. 18, 1919]

REPRESENTATIVES of the bituminous coal miners and operators, in their efforts to reach a compromise which would put an end to the strike, which had begun on Nov. 1, and which threatened the comfort and security of the whole nation, struggled for several hours on Nov. 21 and 22 to find some common basis of settlement. The point on which they disagreed was the proposal of Secretary Wilson for a 31 per cent. increase of wages, which the workers accepted on the basis of a seven-hour day, but which the operators rejected. At the request of the operators, Dr. Garfield, Fuel Administrator, Director General of Railways Hines, and Attorney General Palmer conferred on Nov. 23 on behalf of the Government, with the object of finding a solution that would break the deadlock. Certain principles of settlement, reached by Nov. 24 and read before a joint session of the conflicting parties, laid down as essential that the public should not be asked to pay more than it was already paying for coal unless a reasonable labor wage or a reasonable operating profit demanded it. This program, however, was a disappointment to both parties because it contained no specific recommendations, and the situation remained in statu quo while awaiting the Cabinet's ultimate proposals.

For several hours on the following day the Cabinet discussed the situation, while the miners and operators "marked time." In a statement issued in the evening, the operators of the Central Competitive Field declared that the wage increases for miners proposed by Secretary Wilson would amount to an average increase of 111.3 per cent. over 1913 wages, as compared with an increase of only 77 per cent. in the cost of living during the same period. The operators asserted that their offer of a 20 per cent. increase over the rate obtaining would mean a wage increase of 80.1 per cent. since 1913.

MR. McADOO ANSWERED

The operators also made public a copy of an open telegram to William G. McAdoo replying to the latter's charges under the same date of enormous profits made by the operators in 1917, reaching allegedly in some cases to 2,000 per cent., and to his telegraphed declaration to Administrator Garfield that the miners' demands were fair, and that no part of any eventual wage increase should be borne by the public. In this reply the operators asserted that it was "exceedingly poor taste" for a former Cabinet member to inject himself into the coal situation, charged Mr. McAdoo with ignorance of conditions in 1918-19, and asked him upon what "current facts and figures" he held that the increases for the miners were just and reasonable. This reply elicited a further statement from Mr. McAdoo, in which he reiterated his former charges and demanded that the operators' income tax returns for 1918 and 1919 be published.

To this the operators made no official reply, but on Nov. 26 the United States Treasury Department made public an official statement containing estimates of the income tax returns of the operators. This statement showed that the coal profits in 1917 had ranged from 15 to 800 per cent., that they had been less in the East in 1918, and still less in 1919, when some operators even stated that they were working at a loss.

THE GARFIELD PROPOSAL

Fuel Administrator Garfield, representing the Government, on Nov. 26 read to a joint session of miners and operators at the Red Cross Building in Washington a decision granting the coal miners of the Central Competitive district an average wage increase of 14 per cent., and announcing that the price of coal to the public would not be increased and that the Government would continue provisionally in control of prices. He also urged that a permanent advisory body, headed by Secretary Lane, with an equal representation of miners and operators, be formed to get information regarding the industry to govern future disputes.

The operators at once accepted this decision, and agreed to carry out its terms, but the miners, headed by John L. Lewis, Acting President of the United Mine Workers of America, refused to consider the offer, and stood firmly behind the 31 per cent. increase proposed by Secretary Wilson. Opposition to the Garfield proposal was at once voiced by Acting President Lewis and Frank Farrington, who said that acceptance of the plan would mean starvation wages for many miners. Laughter and jeering came from among the representatives of the miners. The attacks upon the offer were couched in bitter terms, and Administrator Garfield was asked if this new decision meant an open repudiation of Secretary Wilson's proposal. Dr. Garfield declined to answer this, simply saying that questions to that effect misrepresented the situation. He pictured the situation rather as one in which there had been a difference of opinion, and where the stand taken by the Fuel Administrator had prevailed, pending further investigation, and intimated that the new proposal was one behind which the Government would stand firmly. The situation appeared more critical than ever after the session had adjourned.

DEADLOCK ESTABLISHED

A spirited joint meeting of operators and miners was held on the following day, which had no definite outcome, the miners rejecting the operators' proposal to accept the Government's offer, the operators rejecting the miners' demand that Secretary Wilson's offer be accepted. Afterward President Lewis, in stating the position of the miners, pointed out that though the operators ostensibly accepted the Garfield proposal, they also stated that they would be unable to run many of their mines under it, which made the conclusion of any agreement futile. The miners' position, he declared, was unchanged; they held that the United States Government could not break its word, pledged by Secretary Wilson, to grant a 31 per cent. increase in wages. Dr. Garfield's proposal he characterized as a "colossal blunder." Meanwhile Mr. Lewis remained in the capital to await developments, but many of the other delegates on both sides returned home.

On the side of the miners, Frank Farrington, President of the Illinois District of the United Mine Workers of America, was arrested in Springfield, Ill., Dec. 6, on charges of violating the injunction. His bond was fixed at $10,000. Farrington's attorney announced that a writ of habeas corpus would be asked to obtain his release.

So the situation reached a crisis, in which no prospect of compromise or agreement seemed immediately possible. It was at this time that President Wilson himself intervened with a new offer, which brought fresh negotiations and a hope of agreement.

THE PRESIDENT'S OFFER

Attorney General Palmer announced on Nov. 7 that President Wilson had made the coal miners a definite concrete proposal looking to a speedy termination of the strike and an adjustment of the entire controversy, and that Acting President Lewis and Secretary Green of the miners would urge its acceptance at a meeting of the Scale Committee, called to meet in Indianapolis on Dec. 9. The President's terms had been submitted to Mr. Lewis and Secretary Green at a meeting held the previous day and attended by Joseph Tumulty, Secretary to President Wilson. Mr. Palmer had previously gone over the whole situation with the President.

The nature of the new offer was not disclosed at this time. The text of Mr. Palmer's statement as well as the general attitude of the Government officials, indicated clearly, however, that acceptance by the miners was anticipated. The announcement came more in the nature of a surprise, because Fuel Administrator Garfield had declared emphatically that there would be no compromise on the Government's part. In regard to this announcement Dr. Garfield refused to make any comment, except that, so far as he personally was concerned, there would be no compromising.

Attorney General Palmer issued this further statement on Dec. 9:

The President, Saturday, was about to issue a statement to the country reciting the facts in relation to the strike situation and making an appeal to the miners to go back to work. Mr. Lewis and Mr. Green called on me that day and I showed them the President's statement. They finally agreed to its terms as far as they were concerned and called a meeting of their official boards to consider it, at which time they agreed to urge its acceptance.

A memorandum was prepared, its form being agreed to by Mr. Lewis and myself, embodying in brief the President's proposal and the action which should be taken by the miners. The President's statement will be presented to the miners this afternoon and I am assured that the action indicated will be taken.

The memorandum referred to by Mr. Palmer reads:

In accordance with the request of the President, as contained in his statement of Dec. 6, the miners will immediately return to work with the 14 per cent. increase in wages which is already in effect.

Immediately upon a general resumption of operations, which shall be in all districts, except as to wages, upon the basis which obtained on Oct. 31, 1919, the President will appoint a commission of three persons, one of whom shall be a practical miner and one of whom shall be a mine owner or operator in active business, which commission will consider further questions of wages and working conditions as well as profits of operators and proper prices for coal, readjusting both wages and prices if it shall so decide, including differentials and internal conditions within and between districts.

Its report will be made within sixty days if possible and will be accepted as the basis of a new wage agreement, the effective date and duration of which shall also be determined by the commission.

TEXT OF PROPOSAL

On the same date the full proposal of President Wilson was made public, following presentation to the Miners' Scale Committee. It was as follows:

I have watched with deep concern the developments in the bituminous coal strike and am convinced there is much confusion in the minds of the people generally and possibly of both parties to this unfortunate controversy as to the attitude and purposes of the Government in its handling of the situation.

The mine owners offered a wage increase of 20 per cent. conditioned, however, upon the price of coal being raised to an amount sufficient to cover this proposed increase of wages, which would have added at least $150,000,000 to the annual coal bill of the people. The Fuel Administrator, in the light of present information, has taken the position, and I think with entire justification, that the public is now paying as high prices for coal as it ought to be requested to pay, and that any wage increase made at this time ought to come out of the profits of the coal operators.

In reaching this conclusion, the Fuel Administrator expressed the personal opinion that the 14 per cent. increase in all mine wages is reasonable because it would equalize the miners' wages on the average with the cost of living, but he made it perfectly clear that the operators and the miners are at liberty to agree upon a large increase provided the operators will pay it out of their profits so that the price of coal would remain the same.

The Secretary of Labor, in an effort at conciliation between the parties, expressed his personal opinion in favor of a larger increase. His effort at conciliation failed, however, because the coal operators were unwilling to pay the scale he proposed unless the Government would advance the price of coal to the public, and this the Government was unwilling to do.

The Fuel Administrator had also suggested that a tribunal be created in which the miners and operators would be equally represented to consider further questions of wages and working conditions, as well as profits of operators and proper prices for coal. I shall, of course, be glad to aid in the formation of such a tribunal.

I understand the operators have generally agreed to absorb an increase of 14 per cent. in wages, so that the public would pay not to exceed the present price fixed by the Fuel Administrator, and thus a way is opened to secure the coal of which the people stand in need, if the miners will resume work on these terms pending a thorough investigation by an impartial commission which may readjust both wages and prices.

The Government on Nov. 28 officially warned bituminous coal miners and operators that it would not tolerate any interference with the production of coal. Judge Ames announced for the Department of Justice that instructions had been sent to all United States Attorneys in the coal districts to prosecute conspirators on either side. He further stated that 100,000 troops were to be held available, and would be called in if the situation should justify it.

Meanwhile the operators posted the new scale order at their mines, and President Lewis, after an interview with Secretary Wilson and Samuel Gompers, went home to Indianapolis tired out by the exhausting dispute of which he had borne the brunt. Before his departure he stated that he had been given to understand by Secretary Wilson that Mr. Garfield's offer was definite, final, and supported by the Government. His conference with Mr. Gompers resulted in an arrangement to have the federation's lawyers assist counsel for the miners in perfecting their appeal from the ruling of Federal Judge Anderson, ordering the coal strike order canceled. The Special Assistant District Attorney, Dan W. Simms, declared in Indianapolis on Nov. 29 that the coal must be mined, and that if the miners did not return to work after the posting of notices by the operators the mines would be operated in compliance with the decision of the Government, and many men would be brought before Judge Anderson to face charges of contempt.

Meanwhile the Government rested on its arms. Fuel Administrator Garfield, before leaving Washington for a few days, firmly upheld his proposal, declaring that it would cover increases in the cost of living, and would mean an increase of $107,000,000 yearly. Any effort on the part of the operators to take advantage of the coal crisis to break down the labor unions would be resisted, he declared. Protection, however, would be given to all who wished to work, regardless of their affiliations.

Soft coal operators to the number of 150 assembled for conference in Philadelphia on Nov. 30. They were the employers of about 75,000 union men on strike in the bituminous fields of thirteen counties surrounding Johnstown, Pa., and represented an annual production of 60,000,000 tons of coal. They voted to accept Mr. Garfield's proposal.

COURT CHARGES CONSPIRACY

The warning of the Government that it would institute court proceedings against the leaders of the miners for contempt was backed up by deeds on Dec. 3, when information charging criminal contempt of court was filed in the United States District Court of Indianapolis against eighty-four international and district officers of the 400,000 United Mine Workers of America named in the injunction issued by Judge Anderson. It was charged that all the officers had conspired to keep the strike in force, and had thus violated the terms of the injunction. Among those served with capias summonses were Acting President John L. Lewis, Secretary-Treasurer William Green, Percy Tetlow, Statistician, and Ellis Searles, editor of The United Mine Workers Journal, all of Indianapolis, who agreed to appear in court the following day and furnish bond, fixed at $10,000 by Judge Anderson. Other officials of the mine workers resident outside were also served with summonses to appear.

One of the specific charges made was that of having paid benefits to the striking workmen and their families to enable them to continue the strike. On this charge officials of two local United Mine Workers' Unions at Clinton, Ind., were cited for contempt of court on Dec. 5, and summoned to appear at the same time with the other officials mentioned above. All appeared together and furnished bonds for their appearance. Meanwhile seventy-eight other charges were printed and certified, and copies mailed to all court districts in which the accused resided.

NATION-WIDE INVESTIGATION

It was announced at this time that the scope of the Grand Jury investigation would be extended to cover all phases of the controversy in the coal industry, and would be nation-wide in scope, including investigation of alleged violations of the Lever Fuel act and the Sherman anti-trust law by miners, operators, and others, and prosecutions under the Lever law, which carried a penalty of $5,000 fine or imprisonment not to exceed two years in the penitentiary. This extension was due to certain information gained that the operators, as well as the miners, had transgressed the provisions of this law. The Operators' Committee on Dec. 5 issued a statement characterizing as "vicious and misleading" published reports to the effect that they were considering proposals to compromise with striking mine owners by paying more than the 14 per cent. increase suggested by Dr. Garfield and increasing the price of coal correspondingly. They further sent a dispatch to Indianapolis urging the District Attorney to expedite the investigation of their actions.

By the acceptance of such a plan, the miners are assured immediate steady employment at a substantial increase in wages and are further assured prompt investigation and action upon questions which are not now settled to their satisfaction. I must believe that with a clear understanding of these points, they will promptly return to work. If, nevertheless, they persist in remaining on strike they will put themselves in an attitude of striking in order to force the Government to increase the price of coal to the public, so as to give a still further increase in wages at this time rather than allow the questions of a further increase in wages to be dealt with in an orderly manner by a fairly constituted tribunal representing all parties interested.

No group of our people can justify such a position, and the miners owe it to themselves, their families, their fellow-workmen in other industries, and to their country to return to work.

Immediately upon a general resumption of mining I shall be glad to aid in the prompt formation of such a tribunal as I have indicated to make further inquiries into this whole matter and to review not only the reasonableness of the wages at which the miners start to work, but also the reasonableness of the Government prices for coal. Such a tribunal should within sixty days make its report which could be used as a basis for negotiation, for a wage agreement. I must make it clear, however, that the Government cannot give its aid to any such further investigation until there is a general resumption of work.

I ask every individual miner to give his personal thought to what I say. I hope he understands fully that he will be hurting his own interest and the interest of his family and will be throwing countless other laboring men out of employment if he shall continue the present strike, and, further, that he will create an unnecessary and unfortunate prejudice against organized labor which will be injurious to the best interests of workingmen everywhere. WOODROW WILSON.

Hopes that this solution would be accepted forthwith, and that the long-protracted strike would finally be settled, ran high among the officials of the United Mine Workers, despite the holding of four extended "caucuses" in Indianapolis in which radicals of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Western Pennsylvania made plans for continuing the fight against adoption of the strike settlement plan proposed by the President, which, they held, a convention alone would have the authority to accept or reject. It was stated semi-officially by high officials of the mine workers, however, that the conservative element was in the ascendancy in the conference, which went into closed session on Dec. 9 at 2 o'clock to consider the President's proposal.

It was stated subsequently that the determined opposition that arose was mainly over the method of making the action effective and sending the men back to work, some contending that it would be necessary to reconvene the Cleveland convention, which voted for the strike last November, to pass on the matter, otherwise many of the miners would not go back to work, on the theory that action by the Executive Board and other members of the conference would not be authoritative. In answer to this it was pointed out that in order to relieve suffering the situation demanded immediate action, and that approval by the body assembled would be sufficient. The opposition was so strong, however, that adjournment was judged necessary as the only proper way to save the situation, thus giving the officials time to win over the objectors. Some of the opposition speeches were violent in the extreme, accepting a fight to the finish with the coal operators, pending the suspension of the Lever act, and the ability to fight without "the Government on our backs." To return to work, it was declared, would demoralize the miners' organization and the entire country.

The operators, on their part, according to a statement made by Thomas T. Brewster, Chairman of the Scale Committee of the Coal Operators of the Central Competitive Field, had given their unqualified approval to the President's solution.

SECRETARY WILSON MAKES APPEAL

Into the swaying balance of interests was cast the weight of Secretary of Labor Wilson's personal influence, in this letter sent by him to the United Mine Workers' committee on the same date:

Scale Committee, United Mine Workers of America, Indianapolis.

Gentlemen: I cannot too strongly urge you to accept the basis of settlement proposed by the President. I have been associated with him for more than six years, and I know that every fibre of his strong nature has been devoted toward securing fair play for everybody, and particularly the under dog in the fight. Every blow he has had to bear—and he has had to bear many of them—has been brought about by his intense earnestness in that direction. You can rely thoroughly upon every promise he makes.

But, aside from that, as a result of the stoppage of work in the mines, we are facing the most difficult situation that ever confronted the country. It threatens the very foundation of our social life. In this emergency the President has pointed a way out with honor to the Government and honor to yourselves. If my judgment and experience are of any value to you, let me use them in advising you for the welfare of yourselves and the country as a whole to accept the way out that is proposed by the President.

W. E. WILSON, Secretary of Labor.

PRESIDENT'S OFFER ACCEPTED

President Wilson's terms of settlement were accepted on the following day (Dec. 10) by the officials of the United Mine Workers of America at Indianapolis. The President was advised of the fact immediately. The news came to the White House over a special wire connected with the hall at Indianapolis, where the final action was taken.

Fuel Administrator Garfield declared subsequently that immediate removal of regulations on soft coal consumption was not to be considered, and Director General Hines, in a formal statement, asserted that the dislocation created by the strike could not be remedied immediately.

One of the two statements issued by the mine workers' officials after the taking of the decision was as follows:

The conference of members of the International Executive Board, the Scale Committee of the central competitive field, the Presidents and associate representatives of all districts in the United States agreed with only one dissenting vote to accept the President's proposition of settlement as recommended by Secretary Green and myself.

We have taken this action conscious of our responsibilities to our nation during this acute industrial crisis and firm in the conviction that the word of the President of the United States will secure for the mine workers just consideration of their merited claims.

An immediate telegram will be sent out to all of our 4,000 local unions advising our membership of this action and instructing them immediately to resume work in the mines. This telegram will be later followed by an official order fully explanatory and carrying the signatures of the international officials and the Presidents of all the districts in the organization.

We have confidence that immediate compliance will be given this order; that our men will forthwith return to work and furnish an adequate supply of fuel.

After the mines all resume normal production the international convention will be reconvened in Indianapolis, when a supplemental explanation will be given the delegates from all local unions which will enable them to see the justification for this action.

The action taken today should demonstrate to the people of our country that the United Mine Workers of America are loyal to our country and believe in the perpetuity of our democratic institutions. No greater demonstration of such fact could be given than our action in accepting the proposal of the President of the United States.

We hope and shall expect that the public-spirited citizens of our nation will recognize the importance of the sacrifices that the miners have made and will lend their influence to the end that justice and consideration in wages and working conditions shall be given to the miners who produce the coal upon which is predicated our entire social structure.

The miners everywhere will await with such patience as is possible the award of the President's commission.

MR. PALMER'S STATEMENT

Attorney General Palmer also issued a statement, which read as follows:

The coal strike is settled as the Government wanted it settled. When Messrs. Lewis and Green came to see me Saturday I restated what the Government's position had been from the beginning and insisted on their acquiescence. They finally agreed to it. They have now persuaded the officers of their organization that the situation calls for compliance with the court's order and the Government's wishes, and I am certain that all the miners in the country will cheerfully acquiesce in the decision of their leaders. I desire to publicly commend the wise and patriotic action of Mr. Lewis, Mr. Green, and their associates. I am, of course, gratified at the outcome, which is one the entire country will approve. Mining will be fully resumed at once, the danger of distress and suffering during the Winter is passed, the authority of the Government has been recognized and upheld, the supremacy of the law has been established and a precedent of incalculable value has been set for the peaceful, orderly and lawful adjustment of industrial disputes.

The operators, finally, representing all the larger bituminous fields of the country, gathered in Indianapolis issued a statement on their own part, which said:

We are pleased that the miners have voted to return to work and that the public can be promptly supplied. Realizing the imperative need of coal in large quantities, the operators stand ready now, as in the past, to bend all their energies toward a maximum production, beginning at once.

So, at last, the coal strike was brought to an end, and one of the greatest industrial battles in the history of union labor in the United States reached its climax in a Presidential intervention. This strike had reached far beyond the confines of the coal mining industry, paralyzing business, manufacturing, and transportation, and causing suffering in many localities. It left the country with an acute shortage of coal, and the fuel authorities were obliged to adopt stringent measures to conserve light and heat energy. Many trains were taken off between West and East, car service was limited in various cities, shops were closed down at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Many of these measures were eliminated after the settlement of the strike. The need of coal conservation, pending the continuance of production, was declared by the authorities, however, to be great, even though mining had begun again.

Meanwhile the 400,000 striking miners began to return to work after receiving the proper orders from their union officials; many resumed their labors on Dec. 11, and a further influx followed on the 14th. By Dec. 15 practically all the men were back in the Indiana mines, but the showing in Ohio and Pennsylvania was only about 60 per cent. of normal, while in the important bituminous fields of Illinois only about 10 per cent. of the miners had returned. In the Central Pennsylvania field, one of the largest, about 40 per cent. of the men had gone back to work. At that time President Wilson was still withholding the announcement of the settlement commission, which was to be appointed after all the miners had returned to their labors.

DR. GARFIELD'S RESIGNATION

The President's method of settling the strike, which in part set aside the Fuel Administrator's plan, resulted in the resignation of Dr. Garfield. His resignation, he told the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee on Dec. 13, was due to the fact that, according to his view, the terms on which President Wilson brought an end to the strike meant transfer of the rights of the Fuel Administrator to a commission of three men, which was so composed that it guaranteed no protection to the public. The principle, he declared, was fundamentally wrong. He further informed the committee that his resignation had been accepted by the President on that day. Two of his chief assistants, it was learned on Dec. 14, had similarly resigned.

It was stated at about this time that the Government still intended to proceed with the Grand Jury investigation of charges of violation of the Lever act and anti-trust laws through conspiracy to limit the production of coal. These charges involved both miners and operators. It was indicated, however, that charges of contempt made against the eighty-four officials of the mine workers for alleged violation of the Federal Court injunction against the strike would be dropped.

One echo of the great controversy just ended was heard in Washington on Dec. 13, when representatives of 119 national and international unions, including the four railway brotherhoods, who had been summoned by Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, issued a "bill of rights," which upheld the right of labor to strike, approved the coal and steel strikes, and denounced Government "by injunction," which action was combined with an attack on the I. W. W. and Bolshevism.

International Labor Conference

Other Labor Meetings

THE first International Labor Conference held under the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles ended at Washington Nov. 29. It was understood generally that the next meeting would be late in 1920 at the seat of the League. Delegates from all countries representing labor and employer groups as well as the Governments attended the conference sessions, which continued exactly one month. In that time the members perfected their organization, created a governing body, appointed a Director General of the labor office and agreed upon a great volume of identic legislation to be recommended to their respective Governments.

A protest against the preponderance of European influence in the governing body made by William Gemmill, employers' delegate from South Africa, marked the closing session. The body had twenty-four members, twenty of whom were from European countries and two from the Americas. Mr. Gemmill pointed to the injustice of such organization and asked for an expression on his protest, which was supported by a vote of 44 to 39.

Arthur Fontaine, Director of the Labor Department of the French Ministry of Labor and President of the governing body, said that no unfairness was intended, and indicated the expediency of having the majority from European countries. The board will meet every two months at the seat of the League, and because of that, Mr. Fontaine pointed out, it would be more convenient for members from European countries to attend than for those in far-away countries.

The chief function of the governing body will be to carry on organization work connected with the conference, and on that account it was agreed that the agenda for the next meeting should be prepared by it. An effort was made by some of the delegates to pledge the conference to a discussion of certain subjects at the next meeting, but it failed.

The first meeting of the governing body will be held Jan. 26, probably in London, the temporary headquarters of the League of Nations.

The draft conventions and recommendations adopted by the conference will find their first lodgment at the International Labor Office, of which Albert Thomas, the French labor leader, is the Director General. To the five draft conventions, including that providing for the general adoption of the eight-hour day and the forty-eight-hour week, and that looking to the alleviation of the unemployment problem, there was added, as virtually the last act of the conference, the proposed convention providing for the indemnification of wage-earning mothers at the time of childbirth. It provides for the granting of a six weeks' leave of absence prior to the birth of the child and an equal period immediately afterward, and the payment, either by the State or by some form of insurance, for the time lost.

Before the conference adjourned Secretary Wilson, the Chairman, expressed to the delegates the regret President Wilson felt that he had been unable to meet with them. Various delegates spoke briefly of their appreciation of the courtesy that had been extended to them by the United States.

SECOND INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE

The second conference called by President Wilson to consider remedies for the industrial situation met in the Pan-American Building at Washington on Dec. 1. The meeting was held behind closed doors, and Mr. King declared that there was a unanimous decision to continue these secret sessions until further notice. Just before the meeting began all newspaper men were asked to leave the room. In opening the meeting Secretary Wilson read the President's letter calling the conference together, and detailed the outcome of the first industrial conferences, which ended so disastrously.

The high cost of living and collective bargaining were discussed, but merely academically, so it was declared. No mention was made of either the recent steel strike or the coal strike, inasmuch as the President's letter specifically stated that the conference was not asked to "deal directly with any conditions which exist today," but to try to find remedies that would prevent a repetition. Those present were:

Secretary of Labor Wilson.

Thomas W. Gregory and George W. Wickersham, former United States Attorneys General.

Herbert Hoover, former Food Administrator.

Oscar S. Straus, former Secretary of Commerce.

Henry M. Robinson, lawyer, of Pasadena, Cal., a member of the economic group of advisers at the Peace Conference.

Professor Frank W. Taussig, former Chairman of the Tariff Commission.

Former Governors Samuel W. McCall of Massachusetts, Martin H. Glynn of New York, and Henry C. Stuart of Virginia.

Dr. W. O. Thompson, President of the Ohio State University.

Richard Hooker of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

Julius Rosenwald, President of Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago.

Owen D. Young, Vice President of the General Electric Company of New York.

Henry J. Waters, President of the Kansas State Agricultural College, Manhattan, Kan.

Stanley King, Secretary of the W. E. McElwain Shoe Company of Boston.

No further announcements of its proceedings were made up to Dec. 20.

LABOR'S "BILL OF RIGHTS"

The representatives of 119 national and international unions, including the four railroad brotherhoods, in a conference held at Washington Dec. 13, issued a "bill of rights," setting forth in detail the principles for which they intend to stand. The program contained some but not all of the planks which the more radical elements in organized labor desired.

That the followers of Mr. Gompers were prepared for open warfare upon members of the Industrial Workers of the World who might attempt to inject their extreme policies into the national conference was plain, and the climax came just before adjournment, when resolutions denouncing Bolshevism and I. W. W. principles were adopted by acclamation. These resolutions were as follows:

Whereas, The American Federation of Labor is an American institution believing in American principles and ideas; and

Whereas, An attempt is being made to inject the spirit of Bolshevism and I. W. W.'ism into the affairs of the American Federation of Labor; and,

Whereas, The American Federation of Labor is opposed to Bolshevism, I. W. W.'ism and the irresponsible leadership that encourages such a policy; therefore, be it

Resolved, That this conference of representatives of trades unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. and other organizations associated in this conference repudiate and condemn the policy of Bolshevism and I. W. W.'ism as being destructive to American ideals and impracticable in application; be it further

Resolved, That this conference reiterate the action of the conventions of the American Federation of Labor in the advocacy of the principles of conciliation and voluntary arbitration and collective bargaining.

The keynote of the "bill of rights" is that capital has received too many of the good things of life and that the laws now on the statute books do not insure justice to all.

The steel strike is indorsed and the use of the injunction in the case of the coal miners is attacked. The United States Steel Corporation is denounced for its "autocratic attitude and destructive action." The right of Federal, State, and municipal employes to organize is defended. Congress is urged to keep the railroads under Federal control "at least two years after Jan. 1, 1920." Fixing of wages on a cost-of-living basis is strongly disapproved as "pernicious and intolerable." The declaration states labor's desire that "increased productivity be used for service and not alone for profits."

The Peace Treaty, with the League covenant, is indorsed, and the Senate is asked to ratify, in order that "peoples may know to whom they owe allegiance, boundaries may be fixed, and credit and exchange may regain the lost voltage," and in this same connection the labor section of the Peace Treaty is strongly indorsed.

When the conference ended it was with the understanding that the co-operative committee named at the recent Atlantic City Convention would consult later with representatives of farm organizations with a view to bringing about a co-operative movement. A report would then be made to the Executive Committee of the Federation of Labor and plans laid for the future.

FARMERS' LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Representatives of the farm organizations attending the Washington conference of labor unions submitted, on Dec. 14, a legislative program which they believed would meet the views of their constituents. Their program included the following planks:

1. Passage of the Kenyon bill to regulate the packing industry.
2. Government ownership of railways and Government control of the merchant marine.
3. Nationalization of natural resources.
4. Financing the war cost by the retention of the income and excess profits taxes and a higher tax on land held for speculative purposes.
5. Change in the credit system to take it out of the hands of private interests and conduct the credit system on a co-operative basis, so that the small merchant and the farmer may obtain the same credit as is now available to financiers.
6. Ratification of the suffrage amendment.
7. Passage of the bill submitted by Congressman Sabbath of Illinois for the removal of the tax on oleomargarine!

NATIONAL LABOR PARTY

The work of organizing a new National Labor Party was completed in Chicago on Nov. 25 by the adoption of a declaration of principles and the election of a National Committee to consist of one man and one woman from each State.

The organization will call a national convention next Summer to nominate candidates for President and Vice President. A monthly tax of 2 cents per capita will be levied on the membership.

Included in the declaration of principles are:

- Abolition of the United States Senate.
- Election of Federal Judges by popular vote for terms not exceeding four years.
- International solidarity of labor.
- Maximum hours of labor for men and women to be eight hours a day and forty-four hours a week.
- Minimum wage for workers to be fixed by law.
- Old age, unemployment, and sick pensions.
- Government to own and operate the banking business.
- Nationalization of unused lands.
- Incomes of individuals to be limited by law.
- National initiative, referendum, and recall.
- Application of the "home rule" principle in State, county, and city governments.
- Condemnation of universal military training and conscription.
- International disarmament to prevent future wars.
- Immediate release of all political and industrial prisoners.
- Nationalization of all public utilities and basic industries.
- Criminal prosecution of profiteers and exploiters of labor.
- Free speech, free press, and right of free assembly.
- All Government work to be done by day labor instead of by contract.
- Equal pay for men and women.
- Woman suffrage.

A resolution condemning the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations covenant was adopted on the ground that they do not conform to President Wilson's Fourteen Points and are not in the interest of the working classes.

Anarchist Activity in the United States

Steps Toward Deportation

DISCOVERY of widespread anarchista plotting in the United States stimulated the Government to energetic preventive measures. The House of Representatives Committee on Immigration, which visited Ellis Island on Nov. 25, was told by the Acting Commissioner of Immigration, Byron S. Uhl, that the immigration system at New York, where the largest shifting of races since the Middle Ages had taken place, was at present "largely a farce." Mr. Uhl added that with the limited forces of inspectors boarding incoming ships the effort to weed out dangerous immigrants was futile. These inspections were to a considerable extent "a checking up of names."

In a raid on the headquarters of the Union of Russian Workers in New York on the 26th by agents of the Department of Justice and local detectives, a large quantity of explosives, together with acids and chemicals used in the manufacture of bombs, was discovered in a secret chamber in rear of the main parlor. Among the explosives was a large container marked TNT, the abbreviation commonly used for trinitrotoluol, the most powerful agent of the kind developed by the war. Three books of membership names were also taken over as evidence.

Seventy-three radicals awaiting deportation on Ellis Island, and calling themselves The First Socialist Community of America, began a hunger strike on Nov. 25 to compel the officials to remove a wire screen separating them from visiting friends. When informed of the strike, Commissioner Uhl said they could go without food as long as they liked. The strike came to an inglorious end on the morning of the fourth day.

Meantime a general roundup of radical agitators went on in various parts of the country. In New York the police were reported to have tabulated the names of 500 radical sympathizers, both men and women; and the Extraordinary Grand Jury indicted the Irish agitator, James Larkin, and ex-Assemblyman Benjamin Gitlow for criminal anarchy, due to their connection with manifestoes of the Communist Party published in The Revolutionary Age. Larkin and Gitlow were subsequently released by Supreme Court Justice Weeks on $15,000 bail. From Sacramento, Cal., Governor William D. Stephens announced that no further clemency was to be expected on behalf of William J. Mooney, convicted of murder in connection with the San Francisco Preparedness Day bomb explosions, since he was "convinced Mooney had a part in one of the most atrocious crimes involving treasonable purpose ever perpetrated in the history of the country." A trial of thirty-three members of the I. W. W. was opened before Judge John C. Pollock in the Kansas Federal Court on Dec. 1; the prisoners were charged with attempting to overthrow the United States Government.

Department of Justice agents and Deputy United States Marshals in Detroit raided sixteen places and took 150 prisoners on Dec. 3, and on the same day Federal officials in Toledo arrested 100 persons on criminal charges. The Merchants Association of New York protested to Attorney General Palmer their concern over disclosures that the arrest of anarchists and alien radicals in different parts of the country had resulted in their transfer to New York and their release upon that community, where they renewed their propaganda.

The Lusk Committee in New York, investigating seditious activities, continued its hearings of the case of the so-called Russian Embassy, which was raided in June by the committee's agents. On Dec. 4 Supreme Court Justice Samuel Greenbaum refused the temporary stay of an order restraining the committee from prying into the affairs of the "embassy" pending a final court decision demanded by Dudley Field Malone, representing "Ambassador" Martens. Mr. Martens was under subpoena to appear as a witness before the committee, and to produce his correspondence with the Lenin-Trotsky Government, which he had refused. On the same date Dr. Michael Mislig, recently Treasurer of the Russian Socialist Federation of America, was declared in contempt by the Lusk Committee when, as a witness, he declined to divulge who were the members of the Executive Committee. From Dr. Mislig's testimony it was gathered that the Russian Socialist Federation had gone over to the Communist Party and was in thorough accord with the principles enunciated by Nikolai Lenin, but had transferred its activities underground.

Attorney General Palmer said in his annual report to Congress on Dec. 8 that the Department of Justice was confronted with "increasingly dangerous radical activities." He added that of the total of 365,295 index record cards, 71,000 Bertillon records, and 262,712 fingerprint records now in the department, some 60,000 represented data concerning "Reds" and their work.

Announcement was made in Washington on Nov. 29 by Commissioner General of Immigration Caminetti that the Department of Labor had ordered the deportation of Emma Goldman, anarchist and radical. A few days previously the department had affirmed a similar order in the case of Alexander Berkman. These two radicals arrived at Ellis Island on Dec. 6 and at once began a legal battle to stay the deportation order. On Ellis Island they found eighty-two fellow-anarchists awaiting deportation, thirty of whom had been arrested in New York and New Jersey in the previous week. The most aggressive of these was a 17-year-old boy, who had been educated in the New York public schools. He said he had been converted to anarchy by reading anarchist works in one of the New York public libraries.

Writs of habeas corpus on behalf of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman were issued by Federal Judge Julius M. Mayer. On the 9th Judge Mayer dismissed these writs, but allowed a short stay of deportation to make possible an appeal to the United States Supreme Court. In the brief of appeal to that court Harry Weinberger, counsel for Emma Goldman and Berkman, admitted that his clients were anarchists, but contended that there was insufficient evidence to warrant deportation. The constitutionality under which the order was issued was also attacked. On Dec. 11 the Supreme Court refused to interfere with the deportation of Berkman, but granted Emma Goldman a stay of one week to determine certain legal aspects of her case. In response to this decision Mr. Weinberger, on behalf of Miss Goldman, asked leave to withdraw the appeal on the ground that his client preferred jail or deportation to detention on Ellis Island.

A bill introduced in the House on the 11th by Representative Johnson, Republican, Washington, Chairman of the Immigration Committee, proposed extension of exclusion and deportation laws to aliens affiliated with "any organization which writes, prints, or distributes" matter advocating the overthrow of the Government by violence, sabotage, or assassination of public officials. Another bill, sponsored by Representative Siegel, followed the New York State law almost word for word, except that it made it a Federal act and provided also for the punishment of those who might plot in Mexico or elsewhere to bring about the overthrow of the United States Government. When Mr. Siegel's attention was drawn to Attorney General Palmer's annual report, he said:

I fail to see the result. Since May, 1917, they have actually deported sixty alien anarchists out of a total of 697 for whom warrants have been issued. In two years and seven months they have got rid of only sixty. During that period warrants were issued for a total of 697, but in the last three weeks, since the Congressional Investigation Committee has been at work, they have issued warrants for 400 more.

Commissioner General of Immigration Caminetti, in his annual report, published on Dec. 15, stated that only two aliens were excluded from the United States during the fiscal year on anarchistic grounds, while thirty-seven aliens in the same class were expelled from the country and fifty-five awaited deportation. The Commissioner was opposed to the suggestion that immigration be suspended completely for the reason that it would have "an injurious effect upon our efforts to further American commerce and enterprise in foreign countries." In proceeding to point out that deportation of an anarchist was not punishment for crime, but merely removed him from one field of activity to another, the Commissioner recommended changes in the laws whereby both aliens and citizens would be brought within more certain control of the Government in respect of attempting its overthrow by anarchistic activity, by the enactment of punitive statutes, and the exercise of correctional influences. He further recommended making the anarchist a universal outlaw by international agreement.

Strained Relations With Mexico

Rupture of Diplomatic Intercourse Threatened in Connection With Jenkins Case

THE Mexican Government under General Carranza and the Government of the United States came very near to a diplomatic rupture in December over Mexico's treatment of William O. Jenkins, the American Consular Agent at Puebla. Mr. Jenkins had been kidnapped by bandits on Oct. 19, and held for $150,000 ransom, and had finally been released upon payment of a large portion of that sum. After his release, instead of receiving redress from the Mexican authorities, he was arrested at the instance of the Carranza Government on the charge of having been implicated in his own abduction, and upon his refusal to furnish $500 bail was confined in jail.

Mr. Lansing, the American Secretary of State, met this action by dispatching a vigorous note to the Carranza Government on Nov. 20, calling for the immediate release of Mr. Jenkins. The Mexican Government replied to this note a week later, declining to release Jenkins, taking the ground in a prolonged argument that the Executive could not order the release of a foreigner on trial before a State tribunal in Mexico. On Dec. 1 Secretary Lansing sent a severe reply to this, bringing the relations of the two countries to a most acute stage. He said in part:

What conclusion is to be drawn from such a reply of the Mexican Government other than that there has been a studied effort on the part of Mexican authorities to ensnare Jenkins in the intricacies of legal proceedings by alleging the commission of technical offenses and by bringing unsupported charges against him, for a purpose? In the first place, to divert the attention of the American public and the American Government, and, indeed, of Mexicans themselves, from the actual situation, namely, that Puebla, the capital of the State of Puebla, and perhaps the second largest city in Mexico, is without adequate protection from outlaws who infest the immediate neighborhood and who are accustomed openly and freely to visit the city without hindrance; that by the failure to furnish adequate protection in this district the Mexican authorities have, through their negligence, made possible the abduction of Jenkins, and that in harmony with such an attitude on the part of the Mexican authorities they have failed to carry out the duty and obligation incumbent upon them to apprehend and punish the bandits concerned in the crime of which Jenkins was the victim.

And, in the second place, it appears to have been the purpose of the Mexican Government to assume a willful indifference to the feelings of the American people that have been aroused to the point of indignation by the exposure, hardships, and physical suffering endured by Jenkins during his abduction and his subsequent treatment at the hands of Mexican authorities.

In view of the considerations which have been set forth and in view, particularly, of the belief of my Government that the charge against Jenkins of deliberate false swearing is unfounded, the Government of the United States must renew its request for the immediate release of Consular Agent Jenkins from further imprisonment.

LANSING.

The position of our Government was later confirmed by the statement of Federico Cordova, the brigand who had kidnapped Jenkins, in which he stated that the kidnapping was done "to combat in this manner the dictatorial Government of Carranza, which, unfortunately for Mexico, has established itself in power," and that the deed was done by himself, accompanied by four subordinates, "without outside intervention."

The main object of the kidnapping, said Cordova, was political. He expressly denied the truth of statements made in the Carranzista newspapers that Jenkins was seen with him on friendly terms four days after the kidnapping and warmly denounced their attempts to make it appear that Jenkins was therefore a willing victim.

On Dec. 3 a formal resolution in favor of breaking off diplomatic relations with Mexico was introduced in the Senate by Senator Fall of New Mexico, who charged the Carranza Government with fomenting revolution in this country and trying to overthrow the American Government. The resolution gave the support of Congress to the State Department's action in the Jenkins case and requested President Wilson to withdraw the recognition accorded Carranza's Government and to sever all diplomatic relations with it.

Senator Ashurst of Arizona, Democrat, introduced a resolution directing the Secretary of War to use the nation's armed forces to protect Americans in the border States from raids by Mexican bandits.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S ATTITUDE

The resolutions were referred to committees. Meanwhile it was decided by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate to appoint a committee, consisting of one Democratic and one Republican Senator, to confer with President Wilson and obtain his views on the Mexican situation. Senator Hitchcock, the Democratic leader, and Senator Fall (Rep.) were selected for the purpose. A conference was arranged through the President's Secretary, with the approval of his physicians. The President received the Senators in his bedroom in the White House at 2:30 P. M., Dec. 5.

This personal interview disposed of rumors that President Wilson was in no condition to direct American action in the perturbing state of affairs that has developed between the United States and the Carranza Government. The Senators came away from the White House convinced that his mind was vigorous and active.

A dramatic touch was given to the interview by the sudden appearance of Rear Admiral Grayson, the President's physician, with the announcement that Jenkins, around whose imprisonment the Mexican crisis centred, had been freed the preceding night. The message had come to the State Department while the conference was on. Secretary Lansing had telephoned to the White House that he desired the information to be given to the two Senators immediately.

Both Senators reported the President to be fully able to handle the situation. On Dec. 8 President Wilson gave documentary evidence to the same effect in a letter to Senator Fall acknowledging some data on Mexican matters and referring to the Fall resolution, which was then pending in the Senate, in these words:

I should be gravely concerned to see any such resolution pass the Congress. It would constitute a reversal of our constitutional practice, which might lead to very grave confusion in regard to the guidance of our foreign affairs.

I am convinced that I am supported by every competent constitutional authority in the statement that the initiative in directing the relations of our Government with foreign Governments is assigned by the Constitution to the Executive and to the Executive only.

Only one of the Houses of Congress is associated with the President by Constitution in an advisory capacity, and the advice of the Senate is provided for only when sought by the Executive in regard to explicit agreements with foreign Governments and the appointment of the diplomatic representatives who are to speak for this Government at foreign capitals.

The only safe course, I am confident, is to adhere to the prescribed method of the Constitution. We might go very far afield if we departed from it.

As a result no action was taken by the Senate on the resolution.

ANOTHER MEXICAN NOTE

The Carranza Government replied on Dec. 16 to Secretary Lansing's last note. The reply rejected the claim of the United States that its State Department could determine the guilt or innocence of Jenkins, but added that, as bail had been furnished for him by an American, his case was being further considered. The note ended with the words: "The Government of Mexico expects that the case will not disturb the harmony which it sincerely desires to exist between Mexico and the United States."

It developed that the release of Jenkins was apparently not in response to our Government's demand, but was brought about through the deposit of a cash bond by J. Salter Hansen, an American residing in Mexico, who was regarded as an agent for Carranza.

An American named James Wallace, an employe of the Aquila Oil Company, was killed by Mexicans in the Tampico district early in December. This provoked another note of protest from Washington. On Dec. 13 a band of Villistas raided a ranch near Muzquiz, State of Coahuila, and held an American named Frank Hugo for $10,000 ransom. Hugo was released a few days later without payment of the money.

AMERICANS KILLED IN MEXICO

An official compilation submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Dec. 13 showed that since the Madero revolution of 1910 in Mexico 551 Americans had been killed in Mexico and along the international border. Eighteen American women and children were on the death list, and thirteen American men were listed as having been killed in their effort to protect women. In connection with the deaths listed, eight American women were outraged.

Bandits who shot down Mrs. Mortensen at Guadeloupe, Chihuahua, in 1912, attempted to ravish her 10-year-old daughter. A neighbor who came to the girl's rescue was killed. After Villistas had killed Edward J. Wright and Frank Hayden at Colonia Hernandez, on March 1, 1916, they carried off Mrs. Wright, and for nine days abused her horribly. She escaped while the Villistas were raiding Columbus, N. M. When bandits raided the ranch of John W. Correll at Colonia, near Tampico, Correll sought to defend his wife, and was shot down before her eyes. She was repeatedly outraged by the bandits, who were thought to be Carranza soldiers. On July 22 of the present year rebels kidnapped an unidentified American girl from a train at Baradon, Puebla. She was carried off and died as the result of outrage.

Sixteen of those listed were victims of the Cumbre Tunnel horror, on Feb. 4, 1914. Bandits under Castillo set fire to the timber lining of the railroad tunnel by running a blazing freight train into it. A passenger train crashed into the burning freight train in the centre of the tunnel, and not a single passenger escaped. Some of the bodies never were identified, but it was established that Mrs. Lee Carruth and her five small children, with ten other Americans, perished.

MANY CASES OF TORTURE

In many of the murders the victims were tortured, or mutilated in a horrible manner after they had been killed. William Bishop, Carl Eck, and William Spencer, who were killed by bandits under Posé Perez at Temosachic, Chihuahua, on Nov. 8, 1914, were dragged to death by wild horses. After robbing and murdering John Glenn Parmenter at Guadalajara, Jalisco, on May 26, 1913, the bandits tore the victim's teeth from his head to secure the gold fillings.

Maurice McDonald, an American soldier of fortune who followed Villa, was captured by Carranzistas at San Pedro de las Colonias, Coahuila, in April, 1914. The soles of his feet were cut off and he was forced to walk about the plaza. He was then burned at the stake until his legs had been completely consumed, and finally was shot.

In many cases the authorities cited asserted that the men were killed "because they were Americans," or because the murderer "wished to show that he could kill an American."

During the period from April 7, 1917, to Nov. 11, 1918, while the United States was engaged in the world war, with the Carranza Government in power in Mexico, forty-eight Americans met death.

General Felipe Angeles, who was tried by the Carranza authorities and convicted of aiding the Villista rebellion, was executed by a firing squad on Nov. 27. He was one of the most prominent military men in Mexico and aided the French Government in the production of munitions in 1917 to such an extent that he was decorated by that Government. His wife, an American—formerly Clara Krause of San Francisco—died in New York on Dec. 8 of illness due to worry over her husband, though his tragic fate was concealed from her to the last.

THE BALKANS

BULGARIA signed the Treaty of Neuilly on Nov. 27. The Allies signed with the exception of Serbia and Rumania, which had declined to sign the Treaty of St. Germain—the Austrian treaty—on account of the clauses providing for the protection of minorities, and were consequently forbidden to sign peace with Bulgaria. However, Rumania signed the Treaty of St. Germain on Dec. 9. The head of the Bulgarian delegation was the Premier, Stamboulinski (also spelled Stambulevski and Stamboliisky), leader of the Agrarian Party, who had recently formed a Ministry of pro-Entente statesmen for the purpose of accepting the treaty and bringing to justice the members of ex-Czar Ferdinand's régime, who were declared to be responsible for Bulgaria having sided with the Central Powers.

The Treaty of Neuilly had been presented to the Bulgar delegation on Nov. 3. The Sofia Government expressed its willingness to sign on Nov. 14 after having taken exception to the loss of the Dobrudja and the districts of Vidin, Tzaribrod, Bossilegrad, Strumitza and Thrace, asserting that a plebiscite conducted by the principal allied and associated powers could easily have established the fact of Bulgar majorities in these places.

The effect of the event of Nov. 27 was an attempt in Bulgaria itself to raise its prestige in the Balkans, where, while Rumania was suffering from a Ministerial crisis and the National Assembly of Serbia was attempting to put the monarchy of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in working order, Bulgaria took steps to negotiate commercial treaties with Greece and in other ways to make the best of the treaty Stamboulinski had signed. On Nov. 27 a Bulgar-Greek convention was also signed at Paris.

The object of this convention was to prevent in both countries the tyrannous coercion of minority races by the predominant majority, which had caused ceaseless trouble in the past in these countries, where the population, as is well known, consists of inextricably mixed nationalities. The document, which consisted of sixteen articles, permitted free emigration for a period of two years, and instituted a mixed Greco-Bulgar commission, whose duty it was to supervise and facilitate voluntary emigration, to liquidate the property of the emigrants, and to make advances to intending emigrants equal to the value of their real property.

BULGARIA—Bulgarian propaganda having passed through various phases calculated to arouse the sympathy of the Peace Conference reached a new stage censuring Rumania and Serbia for declining to promise protection to minorities, and calling upon the authorities to make short work of all pro-Germans while emphasizing the utter innocence of the people in being led into the war by Ferdinand and the Government of Radoslavoff.

The new Government of M. Stamboulinski reached the following decision, which went into effect on Nov. 4:

All ex-Ministers of the Cabinet of Radoslavoff, ex-members of the Sobranje, statesmen and journalists, officers, functionaries and Macedonian leaders who by their conduct have given Germanophile tendencies to Bulgarian politics and who have contributed toward the catastrophe of the country which involved Bulgaria in war, to be arrested and judged of their conduct and crimes.

Order for arrest had been issued for 400 persons. Early this morning the order began to be executed. The dwellings of ex-Ministers were surrounded by policemen and one by one they were arrested. Up to the present are arrested P. Peshoff, the actual chief of Radoslavoff's party and ex-Minister of Education; D. Toncheff, ex-Minister of Finances; P. Dimtchoff, ex-Minister of Agriculture; D. Petcoff, ex-Minister of Public Buildings, and the chief of Stamboulloff's party; G. Bakaloff, ex-Minister of Commerce; N. Apostoloff, ex-Minister of Railroads; N. Popoff, ex-Minister of Justice; Koznitchki, Minister of Railways after Apostoloff. The deputies: Dr. Georgieff, the son-in-law of Dr. Radoslavoff; Dr. Provdalleff, brother-in-law of Dr. Radoslavoff; K. Rankoff, T. Usounoff, N. Altimirski, Milan Maroff, Dr. Toshkoff, General Protogheroff, ex-Director of Socials Livelihood and Macedonian leader, and General Koutintcheff, the chief of the army during the war. The journalists: Atanass Damyanoff, director of the newspaper Dnevnik and Utro; Chrusto Stantcheff, director of the newspaper Kambana; Spass Iconomoff and Ivan Colaroff, the editors of the newspaper Narodni Prava, organ of Radoslavoff.

On his return from Paris to Sofia on Dec. 15, Premier Stamboulinski declared at a Cabinet meeting that it would be necessary to bring ex-Czar Ferdinand to trial, and for that purpose steps would immediately be taken to extradite him and other refugees. The Mir of Sofia stated that undoubtedly Bulgaria would try Ferdinand before the Allies tried Kaiser William.

GREECE—On Nov. 20 the press of Athens gave prominence to two pieces of news, which, however, as yet have not been confirmed by the Peace Conference. One stated that an Italo-Greek agreement had been reached in regard to the Dodecanese Islands, off the coast of Asia Minor, Italy to surrender the islands, retaining a coaling station and receiving territorial concessions on the mainland south of Smyrna; the other announced a similar agreement in regard to Epirus, the region lying in the Western Balkan Peninsula, between Greece and Albania, comment on which was as follows:

In accordance with the Italo-Greek agreement, Hellenic troops have begun to occupy the region of Northern Epirus as far as the line set by the protocol of Florence. The Italian troops withdrew to the frontier established by that protocol. The Greek and Italian authorities exchanged reciprocal sentiments of good-will.

Censorship both of mail and press increased its vigilance, letters, unless specially registered, taking thirty days between Athens and New York. Papers coming from the loyalists of ex-King Constantine, with headquarters at Berne, were severely dealt with on reaching Athens. All attacked M. Venizelos, the Prime Minister, not because he had failed to get more from the Peace Conference for Greece, but because, it was affirmed, Greece would have been in a position of predominance in the Near East if she had remained neutral and Constantine been allowed to remain King. An Athens dispatch announced on Nov. 24 that a plot to assassinate Venizelos and restore Constantine had been discovered in the capital and many arrests made.

On Dec. 1 the ex-King denied the existence of any plot in an interview published in the Neue Zürcher Zeitung (Zurich, Switzerland), adding:

M. Venizelos only remains in power by terrorism and by using martial law against his opponents. From 90 to 95 per cent. of the people are opposed to him, and if there were any truth in the story of the attempt against him it would be an expression of the will of the people not to be ruled by force. I wish emphatically to deny that I have ever been in favor of the Central Empires; I only desire to remain neutral, but France distrusted me and plotted against me.

In Athens the most violent anti-Venizelos journal was Politia, which was rarely published without at least a page censored out.

RUMANIA—Previous to the signing of the St. Germain treaty on Dec. 9 Rumania had already, Nov. 25, expressed herself as willing to comply fully with the demands of the Peace Conference concerning the protection of national minorities in newly acquired territorial regions and would submit as soon as possible legislative proposals in this respect to the Rumanian Chamber; the Rumanian Government was also willing to give way in connection with the Bessarabia language question; it was pointed out, however, that popular opinion was against Rumania evacuating the left bank of the Theiss.

On the same day that Rumania signed the treaty a new Cabinet was formed, taking the place of the Bratiano Administration, called the "Generals' Ministry," because all the portfolios, save that of Justice, were held by Generals on the active list. As was stated last month, the Opposition declined to take part in the election thus managed by a military Government under the dictatorship of M. Bratiano to give the latter a parliamentary majority.

The only candidates were those of the Liberal Party (M. Bratiano), those of the Germanophil Party (M. Marghiloman), and a number of candidates of the Nationalist and Peasants' Parties. In spite of the large number of absentions—70 per cent., it was reported—M. Bratiano's supporters, who expected to elect every one of the 240 Deputies, only succeeded in seating 100 as against 120 members of the Nationalist Party, the Peasants' Party, and other independent groups, and even among the 100 were thirty or forty dissenters on important points. The Germanophil Party secured only five seats, and M. Marghiloman was personally defeated in the domain of Buzeu, as was M. Bratiano's brother Dinu in that of Muscal.

The new Ministry of Dec. 9 was made up in part as follows, led by the head of the peace delegation then in Paris:

Alexander Vlada
Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs
General Fofzo Averescu.....	Interior

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND

Revised, official returns of the Belgian elections held on Nov. 16 gave the result as follows for the new Chamber:

Catholics	71
Socialists	70
Liberals	34
Christian Democrats	4

186

The Catholics lost 24 seats, the Socialists gained 30, and the Liberals lost 11. With 27 Senators still to be elected by provincial councils, the new Senate showed 59 Catholics, 36 Liberals, and 25 Socialists.

A revised list of party totals gives:

Socialists	644,924
Catholics	619,911
Liberals	309,976
Front Party	44,426
Christian Democrats	44,386

According to the debates of the Executive Council of the Socialist Party, while a purely Socialist program was advocated, Bolshevik doctrine was denounced, and members were advised to take part in a Coalition Government and to support a collaborated policy.

For a fortnight after the elections party groups indulged in prolonged and animated discussions in order to arrive at a common program, no party being willing to participate in a Coalition Government without its own special reservations being accepted, at least in principle. The Socialists finally gained a promise for the suppression of Article 310 of the Penal Code, dealing with picketing and sabotage, and for bills dealing with housing and pensions, and the Liberals gained the Socialist support of a bill regulating the liberty of labor unions. All agreed to reform the election laws.

M. Delacroix, who had resigned when the first results of the elections became known, was thus able to form a Coalition Government. It was the same as the last, except that M. Pouillet, formerly President of the Chamber, became Minister of the Interior instead of Count de Broque, and the post of Minister of Science and Art was accepted by M. Des-trée. The new Government will thus consist of five Catholics, four Socialists, and three Liberals.

For the year ending Dec. 1 Belgium imported from the United States goods valued at $283,417,698 and sent to this country goods valued at $2,901,644.

Holland, in spite of the reassurances of Belgian Socialists and the defeat of that party in France, paid more attention to the victory of the extremists in Italy and their subsequent demonstrations. A number of Governmental measures were taken to keep out the Reds and to stop Bolshevik propaganda. Consuls abroad were ordered to be particularly careful whose passports they visé'd and frontier guards received special instructions. On Dec. 5 the Dutch-German frontier was closed with 9,220 persons held up at Heerenberg. In the Second Chamber, on Nov. 20, the Dutch Premier, Jonkheer Ruijs de Beerenbruck, said that he would like to see incorporated in the covenant of the League of Nations a clause against Bolshevism.

EGYPT, INDIA, AND IRELAND

For several quite pertinent reasons Egypt, India, and Ireland are grouped together this month—all are attached to the British Empire, all are seeking to modify that attachment or to rupture it entirely, all are revolting against the constituted authorities, constitutions have been promised to all, and in all encouragement is given to conspirators, as some claim by a policy of concession and surrender and as others claim by a policy of delay and prevarication. All claim international instead of British intervention.

EGYPT—Amid the Nationalist uprisings of last Spring the British Government decided to send out a commission under the Presidency of Lord Milner. In September the personnel of the commission was made up. On Nov. 18 the following communiqué was issued at the British Residency at Cairo:

The policy of Great Britain in Egypt is to preserve the autonomy of that country under British protection and to develop the system of self-government under an Egyptian ruler.

The object of Great Britain is to defend Egypt from all external danger and interference by any foreign power, and at the same time to establish a constitutional system in which, under British guidance, the Sultan, his Ministers, and the elected representatives of the people may in their several spheres and in an increasing degree co-operate in the management of Egyptian affairs.

His Majesty's Government have decided to send to Egypt a mission which has as its task to work out the details of the Constitution, to carry out this object, and, in consultation with the Sultan, his Ministers, and representative Egyptians, to undertake the preliminary work which is requisite before the future form of government can be settled.

It is no function of the mission to impose a Constitution on Egypt. Its duty is to explore the ground and to discuss, in consultation with the authorities on the spot, the reforms that are necessary and to propose, it is hoped in complete agreement with the Sultan and his Ministers, a scheme of government which can subsequently be put into force.

A Cabinet crisis and Nationalist demonstrations, ultimately taking the attitude of rebellion, at once ensued. Both were based on the objection of the Moslem Egyptian to co-operate with the British Government until the fate of Turkey had been decided by the Peace Conference. The Ministry resigned, and on Nov. 26 another was constituted, as follows, being more Egyptian than any of its predecessors:

Premier and Minister of Finance—YOUSSEF WAHBA PASHA.

Public Works, War, and Marine—SIR ISMAIL SIRRY PASHA, K. C. M. G.
Communications — A H M E D ZIWER PASHA.

Justice—AHMED ZULFICAR PASHA.
Interior—TEWFIK NESSIM PASHA.
Agriculture — MOHAMED SHAFIK PASHA.

Education—YEHLA IBRAHIM PASHA.
Wakfs (Pious Foundations)—HUSSEIN DARWISCHE BEY.

Revolutionary demonstrations and riots in which both civilians and soldiers had been killed had already given emphasis to the increasing objections to the Milner Commission, and on Nov. 24 Lord Allenby, the British High Commissioner, had issued the following proclamation:

Whereas certain evilly disposed persons recently endeavored, and are now endeavoring, by means of publications in the press, by the distribution of printed matter, and by public speeches and other means to promote demonstrations and disturbances calculated to endanger public order and public security, I hereby give warning that all acts of incitement to participation in disorderly or unlawful demonstrations and all other acts subversive of authority or endangering public order and security, constitute offenses under martial law and render offenders liable to arrest and prosecution by a military court.

In the British House of Lords on Nov. 25 Earl Curzon, the Foreign Secretary, announced that Great Britain could not possibly give Egypt entire liberty of action, as the country, standing as it did at the door of Africa and the highway to India, was incapable of maintaining either a stable government or of protecting its own frontiers.

INDIA—Three phases of the India question came into prominence—a revival of fighting on the Afghan frontier, exchange of amenities between the der Herr Suritz, organized at Tashkend, Turkistan, reached Kabul. The aim of the former was to establish commercial relations between Afghanistan and Soviet Russia; the aim of the latter was to draft as much of the Bolshevik doctrine on the Koran as the precepts of Islam would stand. Both were anti-British.

In the way of this Bolshevik-Afghan combination stood the Emir of Bokhara, who was approached by a combined Bolshevik-Afghan mission which urged the Emir to join it in bringing pressure upon Persia to enter a Pan-Islamic democratic union, but the Emir as a measure of self-protection ordered torn up the railway twelve miles on both sides of Bokhara. The Bolsheviks became firmly established at Kizil Arvat, on the Trans-Caspian Railway, and threatened the road to Krasnovodsk, the terminus of the railway on the Caspian.

The report of the Joint Select Committee on the Government of India bill was presented to the British Parliament on Nov. 19. It drew its authority from his Majesty's Government's declaration of Aug. 20, 1917, and was based on the subsequent Montagu report. Aside from the establishment of a Council of Princes, which has merely advisory functions, little change has been made in the relations between the Government of India and the India Office, between the people of India and the British Crown. The more important changes are the following:

Increased financial powers to be given to the Legislatures and adjustments to be made with a view to equitable provision as between transferred and reserved subjects.

The President of each provincial Legislature to be not the Government, but a specially selected officer. The President of the Indian Legislature to have Parliamentary experience.

The Governor of the province will depart from the advice of Ministers on transferred subjects only under exceptional circumstances.

Free consultation between the two halves of Government to be fostered in every way without obscuring their separate distinctive responsibilities.

Two Ministers to be appointed in each province.

The franchise as settled by the rules not to be altered for the first ten years. The rules to give greater weight than under

SCENE OF RECENT FIGHTING ON NORTH-WESTERN FRONTIER OF INDIA

Afghan Court at Kabul and the Bolshevik administration at Moscow, and the report on the Government of India bill in the British Parliament.

Although the Indian Government had made peace with Kabul on Aug. 8, it fell to the former to enforce the terms on the frontier tribes, two of which, the Waziris and Mahsuds, 200 miles south-east of Kabul, attacked British outposts in the middle of November and were in turn bombed by airplanes into partial submission. The Afghan force of Shah Doula was said to be ready to aid the tribesman, but the Emir forbade their movement.

Meanwhile an Afghan Extraordinary Mission reached Bolshevik headquarters at Moscow, and a Bolshevik Mission un-the Southborough scheme to the rural vote and artisan representation.

The Council of State to be reshaped as a true second chamber for the central authority, and not to be the instrument of securing essential legislation.

Three members of the Governor General's Executive to continue to be public servants of not less than ten years' Indian experience; three to be Indians, and one to have definite legal qualification, which may be gained in India as well as in the United Kingdom.

The Indian Council to be reduced in numbers, and membership to be for five instead of seven years.

The cost of the India Office for other than "agency" services to be paid out of British and not Indian revenues.

Agency functions for India to be carried out by a High Commissioner in London.

The Secretary as far as possible to avoid interference when the Government of India and its Legislature are in agreement, especially in respect to fiscal policy.

The Joint Select Committee to be reappointed to advise Parliament in respect to the rules to be made under the act.

IRELAND—All through October and November Irish Nationalists and Unionist Ulsterites were both optimistic in regard to the new Home Rule bill which the Cabinet Committee on the Irish question was preparing. As the day approached for the presentation of the bill to Parliament, opinion gradually became pessimistic and there were said to be serious differences in the Cabinet over certain of its articles. As the situation stood on Dec. 18 the Government may or may not present the bill before the end of the year.

The essence of the scheme is the creation of two State Legislatures with a Council of Ireland as an indispensable link. The largest possible unit is proposed for the Ulster Legislature. It is to consist not of the four northeastern counties nor of the six by the inclusion of the debatable ground of Fermanagh and Tyrone, but of the whole province. There is to be no voting into one Legislature or out of the other. The second Legislature is to consist of the provinces of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught. The Council of Ireland will consist of delegations of equal strength drawn from the two State Legislatures. The Council will possess not only the obvious functions of co-ordination and unification, but will have potentialities of a far-reaching character—similar to those enjoyed by the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

In Ireland more drastic measures were taken against the Sinn Fein, calculated to prevent acts against law and order and to visit the delinquents with more severe penalties.

FRANCE

The municipal elections of Nov. 30 gave the Socialists of France a supplementary defeat to the one they had received in the national election of a fortnight before. In Paris seven Conservatives, thirteen Progressives, thirteen Republicans, thirteen of the Republican Left, and finally four Radicals and Radical Socialists who were not extremists were elected. Elsewhere, in 125 prefectures and sub-prefectures, the returns showed fifty-one Republican Leftists, fifty Radicals and Radical Socialists, ten Progressives, eight Conservatives, two Republican Socialists, and only four extreme Socialists.

Aside from the overwhelming Socialist defeat on Nov. 16, the old bloc of Radicals and Radical Socialists (although neither faction was Socialist) was practically dissolved. This was the combination, made up of 249 Deputies in the late Chamber, which enabled M. Caillaux and, after him, his lieutenants, to manipulate French national and international politics for a number of years.

Many causes were assigned for the great swing of all parties toward the Right, or Conservative, which, although inherently Republican, will permit a greater tolerance for religion, greater respect for existing institutions, and a stronger determination to conserve the existing social order. The direct defeat of the Socialists was charged to defections among the party itself after the revelations that came from Soviet Russia and the repudiation by Socialist soldiers on account of Defeatism, and by the peasants on account of the Soviet land scheme. Added to these elements was the constant appeal of all but the anarchist press to kill Bolshevism in France.

That remarkable paper, La Presse de Paris, a composite journal of practically all the Paris papers which were obliged to suspend publication on Nov. 11 on account of a strike of linotypers and typographers, was published daily from Nov. 11 till Nov. 30, inclusive. It was a four-page folio sheet and a model of its kind at 10 centimes a copy, of which over 5,000,000 were daily issued. The first page was devoted to local news, the second to editorial comment under captions showing its origin—L'Homme Libre, Le Gaulois, Le Journal, &c.—the third to telegraphic dispatches and theatrical and other announcements, and the fourth to advertisements. Although it was said that the strike was made in order to embarrass the press at election time, the defeat of the Socialists at the polls may have contributed not a little to the ultimate victory of the proprietors, who promised to take back the strikers as they had need of them.

On Nov. 27 three Cabinet Ministers who had been defeated at the polls were replaced by newly elected Deputies, of whom there were 339 who had never been seated before. Léon Bérard succeeded Louis Lafferre as Minister of Public Instruction and Fine Arts; Louis Dubois, Etienne Clémentel, as Minister of Commerce, Industry, Posts and Telegraphs; and Yves Le Trocquer, Louis Morel, as Under Secretary for Finance. The post of Under Secretary for Demobilization was abolished and its incumbent, Louis Deschamps, was appointed Under Secretary for Posts, Telegraphs, and Telephones. It was expected that M. Shuman, Deputy from Moselle, would succeed M. Colliard as Minister of Labor.

French customs returns for the first three-quarters of 1919 were published. The imports showed an advance of $755,000,000 over the same period for last year; the exports $182,500,000. Owing to the present rate of exchange the international value of these figures is reduced nearly one-half. French foreign trade in million dollars at the nominal rate of exchange was as follows:

Countries	Impts.	Expts.
United States.....	1,020	11.9
Great Britain.....	900	26.5
Belgium	75	21.4
Spain	140	4.15
Switzerland	45	5.55

Countries	Impts.	Expts.
Italy	97	6.5
Brazil	101	1.25
Argentina	134	2.75
Russia	3	.35
Algeria	119	9.40
Morocco	32	1.30

According to French law, as soon as the state of war ceases and has so been announced by Presidential decree, the French railways revert automatically to pre-war conditions. But it was found that the roads were not prepared to revert in this way, and so the President decreed a number of transition provisions which will be in force till Dec. 31, 1920, unless earlier abrogated:

The principal railroads must give priority in the following cases:

To the transportation of goods destined for the reconstitution of the liberated regions, along the lines of the program laid down by the Ministry for the Liberated Regions.

To slow freight, in carload lots, along the lines recommended by the Ministries of Revictualing and Industrial Réconstitution in regard to the supply of fuel and revictualing of the whole country.

A provisional committee will be formed to decide upon the necessary measures to insure the proper compliance with these provisions and the satisfactory working of the great railroad systems. Its decisions are final and obligatory for all the systems.

Another committee will be appointed to deal with questions relating to railroad supplies and rolling stock and to co-ordinate the action of the railroads in respect to such matters.

This latter committee will include among its members three manufacturers of railroad material designated by the Ministry of Public Works. Its decisions are final, with the exception of measures relating to closing stations, suppression of trains, or limiting shipments. In such cases its decisions are subject to revision by the Ministry.

ITALY

The estimate of the results of the Italian Deputorial elections on Nov. 16, made in CURRENT HISTORY for December, were confirmed by the official figures issued on Nov. 21 as follows:

Socialists	156	Democrats	23
Catholics	101	Republicans	9
Liberals	161	Discharged Soldiers.....	23
Reformist Socialists	16	Independents	8

Although the Liberals led, theirs was not an organized party, being governed by individuals rather than by measures. The organized parties were the Socialist, the Popular Party (the Catholic), and the Republican. The Socialist gain was seventy-nine seats. At first it was believed that the Nitti Government would be unable to persuade the Socialists to co-operate with other parties on vital questions, when the alternative would have been resignation for the Government or dissolution with a new election and a special appeal to the absentee bourgeoisie.

There were Socialist and anti-Socialist demonstrations, with loss of life and a general strike, but after a fortnight tranquillity prevailed, and on Dec. 13 the Chamber voted approval of King Victor Emmanuel's speech from the throne made on Dec. 1, and rejected by a vote of 289 to 124 an amendment calling for the recognition of Soviet Russia.

Geography played a larger part in this vote than political principles, for the Socialists of the north differ from the Socialists of the south, just as the Catholics do—on all but Vatican questions. A comparative table of the Socialist victories at the polls showed how great was the difference between the industrial north and the agricultural south. While Northern Italy selected 85 and Central Italy 60 out of the 156 Socialist Deputies, the continental south elected only 11 and Sicily and Sardinia not one. The same was true of the Catholics. Of their 101 Deputies 52 were elected in the north, 25 in the centre, 17 in the continental south, and 7 in the islands.

It was thus calculated that 73 per cent. of the total representation of the industrial north was either Socialist or Catholic, and 71 per cent. of that of Central Italy. The vote of 124 cast for the recognition of Soviet Russia was entirely made up of northern Socialists. On many reform measures the Socialists and Catholics promised cohesion.

On Nov. 26 Signor Tittoni resigned as Foreign Minister and head of the Italian delegation at Paris, and was succeeded in both posts by Vittorio Scialoja, a professor of Roman law and the holder of several learned titles, who had been Minister without portfolio in the short-lived Boselli Cabinet of 1916-17 and once Minister of Justice, back in 1909. He had also been Signor Tittoni's lieutenant at Paris.

On Nov. 26 the Government published its financial program. The forced loan at 2 per cent. and the 3½ per cent. loan on capital were abandoned, and one of 5 per cent. issued at 87½ proposed, but with drastic increases of taxation. The measures were divided into the following categories:

- (1) A progressive tax on increase of capital due to war profits.
- (2) An extraordinary progressive tax on all capital.
- (3) A revision of the present tax on incomes by the institution of a comprehensive income tax.
- (4) An increase of the special tax on bearer bonds.
- (5) An increase of the various existing taxes on bicycles and motors.
- (6) A tax on the sale of all articles except food and fuel.
- (7) A special luxury tax on silk gloves, &c.

The tax on increase of capital due to war profits will vary from 10 to 60 per cent. The tax on capital will be payable in annual quotas for 30 years, and a new valuation will be taken from time to time during this period. Property below the value of £800 will be exempt from the tax. Above that sum the amount taken varies from 5 per cent. to 25 per cent., the latter in the case of estates of £4,000,000. The annual quota payable varies from .167 per cent. in the case of estates of £800 to .833 per cent. in the case of the maximum. In practice the new tax amounts to an increase of income tax.

LATIN AMERICA

The Brazilian Government, through the Dutch Chargé d'Affaires at Rio de Janeiro, informed Berlin on Nov. 22 that German immigrants would be admitted to Brazil "without restrictions of any kind." The same invitation was extended to Italians through the Brazilian Ambassador at Rome, Dr. L. Martins de Sousa Dantas. In a recent interview in La Tribuna of Rome he declared that "relations between Brazilians and Italian immigrants have become an indestructible force for prosperity and fraternity." He also spoke of the prosperity of Sao Paulo as depending upon Italians.

Papers of Southern Chile called attention to the fact that a Japanese syndicate had obtained an option on some coal mines at the head of Concepcion Bay. A Santiago paper stated that copper and iron properties along the Northern Railway had been purchased by a Japanese syndicate for $5,000,000.

The Colombian Senate adopted and issued a motion reciting the guaranties under which foreigners live in Colombia, and ending with this declaration:

The Senate of the Republic of Colombia proclaims to the world that for the sake of her own honor Colombia does now and always will maintain her respect of all alien rights with a firmness equal to that with which she will sustain her independence and sovereignty and demand her rights.

MONGOLIA

The Kiachta Treaty of 1912 practically placed Mongolia, formerly a Chinese protectorate, under the protection of the Czar of Russia, although affirming its internal autonomy. Since the rise of Bolshevism the treaty had become ineffective, and Mongolia, menaced from the north by Russian bands operating from the Trans-Siberian Railway, from the east by the Japanese, while from the south 4,000 Chinese troops had moved on Urga, the capital.

AS THE RUSSO-MONGOLIAN CONVENTION OF 1912 IS NO LONGER OPERATIVE, AND AS THE JAPANESE ARE PENETRATING WESTWARD FROM MANCHURIA, THE MONGOLIANS WISH TO REVERT TO THEIR PROTECTION UNDER PEKING

In these circumstances the Government at Urga, on Nov. 20, called the attention of the Peking Government to the ineffectiveness of the treaty, and to the menace from the north and east, announced its intention to cancel its autonomy and requested that Mongolia be allowed to come under the wing of China "as in the time of the Manchu dynasty," hoping that the Mongolian people would be permitted to retain some of their rights and privileges, "so that they may happily attach themselves to the Republic of China."

On Nov. 23 a Presidential mandate, issued at Peking, repudiated all the Russo-Chinese and Russo-Mongol agreements concluded since the declaration of Mongolian independence, accepted the Mongolian proposal, and promised to the Mongols cordial treatment and the blessings of the republic forever.

In the week following the Chinese General at Urga brought north more troops, and General Semenov, with the Russians, advanced south, sending a proclamation to the Urga Government that the Government of Siberia considered the treaty of Kiachta still operative, and warning against a surrender to China.

SCANDINAVIA

Irrespective of what might be the result of the Schleswig plebiscite the Danish press started an opposition campaign to secure the important port of Flensburg. There were also demonstrations to this effect in Copenhagen. M. Zahle, the Premier, announced that should the occasion arise he would refer the matter to a Danish plebiscite and resign if the vote were for Flensburg.

On Nov. 30 elections for the new Advisory Council of the North Schleswig Electors' Associations resulted in a victory for the party which had hitherto been the Minority group and which opposed the Government's policy. It demanded the absorption of the second zone, including Flensburg, in Denmark. This minority, who had twenty-three votes in the old Council, thereby gained a total of thirty, while the party which was formerly the majority, thirty-four strong, was reduced to twenty-two seats.

In the course of a debate in the Rigsdag Premier Zahle said in reference to the Schleswig plebiscite:

Reunion with our lost brothers is an epoch-making event in the history of our country. A heavy responsibility rests upon the generation to whose lot it has fallen to experience this great event. A responsibility before history and the idea of political justice. We cannot evade this responsibility. Ours may be the joy of knowing that all Danes are once more united under a single sway, but ours, too, would be a heavy responsibility if in the critical hours we lose our balance, if we forget the grave lessons of our history and the bitter teaching of defeat and spoliation and aim at the solution incompatible with the principle upon which our claims have rested for more than half a century—I mean the right of self determination on the basis of nationality.

An important commercial event in the history of Sweden was the opening of the new free harbor of Stockholm at Lindarängen, work on which was begun on Aug. 6, 1917. Up to the opening, $1,230,750 had been expended in construction work on the new harbor, but much more must be spent before the great enterprise is completed. Two enormous new quays are already in use.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

The lockout inaugurated by Barcelona employers against the General Federation of Labor on Nov. 4 spread throughout Catalonia, and thence to Madrid, where, by Dec. 15, 30,000 employes were out of work. (The purpose of the lockout and the character of the federation were described last month.)

The Toca Government went out of office on account of opposition to the budget, and on Dec. 12 Manuel Aliende Salazar, as Premier, arranged a new Cabinet:

Minister of the Interior—FERNANDEZ PRIDA.

Minister of Foreign Affairs—MARQUIS DE LEMA.

Minister of Finance—COUNT DE BURGALLAL.

Minister of War—GENERAL VILLALBA.

Minister of Marine—ADMIRAL FLORES.

Minister of Instruction—NATALIO RIVAS.

Minister of Justice—SEÑOR GARNICA.

Minister of Public Works—AMALIO GIMENO.

The budget, which did not allow for extraordinary expenditure in its estimates, showed a deficit of 400,000,000 pesetas. It did not produce a favorable impression in financial circles, and the distribution of taxation caused unfavorable comment among the masses.

The question of the return of Olivenza by Spain to Portugal came up in the Senate of the latter on Nov. 21, and became the subject of a reply by the Spanish Government on Dec. 1. Olivenza is the capital of a district in the Province of Badajoz, fourteen miles southwest of Badajoz and six miles from the Portuguese frontier. It is a walled town and was formerly strongly fortified. In the war of the Spanish Succession of 1709 it was besieged by the French and Spaniards, and was stormed by the French under Soult in 1811. The Treaties of 1815 assigned the town to Portugal, but the Spaniards refused to surrender it, and have remained in possession of it ever since.

Senhor Bernardino Machado, former President of Portugal, insisted in the Senate that a demand should be made for the restitution of Olivenza upon the declaration of the Foreign Minister that the question was outside the scope of the Paris Peace Conference to adjust. The demand was made and the Spanish Government replied by declaring that for historic reasons the request of Senhor Machado was impossible of fulfillment, and by regretting that a former President of Portugal should have reopened a question which had been closed for years.

TURKEY

The whole aim and method of the Turkish Nationalist movement was revealed in a proclamation issued by Mustapha Kemal Pasha in the name of the Committee for the Defense of the Rights of Anatolia and Rumelia. Mustapha at about the same time (Nov. 24) informed the new Turkish Grand Vizier that the Nationalist movement would no longer interfere in public affairs, and that the orders of the Constantinople Government would be carried out without any restrictions. Mustapha's proclamation read:

The Entente Powers will pursue their project of depriving our nation of the fairest portion of its country. They are working to balance their interests by partitioning our country. The massacres and atrocities committed in the Aidin vilayet, which Greece was allowed to occupy in order to pave the way to a partition of Turkey, were identical with those now committed in the Adana vilayet occupied by the French, using the Armenians as their instrument. We protest with all our energy against the illegal acts committed up to the present by the Entente

KURDISTAN AND THE REGION OVER WHICH ENVER PASHA SEEKS TO RULE

Powers and we hope that they will learn to cherish juster sentiments toward our nation. The result which will be brought about by the inhuman methods embarked upon by those powers without consenting to listen to the legitimate voice of our nation may be very fatal. It would not be fatal only to a few countries, but possibly also to two worlds.

There was no change in the situation in Smyrna, occupied by the Greeks, or in Syria, from which the British withdrew in favor of the French, but the foregoing proclamation was believed to have fixed the origin of the propaganda, which told stories of both Greek and French atrocities in the newly occupied territories, and that this propaganda was not remote from that importuning the United States to assume the mandate of all Turkey, but far remote from that other propaganda asking this country to become the mandatory for Armenia alone. It was announced in Nationalistic circles in Constantinople that with the United States as Turkey's guardian angel the Committee of Union and Progress would be able to achieve in peace what it had failed to win by war.

Meanwhile, Mustapha's trend toward the east was emphasized on Dec. 12, when it was announced from Constantinople that Enver Pasha, the former Turkish Minister of War, had made himself Dictator of Kurdistan, the region surrounded by Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Persia. This report was not confirmed, but the British War Office had announced on Nov. 22 that the revolt of Sheik Mahmud having been put down by the British at Sulemaniyeh, pilgrim traffic from Tabriz to Bagdad had begun to pass through that place closed to the faithful for many years.

THE VATICAN

Seven new Cardinals were nominated at a secret consistory on Dec. 15, and the conferment of the Cardinalate on Mgr. Bertram, Archbishop of Breslau, reserved in petto at the consistory of 1916, was announced. The others named were:

Monsignor Valfre di Bouzo, former Nuncio at Vienna.

Monsignor Camassel, former Patriarch of Jerusalem.

Monsignor Sili, Vice Chamberlain of the Church.

Monsignor Soldevila y Romeo, Archbishop of Saragossa.

Monsignor Kakowski, Archbishop of Warsaw.

Monsignor Dalbor, Archbishop of Posen.

At a public consistory on Dec. 18, with the court assembled in full pontificals, all the new Cardinals except the Archbishop of Saragossa took the oath. To him the biretta was dispatched by Mgr. Somma, the papal ablegate.

The Rev. John G. Murray, Chancellor and Secretary of the Diocese of Hartford, Conn., was appointed Auxiliary Bishop of Hartford and Titular, Bishop of Flavies.

General Pershing's Final Report

Complete Official Story of the American Operations in the World War

[FIRST HALF]

General John J. Pershing, Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, submitted his final report to the Secretary of War late in November and it was made public Dec. 13, 1919. The complete text of the report is printed in this magazine in two installments. The first part, covering all the military operations of the First Army, appears below:

THE War Department planned as early as July, 1917, to send to France by June 15, 1918, twenty-one divisions of the then strength of 20,000 men each, together with auxiliary and replacement troops, and those needed for the line of communications, amounting to over 200,000, making a total of some 650,000 men. Beginning with October, six divisions were to be sent during that quarter, seven during the first quarter of 1918, and eight the second quarter. While these numbers fell short of my recommendation of July 6, 1917, which contemplated at least 1,000,000 men by May, 1918, it should be borne in mind that the main factor in the problem was the amount of shipping to become available for military purposes, in which must be included tonnage required to supply the Allies with steel, coal, and food.

SITUATION REVIEWED

On Dec. 2, 1917, an estimate of the situation was cabled to the War Department, with the following recommendation:

Paragraph 3. In view of these conditions, it is of the utmost importance to the allied cause that we move swiftly. The minimum number of troops we should plan to have in France by the end of June is four army corps of twenty-four divisions in addition to troops for service at the rear. Have impressed the present urgency upon General Bliss and other American members of the conference. Generals Robertson, Foch and Bliss agree with me that this is the minimum that should be aimed at. This figure is given as the lowest we should think of and is placed no higher because the limit of available transportation would not seem to warrant it.

Paragraph 4. A study of transportation facilities shows sufficient American tonnage to bring over this number of troops, but to do so there must be a reduction in the tonnage allotted to other than army needs. It is estimated that the shipping needed will have to be rapidly increased, up to 2,000,000 tons by May, in addition to the amount already allotted. The use of shipping for commercial purposes must be curtailed as much as possible. The Allies are very weak and we must come to their relief this year, 1918. The year after may be too late. It is very doubtful if they can hold on until 1919 unless we give them a lot of support this year. It is therefore recommended that a complete readjustment of transportation be made and that the needs of the War Department as set forth above be regarded as immediate. Further details of these requirements will be sent later.

A SECOND REPORT

Again on Dec. 20, 1917:

Understood here that a shipping program based on tonnage in sight prepared in War College Division in September contemplated that entire First Corps with its corps troops and some 32,000 auxiliaries were to have been shipped by end of November, and that an additional program for December, January, and February contemplates that the shipment of the Second Corps with its corps troops and other auxiliaries should be practically completed by the end of February. Should such a program be carried out as per schedule and should shipments continue at corresponding rate, it would not succeed in placing even three complete corps, with proper proportion of army troops and auxiliaries, in France by the end of May. The actual facts are that shipments are not even keeping up to that schedule. It is now the middle of December and the First Corps is still incomplete by over two entire divisions (The First, Forty-second, Second, and Twenty-sixth Divisions had arrived but not the Replacement and the Depot Divisions), and many corps troops. It cannot be too emphatically declared that we should be prepared to take the field with at least four corps by June 30. In view of past performances with tonnage heretofore available such a project is impossible of fulfillment, but only by most strenuous attempts to attain such a result will we be in a position to take a proper part in operations in 1918. In view of fact that as the number of our troops here increases a correspondingly greater amount of tonnage must be provided for their supply, and also in view of the slow rate of shipment with tonnage now available, it is of the most urgent importance that more tonnage should be obtained at once as already recommended in my cables and by General Bliss.

SUBDIVISION PLAN

During January, 1918, discussions were held with the British authorities that resulted in an agreement which became known as the subdivision plan and which provided for the transportation of six entire divisions in British tonnage, without interference with our own shipping program. High commanders, staff, infantry, and auxiliary troops were to be given experience with British divisions, beginning with battalions, the artillery to be trained under American direction, using French material. It was agreed that when sufficiently trained these battalions were to be united for service under their own officers. It was planned that the period of training with the British should cover about ten weeks. To supervise the administration and training of these divisions the Second Corps Staff was organized Feb. 20, 1918.

In the latter part of January joint note No. 12, presented by the military representatives with the Supreme War Council, was approved by the council. This note concluded that France would be safe during 1918 only under certain conditions, namely:

(a) That the strength of the British and French troops in France be continuously kept up to their present total strength and that they receive the expected reinforcements of not less than two American divisions per month.

Critical Situation, March, 1918—Allied Agreement

The first German offensive of 1918, beginning March 21, overran all resistance during the initial period of the attack. Within eight days the enemy had completely crossed the old Somme battlefield and had swept everything before him to a depth of some fifty-six kilometers. For a few days the loss of the railroad centre of Amiens appeared imminent. The offensive made such inroads upon French and British reserves that defeat stared them in the face unless the new American troops should prove more immediately available than even the most optimistic had dared to hope. On March 27 the military representatives with the Supreme War Council prepared their joint note No. 18. This note repeated the previously quoted statement from joint note No. 12, and continued:

The battle which is developing at the present moment in France, and which can extend to the other theatres of operations, may very quickly place the allied armies in a serious situation from the point of view of effectives, and the military representatives are from this moment of opinion that the above-detailed condition can no longer be maintained, and they consider as a general proposition that the new situation requires new decisions.

The military representatives are of opinion that it is highly desirable that the American Government should assist the allied armies as soon as possible by permitting in principle the temporary service of American units in allied army corps and divisions. Such reinforcements must, however, be obtained from other units than those American divisions which are now operating with the French, and the units so temporarily employed must eventually be returned to the American Army.

The military representatives are of the opinion that from the present time, in execution of the foregoing, and until otherwise directed by the Supreme War Council, only American infantry and machine-gun units, organized as that Government may decide, be brought to France, and that all agreements or conventions hitherto made in conflict with this decision be modified accordingly.

ASSIGNMENT OF FIRST ARRIVALS

The Secretary of War, who was in France at this time; General Bliss, the American military representative with the Supreme War Council, and I at once conferred on the terms of this note, with the result that the Secretary recommended to the President that joint note No. 18 be approved in the following sense:

The purpose of the American Government is to render the fullest co-operation and aid, and therefore the recommendation of the military representatives with regard to the preferential transportation of American infantry and machine-gun units in the present emergency is approved. Such units, when transported, will be under the direction of the Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, and will be assigned for training and use by him in his discretion. He will use these and all other military forces of the United States under his command in such manner as to render the greatest military assistance, keeping in mind always the determination of this Government to have its various military forces collected, as speedily as their training and the military situation permit, into an independent American army, acting in concert with the armies of Great Britain and France, and all arrangements made by him for their temporary training and service will be made with that end in view.

While note No. 18 was general in its terms, the priority of shipments of infantry more especially pertained to those divisions that were to be trained in the British area, as that Government was to provide the additional shipping according to the six-division plan agreed upon even before the beginning of the March 21 offensive.

On April 2 the War Department cabled that preferential transportation would be given to American infantry and machine-gun units during the existing emergency. Preliminary arrangements were made for training and early employment with the French of such infantry units as might be sent over by our own transportation. As for the British agreement, the six-division plan was to be modified to give priority to the infantry of those divisions. However, all the Allies were now urging the indefinite continuation of priority for the shipment of infantry and its complete incorporation in their units, which fact was cabled to the War Department on April 3, with the specific recommendation that the total immediate priority of infantry be limited to four divisions, plus 45,500 replacements, and that the necessity for future priority be determined later.

The Secretary of War and I held a conference with British authorities on April 7, during which it developed that the British had erroneously assumed that the preferential shipment of infantry was to be continuous. It was agreed at this meeting that 60,000 infantry and machine-gun troops, with certain auxiliary units to be brought over by British tonnage during April, should go to the British area as part of the six-division plan, but that there should be a further agreement as to subsequent troops to be brought over by the British. Consequently, a readjustment of the priority schedule was undertaken on the basis of postponing "shipment of all noncombatant troops to the utmost possible to meet present situation, and at the same time not to make it impossible to build up our own army."

FIRST UNITS WITH BRITISH TROOPS

The battleline in the vicinity of Amiens had hardly stabilized when, on April 9, the Germans made another successful attack against the British lines on a front of some forty kilometers in the vicinity of Armentières and along the Lys River. As result of its being included in a salient formed by the German advance, Passchendaele Ridge, the capture of which had cost so dearly in 1917, was evacuated by the British on April 17.

The losses had been heavy and the British were unable to replace them entirely. They were, therefore, making extraordinary efforts to increase the shipping available for our troops. On April 21 I went to London to clear up certain questions concerning the rate of shipment and to reach the further agreement provided for in the April 7 conference. The result of this London agreement was cabled to Washington April 24, as follows:

(a) That only the infantry, machine guns, engineers, and signal troops of American divisions and the headquarters of divisions and brigades be sent over in British and American shipping during May for training and service with the British Army in France up to six divisions, and that any shipping in excess of that required for these troops be utilized to transport troops necessary to make these divisions complete. The training and service of these troops will be carried out in accordance with plans already agreed upon between Sir Douglas Haig and General Pershing, with a view at an early date of building up American divisions.

(b) That the American personnel of the artillery of these divisions and such corps troops as may be required to build up American corps organizations follow immediately thereafter, and that American artillery personnel be trained with French material and join its proper divisions as soon as thoroughly trained.

(c) If, when the program outlined in paragraphs (a) and (b) is completed, the military situation makes advisable the further shipment of infantry, &c., of American divisions, then all the British and American shipping available for transport of troops shall be used for that purpose under such arrangement as will insure immediate aid to the Allies, and at the same time provide at the earliest moment for bringing over American artillery and other necessary units to complete the organization of American divisions and corps. Provided that the combatant troops mentioned in (a) and (b) be followed by such Service of the Rear and other troops as may be considered necessary by the American Commander in Chief.

(d) That It is contemplated American divisions and corps, when trained and organized, shall be utilized under the American Commander in Chief in an American group.

(e) That the American Commander in Chief shall allot American troops to the French or British for training them with American units at his discretion, with the understanding that troops already transported by British shipping or included in the six divisions mentioned in paragraph (a) are to be trained with the British Army, details as to rations, equipment, and transport to be determined by special agreement.

INDEPENDENT AMERICAN ARMY

At a meeting of the Supreme War Council held at Abbéville May 1 and 2, the entire question of the amalgamation of Americans with the French and British was reopened. An urgent appeal came from both French and Italian representatives for American replacements or units to serve with their armies. After prolonged discussion regarding this question and that of priority generally the following agreement was reached, committing the council to an independent American army and providing for the immediate shipment of certain troops:

It is the opinion of the Supreme War Council that, in order to carry the war to a successful conclusion, an American army should be formed as early as possible under its own commander and under its own flag. In order to meet the present emergency it is agreed that American troops should be brought to France as rapidly as allied transportation facilities will permit, and that, as far as consistent with the necessity of building up an American army, preference will be given to infantry and machine-gun units for training and service with French and British armies; with the understanding that such infantry and machine-gun units are to be withdrawn and united with its own artillery and auxiliary troops into divisions and corps at the direction of the American Commander in Chief after consultation with the Commander in Chief of the allied armies in France.

Subparagraph A. It is also agreed that during the month of May preference should be given to the transportation of infantry and machine-gun units of six divisions, and that any excess tonnage shall be devoted to bringing over such other troops as may be determined by the American Commander in Chief.

Subparagraph B. It is further agreed that this program shall be continued during the month of June upon condition that the British Government shall furnish transportation for a minimum of 130,000 men in May and 150,000 men in June, with the understanding that the first six divisions of infantry shall go to the British for training and service, and that troops sent over in June shall be allocated for training and service as the American Commander in Chief may determine.

Subparagraph C. It is also further agreed that if the British Government shall transport an excess of 150,000 men in June that such excess shall be infantry and machine-gun units, and that early in June there shall be a new review of the situation to determine further action.

PARIS IN GRAVE DANGER

The gravity of the situation had brought the Allies to a full realization of the necessity of providing all possible tonnage for the transportation of American troops. Although their views were accepted to the extent of giving a considerable priority to infantry and machine gunners, the priority agreed upon as to this class of troops was not as extensive as some of them deemed necessary, and the Abbéville conference was adjourned with the understanding that the question of further priority would be discussed at a conference to be held about the end of May.

The next offensive of the enemy was made between the Oise and Berry-aubac against the French instead of against the British, as was generally expected, and it came as a complete surprise. The initial Aisne attack, covering a front of thirty-five kilometers, met with remarkable success, as the German armies advanced no less than fifty kilometers in four days. On reaching the Marne that river was used as a defensive flank and the German advance was directed toward Paris. During the first days of June something akin to a panic seized the city and it was estimated that 1,000,000 people left during the Spring of 1918.

APPEAL OF PRIME MINISTERS

The further conference which had been agreed upon at Abbéville was held at Versailles on June 1 and 2. The opinion of our allies as to the existing situation and the urgency of their insistence upon further priority for infantry and machine gunners are shown by the following message prepared by the Prime Ministers of Great Britain, France, and Italy, and agreed to by General Foch:

The Prime Ministers of France, Italy, and Great Britain, now meeting at Versailles, desire to send the following message to the President of the United States:

We desire to express our warmest thanks to President Wilson for the remarkable promptness with which American aid in excess of what at one time seemed practicable has been rendered to the Allies during the last month to meet a great emergency. The crisis, however, still continues. General Foch has presented to us a statement of the utmost gravity, which points out that the numerical superiority of the enemy in France, where 162 allied divisions now oppose 200 German divisions, is very heavy, and that, as there is no possibility of the British and French increasing the number of their divisions (on the contrary, they are put to extreme straits to keep them up) there is a great danger of the war being lost unless the numerical inferiority of the Allies can be remedied as rapidly as possible by the advent of American troops. He, therefore, urges with the utmost insistence that the maximum possible number of infantry and machine gunners, in which respect the shortage of men on the side of the Allies is most marked, should continue to be shipped from America in the months of June and July to avert the immediate danger of an allied defeat in the present campaign owing to the allied reserves being exhausted before those of the enemy. In addition to this, and looking to the future, he represents that it is impossible to foresee ultimate victory in the war unless America is able to provide such an army as will enable the Allies ultimately to establish numerical superiority. He places the total American force required for this at no less than 100 divisions, and urges the continuous raising of fresh American levies, which, in his opinion, should not be less than 300,000 a month, with a view to establishing a total American force of 100 divisions at as early a date as this can possibly be done.

We are satisfied that General Foch, who is conducting the present campaign with consummate ability, and on whose military judgment we continue to place the most absolute reliance, is not overestimating the needs of the case, and we feel confident that the Government of the United States will do everything that can be done, both to meet the needs of the immediate situation and to proceed with the continuous raising of fresh levies calculated to provide as soon as possible the numerical superiority which the Commander in Chief of the allied armies regards as essential to ultimate victory.

A separate telegram contains the arrangements which General Foch, General Pershing, and Lord Milner have agreed to recommend to the United States Government with regard to the dispatch of American troops for the months of June and July.

FINAL DISTRIBUTION OF TROOPS

Such extensive priority had already been given to the transport of American infantry and machine gunners that the troops of those categories which had received even partial training in the United States were practically exhausted. Moreover, the strain on our services of supply made it essential that early relief be afforded by increasing its personnel. At the same time, the corresponding services of our allies had in certain departments been equally overtaxed and their responsible heads were urgent in their representations that their needs must be relieved by bringing over American specialists. The final agreement was cabled to the War Department on June 5, as follows:

The following agreement has been concluded between General Foch, Lord Milner, and myself with reference to the transportation of American troops in the months of June and July:

The following recommendations are made on the assumption that at least 250,000 men can be transported in each of the months of June and July by the employment of combined British and American tonnage. We recommend:

(a) For the month of June: (1) Absolute priority shall be given to the transportation of 170,000 combatant troops (viz., six divisions without artillery, ammunition trains, or supply trains, amounting to 126,000 men and 44,000 replacements for combat troops); (2) 25,400 men for the service of the railways, of which 13,400 have been asked for by the French Minister of Transportation; (3) the balance to be troops of categories to be determined by the Commander in Chief, American Expeditionary Forces.

(b) For the month of July: (1) Absolute priority for the shipment of 140,000 combatant troops of the nature defined above (four divisions minus artillery "et cetera," amounting to 84,000 men, plus 56,000 replacement); (2) the balance of the 250,000 to consist of troops to be designated by the Commander in Chief, American Expeditionary Forces.

(c) It is agreed that if the available tonnage in either month allows of the transportation of a larger number of men than 250,000, the excess tonnage will be employed in the transportation of combat troops as defined above.

(d) We recognize that the combatant troops to be dispatched in July may have to include troops which have had insufficient training, but we consider the present emergency is such as to justify a temporary and exceptional departure by the United States from sound principles of training, especially as a similar course is being followed by France and Great Britain.

FOCH,
MILNER,
PERSHING.

The various proposals during these conferences regarding priority of shipment, often very insistent, raised questions that were not only most difficult but most delicate. On the one hand, there was a critical situation which must be met by immediate action, while on the other hand, any priority accorded a particular arm necessarily postponed the formation of a distinctive American fighting force and the means to supply it. Such a force was, in my opinion, absolutely necessary to win the war. A few of the allied representatives became convinced that the American services of supply should not be neglected, but should be developed in the common interest. The success of our divisions during May and June demonstrated fully that it was not necessary to draft Americans under foreign flags in order to utilize American manhood most effectively.

THE MIGHTY ONSLAUGHT OF THE GERMANS

When, on March 21, 1918, the German army on the western front began its series of offensives, it was by far the most formidable force the world had ever seen. In fighting men and guns it had a great superiority, but this was of less importance than the advantage in morale, in experience, in training for mobile warfare, and in unity of command. Ever since the collapse of the Russian armies and the crisis on the Italian front in the Fall of 1917, German armies were being assembled and trained for the great campaign which was to end the war before America's effort could be brought to bear. Germany's best troops, her most successful Generals, and all the experience gained in three years of war were mobilized for the supreme effort.

The first blow fell on the right of the British armies, including the junction of the British and French forces. Only the prompt co-operation of the French and British General Headquarters stemmed the tide. The reason for this objective was obvious and strikingly illustrated the necessity for having some one with sufficient authority over all the allied armies to meet such an emergency. The lack of complete co-operation among the Allies on the western front had been appreciated, and the question of preparation to meet a crisis had already received attention by the Supreme War Council. A plan had been adopted by which each of the Allies would furnish a certain number of divisions for a general reserve, to be under the direction of the military representatives of the Supreme War Council, of which General Foch was then the senior member. But when the time came to meet the German offensive in March these reserves were not found available and the plan failed.

FOCH IS SELECTED

This situation resulted in a conference for the immediate consideration of the question of having an allied Commander in Chief. After much discussion, during which my view favoring such action was clearly stated, an agreement was reached and General Foch was selected. His appointment as such was made April 3 and was approved for the United States by the President on April 16. The terms of the agreement under which General Foch exercised his authority were as follows:

Beauvais, April 3, 1918.

General Foch is charged by the British, French and American Governments with the co-ordination of the action of the allied armies on the western front; to this end there is conferred on him all the powers necessary for its effective realization. To the same end, the British, French and American Governments confide in General Foch the strategic direction of military operations.

The Commander in Chief of the British, French and American armies will exercise to the fullest extent the tactical direction of their armies. Each Commander in Chief will have the right to appeal to his Government, if in his opinion his army is placed in danger by the instructions received from General Foch.

Employment of American Divisions, March to September

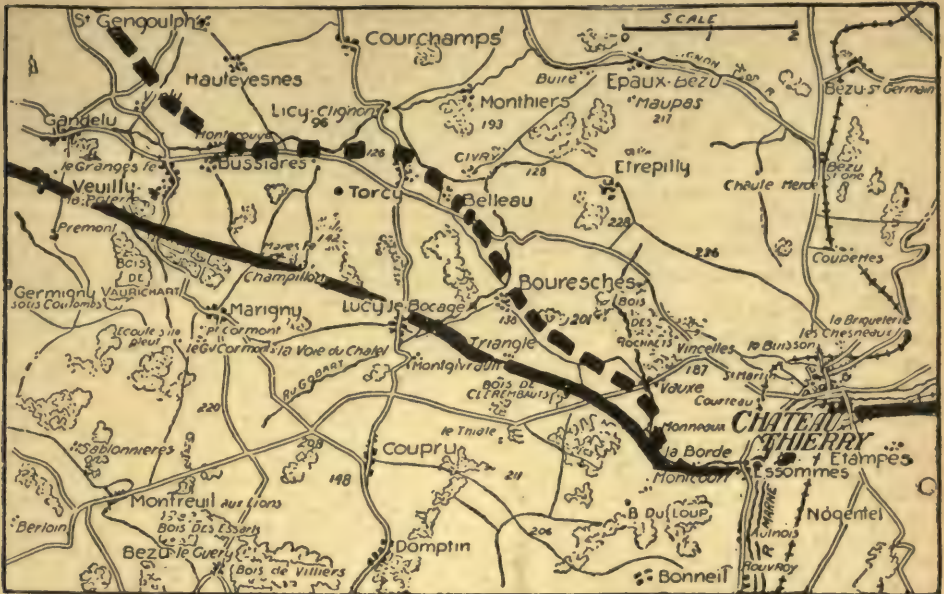

The grave crisis precipitated by the first German offensive caused me to make a hurried visit to General Foch's headquarters at Bombon, during which all our combatant forces were placed at his disposal. The acceptance of this offer meant the dispersion of our troops along the allied front and a consequent delay in building up a distinctive American force in Lorraine, but the serious situation of the Allies demanded this divergence from our plans.

On March 21, approximately 300,000 American troops had reached France. Four combat divisions, equivalent in strength to eight French or British divisions, were available—the 1st and 2d then in line, and the 26th and 42d just withdrawn from line after one month's trench warfare training. The last two divisions at once began taking over quiet sectors to release divisions for the battle; the 26th relieved the 1st Division, which was sent to northwest of Paris in reserve; the 42d relieved two French divisions from quiet sectors. In addition to these troops, one regiment of the 93d Division was with the French in the Argonne, the 41st Depot Division was in the Services of Supply, and three divisions (3d, 32d, and 5th) were arriving.

On April 25 the 1st Division relieved two French divisions on the front near Montdidier and on May 28 captured the important observation stations on the heights of Cantigny with splendid dash. French artillery, aviation, tanks, and flame throwers aided in the attack, but most of this French assistance was withdrawn before the completion of the operation, in order to meet the enemy's new offensive launched May 27 toward Château-Thierry. The enemy reaction against our troops at Cantigny was extremely violent, and apparently he was determined at all costs to counteract the most excellent effect the American success had produced. For three days his guns of all calibres were concentrated on our new position and counterattack succeeded counterattack. The desperate efforts of the Germans gave the fighting at Cantigny a seeming tactical importance entirely out of proportion to the numbers involved.

Of the three divisions arriving in France when the first German offensive began, the 32d, intended for replacements, had been temporarily employed in the Services of Supply to meet a shortage of personnel, but the critical situation caused it to be reassembled, and by May 21 it was entering the line in the Vosges. At this time the 5th Division, though still incomplete, was also ordered into the line in the same region. The 3d Division was assembling in its training area and the 3d Corps staff had just been organized to administer these three divisions. In addition to the eight divisions already mentioned, the 28th and 77th had arrived in the British area, and the 4th, 27th, 13th, 33d, 35th, and 82d were arriving there. Following the agreements as to British shipping, our troops came so rapidly that by the end of May we had a force of 600,000 in France.

The third German offensive, on May 27, against the French on the Aisne, soon developed a desperate situation for the Allies. The 2d Division, then in reserve northwest of Paris and preparing to relieve the 1st Division, was hastily diverted to the vicinity of the Meaux on May 31, and, early on the morning of June 1, was deployed across the Château-Thierry-Paris road near Montreuil-aux-Lions in a gap in the French line, where it stopped the German advance on Paris. At the same time the partially trained 3d Division was placed at French disposal to hold the crossings of the Marne, and its motorized machine-gun battalion succeeded in reaching Château-Thierry in time to assist in successfully defending that river crossing.

BELLEAU WOODS

The enemy having been halted, the 2d Division commenced a series of vigorous attacks on June 4, which resulted in the capture of Belleau Woods after very severe fighting. The village of Bouresches was taken soon after, and on July 1 Vaux was captured. In these operations the 2d Division met with most desperate resistance by Germany's best troops.

To meet the March offensive, the French had extended their front from the Oise to Amiens, about sixty kilometers, and during the German drive along the Lys had also sent reinforcements to assist the British. The French lines had been further lengthened about forty-five kilometers as a result of the Marne pocket made by the Aisne offensive. This increased frontage and the heavy fighting had reduced French reserves to an extremely low point.

Our Second Corps, under Major Gen. George W. Read, had been organized for the command of the ten divisions with the British, which were held back in training areas or assigned to second-line defenses. After consultation with Field Marshal Haig on June 3, five American divisions were relieved from the British area to support the French. The 77th and 82d Divisions were removed south to release the 42d and 26th for employment on a more active portion of the front; the 35th Division entered the line in the Vosges, and the 4th and 28th Divisions were moved to the region of Meaux and Château-Thierry as reserves.

On June 9 the Germans attacked the Montdidier-Noyon front in an effort to widen the Marne pocket and bring their lines nearer to Paris, but were stubbornly held by the French with comparatively little loss of ground. In view of the unexpected results of the three preceding attacks by the enemy, this successful defense proved beneficial to the allied morale, particularly as it was believed that the German losses were unusually heavy.

On July 15, the date of the last German offensive, the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 26th Divisions were on the Château-Thierry front with the 4th and 28th in support, some small units of the last two divisions gaining front-line experience with our troops or with the French; the 42d Division was in support of the French east of Rheims, and four colored regiments were with the French in the Argonne. On the Alsace-Lorraine front we had five divisions in line with the French. Five were with the British Army, three having elements in the line. In our training areas four divisions were assembled and four were in the process of arrival.

AMERICANS BAR THE WAY TO PARIS

The Marne salient was inherently weak and offered an opportunity for a counteroffensive that was obvious.

If successful, such an operation would afford immediate relief to the allied defense, would remove the threat against Paris, and free the Paris-Nancy railroad. But, more important than all else, it would restore the morale of the Allies and remove the profound depression and fear then existing. Up to this time our units had been put in here and there at critical points as emergency troops to stop the terrific German advance. In every trial, whether on the defensive or offensive, they had proved themselves equal to any troops in Europe. As early as June 23 and again on July 10 at Bombon, I had very strongly urged that our best divisions be concentrated under American command, if possible, for use as a striking force against the Marne salient. Although the prevailing view among the Allies was that American units were suitable only for the defensive, and that at all events they could be used to better advantage under allied command, the suggestion was accepted in principle, and my estimate of their offensive fighting qualities was soon put to the test.

The enemy had encouraged his soldiers to believe that the July 15 attack would conclude the war with a German peace. Although he made elaborate plans for the operation, he failed to conceal fully his intentions, and the front of attack was suspected at least one week ahead. On the Champagne front the actual hour for the assault was known and the enemy was checked with heavy losses. The 42d Division entered the line near Somme Py immediately, and five of its infantry battalions and all its artillery became engaged. Southwest of Rheims and along the Marne to the east of Château-Thierry the Germans were at first somewhat successful, a penetration of eight kilometers beyond the river being effected against the French immediately to the right of our 3d Division. The following quotation from the report of the commanding General, 3d Division, gives the result of the fighting on his front:

"Although the rush of the German troops overwhelmed some of the front-line positions, causing the infantry and machine-gun companies to suffer, in some cases a 50 per cent. loss, no German soldier crossed the road from Fossoy to Crezancy, except as a prisoner of war, and by noon of the following day (July 16) there were no Germans in the foreground of the 3d Division sector except the dead."

On this occasion a single regiment of the 3d Division wrote one of the most brilliant pages in our military annals. It prevented the crossing at certain points on its front, while on either flank the Germans who had gained a footing pressed forward. Our men, firing in three directions, met the German attacks with counterattacks at critical points and succeeded in throwing two German divisions into complete confusion, capturing 600 prisoners.

The selection by the Germans of the Champagne sector and the eastern and southern faces of the Marne pocket on which to make their offensive was fortunate for the Allies, as it favored the launching of the counterattack already planned. There were now over 1,200,000 American troops in France, which provided a considerable force of reserves. Every American division with any sort of training was made available for use in a counteroffensive.

General Pétain's initial plan for the counterattack involved the entire western face of the Marne salient. The 1st and 2d American Divisions, with the 1st French Moroccan Division between them, were employed as the spearhead of the main attack, driving directly eastward, through the most sensitive portion of the German lines, to the heights south of Soissons. The advance began on July 18, without the usual brief warning of a preliminary bombardment, and these three divisions at a single bound broke through the enemy's infantry defenses and overran his artillery, cutting or interrupting the German communications leading into the salient. A general withdrawal from the Marne was immediately begun by the enemy, who still fought stubbornly to prevent disaster.

MAGNIFICENT DASH NEAR SOISSONS

The 1st Division, throughout four days of constant fighting, advanced eleven kilometers, capturing Berzy-le-Sec and the heights above Soissons and taking some 3,500 prisoners and sixty-eight field guns from the seven German divisions employed against it. It was relieved by a British division. The 2d Division advanced eight kilometers in the first twenty-six hours, and by the end of the second day was facing Tigny, having captured 3,000 prisoners and sixty-six field guns. It was relieved the night of the 19th by a French division.

"The result of this counteroffensive was of decisive importance. Due to the magnificent dash and power displayed on the field of Soissons by our 1st and 2d Divisions the tide of the war was definitely turned in favor of the Allies."

Other American divisions participated in the Marne counteroffensive. A little to the south of the 2d Division, the 4th was in line with the French and was engaged until July 22. The 1st American Corps, Major Gen. Hunter Liggett commanding, with the 26th Division and a French division, acted as a pivot of the movement toward Soissons, capturing Torcy on the 18th and reaching the Château-Thierry-Soissons roads on the 21st. At the same time the 3d Division crossed the Marne and took the heights of Mont

Saint Peter and the villages of Charteves and Jaulgonne.

ADVANCING TO THE VESLE

In the 1st Corps, the 42d Division relieved the 26th on July 25 and extended its front, on the 26th relieving the French division. From this time until Aug. 2 it fought its way through the Forest de Fère and across the Ourcq, advancing toward the Vesle until relieved by the 4th Division on Aug. 3. Early in this period elements of the 28th Division participated in the advance.

Further to the east the 3d Division forced the enemy back to Ronchères Wood, where it was relieved on July 30 by the 32d Division from the Vosges front. The 32d, after relieving the 3d and some elements of the 28th on the line of the Ourcq River, advanced abreast of the 42d toward the Vesle. On Aug. 3 it passed under control of our 3d Corps, Major Gen. Robert L. Bullard commanding, which made its first appearance in battle at this time, while the 4th Division took up the task of the 42d Division and advanced with the 32d to the Vesle River, where, on Aug. 6, the operations for the reduction of the Marne salient terminated.

In the hard fighting from July 18 to Aug. 6 the Germans were not only halted in their advance, but were driven back from the Marne to the Vesle and committed wholly to the defensive. The force of American arms had been brought to bear in time to enable the last offensive of the enemy to be crushed.

BATTLES ON THE VESLE

The 1st and 3d Corps now held a continuous front of eleven kilometers along the Vesle. On Aug. 12 the 77th Division relieved the 4th Division on the 1st Corps front, and the following day the 28th relieved the 32d Division in the 3d Corps, while from Aug. 6 to Aug. 10 the 6th Infantry Brigade of the 3d Division held a sector on the river line. The transfer of the 1st Corps to the Woevre was ordered at this time, and the control of its front was turned over to the 3d Corps.

On Aug. 13 General Pétain began an offensive between Rheims and the Oise. Our 3d Corps participated in this operation, crossing the Vesle on Sept. 4, with the 28th and 77th Divisions and overcoming stubborn opposition on the plateau south of the Aisne, which was reached by the 77th on Sept. 6. The 28th was withdrawn from the line on Sept. 7. Two days later the 3d Corps was transferred to the region of Verdun, the 77th Division remaining in line on the Aisne River until Sept. 17.

The 32d Division, upon its relief from the battle on the Vesle, joined a French corps north of Soissons and attacked from Aug. 29 to 31, capturing Juvigny after some particularly desperate fighting and reaching the Chauny-Soissons road.

On the British front two regiments of the 33d Division participated in an attack on Hamel July 4, and again on Aug. 9, as an incident of an allied offensive against the Amiens salient. One of these regiments took Gressaire Wood and Chipilly Bridge, capturing 700 prisoners and considerable material.

ASSEMBLING OF THE FIRST AMERICAN ARMY

In conference with General Pétain at Chantilly on May 19 it had been agreed that the American Army would soon take complete charge of the sector of the Woevre. The 26th Division was already in line in the Woevre north of Toul and was to be followed by other American divisions as they became available, with the understanding that the sector was to pass to our control when four divisions were in the line. But demands of the battle then going on further west required the presence of our troops, and the agreement had no immediate result. Due to the presence of a number of our divisions northeast of Paris, the organization of an American corps sector in the Château-Thierry region was taken up with General Pétain, and on July 4 the 1st Corps assumed tactical control of a sector in that region. This was an important step, but it was by no means satisfactory, as only one American division at the moment was operating under the control of the 1st Corps, while we had at this time eight American divisions in the front line serving in French corps.

The counteroffensive against the Marne salient in July, and against the Amiens salient in August had gained such an advantage that it was apparent that the emergency, which justified the dispersion of our divisions, had passed. The moment was propitious for assembling our divisions. Scattered as they were along the allied front, their supply had become very difficult. From every point of view the immediate organization of an independent American force was indicated. The formation of the army in the Château-Thierry region and its early transfer to the sector of the Woevre, which was to extend from Nomeny, east of the Moselle, to north of St. Mihiel, was therefore decided upon by Marshal Foch and myself on Aug. 9, and the details were arranged with General Pétain later on the same day.

Americans in the St. Mihiel Operation

At Bombon on July 24 there was a conference of all the Commanders in Chief for the purpose of considering allied operations. Each presented proposals for the employment of the armies under his command, and these formed the basis of future co-operation of the Allies. It was emphatically determined that the allied attitude should be to maintain the offensive. At the first operation of the American Army the reduction of the salient of St. Mihiel was to be undertaken as soon as the necessary troops and material could be made available. On account of the swampy nature of the country it was especially important that the movement be undertaken and finished before the Fall rains should begin, which was usually about the middle of September.

Arrangements were concluded for successive relief of the American divisions, and the organization of the First American Army under my personal command was announced on Aug. 10, with La Ferté-sous-Jouarre as headquarters. This army nominally assumed control of a portion of the Vesle front, although at the same time directions were given for its secret concentration in the St. Mihiel sector.

The force of American soldiers in France at that moment was sufficient to carry out this offensive, but they were dispersed along the front from Switzerland to the Channel. The three army corps headquarters to participate in the St. Mihiel attack were the 1st, 4th, and 5th. The 1st was on the Vesle, the 4th at Toul, and the 5th not yet completely organized. To assemble combat divisions and service troops and undertake a major operation within the short period available and with staffs so recently organized was an extremely difficult task. Our deficiencies in artillery, aviation, and special troops, caused by the shipment of an undue proportion of infantry and machine guns during the Summer, were largely met by the French.

The reduction of the St. Mihiel salient was important, as it would prevent the enemy from interrupting traffic on the Paris-Nancy Railroad by artillery fire and would free the railroad leading north through St. Mihiel to Verdun. It would also provide us with an advantageous base of departure for an attack against the Metz-Sedan railroad system, which was vital to the German armies west of Verdun, and against the Briey Iron Basin, which was necessary for the production of German armament and munitions.

FOCH'S PLAN OF BATTLE

The general plan was to make simultaneous attacks against the flanks of the salient. The ultimate objective was tentatively fixed as the general line Marieulles (east of the Moselle)—heights south of Gorze-Mars in Tour-Etain. The operations contemplated the use of the western face of three or four American divisions, supported by the attack of six divisions of the Second French Army on their left, while seven American divisions would attack on the southern face, and three French divisions would press the enemy at the tip of the salient. As the part to be taken by the Second French Army would be closely related to the attack of the First American Army, General Pétain placed all the French troops involved under my personal command.

By Aug. 20 the concentration of the scattered divisions, corps, and army troops, of the quantities of supplies and munitions required, and the necessary construction of light railways and roads, were well under way.

In accordance with the previous general consideration of operations at Bombon on July 24, an allied offensive extending practically along the entire active front was eventually to be carried out. After the reduction of the St. Mihiel sector the Americans were to co-operate in the concerted effort of the allied armies. It was the sense of the conference of July 24 that the extent to which the different operations already planned might carry us could not be then foreseen, especially if the results expected were achieved before the season was far advanced. It seemed reasonable at that time to look forward to a combined offensive for the Autumn, which would give no respite to the enemy and would increase our advantage for the inauguration of succeeding operations extending into 1919.

On Aug. 30 a further discussion with Marshal Foch was held at my headquarters at Ligny-en-Barrois. In view of the new successes of the French and British near Amiens and the continued favorable results toward the Chemin des Dames on the French front, it was now believed that the limited allied offensive, which was to prepare for the campaign of 1919, might be carried further before the end of the year. At this meeting it was proposed by Marshal Foch that the generous operations as far as the American Army was concerned should be carried out in detail by:

(a) An attack between the Meuse and the Argonne by the Second French Army, reinforced by from four to six American divisions.

(b) A French-American attack, extending from the Argonne west to the Souain road, to be executed on the right by an American Army astride the Aisne and on the left by the Fourth French Army.

To carry out these attacks the ten to eleven American divisions suggested for the St. Mihiel operation and the four to six for the Second French Army, would have eight to ten divisions for an American Army on the Aisne. It was proposed that the St. Mihiel operation should be initiated on Sept.

PERSHING'S PLAN SUPERSEDES THAT OF FOCH

The plan suggested for the American participation in these operations was not acceptable to me because it would require the immediate separation of the recently formed First American Army into several groups, mainly to assist French armies. This was directly contrary to the principle of forming a distinct American army, for which my contention had been insistent. An enormous amount of preparation had already been made in construction of roads, railroads, regulating stations, and other installations looking to the use and supply of our armies on a particular front. The inherent disinclination of our troops to serve under allied commanders would have grown and American morale would have suffered. My position was stated quite clearly that the strategical employment of the First Army as a unit would be undertaken where desired, but its disruption to carry out these proposals would not be entertained.

A further conference at Marshal Foch's headquarters was held on Sept. 2, at which General Pétain was present. After discussion the question of employing the American Army as a unit was conceded. The essentials of the strategical decision previously arrived at provided that the advantageous situation of the Allies should be exploited to the utmost by vigorously continuing the general battle and extending it eastward to the Meuse. All the allied armies were to be employed in a converging action. The British armies, supported by the left of the French armies, were to pursue the attack in the direction of Cambrai; the centre of the French armies, west of Rheims, would continue the actions already begun to drive the enemy beyond the Aisne; and the American Army, supported by the right of the French armies, would direct its attack on Sedan and Mézières.

It should be recorded that although this general offensive was fully outlined at the conference no one present expressed the opinion that the final victory could be won in 1918. In fact, it was believed by the French High Command that the Meuse-Argonne attack could not be pushed much beyond Montfaucon before the arrival of Winter would force a cessation of operations.

The choice between the two sectors, that east of the Aisne, including the Argonne Forest, or the Champagne sector, was left to me. In my opinion no other allied troops had the morale or the offensive spirit to overcome successfully the difficulties to be met in the Meuse-Argonne sector, and our plans and installations had been prepared for an expansion of operations in that direction. So the Meuse-Argonne front was chosen. The entire sector of 150 kilometers of front, extending from Port-sur-Seille, east of the Moselle, west to include the Argonne Forest, was accordingly placed under my command, including all French divisions then in that zone. The First American Army was to proceed with the St. Mihiel operation, after which the operation between the Meuse and the western edge of the Argonne Forest was to be prepared and launched not later than Sept. 25.

THE FIELD OF BATTLE

As a result of these decisions the depth of the St. Mihiel operation was limited to the line Vigneulles-Thiaucourt-Regnéville. The number of divisions to be used was reduced and the time shortened. Eighteen to nineteen divisions were to be in the front line. There were four French and fifteen American divisions available, six of which would be in reserve, while the two flank divisions of the front line were not to advance. Furthermore, two Army Corps Headquarters, with their corps troops, practically all the army artillery and aviation, and the 1st, 2d, and 4th Divisions, the first two destined to take a leading part in the St. Mihiel attack, were all due to be withdrawn and started for the Meuse-Argonne by the fourth day of the battle.

The salient had been held by the Germans since September, 1914. It covered the most sensitive section of the enemy's position on the western front, namely, the Mézières-Sedan-Metz railroad and the Briey Iron Basin; it threatened the entire region between Verdun and Nancy, and interrupted the main rail line from Paris to the east. Its primary strength lay in the natural defensive features of the terrain itself. The western face of the salient extended along the rugged, heavily wooded eastern heights of the Meuse; the southern face followed the heights of the Meuse for eight kilometers to the east and then crossed the plain of the Woëvre, including within the German lines the detached heights of Loupmont and Montsec which dominated the plain and afforded the enemy unusual facilities for observation. The enemy had reinforced the positions by every artificial means during a period of four years.

On the night of Sept. 11 the troops of the First Army were deployed in position. On the southern face of the salient was the 1st Corps, Major Gen. Liggett commanding, with the 82d, 19th, 5th and 2d Divisions in line, extending from the Moselle westward. On its left was the 4th Corps, Major Gen. Joseph T. Dickman commanding, with the 89th, 42d and 1st Divisions, the left of this corps being opposite Montsec. These two army corps were to deliver the principal attack, the line pivoting on the centre division of the 1st Corps. The 1st Division, on the left of the 4th Corps, was charged with the double mission of covering its own flank while advancing some twenty kilometers due north toward the heart of the salient, where it was to make contact with the troops of the 5th Corps. On the western face of the salient lay the 5th Corps, Major Gen. George H. Cameron commanding, with the 26th Division, 15th French Colonial Division and the 4th Division in line, from Mouilly west to Les Eparges and north to Watronville. Of these three divisions the 26th alone was to make a deep advance directed southeast toward Vigneulles. The French division was to make a short progression to the edge of the heights in order to cover the left of the 26th. The 4th Division was not to advance. In the centre, between our 4th and 5th Army Corps, was the 2d French Colonial Corps, Major Gen. E. J. Blondlat commanding, covering a front of forty kilometers with three small French divisions. These troops were to follow up the retirement of the enemy from the tip of the salient.

ADVANCE AT DAWN

The French independent air force was at my disposal, which, together with the British bombing squadrons and our own air forces, gave us the largest assemblage of aviation that had ever been engaged in one operation. Our heavy guns were able to reach Metz and to interfere seriously with German rail movements.

At dawn on Sept. 12, after four hours of violent artillery fire of preparation, and accompanied by small tanks, the infantry of the 1st and 4th Corps advanced. The infantry of the 5th Corps commenced its advance at 8 A. M. The operation was carried out with entire precision. Just after daylight on Sept. 13 elements of the 1st and 26th Divisions made a junction near Hattonchâtel and Vigneulles, eighteen kilometers northeast of St. Mihiel.

The rapidity with which our divisions advanced overwhelmed the enemy, and all objectives were reached by the afternoon of Sept. 13. The enemy had apparently started to withdraw some of his troops from the tip of the salient on the eve of our attack, but had been unable to carry it through. We captured nearly 16,000 prisoners, 443 guns, and large stores of material and supplies. The energy and swiftness with which the operation was carried out enabled us to smother opposition to such an extent that we suffered less than 7,000 casualties during the actual period of the advance.

During the next two days the right of our line west of the Moselle River was advanced beyond the objectives laid down in the original orders. This completed the operation for the time being and the line was stabilized to be held by the smallest practicable force.

RESULTS OF THE BATTLE

The material results of the victory achieved were very important. An American army was an accomplished fact, and the enemy had felt its power. No form of propaganda could overcome the depressing effect on the morale of the enemy of this demonstration of our ability to organize a large American force and drive it successfully through his defenses. It gave our troops implicit confidence in their superiority and raised their morale to the highest pitch. For the first time wire entanglements ceased to be regarded as impassable barriers and open-warfare training, which had been so urgently insisted upon, proved to be the correct doctrine. Our divisions concluded the attack with such small losses and in such high spirits that without the usual rest they were immediately available for employment in heavy fighting in a new theatre of operations. The strength of the First Army in this battle totaled approximately 500,000 men, of whom about 70,000 were French.

Battling to Break Hindenburg Line

The definite decision for the Meuse-Argonne phase of the great allied convergent attack was agreed to in my conference with Marshal Foch and General Pétain on Sept. 2. It was planned to use all available forces of the First Army, including such divisions and troops as we might be able to withdraw from the St. Mihiel front. The army was to break through the enemy's successive fortified zones to include the Kriemhilde Stellung, or Hindenburg line, on the front Briailles-Romagne sous Montfaucon-Grand Pré, and thereafter, by developing pressure toward Mézières, was to insure the fall of the Hindenburg line along the Aisne River in front of the Fourth French Army, which was to attack to the west of the Argonne Forest. A penetration of some twelve to fifteen kilometers was required to reach the Hindenburg line on our front, and the enemy's defenses were virtually continuous throughout that depth.

The Meuse-Argonne front had been practically stabilized in September, 1914, and, except for minor fluctuations during the German attacks on Verdun in 1916 and the French counteroffensive in August, 1917, remained unchanged until the American advance in 1918. The net result of the four years' struggle on this ground was a German defensive system of unusual depth and strength and a wide zone of utter devastation, itself a serious obstacle to offensive operations.

The strategical importance of this portion of the line was second to none on the western front. All supplies and evacuations of the German armies in Northern France were dependent upon two great railway systems—one in the north, passing through Liège, the other in the south, with lines coming from Luxemburg, Thionville, and Metz, had as its vital section the line Carignan-Sedan-Mézières. No other important lines were available to the enemy, as the mountainous masses of the Ardennes made the construction of east and west lines through that region impracticable. The Carignan-Sedan-Mézières line was essential to the Germans for the rapid strategical movement of troops. Should this southern system be cut by the Allies before the enemy could withdraw his forces through the narrow neck between Mézières and the Dutch frontier, the ruin of his armies in France and Belgium would be complete.

From the Meuse-Argonne front the perpendicular distance to the Carignan-Mézières railroad was 50 kilometers. This region formed the pivot of German operations in Northern France, and the vital necessity of covering the great railroad line into Sedan resulted in the convergence on the Meuse-Argonne front of the successive German defensive positions. The effect of this convergence can be best understood by reference to the map. It will be seen, for example, that the distance between No Man's Land and the third German withdrawal position in the vicinity of the Meuse River was approximately 18 kilometers; the distance between the corresponding points near the tip of the great salient of the western front was about 65 kilometers, and in the vicinity of Cambrai was over 30 kilometers. The effect of a penetration of 18 kilometers by the American Army would be equivalent to an advance of 65 kilometers further west; furthermore, such an advance on our front was far more dangerous to the enemy than an advance elsewhere. The vital importance of this portion of his position was fully appreciated by the enemy, who had suffered tremendous losses in 1916 in attempting to improve it by the reduction of Verdun. As a consequence it had been elaborately fortified, and consisted of practically a continuous series of positions 20 kilometers or more in depth.

In addition to the artificial defenses, the enemy was greatly aided by the natural features of the terrain. East of the Meuse the dominating heights not only protected his left, but gave him positions from which powerful artillery could deliver an oblique fire on the western bank. Batteries located in the elaborately fortified Argonne Forest covered his right flank, and could cross their fire with that of the guns on the east bank of the Meuse. Midway between the Meuse and the forest the heights of Montfaucon offered observation and formed a strong natural position which had been heavily fortified. The east and west ridges abutting on the Meuse and Air River valleys afforded the enemy excellent machine-gun positions for the desperate defense which the importance of the position would require him to make. North of Montfaucon densely wooded and rugged heights constituted natural features favorable to defensive fighting.

When the First Army became engaged in the simultaneous preparation for two major operations an interval of fourteen days separated the initiation of the two attacks. During this short period the movement of the immense number of troops and the amount of supplies, and confined entirely to the hours of darkness, was one of the most delicate and difficult problems of war. The concentration included fifteen divisions, of which seven were involved in the pending St. Mihiel drive, three were in sector in the Vosges, three in the neighborhood of Soissons, one in a training area and one near Bar-le-Duc. Practically all the artillery, aviation and other auxiliaries to be employed in the new operations were committed to the St. Mihiel attack and, therefore, could not be moved until its success was assured. The concentration of all units not to be used at St. Mihiel was commenced immediately, and on Sept. 13, the second day of St. Mihiel, reserve divisions and artillery units were withdrawn and placed in motion toward the Argonne front.

MOVING TOWARD ARGONNE FOREST

That part of the American sector from Fresnes-en-Woevre, southeast of Verdun, to the western edge of the Argonne Forest, while nominally under my control, did not actively become a part of my command until Sept. 22, on which date my headquarters were established at Souilly, southwest of Verdun. Of French troops, in addition to the 2d French Colonial Corps, composed of three divisions, there was also the 17th French Corps of three divisions holding the front north and east of Verdun.

At the moment of the opening of the Meuse-Argonne battle the enemy had ten divisions in line and ten in reserve on the front between Fresnes-en-Woevre and the Argonne Forest, inclusive. He had undoubtedly expected a continuation of our advance toward Metz. Successful ruses were carried out between the Meuse River and Lunéville to deceive him as to our intentions, and French troops were maintained as a screen along our front until the night before the battle, so that the actual attack was a tactical surprise.

The operations in the Meuse-Argonne battle really form a continuous whole, but they extended over such a long period of continuous fighting that they will here be considered in three phases, the first from Sept. 26 to Oct. 3, the second from Oct. 4 to 31, and the third from Nov. 1 to 11.

FIRST FIGHTING IN ARGONNE

On the night of Sept. 25 the nine divisions to lead in the attack were deployed between the Meuse River and the western edge of the Argonne Forest. On the right was the 3d Corps, Major Gen. Bullard commanding, with the 33d, 80th and 4th Divisions in line; next came the 5th Corps, Major Gen. Cameron commanding, with the 79th, 37th and 91st Divisions; on the left was the 1st Corps, Major Gen. Liggett commanding, with the 35th, 28th and 77th Divisions. Each corps had one division in reserve and the army held three divisions as a general reserve. About 2,700 guns, 189 small tanks, 142 manned by Americans, and 821 airplanes, 604 manned by Americans, were concentrated to support the attack of the infantry. We thus had a superiority in guns and aviation, and the enemy had no tanks.

The axis of the attack was the line Montfaucon-Bomagne-Buzancy, the purpose being to make the deepest penetration in the centre, which, with the Fourth French Army advancing west of the Argonne, would force the enemy to evacuate that forest without our having to deliver a heavy attack in that difficult region.

Following three hours of violent artillery fire of preparation, the infantry advanced at 5:30 A. M. on Sept. 26, accompanied by tanks. During the first two days of the attack, before the enemy was able to bring up his reserves, our troops made steady progress through the network of defenses. Montfaucon was held tenaciously by the enemy and was not captured until noon of the second day.

By the evening of the 28th a maximum advance of eleven kilometers had been achieved and we had captured Baulny, Epinonville, Septsarges, and Dannevoux. The right had made a splendid advance into the woods south of Briulles-sur-Meuse, but the extreme left was meeting strong resistance in the Argonne. The attack continued without interruption, meeting six new divisions which the enemy threw into the first line before Sept. 29. He developed a powerful machine-gun defense supported by heavy artillery fire, and made frequent counterattacks with fresh troops, particularly on the front of the 28th and 35th Divisions. These divisions had taken Varennes, Cheppy, Baulny, and Charpentry, and the line was within two kilometers of Apremont. We were no longer engaged in a manoeuvre for the pinching out of a salient, but were necessarily committed, generally squeaking, to a direct frontal attack against strong, hostile positions fully manned by a determined enemy.

By nightfall of the 29th the First Army line was approximately Bois de la Côte Lemont-Nantillois-Apremont-southwest across the Argonne. Many divisions, especially those in the centre that were subjected to cross-fire of artillery, had suffered heavily. The severe fighting, the nature of the terrain over which they attacked, and the fog and darkness sorely tried even our best divisions. On the night of the 29th the 37th and 79th Divisions were relieved by the 32d and 3d Divisions, respectively, and on the following night the 1st Division relieved the 35th Division.

The critical problem during the first few days of the battle was the restoration of communications over No Man's Land. There were but four roads available across this deep zone, and the violent artillery fire of the previous period of the war had virtually destroyed them. The spongy soil and the lack of material increased the difficulty. But the splendid work of our engineers and pioneers soon made possible the movement of the troops, artillery, and supplies most needed. By the afternoon of the 27th all the divisional artillery except a few batteries of heavy guns had effected a passage and was supporting the infantry action.

SECOND PHASE OF BATTLE

At 5:30 A. M. on Oct. 4 the general attack was renewed. The enemy divisions on the front from Fresnes-en-Woeve to the Argonne had increased from ten in the first line to sixteen, and included some of his best divisions. The fighting was desperate, and only small advances were realized, except by the 1st Division, on the right of the 1st Corps. By evening of Oct. 5 the line was approximately Bois de la Côte Lemont-Bois du Fays-Gesnes-Hill 240-Fleville-Chehery-southwest through the Argonne.

It was especially desirable to drive the enemy from his commanding positions on the heights east of the Meuse, but it was even more important that we should force him to use his troops there and weaken his tenacious hold on positions in our immediate front. The further stabilization of the new St. Mihiel line permitted the withdrawal of certain divisions for the extension of the Meuse-Argonne operation to the east bank of the Meuse River.

On the 7th the 1st Corps, with the 82d Division added, launched a strong attack northwest toward Cornay, to draw attention from the movement east of the Meuse and at the same time outflank the German position in the Argonne. The following day the 17th French Corps, Major Gen. Claudel commanding, initiated its attack east of the Meuse against the exact point on which the German armies must pivot in order to withdraw from Northern France. The troops encountered elaborate fortifications and stubborn resistance, but by nightfall had realized an advance of six kilometers to a line well within the Bois de Consenvoye, and including the villages of Beaumont and Hautmont. Continuous fighting was maintained along our entire battlefront, with especial success on the extreme left, where the capture of the greater part of the Argonne Forest was completed. The enemy contested every foot of ground on our front in order to make more rapid retirements further west and withdraw his forces from Northern France before the interruption of his railroad communications through Sedan.

REPLACEMENTS INSUFFICIENT

We were confronted at this time by an insufficiency of replacements to build up exhausted divisions. Early in October combat units required some 90,000 replacements, and not more than 45,000 would be available before Nov. 1 to fill the existing and prospective vacancies. We still had two divisions with the British and two with the French. A review of the situation, American and allied, especially as to our own resources in men for the next two months, convinced me that the attack of the First Army and of the allied armies further west should be pushed to the limit. But if the First Army was to continue its aggressive tactics our divisions then with the French must be recalled, and replacements must be obtained by breaking up newly arrived divisions.

In discussing the withdrawal of our divisions from the French with Marshal Foch and General Pétain on Oct. 10 the former expressed his appreciation of the fact that the First Army was striking the pivot of the German withdrawal, and also held the view that the allied attack should continue. General Pétain agreed that the American divisions with the French were essential to us if we were to maintain our battle against the German pivot. The French were, however, straining every nerve to keep up their attacks and, before those divisions with the French had been released, it became necessary for us to send the 37th and 91st Divisions from the First Army to assist the Sixth French Army in Flanders.

OVER ONE MILLION AMERICANS IN BATTLE

At this time the First Army was holding a front of more than 120 kilometers; its strength exceeded 1,000,000 men; it was engaged in the most desperate battle of our history, and the burden of command was too heavy for a single commander and staff. Therefore, on Oct. 12, that portion of our front extending from Port-sur-Seille, east of the Moselle, to Fresnes-en-Woevre, southeast of Verdun, was transferred to the newly constituted Second Army, with Lieut. Gen. Robert L. Bullard in command, under whom it began preparations for the extension of operations to the east in the direction of Briey and Metz. On Oct. 16 the command of the First Army was transferred to Lieut. Gen. Hunter Liggett, and my advance headquarters was established at Ligny-en-Barrois, from which the command of the group of American armies was exercised.

HINDENBURG LINE BROKEN

Local attacks of the First Army were continued in order particularly to adjust positions preparatory to a renewed general assault. The 1st and 5th Divisions were relieved by the 42d and 18th Divisions, which were now fresh. An attack along the whole front was made on Oct. 11. The resistance encountered was stubborn, but the stronghold on Côte Dame Marie was captured and the Hindenburg line was broken. Cunel and Romagne-sous-Montfaucon were taken and the line advanced two kilometers north of Sommerance. A maximum advance of seventeen kilometers had been made since Sept. 26 and the enemy had been forced to throw into the fight a total of fifteen reserve divisions.

During the remainder of the month important local operations were carried out, which involved desperate fighting. The 1st Corps, Major Gen. Dickman commanding, advanced through Grand Pré; the 5th Corps, Major Gen. Charles P. Summerall commanding, captured the Bois de Bantheville; the 3d Corps, Major Gen. John L. Hines commanding, completed the occupation of Cunel Heights, and the 17th French Corps drove the enemy from the main ridge south of La Grande Montagne. Particularly heavy fighting occurred east of the Meuse on Oct. 18, and in the further penetration of the Kriemhilde-Stellung on Oct. 23 the 26th Division, entering the battle at this time, relieved the 18th French Division.

THE RESULTS

Summarizing the material results which had been attained by the First Army by the end of October, we had met an increasing number of Germany's best divisions, rising from twenty in line and reserve on Sept. 26, to thirty-one on Oct. 31; the enemy's elaborately prepared positions, including the Hindenburg line, in our front had been broken; the almost impassable Argonne Forest was in our hands; an advance of twenty-one kilometers had been effected; 18,600 prisoners, 370 cannon, 1,000 machine guns, and a mass of material captured, and the great railway artery through Carignan to Sedan was now seriously threatened.

The demands of incessant battle which had been maintained day by day for more than a month had compelled our divisions to fight to the limit of their capacity. Combat troops were held in line and pushed to the attack until deemed incapable of further effort because of casualties or exhaustion; artillery once engaged was seldom withdrawn, and many batteries fought until practically all the animals were casualties and the guns were towed out of line by motor trucks.

The American soldier had shown unrivaled fortitude in this continuous fighting during most inclement weather and under many disadvantages of position. Through experience, the army had developed into a powerful and smooth-running machine, and there was a supreme confidence in our ability to carry through the task successfully.

While the high pressure of these dogged attacks was a great strain on our troops, it was calamitous to the enemy. His divisions had been thrown into confusion by our furious assaults, and his morale had been reduced until his will to resist had well-nigh reached the breaking point. Once a German division was engaged in the fight, it became practically impossible to effect its relief. The enemy was forced to meet the constantly recurring crisis by breaking up tactical organizations and sending hurried detachments to widely separated portions of the field.

Every member of the American Expeditionary Forces, from the front line to the base ports, was straining every nerve. Magnificent efforts were exerted by the entire Services of Supply to meet the enormous demands made on it. Obstacles which seemed insurmountable were overcome daily in expediting the movements of replacements, ammunition and supplies to the front, and of sick and wounded to the rear. It was this spirit of determination animating every American soldier that made it impossible for the enemy to maintain the struggle until 1919.

THIRD PHASE

The detailed plans for the operations of the allied armies on the western front changed from time to time during the course of this great battle, but the mission of the First American Army to cut the great Carignan-Sedan-Mézières railroad remained unchanged. Marshal Foch co-ordinated the operations along the entire front, continuing persistently and unceasingly the attacks by all allied armies; the Belgian Army, with a French army and two American divisions, advancing eastward; the British armies and two American divisions, with the First French Army on their right, toward the region north of Givet; the First American Army and Fourth French Army toward Sedan and Mézières.

On the 21st my instructions were issued to start the First Army to prepare thoroughly for a general attack on Oct. 28 that would be decisive, if possible. In order that the attack of the First Army and that of the Fourth French Army on its left should be simultaneous, our attack was delayed until Nov. 1. The immediate purpose of the First Army was to take Buzancy and the heights of Barricourt, to turn the forest north of Grand Pré, and to establish contact with the Fourth French Army near Boulton-aux-Bois. The army was directed to carry the heights of Barricourt by nightfall of the first day and then to exploit this success by advancing its left to Boulton-aux-Bois in preparation for the drive toward Sedan. By strenuous effort all available artillery had been moved well forward to the heights previously occupied by the enemy, from which it could fully cover and support the initial advance of the infantry.

On this occasion, and for the first time, the army prepared for its attack under normal conditions. We held the front of the attack, and were not under the necessity of taking over a new front, with its manifold installations and services. Our own personnel handled the communications, dumps, telegraph lines, and water service; our divisions were either on the line or close in the rear; the French artillery, aviation, and technical troops, which had previously made up our deficiencies, had been largely replaced by our own organizations, and now our army, corps, and divisional staffs were by actual experience second to none.

FOE'S LAST DEFENSE

On the morning of Nov. 1 three army corps were in line between the Meuse River and the Bois de Bourgogne. On the right the 3d Corps had the 5th and 90th Divisions; the 5th Corps occupied the centre of the line, with the 89th and 2d Divisions, and was to be the wedge of the attack on the first day, and on the left the 1st Corps deployed the 80th, 77th, and 78th Divisions.

Preceded by two hours of violent artillery preparation, the infantry advanced, closely followed by "accompanying guns." The artillery acquitted itself magnificently, the barrages being so well co-ordinated and so dense that the enemy was overwhelmed and quickly submerged by the rapid onslaught of the infantry. By nightfall the 5th Corps, in the centre, had realized an advance of almost nine kilometers, to the Bois de la Folle, and had completed the capture of the Heights of Barricourt, while the 3d Corps, on the right, had captured Alcreville and Andevanne. Our troops had broken through the enemy's last defense, captured his artillery positions, and had precipitated a retreat of the German forces about to be isolated in the forest north of Grand Pré. On the 2d and 3d we advanced rapidly against heavy fighting on the front of the right and centre corps; to the left the troops of the 1st Corps hurried forward in pursuit, some by motor trucks, while the artillery pressed along the country roads close behind. Our heavy artillery was skillfully brought into position to fire upon the Carignan-Sedan railroad and the junctions at Longuyon and Conflans. By the evening of the 4th our troops had reached La Neuville, opposite Stenay, and had swept through the great Forêt de Dieulet, reaching the outskirts of Beaumont, while on the left we were eight kilometers north of Boulton-aux-Bois.

The following day the advance continued toward Sedan with increasing swiftness. The 3d Corps, turning eastward, crossed the Meuse in a brilliant operation by the 5th Division, driving the enemy from the heights of Dun-sur-Meuse and forcing a general withdrawal from the strong positions he had so long held on the hills north of Verdun.

APPEALS FOR ARMISTICE

By the 7th the right of the 3d Corps had exploited its river crossing to a distance of ten kilometers east of the Meuse, completely ejecting the enemy from the wooded heights and driving him out into the swampy plain of the Woevre; the 5th and 1st Corps had reached the line of the Meuse River along their respective fronts and the left of the latter corps held the heights dominating Sedan, the strategical goal of the Meuse-Argonne operation, forty-one kilometers from our point of departure on Nov. 1. We had cut the enemy's main line of communications. Recognizing that nothing but a cessation of hostilities could save his armies from complete disaster, he appealed for an immediate armistice on Nov. 6.

Meanwhile general plans had been prepared for the further employment of American forces in an advance between the Meuse and the Moselle, to be directed toward Longwy by the First Army, while the Second Army was to assume the offensive toward the Briey Iron Basin. Orders directing the preparatory local operations involved in this enterprise were issued on Nov. 5.

Between the 7th and 10th of November the 3d Corps continued its advance eastward to Remolville, while the 17th French Corps, on its right, with the 79th, 26th, and 81st American Divisions, and two French divisions, drove the enemy from his final foothold on the heights east of the Meuse. At 9 P. M. on Nov. 9 appropriate orders were sent to the First and Second Armies in accordance with the following telegram from Marshal Foch to the commander of each of the allied armies:

"The enemy, disorganized by our repeated attacks, retreats along the entire front.

"It is important to co-ordinate and expedite our movements.

"I appeal to the energy and the initiative of the Commanders in Chief and of their armies to make decisive the results obtained."

NOV. 11, 1918

In consequence of the foregoing instructions our Second Army pressed the enemy along its entire front. On the night of the 10th-11th and the morning of the 11th the 5th Corps, in the First Army, forced a crossing of the Meuse east of Beaumont and gained the commanding heights within the re-entrant of the river, thus completing our control of the Meuse River line. At 6 A. M. on the 11th notification was received from Marshal Foch's headquarters that the armistice had been signed and that hostilities would cease at 11 A. M. Preparatory measures had already been taken to insure the prompt transmission to the troops of the announcement of an armistice. However, the advance east of Beaumont on the morning of the 11th had been so rapid and communication across the river was so difficult that there was some fighting on isolated portions of that front after 11 A. M.

GREAT ODDS OVERCOME

Between Sept. 26 and Nov. 11, twenty-two American and four French divisions, on the front extending from southeast of Verdun to the Argonne Forest, had engaged and decisively beaten forty-seven different German divisions, representing 25 per cent. of the enemy's entire divisional strength on the western front. Of these enemy divisions, twenty had been drawn from the French front and one from the British front. Of the twenty-two American divisions, twelve had, at different times during this period, been engaged on fronts other than our own. The First Army suffered a loss of about 117,000 in killed and wounded. It captured 26,000 prisoners, 847 cannon, 3,000 machine guns, and large quantities of material.

The dispositions which the enemy made to meet the Meuse-Argonne offensive, both immediately before the opening of the attack and during the battle, demonstrated the importance which he ascribed to this section of the front and the extreme measures he was forced to take in its defense. From the moment the American offensive began until the armistice his defense was desperate and the flow of his divisions to our front was continuous.

Work of American Mine Sweepers

Removing the North Sea Barrage

THE United States Navy's mine-sweeping fleet was reviewed by Secretary Daniels Nov. 24, 1919, in the Hudson River. Fifty-nine vessels were in the review, and later in the day 1,500 enlisted men of the crews were entertained at luncheon in the Hotel Astor by the Knights of Columbus. The last great task of this unique fleet had been that of taking up more than 50,000 mines in an area of 250 square miles in the North Sea.

Lieutenant Dudley A. Nichols, U. S. N. R. F., in describing the methods employed in this dangerous work explained that an elementary form of sweep might consist merely of a heavy steel cable having each of its ends made fast to a tug, so that with the two tugs steaming abreast of each other this cable would catch the mooring ropes of any mines within the area between them. Then the mines would be dragged along and in all probability the mooring ropes would finally part, allowing the buoyant mines to float to the surface.

To sweep a considerable area, however, he stated, the sweeping tugs must proceed with all possible speed, and as soon as this is done the horizontal water pressure against the cable lifts it to the surface, with the result that the mines are passed over. To overcome this the kite principle was adopted, but the kite was made to dive instead of fly. The water pressure on a mine-sweeping kite causes it to dive just as the wind pressure on an ordinary box kite lifts it up high into the air.

A huge steel kite weighing 1,800 pounds was towed by each sweeper to attain the level of the deepest mines in the North Sea barrage, which were laid at the maximum depth to which a modern submarine dare submerge.

Just as lengthening the string to an ordinary kite will cause it to rise, lengthening the cable by which the water kite is towed causes it to dive deeper; and it is by this simple means that the mine sweepers are enabled to cut off mines at any desired depth. These vessels always work in pairs, the sweep for each pair comprising a kite towed by a wire rope from each ship and a steel cable stretched between the two kites. The wire rope is called the kite wire, while the steel cable takes the name of sweep wire.

During the war, when mine sweepers were called upon to sweep mines on a scale never known before, it was found that an ordinary steel cable would not cut the mine mooring ropes as quickly as desired. To meet the demand for a better cable, saw-toothed wire, which acts like a huge flexible file and cuts the mine moorings a few seconds after contact, was developed. This wire was used solely in the operations in the North Sea.

The actual plan followed in the North

Sea was explained by Lieutenant Nichols as follows: In each pair one ship would slow down slightly while her mate came alongside until they were running abreast about fifty feet apart. A handline was heaved across the gap between them, the end of the sweep wire hauled over and shackled to its other half, and as they diverged the wire was rapidly paid out. The kites were launched with a great splash, and the sweepers wheeled into the lines of mines, maintaining a constant separation of four or five hundred yards.

It was at this moment that pandemonium would begin. Mines exploded in the sweep ahead, astern, on the beam, and everywhere except directly underneath. The sea suddenly would become a Pandora's box, teeming with evil spirits of noise and demolition.

It is inconceivable that any ships can endure such tremendous shocks without sustaining serious damage. So severe is the shock from a deep-level mine a hundred yards distant that it is as if a prodigious blow has been suddenly struck on the ship's keel by a colossal hammer.

A half mile astern of each pair of sweepers came a little sub-chaser whose duty it was to sink all mines which were cut off and floated to the surface. To accomplish this a half dozen men were kept busy firing service rifles.

Thousands of fish were stunned or killed by the explosions, and the sub-chasers found time to pick up a deckload of these of a size, variety, and excellence to tempt an epicure. At night they generously distributed this cargo of fresh food among the sweepers, and as a result the sub-chasers came to be dubbed the "fishboats." The seagulls quickly discovered this unlimited source of delicate food, and became fast friends and followers of the mine sweepers.

Vienna's Agony

By PHILIP GIBBS

Mr. Gibbs visited Vienna in November. The following account of the tragic scenes he witnessed is printed in CURRENT HISTORY MAGAZINE by arrangement with The London Chronicle:

I CAME by train to Vienna—a journey of twenty-four hours—through the new Republic of Yugoslavia; in a train dragged by an engine which staggered and panted along with a lack of fuel, and stopped abruptly, with frightful jerks, in desolate places with distant views of rain-swept hills.

There was no food in the train, nor time to get it, if any were there in wayside stations. The carriages were crowded, and men, women, and children were packed in the corridors all through a night and day. The babies screamed, and their mothers could not feed them. * * * I wondered why all these people were coming to Vienna. I wonder still, for Vienna has no room for them, no food for them, no fuel, no trade, no money, and no hope for any of them.

There are two and a half million people in Vienna, out of a population of six million in the republic, to which Austria has now been reduced. More are crowding into the city every day, and not leaving—by reason of some strange freak of social psychology, at which I can only guess—a desire for a mad kind of gayety in their world of ruin, a herding together of doomed people, the old spirit which in times of plague made men “eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die.”

CITY OF DREADFUL NIGHT

On my first night in Vienna an enormous gloom seemed to encompass me when I went out into the streets—those streets which I remember so full of light and gayety and music before the war. Only a few lights glimmered. The great arc lamps were not burning. At 6 o'clock all the shops were shut. Not many people were about in the darkness. Truly, I thought, I have come to a city of tragedy.

Now, after other nights, I know that this is a city of tragedy, more tragic than any city I know in the world after the years of war, filled with masses of people who exist in semi-starvation, on the verge of absolute starvation, and with children fed by the charity of people who were their enemies in war, yet not fed enough in spite of an organization of relief—American and British—wonderfully administered and enormous in its scope.

I have seen the valour of men and women striving ceaselessly to cope with the vast sum of misery seething around them in this City of Vienna, but not doing much more, as they acknowledge, than touching the surface of the morass, by a temporary relief which does not cure the spreading and deep-rooted evil of hunger and disease.

The American Relief Committee provided 20 million meals to the starving children of Austria between May 16 and Sept. 30, 1919. That is an astounding achievement.

The British Mission, working with less funds, but with quiet and persistent endeavor to postpone the justice of “reparation” to the immediate needs of a stricken people, have helped in the way of transport and supplies to give a chance of life to a population which otherwise would die.

But beyond all these efforts, overpowering them, is the state of Austria after the war, entirely isolated, hemmed in by unfriendly neighbors, deprived of natural wealth, without industries in her great capital, and ruined so utterly that her Treasury notes are hardly better than waste paper.

PALACE A SOUP KITCHEN

The palace of the Belvedere belonged to the Archduke Franz Ferdinand—he who was murdered at Serajevo, where the spark lit the powder magazine which spread flame and fury through Europe on a day of August in 1914. Now it is a soup kitchen for starving children fed by American relief; and when I went there 1,100 of those little ones were having their first meal of the day—the only meal for most of them—and saying “Gruss Gott” before they dipped their spoons.

The broad boulevards of Vienna are still thronged by people with their heads bent today against the driving blizzard of snow. The cafés and restaurants are crowded with people who come for warmth, light, music and smuggled food, for which they pay great prices. Many of these people are foreigners—Czechs and Slovaks, and Croats, and Serbians, and Italians—who come like vultures to feed on the corpse of Austrian finance, changing their own money into four, five or ten times the number of Austrian kronen.

Others are Viennese profiteers who gathered much bulk of paper money while the old empire was dying, and now are eating it up in a prodigal way, shrugging their shoulders at the future while they fill their stomachs.

Others are middle-class folk who, after a breakfast of corn coffee and black bread, a midday meal of cabbage soup, and a dinner of boiled cabbage, and other green stuff, come hungry into the gilded rooms of these restaurants to linger over a cup of coffee with a glass of water, while they listen for hours to light music, and under the glitter of the chandeliers get a little warmth for their bodies and souls.

Outside, in the thickly populated districts beyond the boulevards, in small middle-class homes and workmen's tenements, there is no kind of pretense at gayety, no “camouflage” of misery. There is poverty, naked and cold. There is hunger which is just less than starvation, and disease just this side of death, and the certain knowledge that, unless “something happens” quickly, they will be in the hands of Famine, which has been staved off, so far, week by week, by foreign relief, a hand-to-mouth supply of Government stocks—on a day last month they had only five days' supply ahead—and by a desperate system of small smuggling.

MISERY BEYOND WORDS

Before I came to Vienna I had read horrible things about the conditions of the city, and believed they might be exaggerated by philanthropic, humanitarian people, anxious to arouse emotion for the sake of their funds. Now, I know by personal investigation that, so far from exaggerating, it is impossible to convey to the outside world anything like the extent and depth of misery into which the Viennese have fallen.

It is impossible for me after all my investigations—and I have been diligent—to know how these people of Vienna are able to live. Frankly, I cannot understand how, in such conditions, they keep body and soul together.

Look at a few simple, appalling facts, as I have found them.

There are 100,000 men out of work in Vienna at the present time, drawing from 5 to 15 kronen (5 to 15 cents of our money, according to the present rate of exchange).

There are 6,000 homeless families.

There are 2,500,000 people, of whom 2,000,000 at least live without meat, butter, milk, or any kind of fat.

Eighty-three per cent. of the children suffer from rickets, so badly bulbous-headed that many are deformed; and

No children over one year of age get any allowance of milk. Children under one year of age are allowed one litre of milk per day; but, as a rule, do not get more than half a litre.

The bread ration for each person is two pounds a week. No potatoes can be obtained by the great mass of people, and those who get them smuggle them.

In a cold climate (with snow already in the streets of Vienna, Nov. 8, 1919) the people are miserably clad in cotton clothes, and many children are bare-legged, so that one sees them shivering in the streets, blue to the lips with cold. There is no coal for factories or dwelling houses.

The middle classes are worse off than the artisan class, so that whereas the mechanic gets 300 kronen a week, the professor, teacher, clerk, journalist and small professional man gets no more than 150 to 250 kronen a week. These figures do not mean much until one knows the purchasing power of the kronen. Then they mean black poverty, daily hunger, hopelessness.

EMACIATED BABIES

I spoke today to a medical officer in charge of an infant welfare centre. He had been showing me the emaciated condition of the babies brought in by half-starved mothers, who were buying tins of condensed milk and cocoa supplied at a cheap rate by the Society of Friends, who are doing very noble work in Vienna.

He pointed out the babies suffering from eczema, rickets, scrofula, and then suddenly he began to tell me about his own conditions of life.

I earn 300 kronen a week [he said], and I have to keep up the appearance of a gentleman. To get this old suit of mine turned cost 600 kronen. A new suit is beyond my means altogether. It costs 2,000 kronen. A shirt costs 120 kronen, a pair of boots 400. I cannot afford to buy meat at 14 kronen for a veal cutlet or 16 kronen for a pork chop. I never eat meat. Potatoes are beyond my means at 7 kronen for two pounds. I live mainly on cabbage soup and bread. Is it any wonder that our young men and women are developing tuberculous disease in a frightful way and that the vitality of the people is being sapped so that they have no strength to work?

TERRIBLE NEED OF COAL

Coal is the supreme need—coal for cooking, coal for heating—and there is so little for the wards that the children have to be crowded together in rooms that can be heated only for two hours a day, and by this crowding do not get a proper chance of health.

Even with money they cannot get it. Transport fails. The trains themselves have no fuel; and the enemies of Austria—in Czechoslovakia—hold up trucks of coal labeled for Vienna, bought and paid for, and hinder them from passing.

I am writing of Austria, but beyond are Hungary and Russia, a vast Slav race, developing not only typhus and tuberculosis, but morbid passions and philosophies of despair.

Western Europe, "victors" of war, but with unhealed wounds, commercial ruin, and an after-war psychology susceptible to infectious ideas, had better take warning while there is time, before they, too, sicken of the fever.

The problems of Eastern Europe are hideously complicated and beyond settlement by statesmen bigger than those who made this muddle of misery. There are natural forces at work which can hardly be controlled—the surgings of many races, whose instincts of nationality are being exploited by political leaders for their own ends.

The people of Vienna are not without friends who, for humanity's sake, are devoting themselves to the relief of all this suffering. They are friends who were once counted as their enemies.

Since I have been in this city I have come in touch with the members of our own British mission, under Sir William Goode, which has done most admirable work by facilitating the transport of foodstuffs in Austria, Hungary, Serbia and other distressed countries by supplying large stocks of food at cost price to the Governments of these States, and by supporting the work of relief agencies.

I have also seen the work of the American Relief Committee, which is magnificently organized and of enormous help, and I have been in touch with the Society of Friends, and seen the devotion, the courage and the ability with which Dr. Hilda Clarke and her assistants are securing milk and food for poor mothers and babies.

All that is splendid as philanthropy, but the scale of the work that these people are doing is in itself a revelation of the mass of misery surrounding and overwhelming their efforts, and of the doom of a people which can be postponed a little, but not averted, by this charity.

The American Child-Relief Committee, directed by a young naval Lieutenant named Stockton, with three other colleagues—all fine men—is enormous in its scope and enterprise. It has established feeding centres and distributing centres in Vienna and outside districts for starving children between the ages of five and fifteen. In Vienna it is feeding 100,000 children, and another 100,000 in other parts. It has already supplied 20,000,000 meals to these hungry mouths of Austria. That is wonderful, and I have seen few things more touching than the battalions of little ones who come for their midday dinner in the American centres.

There is the gratitude of dumb animals in their eyes for this gift of food, and they eat silently and earnestly as they sit together on the long wooden benches. But there are many thousands of children—I suppose 100,000 in Vienna—who do not get these meals.

"A LIMBLESS TRUNK"

All this charitable work is but a sop given to half-starved multitudes, while their state becomes more desperate, and their chances of recovery more unlikely. Vienna, to recover, needs coal for her factories, so that the people may work and produce manufactured articles in exchange for food. With her money fading away to nothing in purchase power, she can buy neither coal nor raw material.

In any case, there can be no recovery in a city of 2,500,000 people isolated from all the natural resources and flow of wealth which created so great a capital. "A man who has had his legs cut off cannot walk," I was told by an Austrian man of letters. "We have had our legs cut off. We are but a limbless trunk."

Charity is good and kind. But Vienna asks for more than charity. She asks for a broad scheme of rescue by the great powers of Europe willing to give her long credit for money and raw material, so that she may regain some kind of vitality.

Before this I have never seen a city that was hopeless—and it is not good to see, unless we are those who lick our lips because vengeance is sweet.

Austria's Hunger Crisis

The Nation's Dangerous Plight

IN Austria the food and coal shortage was reported as remaining so extremely grave that only a large measure of assistance from America during the Winter could save hundreds of thousands from death. In order to conserve the scant coal supply in Vienna the City Government adopted the novel expedient of changing the age-old midday meal hour. Instead of dinner at noon, families in even-numbered houses were required to dine at 11:30 and those in odd-numbered houses at 12:30. Thus excessive pressure was avoided in the power plants, since at this season of the year midday lighting was necessary in the majority of dark houses. A large increase of burglaries and street hold-ups, together with shop-window smashing, was remarked as being entered on the police blotters, due to the dim lighting of the streets.

Serious bread riots broke out at Innsbruck. Hungry mobs of men, women, and children attacked the warehouses, hotels, restaurants, and shops, plundering and destroying. Italian carabinieri protected the banks and Government granaries.

At the invitation of the Supreme Council in Paris Dr. Karl Renner, Austrian Chancellor, arrived in that capital on Dec. 11 to plead his country's dangerous plight. In an interview granted to The Associated Press, Dr. Renner said:

When I left Vienna we had only 9,000 tons of flour for six and three-quarter millions of people—a supply for six days only. Children are dying of hunger and cold, and 85 per cent. of those between 9 months and 3 years of age are suffering with rickets. The loss of weight on the part of nursing mothers is serious, resulting in the diminution of the nursing capacity.

Turning to the desperate condition of Austrian finance, Dr. Renner said:

We are now paying thirty prices for everything we buy. That is to say, the crown has depreciated to one-thirtieth of its normal value. At the same time we have exhausted our resources in securities, and we have nothing left but the resources, which, according to Article 197 of the Treaty of St. Germain, are mortgaged to the Allies for payment of reparations. * * *

I cannot leave Paris empty-handed. I must go back with the assurance that my people will be fed, or else I must resign. It is a question of time. Austria may be likened to a sick man who is not permitted to call in a single physician, but is obliged to depend upon five acting together. One alone might arrive in time, but will all five be able to get together and apply the proper remedy before the patient succumbs? Whether Vienna has bread for Christmas depends upon the answer to the request made to Italy for the urgent shipment for all she can spare. Whether the whole of Austria is faced by famine by the middle of January depends upon quick action by the allied and associated powers.

RELIEF MEASURES ADOPTED

At a meeting of the Supreme Council at Paris, after Chancellor Renner had again explained the food situation, it was decided, on Dec. 16, to allow Austria a credit of $70,000,000 for food, the relief to be furnished at the rate of $9,500,000 monthly. It was agreed that the loan would be guaranteed by Great Britain, France, and Italy, unless the United States assumed the loan. Ambassador Wallace, who was present when the plan was agreed upon was unable to enter into any undertaking for the United States without instructions from his Government, but he cabled to Washington setting forth urgently the need of taking measures in Austria's behalf.

Dr. Renner received a letter from the Supreme Council signed by Premier Clemenceau, confirming a decision of the Supreme Council to maintain integrally the territory of the Republic of Austria as defined in the treaty of St. Germain.

The letter referred to the movements tending toward the separation from the Republic of Vorarlberg, Salzburg, Tyrol, and Western Hungary, and declared the success of such movements in any of these territories would involve complete disintegration of Austria and destroy the equilibrium of Central Europe.

FEEDING CENTRAL EUROPE

Herbert Hoover, Food Commissioner, announced Dec. 17 that unless the United States gave credit for breadstuffs to Finland, Poland, Austria, and other nations in Central Europe, millions of people would starve. He advised that Congress allow the grain corporation to control the advance of wheat and flour on credit to the countries now in dire distress. Mr. Hoover said:

There can be no question that some 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 people in the larger cities of Finland, Poland, Austria, and other portions of Central Europe, outside Germany, are facing starvation unless some quick means can be discovered for their assistance. The bread ration in Vienna has already been reduced to three ounces per day and bread is 60 per cent. of the people's food.

We have in the United States a great surplus of wheat and flour in the hands of the Government Grain Corporation over and above our own possibility of consumption. This surplus of wheat and flour, in the ordinary course, would be sold to foreign countries for cash. The particular peoples mentioned above, owing to their economic situation, are totally unable to find cash. The question therefore arises as to whether we should not devise some method by which they may purchase on credit a certain amount of this surplus that will otherwise go solely to cash purchasers.

Hungary Under New Government

Recognized by the Allies

THE disturbed political situation in Hungary was somewhat relieved on Nov. 23 by the formation of a new Cabinet under the Christian Socialist, Carl Hussar, which included representatives of all parties. The former Premier, Stephen Friedrich, accepted the position of War Secretary. The other members of the Cabinet were:

Minister of the Interior—M. BENICZKY.
Minister of Public Instruction — STEFAN HALLER.
Minister of Agriculture—JULIUS RUBINEK.
Minister of Commerce—FRANZ HEINRICH.
Socialist Minister of Public Safety—KARL PAYER.
Minister of Foreign Affairs—COUNT SOMZICH.
Minister of Justice—DR. PARIZY.

Minister of National Minorities — JACOB BLEYER.
 Minister of War—STEPHEN FRIEDRICH.
 Minister of Finance—M. KORANYI.
 Minister of Supplies—STEFAN SZABO.
 Minister of Small Farmers — M. SOKO-SPATKA.

Upon announcement of this change of Government Sir George Clerk, the allied representative at Budapest, sent a note to M. Hussar, stating that the Allies were prepared to recognize the Cabinet as a Provisional Government with which the Supreme Council could negotiate until elections were held. Previously, it was reported, Sir George had informed the Premier that recognition of the Government depended on these conditions:

First, that elections be held without delay; second, that order be maintained; third, that the provisional borders of Hungary be respected; fourth, that legal equality be granted all citizens; fifth, liberty of the press and public opinion; sixth, free democratic elections, properly safeguarded.

The formation of the Hussar Coalition Cabinet seemed to have been the outcome of Sir George Clerk's successful efforts earlier in the month in bringing into a conference such political leaders as Admiral Horthy, commander of the Hungarian National Army, and MM. Lovassy, Szabo, Vazonyi and Garami, representing respectively the National Land Party, the Peasant Party, the National Democratic Party and the Social Democrats.

The trial of Communists at Budapest charged with crimes during the Bela Kun dictatorship began on Nov. 24. Cserny, commander of the "Lenin Boys," was the first to be placed on trial out of 16,000 accused. He denied many charges of executions, and gave instances in which, he declared, Bela Kun had given explicit orders for murders. Before the court on the 28th a man named Sztenykowski, one of seventeen charged with the murder of Count Stephen Tisza in November, 1918, stated that Joseph Pogany, Minister of War in the Communist Government, had said to Count Tisza, "You are the author of the world war, in which so many have bled to death." According to Sztenykowski, Pogany then fired a shot at the Count, whereupon, the witness said, he and the others fired shots immediately. On Dec. 7 M. Kovacs, the Judge who had been investigating the facts concerning the murder of Count Tisza, committed suicide by jumping from a third-story window in the Court House. Judge Kovacs had been accused by the Extreme Socialists of suppressing evidence to show that former Premier Friedrich had knowledge that the murder of Count Tisza was purposed.

The sentencing of the Communists convicted of crimes during the Bela Kun dictatorship began on Dec. 12. Fourteen were sentenced to death by hanging, one to life imprisonment, and a large number to terms of various periods at hard labor.

A Budapest message of Dec. 7 stated that Brig. Gen. Harry H. Bandholtz, American member of the Interallied Military Commission, had informed the Pester Lloyd that Hungary might rely on the Entente's good-will in the Peace Treaty, and might expect material aid in restoring the economic situation. He added that the Entente was also firm in its intention to protect racial minorities, and that the United States would resume to the fullest extent the friendly relations existing with Hungary before the war.

Poland's Progress Toward Peace

Paderewski's Cabinet Resigns

POLAND, the strongest of the new republics erected in the Baltic regions and Central Europe, has pursued her way of inner progress and outer defense against the forces of Bolshevism, despite many obstacles and some friction. Major Gen. Edgar Jadwin, a member of the American Mission sent to investigate reports of Polish excesses against the Jewish population, said on his return to the United States on Nov. 23:

As good order is being maintained in Poland at present as in the United States. There is a good system of gendarmes. The crops are fair, and they say there is enough food to carry them through the Winter. The trouble lies in the distribution of the food.

It seems marvelous the way the Poles have set to work. In one year they have accomplished many important results. They are laying the foundations for a splendid school system, with elementary and high schools and universities. They are doing their best to settle the land problem, which formerly was very bad, being based on the Russian system. The Government has declared its intention of buying the surplus land and selling it to the people.

I was impressed with the businesslike manner in which the Poles have gone about their affairs. What they accomplished was done because they had the backing of the Peace Conference. The Poles need raw materials, credit, and goods to keep their armies over the Winter campaign. As an instance, in Lodz there was a factory with 132,000 spindles. The Germans carried off all the belts attached to the spindles. In a similar way other factories need supplies and machinery to replace that which has been stolen.

ARMY HOLDS BOLSHEVIKI

At the middle of November the Polish Army was the only anti-Bolshevist army still winning victories against the forces of the Soviet Government; all others had been checked by the energetic Red campaigns. The Polish counteroffensive between the Dvina and the Beresina at that time was going well, and the Poles had regained all the ground lost in the Bolshevik drive of some three weeks before. Only some fifty miles separated them from Denikin's army after their Volhynian victories. These successes were not the result of a withdrawal of Bolshevik forces on the Polish front, for the Poles still continued as before to engage from eight to nine Bolshevik divisions, besides irregular troops. A furious Bolshevik offensive on the Beresina continued all the time, while Petrograd was being threatened by the insufficiently supported advance of General Yudenitch on the former Russian capital; had these Red forces been released by Poland's inactivity, the defeat of the Yudenitch army would have been far more crushing and disastrous than it actually proved.

POLISH BOUNDARIES

The question of Polish boundaries still continued to preoccupy the Polish public mind. The policy adopted by the Paris Peace Conference of refusing to discuss the eastern frontiers of Poland until Russia had been reconstituted left Poland's aspirations indefinitely deferred. The views of General Pilsudski looked toward an early settlement of the boundary question and the establishment of a provisional régime for those portions of Lithuania, White Russia, and Volhynia whose civilization was Polish, and which had been reclaimed from Bolshevism by the Poles.

One solution of the East Galician problem believed to be in harmony with allied desires was the formation of two autonomous States to be set up beyond the Polish frontiers, and to be placed under a Polish protectorate for a period of twenty years, the Governors of each of these States to be appointed by the President of Poland, and the capitals to be fixed at Vilna and Lemberg (Lvov). M. Patek, the Polish Minister to Czechoslovakia, who was sent to Paris on Nov. 12 to take the place of M. Paderewski as Polish delegate to the conference, was commissioned to propound a solution of

Aggression of a Polish army in Lithuania was reported by the American Baltic Commissioner, Commander Gade, after a visit to Kovno, the Lithuanian capital, in the first week of December. Commander Gade and the British Commissioner, Colonel Tallents, had been there at the same time, and had found that the Polish Army had for several weeks been advancing into Lithuanian territory—in some places to a distance of thirty kilometers. The Poles also were continuing to hold Vilna, and were attempting to Polishize the town. A plot to overthrow the Lithuanian Government had resulted in the arrest and imprisonment of sixty Polish leaders. This whole phase of the Polish situation was summed up by a correspondent in these words:

A big Polish force is eating off its head with nothing legitimate to do, and the effect in Lithuania is deplorable. On the one hand, refugees and peasants, dispossessed of their land, swell the ranks of the homeless, workless and discontented. On the other hand, there is a natural feeling throughout the country that the Allies permit, or at least wink at, the ill-treatment Lithuania is receiving.

GERMAN EVACUATION

As for the boundary relations with Germany, these are to be adjusted in accordance with the lines laid down in the Treaty of Versailles and in accordance with a German-Polish agreement regarding evacuation. This latter agreement was signed in Berlin on Oct. 24 by Major Michelis, Chief of the Army Peace Commission in the Ministry of Defense, for Germany, and by Major General Count Lamezan for Poland. Its main points, as given in the German press, are as follows:

The Polish advance is to begin only on the seventh day after the depositing in Paris of the protocol of the ratification of the Peace Treaty by the principal powers. This day is to count as the first day of evacuation, from which the dates hereinafter given are to be reckoned.

During the first three days a narrow strip south of the Schoensee-Culmsee-Bromberg-Nakel-Usch line will be occupied by the Poles; at noon of the second day Thorn will be evacuated by the Germans.

Between the fourth and seventh days the entire district to be ceded east of the Vistula will be occupied, Culm being occupied on the sixth and Graudenz on the seventh. West of the Vistula, during the same period, Bromberg (on the fourth day), Nakel, Brotschin and Wirsitz, and the country to the north of it to the Culmsee line north of Zempelburg will be occupied.

The eighth day is a general day of rest. From the ninth to the twelfth day the Germans will evacuate the territory to the following line: South of Dirschau-Prussian Stargard-Czersk-south of Tuchel-south of Konitz.

From the thirteenth to the sixteenth day the district as far north as above Berent will be occupied by the Poles.

From the sixteenth to the nineteenth day the rest of the territory to be ceded will be evacuated as far as the sea. The movement in the individual zones will be arranged through agreements between the local German and Polish commands.

This agreement was made dependent upon the going into effect of the general treaty between Germany and Poland.

PADEREWSKI'S RESIGNATION

Administrative difficulties that had accumulated in the pathway of the Paderewski Government forced a crisis on Dec. 7, and, owing to lack of support, Premier Paderewski resigned after practically a year in power. After attempts of various party leaders to form another Ministry a Coalition Cabinet was announced on Dec. 15, with M. Skulski as Premier. The other members of the new Government were as follows:

Minister of War—General IESNICWSKI.
Minister of Finance—LADISLAS GRABSKI.
Minister of Justice—M. HEBDZYNSKI.
Minister of Public Instruction—M. IOPU-SZANSKI.
Minister of Commerce and Industry—ANTONY OLSZEWSKI.
Minister of Agriculture—FRANCIS BARDELL.
Minister of Transportation—CASIMIR KOYREE.
Minister of Posts—M. TOLLOSZKO.
Minister of Public Works—M. KENDZIOR.
Minister of Food—STANISLAS SLIWINSKI.
Minister of Labor—EDWARD OPOLOWSKI.
Minister for the Former Prussian Province—LADISLAS SEYDA.

During his occupancy of the Premiership M. Paderewski is declared to have shone more as a statesman and negotiator than as an administrator, this being especially apparent in his dealing with the Supreme Council in Paris. The time had come, however, when Poland required men of strong administrative capacity to undertake the country's reconstruction. Dissatisfaction existed in the country over the Government's failure to make the progress expected of it, and strong hostility to it existed in the Diet.

In a letter to Brig. Gen. Joseph Pilsudski, Chief of State, Paderewski explained that this hostility, together with the loss of the support he had expected from some groups in the Diet, had made it impossible for him to form a strong Ministry. It is asserted that he also lost influence in the country through his failure to secure East Galicia for Poland. With his departure General Pilsudski was expected to become the leading spirit looking to Poland's future.

FREE CITY OF DANZIG

The question of the free city of Danzig still caused Poland much apprehension, in view of the arbitrary actions of the German Government of the city in stripping the place of all material, including ships, docks, &c., which, according to the terms of the Peace Treaty, should have been kept for equitable distribution between Germany and Poland at the time when the League of Nations came into being. The proposal of an ad interim Government had been rejected by the Germans on the ground that it was unnecessary, and that the city could be taken over directly by the League of Nations from the hands of the German régime. A Polish delegation composed of seventeen members, including ten Germans and seven Poles, and representing industrial and commercial circles in Danzig, arrived in Warsaw in November. This delegation assured the Danzig Polish Society in Warsaw that the future free city desired to remain in close contact with Poland.

Regarding Poland's Baltic policy, it was announced from Kovno on Dec. 10 that at Dorpat (Esthonia), where the delegates of the Baltic powers had assembled to discuss the question of an exchange of prisoners with the Bolshevik Government, the Polish delegates, in common with the representatives of Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Ukraine, and White Russia, had declared themselves in favor of a military and political convention to defend their independence.

In the United States an appeal for an American governmental loan for Poland, as well as for the other new nations in Central Europe, was made on Dec. 7 by John F. Smulski, President of the Polish National Committee of America, on the ground that Poland and the new sister republics had spent themselves in fighting the Bolshevik menace and Germany, had given all they had, were financially bankrupt, lacking in all raw materials, in fuel, clothing and food supplies, and that they should be helped materially without further delay to aid them to preserve the liberty which they had so dearly won. A similar plea was made in an address delivered by Herbert Hoover, the former Food Administrator, before the convention of the Poles of America held in Buffalo shortly before the middle of November.

TREATMENT OF JEWS

Henry Morgenthau, who headed President Wilson's special mission to investigate Poland's treatment of the Jews, delivered an address in New York on Dec. 14 in which he said:

We found that not as many murders had been committed in Poland as the Jews had unfortunately proclaimed, but the sight of many dead bodies and of hundreds of others being shipped away in cars was a justification of the feeling that all those who were deported had been killed. But the economic boycott is absolutely as fearful as it has been painted. While among the Turks I saw how they sent the Armenians out into the deserts with released criminals and had the latter kill them on the way. The Poles have a more refined, if you will, method. They thought they could strangle the Jews by not dealing with them. They would do no business with them. Jewish railroad and Government employes were discharged. No officers in the army could be Jews. In designating the professors for four universities they were organizing they had not a single Jew on the list. They impressed Jews into service regardless of age and made them do the hardest kind of work, and the old bearded Jews were afraid to go out alone in the dark, for fear that their beards would be torn or cut from their faces.

The conditions in Poland are indescribable and cannot be appreciated unless actually seen. In Vilna we were told of the man who was tied to a horse and had to run five or six kilometers around the city at a pace set by the soldier who was mounted on the animal. The poet Jaffe, a man of fine fibre and beautiful soul, was arrested, beaten, stripped of his clothing, thrown into a car with fifty others and allowed to go for three days without food or drink. A boy who had been buried alive with five others told how he had extricated himself at night.

If American Jewry wants to cure the evils of Poland it must get at their roots. Sending 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 Jews to Palestine will do little good. The evil consists in allowing the Jews in a town to follow one or two pursuits. Where there are 5,000, perhaps 1,000 of them could make an honest living, but 5,000 must cheat each other or starve. They must be given schools of instruction. They must change their mode of life. It will take a year's intensive study to find out how to do it, but it would be a most creditable achievement for those Jews who have benefited by liberty in this country.

Mr. Morgenthau stated that he had made a definite proposition to the Polish Government for financing Polish industries by means of a $150,000,000 fund, one-third of which was to be subscribed by Poles, one-third by Americans, and one-third by England, Spain, and other countries.

PROTEST OF SOCIALISTS

The following appeal, entitled "Down with the War!" was issued by the Supreme Council of the Polish Social Democratic Party. The Polish Socialists have about sixty Deputies in the National Assembly.

The bloody war continues to rage; the number of dead and wounded is growing. Today, as the Polish troops continue to advance toward the east, as they are occupying non-Polish countries, as they have driven ahead to the Dvina and the Dnieper, the entire working class of Poland must raise its voice in protest and demand the ending of the bloody war.

The bourgeoisie and its hirelings are agitating for the continuance of the war. For the Polish propertied classes it is a question of ruling as much territory as possible in the east in order to reconquer their lost estates, in order to take the land from the farmers and to create new privileges for themselves. At present the war in the east is a struggle to strengthen the reaction in Poland, to delay the great social reforms, to defeat the working people.

Our country needs rest. Hundreds of thousands of young men are being made unfamiliar with productive work through plying the trade of war. A whole park of railroad rolling stock, urgently needed for the bringing in of foodstuffs, is held at the disposition of the military. Thousands of factories are waiting for work. The Winter is approaching. Death through starvation menaces the Polish working class families. A catastrophe seems inevitable. Nevertheless, the bourgeoisie is playing a wicked, wanton game.

The justified demands of the workers are refused; outlawry prevails in the country villages; frauds, usury, extortion, and speculation are becoming widespread. So long as two-thirds of the State's income are used for the war, unemployment, hunger and misery must prevail among the people. But the working people do not intend to be the servants of imperialism any longer. They understand that Poland is to be made the gendarme of Europe, and against this the proletariat will revolt with all its power. The proletariat of all countries will rise against international imperialism.

Away with the war!

Long live the international solidarity of the proletariat!

Reconstruction Days in Germany

Pan German Tendencies

CONTINUED sessions at Berlin of the war-guilt investigating committee of the National Assembly furnished some scenes of international interest. Mainly the investigation revolved around unrestricted U-boat warfare and President Wilson's peace efforts. On Nov. 15 the former Vice Chancellor, Dr. Karl Helfferich, was fined 300 marks for refusing to answer a question put by Independent Socialist Deputy Cohen. He protested he could not recognize Deputy Cohen from patriotic motives, since he charged the Deputy with having accepted funds from the Russian Bolshevik Ambassador Joffe to produce a general internal collapse. After considerable recrimination, in which Deputy Cohen denounced Dr. Helfferich as being not a witness but an accused person, the meeting was adjourned to find some means of forcing Dr. Helfferich to answer Cohen, or persuading Cohen to desist in his cross-examination of the refractory witness. On the following day it was remarked that an almost amusing politeness toned the attitude of those heckling the former Vice Chancellor.

The session of Nov. 18 was made notable by the appearance of Field Marshal von Hindenburg and General Ludendorff before the committee. They drove to the Reichstag building through a bitterly cold Winter scene, which chilled the spirits of the Reactionaries and Spartacans who had threatened demonstrations. A number of Reactionaries, however, had gained entrance to the building. They welcomed the two military leaders with shouts of "Down with the republic!" and cheers for the Kaiser and Hindenburg.

In the chamber Hindenburg's strong, almost square features were observed to be very pale, and he looked physically weaker, though more voluminous, in his black frock coat than in uniform. Ludendorff, on the contrary, appeared sharper and leaner than when he was the war lord's right hand. In response to the eight questions which he had previously consented to answer, Marshal Hindenburg said: "I know with absolute certainty that neither the people, the Kaiser nor the Government desired war, for the Government knew better than others Germany's tremendously difficult position in a war against the Entente." He added that Germany's defensive strength was as unfavorable as possible from the start, "but if there had been solid, united co-operation between army and homeland we could have attained victory. It was not the German Army nor its leaders," he declared, "but the German political leaders, aided by the Socialists, who lost the war. But," he added, on noticing Bethmann Hollweg's agitation, "the Government meant very well and were all honorable men." On his demand for the floor he vigorously asserted, "I and my faithful co-worker wanted peace, but an honorable peace. I resist emphatically charges to the contrary."

The testimony of General Ludendorff followed. One gathered from him that he thought William II. not only the all highest, but the all wisest, and that whatever the Kaiser did was for the benefit of the whole world, which, unfortunately, could not accept it. When some of his opinions were ruled out General Ludendorff grew excited. He denounced it as an infamous lie that he really directed German policy during the war. In a vigorous attack on Count von Bernstorff he charged the former Ambassador to the United States with falsely appraising and inadequately reporting the American situation at Wilhelmstrasse. "Bernstorff and I," he cried, "are two persons of wholly different temperaments. He is quite right if he assumes that I took an unsympathetic view of his work at Washington." When Hindenburg and Ludendorff refused to give further testimony on that day, the session was suddenly adjourned indefinitely.

Hindenburg's return to Hanover after giving evidence before the Investigation Committee was reported to have been a triumphal journey. At Brunswick he was greeted by great cheering and singing crowds. When he arrived at Hanover he was welcomed by a tremendous demonstration and the usual singing of "Deutschland über Alles." Later, he addressed a deputation from the door of his residence. The Field Marshal said that his trip to Berlin had been inspiring, for he had discovered with great pleasure that the national spirit was rising again.

On the evening of Nov. 23 General Ludendorff attended a memorial service at Potsdam Garrison Church, to which soldiers garrisoned at Potsdam marched or were brought in automobiles. He sat in the ex-Kaiser's pew, and spoke on "Militarism as a School for Moral Qualification of Successful Men." When he got through speaking a soldier in uniform rose and shouted: "When the time comes, General, we will follow you again!" Thereupon the whole congregation stood and sang "Deutschland über Alles." As Ludendorff left the church there were loud cheers for him and the ex-Kaiser. The episode was regarded as placing Ludendorff definitely among the Pan-German leaders.

A Berlin correspondent of The New York Times wrote on Nov. 14 that he found among all classes in Germany a kind of sympathetic pity for the ex-Emperor, which was frequently expressed in the term, "Der arme Kaiser!"—"The poor Kaiser!" While this did not seem to imply any wish for his return as Emperor or King, for in that respect he was regarded as erledigt—done with, disposed of once for all—but if he was to blame for the war, it was argued, others were equally guilty, and it was hoped he would not be brought to trial. Moreover, there was no doubt that large sections of the population regretted the days of the Hohenzollern splendor, contrasting them with the sad state into which Germany had fallen. So "Der arme Kaiser!" came with a sigh from many lips. This retrospective interest was further noticed by the correspondent in the display of picture-postcards of Wilhelm and his family in a shop in Friedrichstrasse. One of them represented the Kaiser with his two elder sons looking out of a frame of oak leaves. Beneath crossed swords and other martial emblems ran the lines:

Burschen heraus!
Lasset es schallen von Haus zu Haus,
Wenn es gilt für's Vaterland
Treu die Klingen dann zur Hand
Und heraus mit mut'gem Sang,
Wär' es auch zum letzten Gang,
Burschen heraus!

TRANSLATION.

Out Boys!
From house to house re-echo the noise;
When the Fatherland's at stake,
Faithful your blades in hand you take;
Out—let your cheery song resound,
Were it e'en for the final round—
Out Boys!

The correspondent added: "Both Kaiser and Crown Prince were 'out,' indeed, in a sense very different from that intended by the writer of the verse. But would they remain out for good and all?"

Berlin, on Dec. 3, extended a popular ovation to Field Marshal von Mackensen on his return from captivity. The Noske Guard and troops of all arms waited at the station, together with several prominent Generals, including von Falkenhayn, Mackensen's partner in the Rumanian campaign.

The same date was also marked by the presentation of a vast tax measure to the National Assembly by Mathias Erzberger, Minister of Finance. At the outset the Minister uttered a warning "that the man who was still wrapped up in pre-war individualism would not find the tax assessments to his liking." Herr Erzberger added that "pre-war individualism resulted in a badly distorted conception of property, overemphasized its privileges, never or rarely took into account its duties and limitations." The following scale indicated the Minister's proposed high levy on large incomes:

The first thousand marks of income are not assessed in the scale named in the income tax schedule. After that amount incomes will be taxed 10 per cent. For the second thousand 1 per cent., that being the graded increase for every thousand up to 15,000 marks. Incomes in excess of 500,000 marks must pay 60 per cent. The man who had a pre-war income of 100,000 marks is expected now to turn over half that amount to the State. Local taxes are likely to consume an additional 20,000.

Though the German mark fell to the unprecedented value of only 2 cents in American money, German industries were reported as again expanding at remarkable speed. Herr Schmidt, Minister of Food and Economics, speaking in Berlin on Dec. 7, cited statistics to show that production in the mines, shipyards and general industries had reached a level approaching the pre-war basis. The only exceptions were those lacking raw materials. The so-called German Dye Trust increased its capital to 1,000,000,000 marks with a view to making a vigorous campaign for supremacy in the world markets.

The trial of Lieutenant Marloh for the shooting of thirty-two members of the Marine Division last March, ending in his acquittal, attained wide notoriety. The execution had been ordered on the ground of discipline. According to a Berlin dispatch of Dec. 10, Lieutenant Marloh had been coerced into signing three successive reports regarding the matter, each stronger than the other, at the time of the acquittal of Captain von Kessel, the right-hand man of Colonel Reinhardt; at the same time he had himself admitted complete responsibility for the tragedy "for the sake of military honor." After signing the third report, which Lieutenant Marloh now declared to be nonsense and untrue, he accepted 5,000 marks from von Kessel and agreed to disappear for a time. The military conspirators hoped by these manoeuvres to head off the trial. When, however, it became a certainty, they even contemplated stealing the papers in the case if Lieutenant Marloh could not be induced to disappear again. While the newspapers unanimously agreed that all the parties involved had some excuse for their actions in the incredible confusion of the period, they likewise agreed that the case must not be allowed to rest with Marloh's acquittal, but the real culprits must be brought to trial.

Failure of Germany's Baltic Raid

Troops Driven Home by Letts

COMPLETE collapse and defeat of the German forces in the Baltic States marked the closing weeks of November. Before telling the story of the month's events it may be well to explain the whole obscure situation. A Reval correspondent of The London Morning Post, writing under date of Nov. 5, illuminated the subject in an article which may be summarized as follows:

There are three former Russian provinces that desire independence—Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia-Courland. All three until less than a year ago were completely dominated by the so-called Baltic Barons, who owned the greater portion of all the land in Estonia and Latvia-Courland, and a high percentage of it in Lithuania. These Barons were of absolute Germanic blood. After the Russian collapse their sons in great numbers went into the German Army. Their treatment of their peasants was after the order of the sixteenth century. Every one of them was an anachronism as a landed proprietor. Politically their importance lay in being the liaison between Berlin and what was St. Petersburg, promoting German influence in Russian affairs, to a large extent shaping Russian policy and consistently upholding reactionary and imperialistic principles. Such were the Baltic Barons until the Russian collapse—Russian citizens aiding every devious German design —and then, less than a year ago, the peasants of these Barons rose up, seized the land, and evicted the former owners, who in most instances fled to Berlin.

Much of the unsettled condition in the Baltic States is due to the efforts of the Barons to recover their lost possessions. Under the leadership of a former Russian officer named Bermondts they created a rather formidable army, numbering about 50,000 men. Nominally, the purpose of this army was to capture Petrograd from the Bolsheviks. Actually, the scheme—very thinly disguised—is to subjugate the Baltic States and restore the Barons in their land ownership. This army, in conjunction with von der Goltz's army, set out to capture Riga, Bermondts alleging that he desired a base from which to conduct operations against Petrograd. Though von der Goltz was nominally superseded by one of his lieutenants, General Eberhardt, the purpose of both forces remained unchanged.

Bermondts had served with distinction as a Russian officer through the Russo-Japanese war. In the beginning of the world war he was in the Russian Army. When the Bolshevik revolution came in 1917 he was arrested and imprisoned by the Bolsheviks in Kiev. Through German influences he was released and went to Berlin, where, as a professional soldier, he was hired by the Baltic Barons. His army consists partly of mercenaries recruited in Germany, partly of Russians who had been prisoners of war, partly of deluded Russian patriots and loyalists and partly of Russians who had been in Poland and were sent by the Poles to join Yudenitch, but were intercepted by Bermondts and impressed into his army.

There were two currents in the Bermondts army. One group of officers and men honestly believed that they were eventually to march on Petrograd and relieve the city from Bolshevik control; these are the loyal Russians. The other group are the pure Germans, whose interest is in maintaining German domination in the Baltic States—that is, in so far as mercenaries may be said to have a patriotic interest of any kind.

GERMANY'S OBJECT

Von der Goltz's troops were in part professional soldiers out of jobs; in part discouraged Germans seeking land settlements, in part adventurers on the watch for any haphazard turn of fortune. At first he invaded Lithuania. The Peace Conference told him to get out. The way he did it was to go down into the Suwalki pocket, where he began to harass the Poles. He was ordered from Suwalki and marched toward Riga. Until allied pressure on Berlin forced him to give way to a successor he continued to keep things stirred up, for unsettlement in the Baltic States is a part of German policy.

By keeping the provinces in disorder Germany finds little difficulty in maintaining a comparatively free corridor through to Russia. This corridor, which passes up through Lithuania, she has been using for months, sending through emigrants to form "spheres of influence," and even engineers, to the number of at least 300, to begin industrial reconstruction in Russia. Also, she has succeeded through a most elaborate system of agents in creating in Lithuania an anti-Polish feeling sufficiently strong to make any Polish-Lithuanian union or federation very unlikely. Thus the German desire to keep open a passage to Russia and the desire of the evicted Barons to recover their land are operating to perpetuate turmoil in the Baltic States.

Evacuation of the German Baltic troops, formerly under command of General von der Goltz, was well on its way under General von Eberhardt by the middle of November. Meanwhile, the brilliant military campaign led by the Lettish commander, Colonel Ballod, as a result of which the German-Russian forces under Colonel Avalov-Bermondts were first thrown out of Riga, then driven back to their base at Mitau, and finally taken over by the successor of General von der Goltz, the German General, Eberhardt, to be sent back to Germany, was made the occasion of joyous celebrations in Riga on Nov. 18, the anniversary of the independence of Latvia, which, by an odd coincidence, fell virtually at the date of the Lettish victories. This Baltic city, as imposing as Stockholm or Copenhagen, with its parks, its public buildings and private houses, whose population, since the war began, fell from 750,000 to 200,000, was wild with joy beneath its fluttering flags over its liberation from the German menace, against which it had virtually been fighting for over four years.

The approach to Mitau on Nov. 21 was lit up by the blaze of farms fired by the fleeing enemy, which threw a red glare over the snow. In the immediate foreground the ancient castle of Mitau flared like the funeral pyre of German ambitions in the Baltic. The broad white causeway, barred with the shadows of high trees, was trodden hard and slippery by the advancing Lettish infantry, whose weeks of bitter fighting against heavy odds had been crowned by this remarkable success. The German-Russians gave up Mitau without resistance, although the Lettish casualties had been heavy in the flanking operations, which had forced the evacuation early in the morning of the following day. Some were able to escape by rail; the remainder marched along the road leading directly south toward Shavli.

Before their departure the Germans looted and burned. In the main street of Mitau there was not a single shop that was not smashed or robbed. Despite the bitter provocation, the Lettish troops behaved well, and their entry into the city was unaccompanied by reprisals. Colonel Tallents, commanding the British political mission to the Baltic, who was the first allied representative to enter the town, found the Lettish officers keeping excellent order. The inhabitants told the Lett commanders that they had been living through a reign of terror. The Bermondts forces had looted indiscriminately, and when a pretense of payment was offered, it was in worthless paper money which the Germans had printed in Berlin, and whose acceptance they compelled.

EBERHARDT ASKS ARMISTICE

In a reply formulated at this time to a request for an armistice from General von Eberhardt at Shavli—Avalov-Bermondts meanwhile had disappeared—the Letts asked pointedly whether Eberhardt called himself the German or "West Russian" commander, and whether the German Government admitted responsibility for his actions. Regarding this point it was announced from Berlin on Nov. 23 that Minister of Defense Noske had refused a request by General von Eberhardt for help in equipment and money, and had also declined to give military assistance to liberate the railroad, which the Letts had cut. Meanwhile the German rout continued, with the Letts driving on. From Lithuania came news that the German commander and his staff, numbering sixty-five, had left Kovno for their own frontier. Thus the German-Baltic imbroglio was being largely solved by the courage and tenacity of the fighting Letts.

A painful impression, however, was caused on the Letts by the receipt of a wireless from the newly arrived Inter-allied Commission, presided over by General Niessel, instructing the Lettish Army to cease pursuit of the fleeing Germans, and implying that the Lett soldiery were committing excesses against that portion of the Balt population representing Lettish citizens of German stock. These charges were indignantly denied by the Lettish Commander in Chief, Colonel Ballod, who declared that no executions had occurred without formal trial, and only in the case of espionage. The Lett entrance into Mitau, he said, had been effected only under strict orders to prevent pillage and killing. Regarding the charge that the Letts made no prisoners, Colonel Ballod cited numerous cases of atrocious actions committed by the Germans, which, he asserted, were enough to justify any soldiers in refusing to give quarter. One of these cases, which was authenticated by official reports and photographs, was that of the commander of the 2d Company of the 8th Regiment, Lieutenant Fichtenberg, who fell into the Germans' hands. What the Germans did to him was described by the Lettish commander as follows:

They tore out his eyes and cut off his tongue. Then they wrapped his body in barbed wire and lowered him by a rope over the Dvina bank into a hole which they had cut in the ice. He was immersed for a time and then drawn out, lest death come too quickly, and let fall again, for there were three separate thicknesses of ice on the body when it was found. Can you imagine what would be the feelings of troops who had seen their dead like that?

The American Children's Relief Commissioner, Captain Orbison, on Nov. 24 confirmed this ghastly story in all its details to the correspondent, Walter Duranty, to whom he showed a photograph of the mutilated body of the Lettish officer. Captain Orbison, on the basis of this and many other cases of German atrocities of which he had personal knowledge, expressed surprise at the moderation and self-control which the Lettish troops had shown.

Though the Letts, in obedience to the order of the Interallied Commission, ceased to pursue the German Russians beyond the frontier, the Lithuanians, acting on their own responsibility, advanced westward, and occupied the town of Radziwiliski, with the object of cutting off the German retreat. This action drew from General Niessel specific instructions to the Lithuanians to withdraw and permit the Germans to gain their own frontier, which they seemed only too anxious to do. To this the Lithuanians agreed, but only reluctantly, and it was clear that both Letts and Lithuanians were ready at a moment's notice to take up arms again if the Germans made any further aggression, or delayed their evacuation of Lithuania and Latvia unduly.

AN INGLORIOUS RETURN

Unequipped hospital trains continued to roll with loads of wounded toward the German frontier. Six hundred, who had arrived by Nov. 25 at Königsberg, complained bitterly of the way in which they had been treated by those responsible for the mad Baltic adventure, which had broken down so disastrously. These returning German troops were then a menace only to the villages and towns through which they passed, starving, cold and angry, in their disorderly retreat. They left behind them hundreds of German dead.

Meanwhile, on Nov. 29, it was announced from Berlin that armistice negotiations with the Letts had been begun and were progressing at Yanishki. It had been agreed through the medium of the Interallied Commission that the Germans should withdraw all their troops from Lettland by Dec. 13. On the following day it was further announced that an armistice stipulating the immediate evacuation of Lithuania by the Germans had been signed by Germany and Lithuania through the same commission. At this time the Germans were holding a line in Lithuania a few miles south of the Lettish frontier, where, it was said, they were receiving arms and munitions from Germany. The Letts had taken measures to attack them, and the Lett Foreign Minister at Dorpat said that the Letts, despite their consent to suspend military operations temporarily, would not wait long for the Germans to make their exodus.

News of grave import was received in Riga on Dec. 9, to the effect that five trainloads of troops of the German "Iron Division," who had already arrived at Tilsit on their way to the interior of Germany, had suddenly refused to proceed further in accordance with the Interallied Commission's orders, and that four trainloads had gone back to a point northwest of Memel, where they again threatened Courland. The authorities of the German Army Headquarters at Königsberg said defiantly that this had been done at their orders, and assumed all responsibility for the soldiers' action.

Soldiers of the Iron Division to the number of 15,000 were reported on Dec. 13 to be concentrated at Memel in a position to menace Courland. Further east the evacuation was proceeding regularly, but the Memel force seemed to have got out of hand and was defying the Allies. The true inwardness of the situation was explained as follows by General A. N. Dobrjansky, who had commanded a portion of Yudenitch's forces in Northwest Russia, and who arrived in the United States on Dec. 10:

The northwestern command has established with absolute clearness, by documents, the fact that the Germans are trying to found in Courland a nucleus of armed German forces with which not only Russia but the Allies must settle accounts in the future. Since the hour when they signed the armistice the Germans have been working with feverish haste and in the organized, accurate and well-thought-out manner peculiar to them, to set up a counterpoise to the conditions of the armistice. They have chosen Courland as territory bordering on Germany and yet beyond its frontiers for assembling their army, organizing their material and supply departments, arsenals, and even commissary stations. On this enterprise they have been expending the last remnants of their cash.

The whole enterprise had for its purpose two objects—to save a part of the war supplies needed for their plans from being handed over to the Allies under the armistice, and to camouflage this pecular mobilization under the alleged need to fight Bolshevism, which was supposed to be threatening East Prussia.

The spirit of those German soldiers who returned to Germany was shown on Dec. 5, when the repatriated Baltic troops entered the Doeberitz Camp carrying old imperial flags and singing monarchical and patriotic songs. They brought with them a number of Russian women. The soldiers insulted and fought with the members of the public security groups and the police, and later appeared armed with hand grenades. They retired, however, on finding themselves outnumbered.

BERLIN'S ULTIMATUM

The German Government's final ultimatum to the defiant members of the Iron Division and other Baltic German formations was made public in Berlin on Nov. 1, as follows:

The National Government has been obliged to threaten to use most drastic measures against the troops still remaining in the Baltic region and to this very day refusing to evacuate that foreign land. Every soldier who shall not have crossed the German border on Nov. 11, at the latest, will be declared a deserter and no longer a German citizen.

The National Government knows that the most despicable methods have been used to mislead the troops in the Baltic region and to prevent their return, as well as to lure recruits to their ranks. They have been told that although the National Government, under the pressure of the Entente's demands, must appear to be using all methods to effect the evacuation of Latvia and Lithuania, it is in reality in full accord with the policy pursued by the Iron Division and the other groups.

This is a lie. The National Government has only one policy in the Eastern question, and it demands the return of the troops from the Baltic territory. It regards all else as a policy of criminal adventure which has already involved the entire German people in a most serious and dangerous situation, and, furthermore, is on the point of bringing down upon us endless difficulties and dangers in the future. Therefore the Government has resorted to the most inexecutable means in order to bring the misled and deceived men to their senses in the last moment, and it declares all who shall not have returned to German soil no later than Nov. 11 to be deserters and subject to the loss of their German citizenship by the shortest process.

That means that every man who refuses to return will lose all his claims to maintenance in Germany. He will receive no military allowances of any kind, no invalid or old age pensions, and in case he is wounded or falls ill he will have no claim for support. If he ever wishes to return to Germany he will be regarded as a foreigner and will also be punished for desertion. While abroad he is at the mercy of the regulations of foreign governments, without having any government to intercede for him. Neither are his present or future wife and children Germans any longer, and they, too, lose all right to any kind of support by Germany.

Once more the National Government presents all this for the most serious consideration of those who are in the Baltic country, or who wish to go there, without heeding the gloomy prospects for themselves and for the Fatherland bound to be created by their conduct. The time is nearer than they think when, in the severe Northern Winter, they will be exposed, helpless, without supply trains, without munitions and without medical supplies, to the rage of the embittered troops of those countries. For the last time, before the worst comes: Leave the Baltic region! Back to your homes!

In the closing weeks of the year the Baltic-German intrigue showed signs of undiminished vitality. Colonel Avalov-Bermond, the Russian leader who had attacked Riga with German support, arrived in Berlin on Dec. 17 and was welcomed by Minister of Defense Noske. The Freiheit declared: "The robber chief bears himself like a representative of a friendly power who may continue his adventure on German soil."

Russia's War With Bolshevism

EVENTS in Russia during November and the first half of December showed an unmistakable gain by the Bolsheviki in their death struggle with the anti-Bolshevist forces on the west and east, and considerable progress in the south against the armies of Denikin. The Yudenitch army was driven to the borders of Esthonia; several divisions, forced to cross the border, were disarmed by the Esthonian authorities, while others, under Esthonian direction, held off fierce Bolshevist onslaughts below Narva.

On the Siberian front, Omsk was taken, and the Bolsheviki drove on toward the east, taking large numbers of prisoners from Kolchak's troops and enormous booty. The Kolchak Government was transferred to Irkutsk, and a new Coalition Government was formed.

In the south, desperate fighting continued, in which the forces of Denikin were driven back, especially in the centre, on a front of fifty miles. Later Poltava, Kharkov, and Kiev were captured by the Bolsheviki, Denikin's armies retreating on a wide front.

Despite these victories the Bolshevist authorities insisted that their previous offers to make peace still held good; and Maxim Litvinov, the Soviet Envoy to the Dorpat Baltic Conference and to a conference with British representatives at Copenhagen, was said to have been intrusted with power to open peace negotiations, though his ostensible mission was merely the exchange of prisoners. A peace conference with new Bolshevist envoys ended in a deadlock.

Appearing before the Lusk Investigating Committee in New York, Ludwig A. C. Martens, Soviet "Ambassador" to the United States, admitted that he had received from Soviet Russia since March the sum of $90,000 for purposes which he denied were revolutionary or anarchistic. He later refused to answer questions or produce his official documents, thereby laying himself open to prosecution for contempt.

In North Russia during November and December there was little or no change in the military situation, due to the coming on of Winter, which brought a gradual cessation of hostilities. Up to Nov. 27 the anti-Bolshevist Russian forces had cleared the Pinega River front, forcing the Bolsheviki to fall back on the Dvina, and relieving the enemy pressure on Archangel.

THE PETROGRAD FRONT

The position of the Yudenitch army on the Petrograd front on Nov. 19 was serious. Threatened with envelopment by the advancing Red forces, and crowded together in a small space near Yamburg, the White Army which had approached Petrograd's very doors was faced with capture or internment in Esthonian territory. In answer to an inquiry by General Yudenitch as to what Esthonia would do if he were obliged to cross the Esthonian frontier, the Esthonian authorities sent word that he might bring his hospitals and supplies, but that his soldiers must disarm if they entered Esthonian territory.

A report submitted on Nov. 24 by Colonel Rink, Chief of the General Staff of the Esthonian Army, after a personal visit to the Narva front, stated that the army of General Yudenitch was in a bad state of demoralization after its retreat from Petrograd, and that the General and his staff had lost all connection with it. Part of the army, with 10,000 refugees, had crossed the frontier and settled south of Narva. Some of the soldiers had already been disarmed. Four of the divisions which retreated from Yamburg to Narva had been organized under General Toennison. These forces

The military disaster, it was stated, had been due to the incompetence of the General in command, who had neglected to maintain a reserve in his hasty advance on Petrograd and had made no adequate provision for the transportation of food supplies. The soldiers, half starved, were so weakened that they could offer no resistance to the advancing enemy. Owing to the scarcity of bread the soldiers had been obliged to mix flour with snow. Many refugee children had died of hunger and cold. The Esthonian Government was making all efforts to alleviate distress.

Meanwhile some 15,000 Red troops continued their attacks on the constricted front, which followed the Esthonian boundary some twenty miles northward from Peipus Lake, running eastward and curving around Narva and extending northwest to the sea. These attacks, however, had been repulsed. Efficiency had been restored to those sections of the Russian troops which had come under Esthonian command, while the sections that had crossed over into Esthonia were being reorganized. Bolshevik attacks from Dec. 1 to 3 had been repulsed with heavy losses. In Reval, meanwhile, some 600 soldiers of the former victorious army lay grievously wounded or seriously ill with typhus in a cold emergency shelter destitute of blankets and food.

Despite his crushing defeat, General Yudenitch said to an Associated Press correspondent on Dec. 8:

I have not given up my intention to capture Petrograd. Despite reports to the contrary, the bulk of my army is still intact on Russian soil. Only a fifth part of it has been disarmed by the Esthonians.

M. Lianozov, head of the Northwestern Government, declared on Dec. 11 that a new offensive against Petrograd was already being planned.

REDS ATTACK ESTHONIANS

Bolshevik attacks on the Esthonians in the direction of Narva were continuing in force toward the end of November, with the alleged object of reinforcing drastic demands at the Dorpat

Conference. New Bolshevik regiments were being sent against the Esthonians, whose morale continued good, although these heavy attacks were combined with energetic peace agitation. The Bolshevik offensive went on through the early part of December. On Dec. 10 the Red Army began a new drive, accompanied by terrific artillery fire. No fewer than ten attacks on the strongly fortified Esthonian lines were repulsed with heavy losses to the attackers. The Esthonians were holding their positions strongly, and many of the assailants, who advanced in massed formation, were mowed down before the barbed wire defenses.

With fifteen Bolshevik divisions, as against three of Esthonia, to contend with, however, the Esthonians foresaw disaster, and appealed to Finland for military aid, pointing out that if the Esthonian barrier failed, the Bolsheviks might sweep the Baltic region. Finland replied that she could take no action without consulting the allied Governments.

LITVINOV'S MISSION

Maxim Litvinov, former Soviet Ambassador to England, arrived at Dorpat to attend the conference of Baltic States convened officially for the discussion of the exchange of prisoners, and unofficially, as it was believed, for the bringing about of peace with the Soviet Republic, on Nov. 16. As the Soviet envoy, followed by three other Bolshevik delegates, passed through the silent crowd in the hall of the Dorpat Station, some men near the door uttered a single word: "Brest-Litovsk!" Litvinov must have heard it, though he gave no sign. Since that peace, which had apparently delivered Russia into German servitude, the situation had greatly changed, for it was an open secret that Litvinov was on his way to negotiate a peace that would recognize his Government's independence and the Soviet régime as the de facto Government of the former Russian Empire.

Litvinov himself visited Dorpat only in passing on his way to Copenhagen, to take up with duly accredited British representatives an announced program of discussion concerned with an exchange of prisoners. When the projected meeting was featured purely as a peace conference, only Esthonia and Latvia had agreed to take an active part, with Lithuania in attendance somewhat vaguely as an onlooker; but when the official program was given out as a discussion of exchange of prisoners, Poland, the Ukraine, and Lithuania also sent accredited representatives. The underlying intention was understood, however, to be a tentative discussion of the possibilities of an armistice and eventual peace. It was announced on Nov. 19 that the terms on which prisoners and hostages would be exchanged with the Soviet Government had been agreed upon.

LITVINOV'S ATTITUDE

After his arrival at Dorpat, Litvinov boasted that the Bolsheviki had smashed General Yudenitch's army and would do the same to General Denikin's forces. Toward the representatives of the Baltic States, who had been led to believe that the Bolsheviki were as eager as they to make peace, Litvinov assumed at the outset such a cold and threatening manner that the Baltic delegates were disconcerted. It was said that when Litvinov entered the conference he expressed surprise at finding representatives of Latvia and Lithuania, as well as of Esthonia. The Polish representatives left the conference immediately on Litvinov's arrival. The Bolshevist envoy showed impatience when told that the Baltic delegates were prepared officially to discuss only the exchange of prisoners, remarking that he did not wish to lose time on unimportant details which could be included in a peace treaty. He flatly refused to consider the establishment of a neutral zone, and was not inclined to treat the question of an armistice apart from peace. After a few days' stay in Dorpat, Litvinov proceeded to Copenhagen to conduct, with British representatives, similar discussions of an exchange of prisoners.

THE COPENHAGEN CONFERENCE

Some ten days before Litvinov's arrival in Copenhagen, Cecil Harmsworth had stated in the British Parliament that the Danish Government had agreed that a meeting should take place between representatives of the British and Soviet Governments, "providing that they are previously informed of the personnel of the delegations, which should be small, and that the right of the delegations to remain in Denmark shall automatically cease as soon as either party breaks off negotiations."

One of the first moves made by Litvinov in his conversations with James O'Grady, the British representative, and his assistants, R. Nathan and L. G. M. Gall, which occurred on Nov. 25, was to propose that the Allies lift their blockade on Soviet Russia. The Bolshevik attitude was most conciliatory. Among other things Litvinov offered to telegraph Moscow, Petrograd, and other Bolshevik cities to obtain full reports as to the condition of British subjects held prisoner, estimated at 117 in all. The Soviet Government, he said, was prepared to liberate British prisoners if its own nationals abroad were allowed free communication with Soviet Russia. Though Great Britain was deeply interested in the trend of affairs at Copenhagen, it was affirmed officially that Mr. O'Grady had been definitely instructed to enter into no negotiations beyond those relating to prisoners.

Litvinov's desire to extend the scope of the discussions beyond this subject, however, was made clear on Dec. 10. After he had failed in his efforts to get the British envoys to discuss peace terms he addressed to the allied representatives a copy of a resolution adopted on Dec. 5 by the Seventh Congress of Soviets at Moscow, authorizing peace negotiations with the Allies. This document, however, was returned to him by the allied representatives as constituting a breach of good faith with Denmark, which had not authorized the holding of peace negotiations within her domains. The result of the discussions on the exchange of prisoners had not been officially concluded at the time these pages went to press. Litvinov admitted that he had been approached by Denmark, Sweden, and other neutral countries in regard to a similar exchange, but that everything depended on Britain's action.

THE DORPAT CONFERENCE

The Esthonian Government, still persisting in its desire of peace with the Bolsheviks, announced on Nov. 29 that new negotiations would be begun with the Soviet Government at Dorpat early in December. On Dec. 5, after the arrival of the Bolshevik delegation, headed by M. Krassin, the Bolshevik Minister of Trade and Commerce, M. Poska, the Esthonian Foreign Minister, explained the attitude of his country toward Soviet Russia as follows:

Esthonia has never been aggressive toward Russia, but fought only to defend her independence. I believe the other new States were in the same situation. Esthonia considers it necessary that Soviet Russia should make analogous proposals to them. The other States, however, have only partially accepted the Soviet proposal. All the delegations have not yet arrived. The Esthonian delegation hopes, nevertheless, that these pourparlers will be concluded successfully.

M. Krassin commented as follows:

Some time ago Soviet Russia proposed that Esthonia enter into peace negotiations, resulting in the Pskov Conference, which was so suddenly interrupted. Soviet Russia states once more that she is ready to conclude a peace and to make important concessions. We desire peace on the basis of self-determination and mutual non-interference with each other's affairs.

BOLSHEVIST PEACE TERMS

The Esthonian and Bolshevik envoys exchanged their peace conditions on Dec. 6, before the arrival of either the Latvian or Lithuanian envoys. The Bolshevik conditions were given out officially the following day; they were based on the following thirteen points:

First—Mutual recognition of independence.

Second—Suspension of the state of war.

Third—Suspension of hostilities and determination of the time for withdrawal of the troops.

Fourth—Declaration by the Esthonian Government of the nonexistence of alliances between the States warring with the Soviet.

Fifth—Similar declarations with reference to other forces opposed to the Soviet Government.

Sixth—The internment and disarmament of General Yudenitch (commander of the Russian Northwest Army) and the impounding of his war stores under seal.

Seventh—Amnesty for all citizens condemned for support of the Soviet Government or taking part in the third Internationale.

Eighth—Provisions for a commercial treaty.

Ninth—Resumption of diplomatic relations.

Tenth—Resumption of postal and telegraphic relations.

Eleventh—Joining up of railways.

Twelfth—Transit over the Esthonian railways of goods from Esthonian ports bound for Russia.

Thirteenth—The establishment of dockage facilities for Soviet Russian-bound goods.

Other Bolshevik demands that developed were the occupation by Soviet troops of that part of Esthonia northward from Lake Peipus, taking in the Narva front and all the territory held by the remnants of the Yudenitch Army; this, with Clauses 6, 12, and 13 of the conditions above listed, proved to be the rock on which the negotiating parties split, after an agreement had been reached on most of the other points, including the relief of Esthonia from participation in obligations of the former Imperial Government incurred subsequently to Nov. 17, 1917, her responsibility for prior obligations having been made a condition of recognition by France.

A DEADLOCK ESTABLISHED

To the frontier stipulations of the Bolshevik delegations the Esthonians opposed counterpropositions. M. Krassin then announced that he must consult his Government before making final answer, and soon afterward left for Soviet Russia by way of Pskov. Pending his return, the conference continued the discussion of other subjects. Both sides were pessimistic regarding a favorable outcome. The Bolshevik delegates at this time were demanding full publicity, and M. Krassin had threatened that if the Baltic delegates continued to hold him to silence, he would employ the Moscow wireless to flash news of the conference to the world.

Even more drastic demands were made by the Bolshevik delegates after the return of M. Krassin; they included the severance by the Esthonians of all relations with the Allies and Finland, insistence on the turning over of all transit and dock facilities, which would make Esthonia a mere Soviet dependency, and the forbidding of any troops remaining on Esthonian territory except the Esthonian National Army. They also demanded that no units of the Northwest Russian Army be allowed to enter the Esthonian Army, and that transportation of any armed forces through Esthonia be similarly prohibited. These peremptory demands were being reinforced by determined military attacks on the Esthonian front. It was at this juncture (Dec. 16) that Esthonia appealed to Finland for assistance.

THE SOUTHERN FRONT

Of all the anti-Bolshevist fronts, that of Denikin in the south was the one where the most desperate fighting occurred. The menace to Moscow brought by Denikin's ever-advancing armies had long been a source of apprehension in the Soviet capital. In the last six months the Bolsheviks had sent more than 350,000 men and thousands of guns to the south from the eastern front, Turkestan, and the interior. Fighting of a fierce and obstinate character was continuing on Nov. 12 southwest of Orel, on Denikin's centre, where the Reds were advancing, while southeast of Kursk Denikin's troops were well north of Liski, an important railway junction that had just been recaptured from the Reds. Between Orel and Kursk Bolshevik cavalry broke through Denikin's lines on a front of forty-seven miles. Fighting was practically continuous, and it was evident that the Bolsheviks were concentrating their biggest and best forces in their attempt to break Denikin's centre.

By Nov. 20 Winter had set in, and the troops were fighting in snowstorms, alternating with thaws, that reduced the roads to morasses. At this date it appeared probable that Denikin would be forced to retreat still further, because of the ever-increasing forces brought against his centre, though on Nov. 22 an important victory won by Denikin against a Bolshevik army of 50,000 men between Orel and Tambov was reported. At this time the Bolshevik forces on Denikin's left flank were about fifty miles south of Veronezh.

the Volunteer army between Kharkov and Kursk, and on the front of the Caucasus army on both sides of the Volga, there was an alternation of Bolshevik and anti-Bolshevist advantage, with the balance slightly in favor of the forces of Denikin up to Nov. 25. The Bolsheviks were driven back before Tsaritsin on Nov. 29, and Denikin was advancing in this region, as well as in the neighborhood of Kursk and Kiev about Dec. 4. Counterbalancing these claims, a Bolshevik official statement of Dec. 5 declared that the Red forces were making a general advance along the entire Denikin front, and had captured several towns in the Governments of Tchernigov, Poltava, and Kursk, northeast and east of Kiev.

This success continued. On Dec. 13 Poltava, seventy-five miles southwest of Kharkov, was taken, and on Dec. 12 Kharkov itself, one of the five most important cities of European Russia, also fell. On Dec. 16 the Bolsheviks claimed fresh and continuous successes: the staff of General Mamontov had been captured east of Kiev, many prisoners had been taken in various other sections, including Trans-Caspia and the Persian border, where Kazandzhik had been captured; the Soviet forces were closing in on Kiev itself, and had defeated Denikin's forces in the suburbs of that city; subsequently it was stated that Kiev itself had fallen again into the hands of the Reds. Denikin's armies, outnumbered and outfought, were retreating on a wide front.

DENIKIN'S ASSETS

In some respects, Denikin's general situation continued favorable. The number of volunteers far exceeded the capacity of the army to receive them. In the war with Petlura in the west, the peasant leader's forces had been beaten, his officers were coming over to Denikin, and 20,000 of his Galician soldiers had seceded and joined Denikin's army. General Tarnowsky of the Galician Ukrainian Army had been arrested by the Ukrainians for secret dealing with Denikin. The movement of the bandit leader Makhno, which at one time looked dangerous, had been reduced to a comparatively small area. A junction with the Polish Army occurred about Nov. 30.

THE EASTERN FRONT

Omsk, the former capital of the All-Russian Government, was occupied by the Bolsheviks on the morning of Nov. 15. The city was partially burned following the destruction of the ammunition supplies, which it was found impossible to remove from the town. On Nov. 18 the Siberian Army was occupying positions twenty-five versts east of Omsk. The retreat of the rear units of the Siberian Army was said to have been accomplished in great disorder, the troops throwing away their guns and commandeering locomotives, trains, and carts in which to escape. Some fifteen trains carrying officers and their families, besides scores of other trains, filled with refugees, ammunition, and merchandise, which were blocked by wreckage and lack of motive power, fell into the hands of the Bolsheviks, who followed up the Cossacks with cavalry. On Nov. 24 it was reported by Colonel G. H. Emerson, assistant to John F. Stevens, head of the American Railway Commission in Siberia, that 11 Generals, 1,000 other officers of the Kolchak Army, and 39,000 troops had been captured by the Bolsheviks at Omsk. Material seized included 2,000 machine guns, 30,000 uniforms with overcoats, 4,000,000 rounds of ammunition, 75 locomotives, and 5,000 loaded cars.

NEW GOVERNMENT FORMED

A proclamation calling upon all civilians in Siberia, especially the peasants, to join the army of the All-Russian Government to resist the Bolshevik advance was issued by Admiral Kolchak at this time. This proclamation declared the country to be in danger. Meanwhile social revolutionary elements at Irkutsk, where the Kolchak Ministers had arrived on Nov. 19, began serious opposition to the continuance of the Kolchak Government, and the Ministers telegraphed Admiral Kolchak that a new Coalition Cabinet must be formed at once. To this Admiral Kolchak, who at that time was at Novo Nikolaevsk supervising the retreat of his armies, gave his consent, and on Dec. 2 the newly constituted Ministry, under the head of Premier Pepilaev, announced its program, which included the following principles: Emancipation of the civil administration from political influence of all military leaders; decisive struggle against excesses and injustice, no matter by what faction or party they were committed; close relation between the Government and the people; close and friendly relations with the Czechoslovaks; radical measures against shortage of supplies for the army; reduction of the Ministerial staffs. The entire program, it was declared, was based on the principle of a decisive struggle against Bolshevism for the regeneration of Free Russia.

BOLSHEVIST VICTORIES CONTINUE

The Bolshevik victories on the Kolchak front continued uninterrupted. By Nov. 26 the Siberian troops had retreated to a point eighty-seven miles east of Omsk; by Dec. 11 the military situation was desperate; it was stated in Paris by the former Chairman of the Russo-American Chamber of Commerce on Dec. 15 that Kolchak was ready to cede a part of Siberia to Japan to save the rest of Russia from falling into the hands of the ever-advancing Bolsheviks. The latter, on Dec. 16, announced the capture of Novo Nikolaevsk, on the Trans-Siberian Railway, 390 miles east of Omsk, where Kolchak had made his temporary headquarters; the statement said that more than 5,000 prisoners, many guns and several Generals of the Kolchak Army had been taken by the Soviet troops, who had reached a point 1,200 miles from Irkutsk.

CZECHOSLOVAKS' HOSTILITY

A memorandum embodying the Czechoslovak views on the Siberian situation was delivered to the allied representatives in Vladivostok on Nov. 15. This memorandum read as follows:

The unbearable conditions cause us to ask the Allies to consider a means of safe conduct to the motherland, which return the Allies have approved. The Czechs were prepared to guard the railroad sector allotted to them and have conscientiously fulfilled the task, but now our presence along the Siberian railroad for the purpose of guarding it becomes impossible by virtue of its uselessness and also in consequence of the most primitive demands of justice and humanity.

By guarding and maintaining order, our army has been forced against its convictions to support a state of absolute despotism and unlawfulness which has had its beginning here under defense of the Czech arms.

The military authorities of the Government of Omsk are permitting criminal actions that will stagger the entire world. The burning of villages, the murder of masses of peaceful inhabitants and the shooting of hundreds of persons of democratic convictions and also those only suspected of political disloyalty occurs daily. The responsibility for this before the peoples of the world will fall on us, inasmuch as we, possessing sufficient strength, do not prevent this lawlessness.

Thus our passiveness appears as a direct consequence of the principles of neutrality and noninterference in Russian internal affairs, and we are becoming apparent participants in these crimes as a result of our observing absolute neutrality.

Later, on Dec. 16, it was announced by the Kolchak Government that the Czechoslovaks would remain in Siberia until Summer.

GAIDA REVOLT QUELLED

An even more serious revolt against Admiral Kolchak's authority was an uprising in Vladivostok led by General Gaida, the Czechoslovak commander, on Nov. 17, which ended disastrously: General Gaida himself was wounded and surrendered with about a dozen members of his staff the following day, and the Provisional Government organized by himself and his associates disappeared. General Gaida himself was not punished, but held pending his return to his native country. On Nov. 21 he stated that the movement led by him was one purely of the people. Its supporters, he said, were of the Russian democratic classes, and its leaders included members of the Czar's Duma, three member of the Kerensky Cabinet, and many young Russian officers. He denied that the movement had Bolshevik affiliations. During the fighting occasioned by this revolt the Japanese naval and military forces maintained strict neutrality. General Gaida's departure occurred on Nov. 29.

In November and December the Bolshevik activities were extended particularly in Turkestan and the Far East. German Orientalists were sent by Lenin to India, Persia, and other Far East countries, and the Bolsheviks were in uninterrupted communication with Afghanistan. In the course of an address to the Second All-Russian Congress of the Mussulman Communist organizations of Eastern people held in Moscow at the end of November, Lenin said:

Impudent attacks by enemies of the revolution have brought about a miracle. We have gained a full victory over Kolchak, which will be of historic importance for the peoples of the East. At the same time, attacks from the west are weakening. The Versailles Peace is the greatest blow the Entente could inflict upon itself. The peoples see clearly that President Wilson did not bring liberty to democracy.

A strong resolution urging the making of peace with the Entente was adopted by the Seventh Congress of Russian Soviets at Moscow on Dec. 6, at which both Lenin and Trotzky were present. The resolution passed by the Congress read:

The Soviet Government proposed peace to the Entente on Aug. 5, and has repeated the proposal eight times since. It affirms again its unalterable desire for peace. It offers to all the Entente powers—England, France, the United States, and Japan—together or separately, to begin negotiations. It directs the Executive and the Commissary of Foreign Affairs to continue systematically the policy of peace, taking all steps to attain success.

The First Bolshevik Republic

A WRITER in the Revue des Deux Mondes calls attention to the little-known fact that China furnished the first experiment in Bolshevism. It is known as the Republic of Chetuga, and was created about the middle of the nineteenth century in Manchuria by the Khunguses, whose successors, originally bandits, have now become the regular gendarmerie of Northern Manchuria in the service of Japan.

Gold having been discovered on the banks of the Chetuga, an affluent of the Amur River, the Chinese Government recruited vast numbers of miners to dig up this gold for the Chinese Emperor. Half-starved, almost naked, maltreated, many of these conscripted miners fled into the mountains, and established a communist republic, worked their own gold mines, and substituted work coupons for the use of money. All was held in common for the advantage of the workers alone, and all income was in strict ratio to the amount of work actually done.

The ever-increasing influx of Chinese bandits who had fled from the hell of the mines produced a robber class, who pillaged all except the Khunguses of the Chetuga Republic, and who formed a Government of their own along the same lines. As with the former, so here theft and other crimes against the community were punishable by death.

But the depredations of the robbers finally became so bold that the Chinese Government, long suffering and orientally inert, finally was aroused and sent a small army against them, driving them into the mountains. These forces also took occasion to break up the Republic of Chetuga, disperse its citizens, whose Chinese status had remained one of outlawry, and seize its mines for Government exploitation. The bandits who remained in the northern mountains lived on pillage of boats on the Amur River and its affluents. One of their incursions led to the invasion of Manchuria by Russian troops in 1900. The Russians used them in various ventures against the Chinese, but finally mistreated them so that they went over to the Japanese, in whose service they became the Russians' bitterest enemies.

In 1905, when the Peace of Portsmouth was signed, the Government of Tokio kept the Khunguses in their service and transformed them into a regular body of gendarmes. Unscrupulous but loyal, they were of the greatest value to Japan and the inhabitants of Manchuria as a policing force. In 1914, in Kingan, on the slope of Mount Djigitchan, they had their headquarters. Since 1905, when they numbered some 40,000, their numbers have considerably increased.

Kolchak's Methods in Siberia

Terroristic Nature of His Military Orders a Partial Explanation of His Reverses

THE popular antagonism to the rule of Admiral Kolchak in Siberia, and the refusal of the inhabitants to support him in his losing fight against the Bolsheviks, are attributed by his critics to the severity of his methods in administering the regions that came under his control. He referred to this matter himself in a proclamation issued Sept. 16, 1919, to the peoples of Siberia, in which he said: "The National Congress must also assist the Government to effect a change from a military régime, unavoidably severe, yet indispensable to the conditions of desperate civil war, to a new régime suitable to a life of peace, based upon guarantees of civil liberty and upon the safeguarding of property and personal interests." The documents printed below, however, first made public in the English language by The International Review last November, reveal the extent of the Admiral's severity and go far to explain his failure to win popular support. They show that the shooting of hostages was an established feature of his method of pacification.

Under the Kolchak régime practically the whole country has been subjected to martial law. Not only the war zone proper, but the Transbaikalian, Yenesei, Irkutsk, and Amur and Maritime Provinces, and the lines of the Siberian and Amur Railways, with the branch lines and towns and villages along their routes, are under military law. Local government and its organs—e. g., the Zemstvos—have been reduced to the condition in which they were in the days of Czarism; labor unions have been suppressed, labor leaders banished; the workers are forbidden to strike, and are under military law. In the districts in which martial law has been proclaimed, the military exercise powers of life and death over the inhabitants, and how that power is exercised may be seen in the instructions printed below. That there are continual wholesale floggings and shootings is proved by the protest and orders of General Gaida and Admiral Kolchak himself. One of the orders to officers against such methods naïvely stated that "they (the officers) do not understand that too much zeal harms the cause."

Such are the conditions in those districts of Siberia immediately under the administration of Admiral Kolchak. East of Lake Baikal the country is administered by General Horvat, and his subordinates, Semenov and Kalmikov. Semenov and Kalmikov originally refused to recognize the Kolchak Government. Kolchak tried to get rid of them, but as they were supported by the Japanese he failed, and eventually an arrangement was made by which they recognized the Kolchak Government in return for their recognition by that Government as the restorers of law and order in the Transbaikalian and Amur provinces. The reign of terror carried on by Semenov, says The National Review, exceeds anything known in Russia for a century; whole villages have been stripped naked and knouted, sixty workmen at the Chita workshops were flogged so that seven died. Kalmikov, who appears to be a homicidal maniac, was publicly described by General Graves, commanding officer of the American Expeditionary Force, in an interview in the Japanese Advertiser of February, 1919, as a bandit and murderer. He murdered several thousands of people in and around Habarovsk, and later murdered sixteen of his own officers who wished to leave him and go to the front. He was prevented by the Allies' representatives from murdering these officers on the spot, and promised to send them to Chita for trial. They never arrived, and Kalmikov's explanation was that on the way the sixteen of them "expired." It is hardly surprising in these circumstances that all Siberia east of Lake Baikal was actually or potentially in revolt in the Autumn of 1919; and that where Kolchak had the largest concentration of forces, according to his critics, there was the greatest disorder and the most Bolshevism.

(I) INSTRUCTIONS TO THE COMMANDERS OF GARRISONS

Appendix to the declaration of the Commissioner for the keeping of public order and peace in the Yenesei and part of the Irkutsk Provinces (§ of March 28, 1919.)

1. To inform me by telegraph of every incident which, in the opinion of the garrison commander, requires the execution of the hostages.

2. Announce in the same telegram just what hostages the garrison commander proposes to shoot in view of the given fact.

3. The garrison commander must demand of the military control and investigatory committees the evidence submitted in each case for inclusion as a hostage. The lists of hostages, together with the reasons why they have been considered as hostages, are to be sent to me.

4. The material and evidence received from the organs mentioned above are not to contain an estimate of the person's guilt. This estimate will be made by the garrison commander, but the person and institution that reported the facts are responsible for the accuracy.

5. In cases of undoubted guilt the garrison commander, after receiving from me permission to shoot a given number of hostages owing to the event reported, will inform me simply of the surnames, Christian names, by whom, when, and for what (in the most general terms) detained. On receipt of my telegram, "I agree with the contents of your telegram recommending the shooting of Nos.—," he is to proceed with the shooting within twenty-four hours.

6. In doubtful cases all the evidence collected is to be forwarded to me by telegraph in précis form, and the shooting is not to be proceeded with pending my confirmation for each case (по каждому абдельному делу.)

7. Only persons detained for Bolshevism in general, or for acts implicating them in the present revolt, can be counted as hostages.

Simply criminals (not implicated in the revolt) are not to be included among the hostages.

(2) ORDER TO THE PRE-AMUR MILITARY DISTRICT

The Fortress of Vladivostok, No. 203,

May 3, 1919.

The so-called Bolsheviks temporarily seized the reins of government in Russia. The millions of the Russian people allowed the Bolsheviks to do this only because they believed their delusive promises, trusted their assurances at meetings, and believed that the Bolsheviks are sincere friends of the people. But the Russian people, who had been misled by propaganda and devilish duplicity, soon saw that instead of bread the Bolsheviks gave hunger, instead of peace they soaked Russian soil in the blood of brothers, instead of easy work and a prosperous existence they gave the proletariat unemployment, gave over Russian soil to spoliation, and, collecting bands of hireling slaves from among the criminals released from prison, and war prisoners of our enemies, armed them with the military stores, left in vast quantities from the shamefully concluded war, and hounded these ruffians, like hordes of wild beasts, on the wounded body of our dying mother—Russia.

But the spirit of the long-suffering and patient Russian people has been roused and, in spite of all the horrors of terror and violence by which the Bolsheviks try to hold in their dirty clutches the power they usurped, the Russian people has already two-thirds cleared its soil of this defilement. The many-headed monster is breathing its last under the mighty blows of the blades of the young Siberian army, of Denikin's army, of the noble Cossacks, of the armies of Yudenitch, of the Estonians, and of the peasants rising all over Russia.

But in its death throes it is trying to fix its poisonous fangs in the heel of the foot that crushes it to earth.

The hydra has raised its head in the Far East also, and is trying to incite the peaceful peasantry against one another.

Our young forces did not wish to frighten the peaceful inhabitants, did not wish to disturb the peasant in his peaceful toil, and therefore fought the enemies of the people only when they became too insolent.

Therefore, our young troops struck down the head of Bolshevism only when it was raised too high.

The cowardly, bloodthirsty beasts fled before our detachments, and displayed their courage only at the expense of peaceable inhabitants and of our wounded, whom they subjected to a prolonged and ferocious death.

Cowardly thieves, robbers, and bandits could not act otherwise.

And now the Bolsheviks, not daring to come forward, determined to act secretly, committing terroristic acts.

I herewith publish my order for the cognizance of all, as follows:

1. All active agents of Bolshevism captured by our forces shall be tried by field court-martial, and upon being sentenced immediately shot; all their property is to be destroyed, and their houses razed to the ground.

2. In all places infected by Bolshevism, hostages are to be taken from among those sympathizing with Bolshevism and their accomplices.

3. In case of a repetition of terroristic acts or the discovery of corpses of our soldiers tortured by the Bolsheviks, the hostages are to be shot, and, further, hand over to court-martial and execute Bolshevik agents and active Bolsheviks in prison, as well as those members of the Soviet forces in our power as are convinced adherents of Bolshevism (soznatelnyaya chiny sovetskikh armii—), in the ratio of ten men for every terroristic act committed.

4. In case the acts of terrorism continue, I will publish lists of the Bolshevik agents, and of the parties allying themselves to them, and will declare all these agents outlawed.

Commander of the forces,

MAJOR GEN. IVANOV-RINOV.

(3) THE YENESEI PROVINCE

ORDER TO THE COMMANDERS OF MILITARY FORCES OPERATING IN THE DISAFFECTED REGION OF THE YENESEI PROVINCE.

I order that the following instructions be obeyed unflinchingly:

1. In capturing villages formerly taken by the bandits, demand the surrender of their chiefs and ringleaders; if this is not done, and there is reliable evidence of the presence of such, shoot every tenth man.

2. Villages whose population offers armed resistance to Government troops are to be burned to the ground, the adult male population shot to the last man, property, horses, carts, corn, &c., confiscated for the use of the State.

Remark: All the confiscated goods are to be published in the order of the day of the force.

3. If, when the Government troops pass through a village, the inhabitants do not of their own initiative report the presence in the village of enemy forces, and if there had been a possibility of communicating this information, money contributions are to be laid on the population with collective responsibility, (krugavaya poruka, i. e., each is responsible for all). These tributes are to be exacted mercilessly.

Remark: Every contribution is to be published in the order of the day of the force, and the sums afterward paid in to the State.

4. After occupation of the villages, and examination of the case, contributions are to be imposed without hesitation on all those who have aided the bandits, even indirectly. All such persons are to be held collectively responsible.

5. Declare to the population that for voluntarily supplying the bandits, not only with arms and war material, but with provisions, clothes, &c., the offending villages will be burned, and the property removed for the use of the State. The population is bound to remove its property, or destroy it, in every case where it may be used by the bandits; for property thus destroyed the population will be indemnified in full, either in money or in kind, from the confiscated goods of the bandits.

6. Take hostages from among the population; in case of action hostile to the Government troops by the inhabitants of a village, shoot the hostages without mercy.

7. As a general guide, remember: The people who openly or secretly aid the bandits are to be regarded as enemies, and dealt with mercilessly, and their property must be used to make good the losses due to military operations suffered by that part of the population which is faithful to the Government.

LIEUT. GEN. ROZANOV,

March 27, 1919.

Krasnoyarsk.

(4) SHOOTING HOSTAGES

DECLARATION OF THE COMMISSIONER FOR THE KEEPING OF PUBLIC ORDER AND PEACE IN THE YENESEI AND PART OF THE IRKUTSK PROVINCES.

The Government troops are operating against bands of robbers. The offending elements—dregs of society—commit acts of armed violence for gain and robbery. Bolshevism gave them organization. The disorderly acts committed by the robbers, wrecking of passenger trains, killing of administrative officials, of priests, the shooting of the families of peaceful inhabitants who have felt the region in revolt, the endless series of deeds of violence and oppression—all this makes it necessary to depart from those general moral principles which are applied to the enemy in war.

The prisons are full of the leaders of the murderers. I order the heads of garrisons of the towns in the region under my charge: Consider the Bolsheviks and robbers detained in prisons as hostages. Communicate to me every incident similar to the above, and shoot from three to twenty of the local hostages for every offense taking place in the given region.

Bring this order into force by telegraph. Publish it widely. Detailed instructions follow.

OTHER TESTIMONY

Further light is thrown on conditions in Siberia by a passage from the Siberian co-operative journal Nashe Dyelo, which says that at first the Siberians rejoiced at their liberation from Bolshevism, but

As time went on the people learned that peace and democracy seemed ever further off. Six weeks after the clearing of Siberia, the reactionary elements had completely strangled democracy. * * * The rapidly monarchical elements reappeared, and below the discontent grew ever more real.

A contributor to Vorwärts, A. Grigor'yanz, quotes the text of an official report from the Denikin front dated Sept. 29:

Our flying division, under the leadership of Colonel Mamontov, who has gained notoriety by his smart work in the rear of the Bolshevik troops during the last two months, penetrated a few days ago into the town of Yelez, in the Government of Orel, and after having hanged all the commissaries and members of the different Bolshevik institutions in the place, he disappeared into the unknown. * * *

The population of the conquered districts greet the Denikin and Yudenitch armies as liberators, as with the arrival of the Generals order is restored. But their feelings quickly change as with the order all the well-known institutions of the Tsarist régime and the political secret service are established, and make short work of anybody under suspicion.

Despair of 200,000 Men

The hard fate of hundreds of thousands of Austro-Hungarian prisoners of war, still suffering under the harshest conditions in Siberia, was described in the Japan Weekly Chronicle of Oct. 30, 1919. The writer was himself one of the prisoners—a doctor possessing English university degrees. "The state of affairs he describes," remarked the Japan Chronicle, in presenting the letter, "is a disgrace to the powers who are jointly undertaking the restoration of Siberia." The correspondent wrote:

THERE are at the present day the following numbers of prisoners of war in Siberia: Germans, 5,000; Austrians, 100,000; Hungarians, 90,000; Turks, 15,000; Bulgarians, 2,000; total, 212,000 men. The majority were taken prisoner in 1914, i. e., more than five years ago. On an average they have been kept in captivity about four years already. They are, for the most part, in concentration camps, located in the different towns from Petropavlovsk to Vladivostok, on the northern railway line, strongly guarded by the worst type of Russian soldier, specially hired for this purpose, fed insufficiently, and getting every day exactly the same food—for five long years on end! The exact figures of a medical analysis of this food show that a day's ration contains 1,900 to 2,200 calories on an average, whereas, the normally needed amount is 3,000 calories.

Housed like dogs—not like the dogs of the rich—receiving hardly any clothing since their capture, they are hungry, squalid, and ragged. The uniforms, boots, &c., sent from home through the Danish, Swedish, and other representatives of the Red Cross, or in other ways, have been "requisitioned" and then sold by the Russians, or given to the "brave" Cossacks. They are treated in an indescribably rough and inhuman manner. A recent instance was silently witnessed by American officers, Japanese soldiers, and Red Cross representatives. Five thousand prisoners, sent from Beresovka to Nikolsk-Ussuriiskii, were on arrival surrounded by Kalmykov's Cossacks, and without the slightest reason whatever attacked by the mounted formation, sabred and knouted. It was afterward explained as a "mistake"—they thought they were "Bolsheviki."

In Krasnoyarsk two Russian regiments mutinied, whereupon the Czechs disarmed them. Finding a concentration camp in the vicinity of the barracks of the mutineer regiments, they accused the prisoners of war of having incited the Russian soldiers. This could not, of course, be proved, nevertheless they shot 18 officers, who had been lecturing to their own comrades, in German or Hungarian, on all kinds of scientific questions.

These officers, it may be mentioned, get no rations—only a roof over their heads—hardly a house, for the houses allotted to them in Nikolsk, for instance, had no windows. These had to be made by them. They got 50 rubles a month. From February, 1919, to the present day this had a fluctuating average purchasing value of about 1 yen. They were, therefore, in a decidedly worse position than the men. In May they were promised 100 rubles and food. This order has not been executed as yet, excepting that they get 1 ruble 90 kopeks per day in lieu of rations. They would long ago have been starved, of course, on this pay, which is a derision, had they not found means to support themselves by some kind of work. You find now jurists, professors, engineers, painters, sculptors, &c., cleaning the dirty streets of small Siberian towns and working as servants in all kinds of black labor. Very few have been able to find positions as skilled workmen, not being trained to any manual profession, and fewer still obtain a situation corresponding to their education and abilities. They are in this respect treated exactly like slaves, the Russian authorities giving them out for work only on condition that 50 per cent. of their earnings go to their own mysterious "funds."

All the different representatives of the Red Cross—mainly American—who have visited the camps will confirm in detail the above facts. They have been breathless on first seeing them, promised immediate help and—nothing has happened since, except that time flies, Winter is again at hand, and it can be imagined what that means for people in such a condition in Siberia. There are, of course, political reasons.

Three camps—Krasnaya Riechka, Per-vaya Riechka and the old Nikolsk camp

—have been taken under custody of the American and Japanese command and are now all under Japanese rule. There the men have been clad and fed up in a princely way compared to their previous lot; the officers get $35 (50 yen) per month. The camps have been built up as model camps, duly photographed and advertised in the home papers. They include about 6,000 men. The remaining 206,000 have been left to the Russians in the same misery as before. In Nikolsk there are now prisoners of war of the same armies—Austrian, Hungarian, and Turkish—in two different camps at a distance of 100 yards from each other, and in the one they get 50 yen and maintenance, in the other only 1 yen and hardly sufficient food. Can you explain that even on political grounds?

You might ask, Why do they suffer this? Isn't death far preferable to such existence? The answer is—first, exhaustion, want of energy as a consequence of chronic starvation; secondly, the thought, indeed idée fixe, that they "must" get home somehow or other, to see once more parents, wife, and children, who have a right to their life. But of course there is a limit even to such a pathological state of mind. What the consequences must be if these 200,000 embittered men lose patience I leave it to you to guess.

All these poor wrecks of war thank you in advance for anything you might do for them by publishing some news about their situation, thus helping to arouse public indignation, which alone can wipe out this shameful blot on the "civilization" the Entente has saved.

How We Made the October Revolution

By LEON TROTZKY

[BOLSHEVIST MINISTER OF WAR]

(Concluded*)

THE revolutionary class alone was called to break the fatal circle in which, to its ruin, the revolution had remained confined. It was necessary to seize the power from those elements which, directly or indirectly, were only the servants of the upper bourgeoisie, and who used the resources of the Government as a means of obstructing the revolutionary demands of the people. * * * "Governmental power to the Soviets!" cried our party. In October, 1917, this meant the delivery of all power to the revolutionary proletariat, at the head of which, at this time, stood the party of the Bolsheviks. It was, then, a question of the dictation of the working class, which rallied, or, more exactly, was capable of rallying behind it the millions and millions of men constituting the compact masses of the rural proletariat. This is the whole historical meaning of the October revolution.

Everything spurred the party along this path. Since the first days of the revolution we had preached the necessity, and even inevitability, of delivering power over to the Soviets. After many internal struggles, the majority of Soviets had adopted this demand, and had come to share our view. We then began to prepare the second Congress of the Soviets of all the Russias. The Central Executive Committee, directed by Dan, used every means to prevent the convening of this Congress. With much difficulty, we finally succeeded in fixing the convocation of the Congress for the 25th of October, a date of the greatest significance for Russia's future history.

[At the beginning of October, the Petrograd Military Staff demanded that two-thirds of the garrison be sent to the front. The Executive Committee of the Petrograd Soviet, suspecting a purely political manoeuvre, refused to accept this transfer blindly.

Documents subsequently found, M. Trotsky alleged, proved that the measure was devised by Kerensky, "who sought thus to free the capital of the most revolutionary soldiers," i. e., those most hostile to him. A revolutionary military committee was formed by the Petrograd Soviet, in which the Bolsheviks were in the ascendancy, to examine the question technically. This committee was deliberately conceived to serve as an organ of the approaching revolution, and by its intensive propaganda work among the soldiers of the garrison, on whose attitude the fate of the coming Congress of Soviets depended, prepared the way for the subsequent upheaval.

Meantime the Bolsheviks proclaimed openly their intention to overthrow Kerensky's Government and to substitute the rule of the Second Soviet Congress. Lenin, who was hiding in Finland, sent innumerable letters demanding action. On Oct. 10 a secret session of the Executive Committee was held in Lenin's presence to discuss the projected revolution. With only two dissenting voices a resolution was adopted declaring that the sole way to save the revolution and the country from final disaster was to create a revolutionary movement which should deliver over all governmental power into the hands of the Soviets. Seeing in the Democratic Soviet and the Provisional Parliament a mere compromise with the upper bourgeoisie, the Bolsheviks decided to break with it publicly. The Socialist-Revolutionists refused to follow them in an armed revolt. The Bolsheviks then announced from the gallery of the Provisional Parliament that they had decided to abandon this institution. This declaration "was received by the majority groups with roars of impotent anger."

The work of preparation went on, amid the alleged slanders of the opposition press. "The advocates of the upper bourgeoisie were right," said M. Trotsky, "when they accused us of seeking to create a revolutionary situation. Open revolt and direct seizure of power were in our eyes the only issue possible." The popular masses came over in greater and greater numbers; delegates from the trenches constantly arriving declared that if peace were not effected by Nov. 1 the soldiers would leave the trenches and attack Petrograd. The Bolsheviks had become at last the army's main hope. The Petrograd garrison, meantime, was won over by the Bolshevik propaganda. The Revolutionary Military Committee, supported by the Petrograd Soviet, became openly an organization of révolt. The decisive moment was approaching. M. Trotzky continues:]

BOLSHEVIST COMMISSARIES

The first act of the Revolutionary Military Committee had been to appoint commissaries for all parts of the Petrograd garrison and for all the important institutions of the capital and its surroundings. On every hand we were informed that the Government, or, rather, the Governmental factions, were organizing and arming their forces energetically. In all places where arms were kept, both public and private, they had seized guns, revolvers, machine guns and cartridges, with which they had armed non-commissioned officers, students and young men of the middle class in general. We were therefore compelled to take preventive measures. Our commissaries were installed in all arsenals and gunshops. With practically no resistance they became the masters of the situation. Henceforth no arms were delivered except by order of the commissaries. The regiments of the garrison declared one after the other that they recognized only the commissaries of the Petrograd Soviet, and that they would not move without their instructions.

Besides this work of organization a violent campaign of agitation was carried on. Continual meetings were held in the factories, in the Cirque Moderne, in the Cirque Ciniselli, in clubs, and barracks. The atmosphere of all these meetings was filled with electricity. Every allusion to the imminent revolution was received with thunders of applause and cries of enthusiasm. The bourgeois press contributed greatly to deepen the impression of general unrest. The order signed by me and given to the Sestror-jetzk Munitions Works to furnish the Red Guard with 5,000 guns aroused an indescribable panic in the bourgeois circles. Everywhere, in speech and press, the main topic of discussion was the general massacre that was being prepared. This naturally did not prevent the factory in question from delivering the guns to the Red Guard. And the more the bourgeois press barked against us and slandered us the more ardent was the response of the masses to our call.

KERENSKY'S POWER GONE

The Smolny Institute was already at that time in the hands of the Petrograd Soviet and of our party. The Mensheviks and the Revolutionary Socialists of the Right transferred their political activity to the Mary Palace, where the recently born Provisional Parliament was already in its death agony. Kerensky delivered before this Parliament a long speech, in which he sought to conceal his powerlessness behind the loud applause of the bourgeois factions and menacing cries raised against the Bolsheviks. The Government Military Staff made one last effort at resistance. It sent to all the elements of the garrison an invitation to appoint two delegates for each troop corps to examine the question of whether the soldiers of the garrison should be sent away from the capital. The discussion was fixed for Oct. 22 at 1 P. M.

The regiments notified us immediately of this invitation. We summoned the Council of the Garrison to meet at 11 in the morning. A part of the delegates, however, went to the Staff Headquarters, but only to declare that they would do nothing without the instructions of the Petrograd Soviet. The Garrison Council showed almost unanimously its loyalty to the Revolutionary Military Committee. Objections were made only by the official representatives of the factions of the former Soviet, but these found no sympathy with the regimental delegates. The efforts of the Staff Headquarters had shown us clearly that we were on solid ground. Among our warmest partisans was the Volhynian Regiment, that same regiment which, on the night of July 4, preceded by its military band, had left the Tauride Palace to suppress the Bolsheviks.

SOVIET DAY IN "PETER"

Since the end of September we had undertaken a series of steps to procure for the Petrograd Soviet an independent paper. But all the printing houses were occupied, and their owners, supported by the Central Executive Committee, boycotted us. We therefore decided to organize a "Soviet Day in Petrograd," and to collect the funds necessary to finance such a paper. This day had been fixed two weeks before for Oct. 22, which date coincided with the date of the opening of the conflict. The opposition press declared positively that on Oct. 22 an armed rebellion by the Bolsheviks would take place in the streets of Petrograd. * * * The Soviet, however, proceeded calmly and coolly, paying no attention to the vociferations of "public opinion" and the outcry of the upper bourgeoisie.

Oct. 22 was the parade day of the proletarian army. Everything went off well. Despite all warnings issued by the Right that blood would flow in streams in the streets, the popular masses thronged to the meetings of the Petrograd Soviet. All the forces of oratory had been marshaled. All public buildings were packed. The meetings lasted for several hours without interruption. As speakers there were members of our party, delegates of the Congress of Soviets, representatives from the front, Social Revolutionists of the Left, and anarchists. All public edifices were invaded by throngs of workmen, soldiers, and sailors. * * * Tens of thousands of men filled the People's House, swarmed in the corridors, filled the halls to overflowing. Around the iron pillars clusters of human heads, hands, and feet clung like enormous vines. The atmosphere was charged with that electrical tension which characterizes all critical moments of revolution.

"Down with the Kerensky Government!" "Down with war!" "All power for the Soviets!" these masses shouted. Before this vast multitude no one dared utter a protest. The Petrograd Soviet dominated absolutely everything. The revolution had begun. The only thing remaining was to give the pale spectre of Kerensky's Government the finishing blow.

[Steps were taken immediately to win over troops who were still irresolute, such as the Cossacks, the cavalry regiments, Semenov's regiment, the automobile corps. Commissaries and agitators were dispatched to these danger points, as well as to the Fortress of Peter and Paul dominating Petrograd. The efforts of the Bolsheviks were everywhere successful. Additional troops sent for by the desperate Kerensky from outside halted their march and sent delegates to the Bol-shevist leaders. Delegates from the front returned there with Bolshevik propaganda material to distribute. The Revolutionary Military Committee established communication by telephone with the garrisons of neighboring towns, and posted forces at all stations to prevent the entrance of "counter-revolutionaries" into the city. The public telephone service was taken over by force after it had refused its co-operation. The telegraph and postal services were also seized. The Smolny Institute was equipped with machine guns, and the Bolshevik leaders installed themselves on the third floor in a small corner room, where all reports were received, and whence all action was directed.

On the evening of Oct. 24 Kerensky went before the Provisional Parliament and asked authority to take repressive measures against the Bolsheviks. A wild storm of conflicting views arose, which resulted in the condemnation of the seditious movement of the Soviet, but also in throwing the blame for this movement "on the anti-democratic policy of the Government." The Bolshevik leaders received dozens of letters threatening death. Gorky, in his Novaya Zhizn, prophesied the end of the world.

The members of the Revolutionary Military Committee had not left the Smolny Institute the whole week; they lay on sofas, sleeping but little, awakened constantly by couriers, bringers of news, cyclists, telegraph messengers, and telephone calls. The most exciting night was that of Oct. 24-25, when news came that Kerensky was preparing armed resistance at Pavlovsk and Peterhof. The Bolsheviks replied by posting sentries on all roads leading to Petrograd, and sending agitators forward to mingle with the Government troops and seduce them to the Bolshevik cause. The Petrograd garrison, meanwhile, held itself in readiness to support the Bolsheviks. In this decisive night all the principal points of the city, including the State Bank, were seized by the Bolsheviks almost without resistance. The cruiser Aurora, on the Neva, was held up as it was about to sail and taken over into the service of the Soviets. The narrative of M. Trotsky continues:]

THE DECISIVE DAY

On Oct. 25, at dawn, there arrived at the Smolny Institute a man and a woman worker from the printing plant of our party, who announced that the Government had forbidden the appearance of the central organ of the party, as well as that of the new paper of the Petrograd Soviet. Government agents had placed seals on the plant. The Revolutionary Military Committee immediately took the two organs under its protection, and confided "to the glorious Volhynian regiment the great honor of defending the freedom of the people's press against counter-revolutionary attacks." The printing plant resumed work, without further interruption, and the two papers appeared at the time fixed.

The Government was still quartered in the Winter Palace, but it was only the shadow of a Government. Politically it was already dead. On Oct. 25 [Nov. 7, New Style] the Winter Palace was gradually surrounded by our troops. At 1 o'clock in the afternoon, at the session of the Petrograd Soviet and in the name of the Revolutionary Military Committee, I announced that the Kerensky Government no longer existed, and that pending the decision of the Soviet Congress all Governmental power passed into the hands of the Revolutionary Military Committee.

Lenin, who had secretly left Finland and gone into hiding in the suburbs, came to the Smolny Institute on Oct. 25. That same evening a provisional session of the Soviet Congress took place. Dan, head of Kerensky's Central Executive Committee, made a report in the name of that committee. He delivered a speech accusing the rioters, the "expropriators" and fosterers of rebellion, tried to frighten the Congress by representing the repression of the revolutionary movement as inevitable, declaring that it would be crushed by troops from the front within a few days. His words lacked persuasiveness, and were out of place in an assemblage where the great majority of the delegates followed with intense joy the victorious progress of the Petrograd revolution.

The Winter Palace was then surrounded, but not yet taken. From time to time shots were fired from its windows against the besiegers, who slowly and prudently closed their circle around it. From the Fortress of Peter and Paul two or three cannon shots were fired at the palace. Their far-off thunder could be heard inside the Smolny Institute. Filled with impotent rage, Martov, from the gallery of the Congress, spoke of civil war, and especially of the siege of the Winter Palace. The reply to this was given by two sailors, who had come directly from the scene of combat to submit a report. This report recalled the offensive of June 18, all the policy of betrayal of the former Government, the re-establishment of the death penalty for the soldiers, arrests and oppressive measures against revolutionary organizations, and ended with a solemn oath to conquer or die.

These sailors also brought us the news of our first losses, which occurred in the large square facing the Winter Palace. As though a signal had been given, all the delegates rose from their seats and with a unanimity produced only by a high moral tension, intoned the Song of the Dead. All those who experienced that moment will never forget it. The session was broken off. It was impossible to continue the theoretical discussion relating to Government when the fate of the existing Government was being decided amid the tumult of combat and shots around the Winter Palace. * * * We all awaited anxiously the news of what was going on.

FALL OF KERENSKY

After some time Antonov, who was directing the operations, arrived at Smolny. Amid utter silence he announced that the Winter Palace had been taken, that Kerensky had fled, and that the other Ministers had been arrested and brought to the Peter and Paul Fortress. The Social Revolutionists and the Mensheviks, numbering about sixty, or about one-tenth of the Congress, left the hall protesting. As they had no other alternative, they "threw all responsibility" for everything destined to occur upon the Bolsheviks and the Social Revolutionists of the Left.

The latter still hesitated. The Right wing of this party had gone over completely to the middle class and the lower bourgeoisie, to the intellectuals of the lower bourgeoisie, and to the well-to-do residents of the villages, and in all important questions it allied itself against us with the liberal upper bourgeoisie. The most revolutionary elements of this party, in which was still reflected all the radicalism of the social demands of the poorest peasant masses, leaned toward the proletariat and the party of the proletariat. Nevertheless they were afraid to cut the bonds which linked them with their former party. When, therefore, we left the Provisional Parliament, they refused to follow us and warned us against "adventures." But now the revolution compelled them to choose for the Soviets or against the Soviets. Not without hesitation they took up their position on the same side of the barricade as ourselves. The first chapter of the October revolution was thus concluded.

Free Finland

By ARMAS HERMAN SAASTAMOINEN

[FINNISH MINISTER TO THE UNITED STATES]

Mr. Saastamoinen, though not yet 40 years of age, is considered one of the ablest statesmen in the new Finland. In the Spring of 1918 he was appointed first envoy of independent Finland to Copenhagen. He was subsequently offered the portfolio of Foreign Affairs in the Finnish Government, but preferred the post of Finnish Minister to the United States, a country which he had learned to know from a business and study trip taken some years ago. His story of events in Finland since the Russian revolution is here reproduced from the October number of the American-Scandinavian Review.

THE whole history of Finland is nothing but a struggle for her very existence. After centuries of wars and resistance to oppression, we have at last attained freedom and recognition as one of the independent States of the world, but only after a struggle more bitter than any that preceded it, because in this case we had to fight our own brothers. It is no wonder that other countries, while they were themselves in the throes of great events, should have failed to understand what took place in our country, but increased sympathy will come with fuller knowledge. When the whole history of our struggle becomes known, as perhaps it will be ten years from now, the world will be amazed.

It has seemed to many foreigners that the class hatred shown in the Red revolt must necessarily be the result of oppression by the capitalist class, and that the excesses of the proletariat, however terrible, must have had some justification or at least excuse in the tyranny of their masters. This is an absolute perversion of the truth. The Finns are by nature pugnaciously democratic, and we had in our country evolved a democracy so complete that its failure to insure peace would almost tempt one to doubt the possibility of democracy anywhere.

During the last few decades Finland has been changing rapidly from an almost purely agricultural country to one in which large industries hold an important place. The laborers, being practically a new class, were not represented in our old-fashioned Constitution, which was based on representation of four estates. In 1905, however, the whole country instituted a strike against Russian autocracy, a strike in which not only workingmen but professional men, officials, university professors, and even the police took part, and by this means we succeeded in wresting from the Czar a new Constitution, the most democratic the world had up to that time known. All power was lodged in a one-chamber Parliament, elected by free and equal suffrage of all men and women over 24 years of age. Unfortunately, however, our Constitution was in effect nullified by the Czar, who would dissolve the Diet whenever it was on the point of passing any liberal law, and during the war it was permanently suspended; but it has now resumed its functions. The present Diet, elected last March, has framed a republican Constitution and elected our first President. Since the revolution in March, 1917, we have had in fact a parliamentary government, and in December of the same year a law was passed making it obligatory that the Ministry should have the confidence of the Diet.

Economically, as well as politically, Finland is a democracy. I venture to say that there is no country in the world where wealth is more evenly distributed, where there are fewer large fortunes, and where the standard of living is simpler and more uniform among all classes. Nor is there any immutable line between classes; most of the present leaders are plain men who have risen from the people. The so-called bourgeois parties have for decades been working to reform our somewhat antiquated land laws, but all efforts were wrecked on the refusal of the Czar to sanction any liberal legislation and on the resistance of the Socialists, who wanted to communize the land, and therefore would not support a law that would increase the number of land owners. The law making thousands of small tenants (torpare) owners of the soil they tilled has now been passed; it was, in fact, one of the very first actions of that "rump" Diet which met immediately after the revolt was crushed. Other reforms in the interests of industrial workers were passed by the bourgeois majority in the Diet of 1917, among them the eight-hour-day law and a very radical municipal law—the two chief points for which the Socialists had instituted the general strike of November, 1917. Nevertheless, the preparations for revolution went right on, and the Red leaders continued to delude their followers by calling the members of the Government "butchers" and "enemies of the people."

This accusation would be absurd if it were not so tragic. How could these men be enemies of the people? They had suffered imprisonment and banishment and had been threatened with death a thousand times for standing by their own people. The most determined resistance to the tyranny of the Czar was always found in the educated middle classes, and not least among the officials. During the years 1911 to 1917 not less than fifty Finnish officials were confined in Russian prisons because they refused to execute orders that were contrary to Finnish law. When the Russian revolution broke out, about 200 Finnish patriots were awaiting their death sentences in Petrograd prisons and others were in banishment in Siberia, among them President of the Diet Svinhufvud and Mayor Hasselblatt of Vasa, who had both been deported in 1914. The White Guards were not, as the Red leaders attempted to make their followers believe, organized against the workingmen, but to keep order and, of course, with a view to being eventually used against the foreign oppressor. They asked nothing better than to co-operate with the workingmen against the common enemy.

No, the class hatred in Finland was artificially stimulated from the outside. To understand the whole situation, it must be remembered that our country had for twenty years been living under abnormal conditions. Russification had been going on at an accelerated pace, and had roused bitter and vengeful resistance. The inherited respect for law and authority was undermined, because law and authority were represented by the hated Government of the Czar. The fires of revolution were smoldering in the people, and when, at last, they burst out in flame they were turned against countrymen instead of against the tyrant, who had so suddenly and unexpectedly fallen.

It was a fatal influence that made the Finns identify their cause with that of the Russian revolutionists. The sympathy was natural enough, since both were fighting a common enemy, and yet the situation in our country was widely different from that of our earnest neighbor. Finland was a well-ordered western democracy with a popular representation, able to put through any reforms that the people demanded, provided only that the Czar would allow it to function. Resistance with us could therefore take legal forms. Not so in Russia. An Oriental despotism held sway there and could only be changed by the complete overthrow of the despot and the building up of a new form of government. Our Finnish workingmen, though they stand infinitely higher in literacy and intelligence than do Russians of the same class, were unable to see the difference. During the war they came very much under the influence of Russian soldiers and marines. Immense fortifications were built in Finland, and the construction gave employment to about 70,000 Finnish laborers. There they were under the supervision of Russian soldiers, and learned to fraternize with them as well as with the marines from the battleships stationed near our coast.

As all the world now knows, the Russian Army, and even more the Russian Navy, with its inhuman discipline, were breeding places of anarchism, and it was in the navy that Bolshevism found its first supporters. Finland became the spectator of a horrible massacre of officers, and the streets of Helsingfors were infested with Russian marines, rushing around in automobiles, finger on trigger, hunting down their former commanders, or shooting into the empty air for sport.

Long before that crisis, however, our laborers had been infected with Bolshevik doctrines. There is much in the character of the Finn that makes him fall a ready victim to theories of that kind. He is extremely doctrinaire, and, when he has once accepted an idea, is ready to carry it out to its ultimate consequences. Sometimes this quality leads him to the most sublime self-sacrifice, even to death, for his convictions, but at other times it may be a source of great danger. In the present case, it carried the workingmen to the extremes of internationalism. They accepted the doctrine of the solidarity of the proletariat against the "exploiting class," and instantly transplanted to their own conditions that class hatred which might have some reason in Russia, but was absolutely without justification in Finland. As a Finnish writer, Henning Söderhjelm, says: "With Finnish stubbornness and tenacity they accepted the lightly constructed fancies and utopias of the Russians. The edifice which to the Russian was only a house of cards, built in an exalted hour and dismissed with a mere shrug of the shoulder when it fell, was to them a temple founded on a rock which could never fall."

GENERAL JUSTAS MANNERHEIM
Commander in Chief of Finnish armies

There were, of course, moderate Socialists in Finland, but these were either carried away or, at best, remained passive. To all such, who now disclaim responsibility for the revolt, we can only say that they blew sparks which they ought to have known would burn the house. In the elections of 1917, the party managed to secure 103 out of a total of 200 representatives, largely through the indifference of the bourgeois parties, which had lost interest in the vote, since all their attempts at legislation were nullified by the Russian authorities. Following in the footsteps of the Czar, Kerensky dissolved the Diet in July of the same year, and when the new elections were held in October the Socialists had lost their majority, and succeeded in electing only 92 of their candidates. The reason was simply that the people saw whither the Socialists were tending. They saw them fraternizing with the ancient enemies of our people, while the Red Guard refused to put a stop to the crimes committed by hooligans and the demoralized Russian soldiery. Therefore the voters turned against them, but the Socialists refused to accept their defeat at the polls, and prepared more and more openly for revolution. On Jan. 27, 1918, at 6 o'clock, the signal was given which let loose the forces of the Red revolt.

We have been criticised for accepting German aid, but it was a case of self-preservation. We had no army; for the Finnish Army had been dissolved by the Russian authorities, and since 1902 we have had no military service. We had scarcely any arms; for the possession of firearms had long been forbidden. Against us we had the Red Army, which, according to the protocol of the Guard in March, 1918, numbered 75,000, augmented by tens of thousands of Russian soldiers. They were supplied with arms, which had been pouring into the country from the Bolsheviki in Petrograd ever since the beginning of December, 1917. They were in possession of the line of forts that had been flung across the country in the expectation that Finland would become an important strategic centre in the world war—tremendous fortifications, blasted in rock, reinforced with trenches and barbed wire, and comparable in strength to Antwerp and Liège. Outside our coasts were about four-fifths of the Russian battleships, most of them right in the Harbor of Helsingfors.

Against all this we had practically only our bare hands—not a single cannon and only a few rifles. Nevertheless, General Mannerheim assured the Government that, given time, he could put down the Reds unaided, but the Government did not think it right to incur the frightful loss of life that must have been the consequence of going against the fortifications with unarmed men. It would have meant that the entire southern part of the country would have been laid waste and Helsingfors reduced to an ash-heap. The brunt of the fighting, however, was borne by Mannerheim's volunteer army, the backbone of which was made up of peasants and woodsmen from the north.

A glance at the composition of the White Army is the best answer to the fiction that it was an army of the "possessing classes" trying to crush the proletariat. Peasants fighting to retain their few acres of land, country school teachers defending their hearthstones, schoolboys who had been learning the use of firearms in secret to use them some time against Russia—these were the "capitalists" and "reactionaries" of the Finnish people's army. A Swedish writer, Ernst Klein, has remarked that one "might as well hope to marshal an army in Finland for Confucianism or for the Asa faith as for reactionism." Equally untrue, therefore, is the accusation that Finnish "junkers" were intriguing with Prussians of the same calibre to enslave their own countrymen. Our leaders were pro-German in the sense of looking to Germany as the only power likely to help them against Russian aggression; but the men who had just come back from prison and banishment for refusing to submit to one tyrant were not likely to put their country under the foot of another. All they wanted was Finland free and independent.

This is not the place to tell the story of the fighting and of the final victory won by our troops, but I wish to say a few words about the so-called White terror. The Socialists claim that more than 15,000 persons were killed, and it is made to appear that these people were executed by the Government in cold blood, after peace was restored and the enemy had been rendered helpless. This is absolutely untrue. No doubt summary justice was done by local bodies of White troops, who took the law in their own hands, for the war was largely a guerrilla war, fought by undisciplined men, who were under terrible provocation. I shrink from mentioning the Red terror; it is hard to confess that such things could be done by my own countrymen, but it is necessary to touch on it in order to understand the fury of the peasants. Many localities had been infested by bands of thieves and cut-throats for months past; about one thousand murders were committed before the revolution broke out, besides those perpetrated on helpless prisoners during the war. Often they were accompanied by such bestial tortures that the story is unfit to print. One can hardly marvel that people who saw their neighbors nailed to the table by their tongues—to mention only one instance—would take instant vengeance.

With regard to the executions ordered by the Government, I am able to give exact figures. They were 127 or, possibly, 128. Nearly all those condemned to death were murderers; many had several murders on their conscience, one no less than 120. All were tried in civil courts. Not a single person was executed in the camps.

The conditions in the camps have been the subject of criticism. When the war was over, we found ourselves with 80,000 prisoners on our hands. Many of these were, of course, comparatively innocent; they had been deluded or perhaps even forced into the Red army. On the other hand, there was danger of releasing those who would instantly start the revolt over again. The sifting process took time, and it was difficult to care for this mass of people, but I deny that deliberate cruelties or even avoidable hardships were inflicted on them. There were epidemics due to malnutrition in the camps, but also outside of the camps. The daily bread ration in Finland, even after we had received some aid from abroad, was eighty grams, of which forty grams were wood pulp. (A normal ration is 500 grams.) If the prisoners were staggering for want of food, so were the guards who took care of them, and had exactly the same miserable rations. I doubt if any people less hardy than the Finns could have lived, let alone fought, on the diet of our troops. It is the literal truth that sometimes they did not taste food for days together, for they could not plunder the land they were set to defend or take the bread out of the mouths of helpless women and children. As fast as the prisoners could be tried, they were released in batches of many thousands each time.

According to the latest report from Finland, General Mannerheim has proposed that the few who still remain be released, with the exception of criminals and the leaders of the revolt.

That the Socialists have not been deprived of the right of free speech and the use of their press is shown by the fact that in the last March elections they managed to elect eighty representatives to the Diet. In my opinion, they will not be able to turn Finland into a communistic State, but will have to accept the fact that it will remain a radical democracy with more and more liberal tendencies. * * *

It is to the Scandinavian countries that Finland must look for her closest friends in the future. One-eighth of our population are Swedes, and they enjoy exactly the same rights with regard to the use of their language as do the Finnish-speaking majority. Our culture has been built by both races, but has received its strongest impulses from Scandinavia, not only from Sweden, but from Denmark and Norway. We feel, perhaps, a stronger affection for the three brother nations than they feel for one another. The sympathy of Scandinavia has been to us more than mere words; to us who have had almost to dig ourselves out of our own grave, the hand of fellowship from the west has meant renewed hope of life. To all Scandinavians I want to say that the Finland you learned to know in the writings of Runeberg and Topelius is still there.

The White Terror in Hungary

Premier Friedrich Charged With Concealing and Promoting Murder and Persecution

After the fall of Bela Kun's Bolshevist régime and the brief interim of Archduke Joseph's attempt to govern Hungary, the power fell into the hands of the temporary Friedrich Government, with which the Peace Conference long refused to negotiate a treaty of peace. Charges of a White Terror under this régime were formulated in impressive detail by a special correspondent of the Viennese Socialist paper, the Arbeiter Zeitung; his articles, signed "R," appeared in the issues of Sept. 16 and 17, 1919. The Arbeiter Zeitung is an anti-Bolshevist journal, hence its story of atrocities committed in the name of anti-Bolshevism carries weight. The International Review's translation is here presented in part.

Budapest, Sept. 13, 1919.

UNDER Friedrich, Hungary has arranged the most stringent embargo on information, so as to be able to carry on her hangman's job undisturbed. The Reds had yoked the Hungarian press; the Whites have strangled it. With the help of the Rumanian censorship a check has been imposed on correspondents of the foreign press, by means of which reports about events in Hungary are, at the least, detained; but should the Rumanian censorship, nevertheless, allow something to slip through, Friedrich has made arrangements to prevent the handing on of such information to foreign countries; for this purpose the so-called Friedrich censors have been installed at the central telegraph stations, and they subject telegrams to a fresh scrutiny. One or two notices of atrocities had, however, appeared in the Vienna papers; these papers, as I know by personal observation, have been seized at the frontier by the frontier police for the last ten days, at the direct order of the Hungarian Government. The most stringent embargo on information is being imposed on Hungary, because Hungary has an evil conscience!

And suppose a cry of despair from some of those who are being tortured to death should, nevertheless, penetrate the embargo, in order to call Europe to witness their arraignment—for this eventuality also Friedrich has made his dispositions: he directs his telegraph bureau to circulate in foreign parts lies calculated to contradict all accusation, even over there. A few days ago, for instance, the Friedrich Government caused to be circulated a certain declaration; it appeared also in the official Gazette: that declaration, with the audacity characteristic of Herr Friedrich, contained a statement to this effect: "Once for all let us say, with the utmost definiteness, that the much talked-of White Terror does not exist, and never has existed. What is being done in Hungary by the White Guard simply amounts to the keeping of law and the keeping of order. We further declare that the White Guard will not allow itself to be obstructed by this manoeuvre."

GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSIBILITY

Before I give cases, proved by documentary evidence, copies of most of which are in the possession of the Entente missions, I propose first to settle accounts with the malicious lie which has been officially spread abroad in order to suppress the truth.

Herr Friedrich, Premier of Hungary: I beg to remind you that when last I spoke to you and had an opportunity of asking you about the authentic information I had of atrocities of the White Guard in Trans-Danubian Hungary, you answered as follows: "I regret to have to admit that these atrocities did, as a matter of fact, take place." As I know your political methods full well by now, I am aware that, when as a simple correspondent, I now bring a public complaint against your system, you will, in order to whitewash yourself, deny that this conversation ever took place. You will not succeed. Here and now, I submit to you the records of the Hungarian War Ministry, Department 5a, copies of which, as is stated in these documents themselves, have been deposited with Colonel Lorx, at Algya-Papp, with First Lieutenant Nyekhegyi, with Major Denes, with Captain Denghy, with the Police Section of the Ministry of the Interior, with the Manager of the Press Bureau in the Prime Minister's Department, with various Hungarian Ministries, with Sections II., III., XIII., XIV., and with the Hungarian liaison officers attached to the Entente missions. I have had opportunity to inspect a great many "bulletins"; in order to keep within the limits of this article I will, at present, select only a few cases.

From the bulletin of the Hungarian War Ministry 621/1, 5a 1010, dated Aug. 21, 1918, (sic), 8 A. M.:

Official Report from Veszprim:

The Rumanian occupation troops are limiting their operations to keeping order and to taking prisoner Communists who are in hiding. The population has absolutely no cause for complaint on account of the Rumanian occupation. On the other hand, in the unoccupied villages of the county the White Guard are making unauthorized requisitions, are using lynch law, are carrying out executions.

In this same report Count Louis Batthyany of Polgardi, who is a big landowner, says:

The soldiers who form the White Guard are carrying on a reign of terror in the village and surrounding district, are making unauthorized requisitions, have blackmailed a Jewish merchant to the extent of 20,000 kronen, which he was to pay in order not to be hanged. They are behaving in a way calculated to arouse the greatest disquiet among the population.

The administrative authorities of the Feher County report:

We have already several times drawn the attention of the Gendarmerie Command in Stuhlweissenburg to the behavior of the White Guard. There are official reports to the effect that the soldiers of the White Guard are carrying out lynch law and are refusing trial; that they hang all persons who had any connection with the Bolshevik régime, and they further egg on the people to religious cruelties. These cases of execution by lynch law were carried out within the Feher County, principally in Nagylang and Aban, in the Veszprim County, in Lepseny and Enying. The Gendarmerie Command informed the Chief Command of the White Guard of these events, and, according to information supplied by Captain of the Gendarmerie, Ratz, the Chief Command has already instituted an inquiry. The population of the villages, which has been embittered by the Bolshevik rule, in many cases openly encouraged the executions and lynch law of the White soldiers. But it is to be feared that much harm will be done to public safety hereabouts by these unauthorized acts, and the tolerable security of the district will be succeeded by a reign of utter anarchy.

In the bulletin of the War Ministry, 822/1, 5a, 1919, dated Aug. 22 of the current year, the Vice Governor of Stuhlweissenburg says:

I am receiving from the borders of the Feher and Tolna counties the most disquieting reports of acts of lynch law. The members of the White Guard are continuing their persecution of the Jews, their lynch executions, and their other acts of violence, especially in the Sarbogard district. Several days ago I sent in a complaint as to this to the Prime Minister's Department, to the Ministry of the Interior, and to the Trans-Danubian Command of the National Army. Five days ago the military authorities promised me to make an end of these unauthorized acts. Until now nothing has happened. In Enying the atrocities of the White Guards are being continued.

Such official bulletins are being received every day. Fresh news of the outrages of the White Guard come in hourly. * * * The Government are taking no steps about the White Terror because, having seized power by means of a police coup d'état, they hold it unjustifiably, and not only are unable to keep it except with the help of the Terror, but also misuse for their own purposes the anti-Semitic feeling which certainly exists among the population.

In this, my first statement, I have intended to confine myself to proving that the atrocities have, in fact, been carried out by the White Guard with the complicity of the Government, in spite of all denials. I will now come back to individual cases which rest on documentary evidence already in the hands of the Entente.

LIKE THE RED TERROR

Budapest, Sept. 14.

The organization of the White Terror is an uncanny copy of the Red Terror down to the smallest details. Its sphere of operations covers the same sites as those which housed the Red Guards; the same Headquarters Siofok, where formerly Pogany and Szamuely had set up their rule, is now the seat of the White General Staff, and even the "execution train" of the Red Terrorists is now being used by the Whites. In Trans-Danubian Hungary the White National Army forms the nucleus of the Terror; in Budapest, the place of the "Lenin Boys" has been taken by the White Terrorists, who call themselves the "Revivalist Hungarians." It is a characteristic fact that both among the White Guard, which is devastating the countryside, and among the Terrorist group at Budapest, there are those serving, and even playing a leading rôle, who, only six weeks ago, were among the maddest of the Red leaders. * * *

The elements of the Revivalist Hungarian organization were started by Friedrich soon after the October revolution, although at that time it professed to follow Karolyi. When Friedrich came to power he developed his organization. This organization was directed by the Prime Minister's Department, and the Government also made arrangements for the necessary financial support. The Szent-Imre College alone received 600,000 kronen. Now the Revivalist Hungarians are among the most dreaded of the Terrorists. They have suppressed every expression of opinion, and for weeks together have disquieted the city with the most infamous lying placards. * * *

The Revivalist Hungarians form the Budapest outpost of the central Terrorist organization in Trans-Danubian Hungary. The elements of this White Terrorist Guard were in existence even at Szegedin. Contrary to hitherto accepted information, the French Command at Szegedin did not show any particular favor or partiality for the army formed at Szegedin, which army consisted almost exclusively of officers. In every way the French put obstruction in the path of the Szegedin Army. Nor did these relations change perceptibly when the fall of the Soviet Government was imminent. At that time the Whites managed to get permission for an officers' troop to take up its position behind the French position, which was detailed to guard the line of demarkation. This officers' troop, which called itself the Pronay troop, and was under the leadership of Pronay, First Lieutenant of Hussars, had wormed itself in between Szagmaz and Dorozma. It was known as the Black Death Battalion, and it undertook to exact vengeance for Bolshevism.

The very first days of its activities resulted in the deaths of innocent persons. Thus, on the second day, it hanged a 19-year-old youth, named Herz, the son of a Budapest barrister. His guilt consisted in having on him two letters of introduction from William and Eugene Vazsonyi. The young man had been denounced as a Bolshevik to the French, and as proof the letters of the two "biggest Bolsheviks," the Vazsonyi, were produced; but the French let the young man go at once as being innocent. The Whites hanged him, nevertheless. The artist, Nana Kukovicz, was buried alive; she was accused of having sympathized with the Bolsheviks. Among the murders of wholly innocent victims the following is the most extraordinary: A man's body was found in the Theiss; hands and feet were fastened together with wire, and the neck was throttled with a wire noose. The French military authorities diagnosed the corpse as that of a Russian spy in their service, who was bringing them information about the Budapest Bolsheviks. French detectives have established the fact that this man was murdered by three Hungarian nobles, officers of Hussars, because they thought him a Bolshevik.

The leaders of the White Terrorist troops are mostly Hungarian nobles. We find the names of Scéchényi, Esterhazy, Count Vaj, Baron Pronay, Pongracz, Salm, and Denes Bibó, Knight of the Golden Spur. The sites where they have worked are Simontorney, Enying, Czell-dömölk, Dunaföldvár, Marczalli, Csurgó, Janoshaza, and other places in Trans-Danubian Hungary. For instance, in Marczalli, twenty-five innocent persons were executed within a week; in Lengyel, nine; in Czurgo, eight; in Fonyod, four. The commander, Nicholas Horthy, whose seat is at Siofok, has attempted in individual cases to rescue innocent persons from his officers, but always unsuccessfully.

EXTORTION AND MURDER

Of the many cases which have been communicated to the Entente Missions, among others, I will choose only those which the documentary evidence shows to be the most characteristic. At Dunaföldvár Baron Pronay arrived with thirty-five men, and, by order of Commander Horthy, took over the command in that place. With him was Count Salm. The first question which the officers asked was: "Are there any Jews here; if so, bring them to us at once." The first to be caught was the dancing master at Dunaföldvár, Heldai; he was hanged immediately. In the afternoon Salm went to the innkeeper, Eugene Kovacs, who was accused of having sympathized with the Bolsheviks, and of being a Jew. Said Salm to him: "You, Jew, hand me over 100,000 kronen, and I will let you live." Kovacs was brought into a room, a noose was put around his neck, and while they drew the rope tight, Salm said to him again: "Pay or be hanged." Meanwhile District Judge Frey came in. When he saw what they were about, he went to Salm and swore that Kovacs had never been a Bolshevik; had, on the contrary, been forced to flee from the Bolsheviks. Whereupon Salm said to Kovacs: "The District Judge says that you are neither Communist nor White. If you can deposit 10,000 kronen at once, we'll let you go." The noose was taken off his neck. Kovacs went to his safe, with difficulty got together 10,000 kronen, and gave them into the hands of District Judge Frey, who paid them over to Salm.

Kovacs went to his house. Ten minutes later Salm appeared again and said: "I have just heard that you have deceived us; you have some more money. Unless you hand over the rest at once, I'll have you hanged." The District Judge, who was still there, again interfered, and swore that Kovacs really had no more money to give. Salm made Kovacs kneel down, sing the doxology, and boxed his ears. Then he went away.

Half an hour afterward the Whites came back again, but Kovacs had, meanwhile, succeeded in escaping. When the Whites realized that he was gone, they took his brother-in-law, Alexander Stein, who, according to the statement of all the inhabitants, had been entirely ruined by the Bolsheviks, and, consequently, could not have sympathized with the Bolsheviks, saying to him: "You wretched Jew, we want you, too." Stein was hanged. While the rope was being adjusted it broke. Stein attempted to escape, but was brought back. To punish him, his head was hammered with a stone; then he was again strung up.

Afterward, the Whites went to his house, where they looted 8,000 kronen in cash, jewelry, linen, and clothes. Stein was agent of an English insurance company, and, as such, had money deposited with him; these sums, too, were taken. Salm noticed a pair of new boots, and asked the murdered man's wife whose they were; she answered they were her husband's; whereupon Salm, with the words, "They were his; they are mine," put them on.

A teacher living in Dunaföldvár, Ravasz, accused of having abused the Government, was stripped and hit twenty-five times with a rod in the market place in the presence of the crowd. While receiving this punishment he was forced to sing the doxology. On that same day, George Somlo, the 60-year-old Maurice Braun, and the 70-year-old Leopold Eisenstätter were also stripped and beaten, only because they were Jews. The two latter are still in hospital suffering from severe wounds. Two booksellers, Emanuel Somlo and Frederick Raab, who were found to be in possession of Socialist books, had to buy themselves off from being executed, Somlo by a payment of 20,000 and Raab by a payment of 10,000 kronen. When the Jews were being executed, Konyok, a priest, appeared and swore on the cross on his cassock the condemned were innocent, and begged for mercy for them. But the White officers would not listen to him. Such acts naturally arouse the greatest agitation among the respectable people of Trans-Danubian Hungary.

CEREMONY AT BELGIAN HEADQUARTERS IN HONOR OF THE ARRIVAL OF AMERICAN TROOPS ON BELGIAN SOIL, JULY 3, 1918

How Americans Fought in Belgium

By W. P. CRESSON

[LATE CAPTAIN A. E. F., FORMERLY CHIEF OF THE AMERICAN MILITARY MISSION AT BELGIAN HEADQUARTERS]

THE operations carried out during the Autumn of 1918 by the newly formed army of Flanders, which ended in freeing Belgium from the tyranny of German occupation, were intimately connected with Foch's great final strategical plan. Irresistible pressure exercised at widely distant points along the front—notably the forward movement of the American troops in the Argonne—were all part of the monumental scheme devised by the French High Command. American divisions also participated in loosening the enemy's long hold on Belgian soil and joined in the final struggle along the Scheldt which ended in the evacuation of Ghent and Brussels. Yet the story of the part played by the American Expeditionary Forces in this latter important offensive has never yet been told (so far as the writer is aware) outside the pages of brief official reports and summaries.

Admiral Sims's valuable memoirs have drawn attention to the outstanding importance to the enemy's cause of his submarine lairs established in the ports of Ostend and Zeebrugge and his great naval refitting base of Bruges. For the task of reconquering Belgium, and of finally removing this menace to allied shipping, a separate army known as the "Army of Flanders" was assembled and placed under the command of King Albert in person. Directing the strategy of the allied forces of which this army was composed was one of the best of the French "fighting Generals"—General Degoutte—fresh from a victorious command which included the heroic American divisions who won a place in history at Château-Thierry. Though American troops were not brought into the battle line in Belgium until just before the decisive moments of this forward movement, their participation had been counted on from the beginning.

It was my good fortune to be associated during the entire campaign both with the Belgian General Staff (to which I had long been accredited as General Pershing's personal representative) and also with the Headquarters of the Army of Flanders, which were established near La Panne. I was thus able to follow the whole course of these operations and to take part in the opening assault on Sept. 28, which drove the enemy from the tragic old battlefields of Langemarck and Houthulst Forest. Finally it was my privilege to take part in the royal entry into Brussels and to view the dramatic climax of Belgium's just vengeance—the entry of the Belgian cavalry into the proud imperial city of Aix-la-Chapelle.

COMING OF THE AMERICANS

Following the check of the desperate German offensive along the Lys a new spirit began to animate the allied troops, Belgian, French, and British, who had long shared the monotonous defensive campaign of the Yser front. Rumors, constantly verified, of the successful debarkation in France of American forces, in numbers exceeding all anticipations, and finally the arrival on Belgian soil of two American divisions (the 30th and 27th) filled the entire population of "Free Belgium," both civilian and military, with anticipation of great events to come. Moreover, the "Unity of Command" which General Pershing had so insistently advocated began to give almost immediate results.

On July 4 a little military ceremony took place at the Belgian Headquarters at Houtem to mark the advent of our welcome reinforcements. The American flag was raised and saluted by a guard chosen from the Belgian troops, who had most signally distinguished themselves during the victorious engagement of Kippe (April 17). This battle—in spite of the relatively small numbers engaged—decided the fate of the Ypres salient during the darkest hours of the Lys onslaught, and proved the mettle of the reconstructed Belgian Army. A few days later American troops of the new Second Corps, hastily drawn from the training areas, were placed in support of their British instructors defending Kemmel and the West Poperinghe line.

In contrast to this celebration of our Glorious Fourth came the news that reached us on July 14, most fateful of French national holidays, when Ludendorff's final desperate attempt reached the high-water mark of the Hun invasion. The Lys and Picardy salients both had the coast ports as their objective, and the first result of such a success would have been the capture of the entire Belgian Army and their neighboring allies. But within a few weeks Foch's overmastering strategy and the heroic defense of the "Line of the Mounts" relieved us of our imminent danger. In this dramatic struggle the 30th and 27th American Divisions again played an important rôle in the defense of the little triangle of sacred soil—all that was left of "Free Belgium."

TASK OF ALBERT'S TROOPS

During these anxious days, while our fate was being decided elsewhere, perhaps the greatest trial to which the Belgian Army was subjected was in the patient carrying out of its strategical task—that of remaining on a stubborn defensive. The line held by King Albert's troops between Ypres and the sea—defended by the Yser and its canals—was, by the nature of its obstacles, almost impregnable. The constant vigilance of the Belgian engineers, their skillful handling of the great inundations that formed our chief protection, safely repulsed all danger from a direct offensive on this important front. Indeed, to attack from either side across these "flooded areas" was almost an impossibility. Raids—in which whole companies sometimes took part—were, however, undertaken across the drowned lands by both sides. This happily preserved the morale of our infantry from stagnation.

By September it became apparent that the tide of victory had definitely set in our favor, and a restless desire to share in the promised harvest of military laurels beset the officers and men of our whole sector. On Sept. 13 a High Council, at which Marshal Foch was present, was held at Belgian Headquarters. Within the next few weeks we became by degrees aware that the new "Army of Flanders" under King Albert's command had silently come into being. Along the roads to our rear French, British, and Belgian troops, infantry and artillery, began converging as secretly as possible upon the Belgian front.

The assembling of a great armed force under modern conditions of warfare is at best a difficult enterprise. During these last two weeks of September many a farmer of the Pas de Calais awoke to find his orchard or "wood lot" filled with troops, tired out by their long night's march. Often, if no better shelter was available, the infantry could be found sleeping in long lines in the deceptive shadow of some hedgerow, while their artillery and baggage trains were masked by piles of hay or green branches. From all the evidence we were subsequently able to gather, the attack of the French divisions came as a surprise to the boche armies across the Yser.

BEGINNING THE OFFENSIVE

Events now began to move with surprising rapidity. On Sept. 13 General Degoutte's headquarters were established in La Panne. (A few days later the neighboring town of Bergues—a picturesque relic of Vauban's "barrier fortress"—was heavily bombed by the enemy under the impression that this old masterpiece of military art was the centre of our operations.) From now on I was able through the courtesy of General Degoutte to follow closely the staff operations at the French Headquarters, to which two American officers (Lieutenants Leigh Hunt and Greppo) were attached as liaison officers.

The atmosphere of suspense and mystery surrounding the impending offensive became almost intolerable as the hour of Belgium's vengeance approached. Early in the morning of Sept. 28 a salvo of shots fired from the great guns of the English monitors of the Dunkirk flotilla (which had crept down the coast and anchored opposite La Panne) announced the opening phase of the attack. Their deafening music bombarding the defenses of Ostend and Zeebrugge was echoed by the massed artillery supporting the French divisions in reserve behind the Belgian battlefront. At King Albert's desire, and their own, the brunt of the first day's fighting fell chiefly upon the Belgian divisions. Beyond Ypres their attack blended with the simultaneous assault of General Plumer's Second British Army—a ten-mile front in all.

The irresistible onslaught of these allied forces began at 5:30 A. M. By 9 the first objectives had everywhere been attained, the whole battlefront moving forward from near Dixmude to a point beyond Ypres. I cannot better describe the general tactics of the first day's attack than by attempting some account of the events which passed beneath my own observation.

CONTACT WITH THE ENEMY

It was not until late in the morning of the 28th that my military duties allowed me to leave the vicinity of French and Belgian Headquarters and proceed to the front. The part of the line I proposed to visit was a typical one, that near Dixmude, the "hinge" upon which the enemy's front was being slowly pressed back.

Arriving at Divisional Headquarters, I secured General Bernheim's consent to allow me to accompany a liaison officer just starting on horseback for the sadly famous marshes surrounding Lake Blankkaert. In spite of the fact that an attack had not been seriously contemplated at this point, the Belgian troops through their desire to keep in touch with the division on their right, and through their own initiative and the zeal of their battalion commanders, had pressed forward until they found themselves engaged in an actual hand-to-hand conflict with an enemy whose strong defenses had been but superficially prepared by the artillery. Traces of the struggle were everywhere to be met with as we threaded our way among the shell holes of what a few hours before had been the No Man's Land separating the Belgian trenches from the enemy's first line of defense.

Crossing a little stream known as the Jansbeek, and leaving on our right the collection of ruins marking the village of Merckhem, we reached the broken chaussée of the old road formerly connecting the market town of Woumen with Elverdinghe. The enemy's machine gunners still held the ridge on which Woumen stands, and a constant stream of walking wounded and files of stretcher cases carried on the shoulders of sullen German prisoners showed with what tenacity these German units had been ordered to protect the retirement of the main forces behind. It was these same boche machine gunners—the last heroes which Germany's great adventure was to produce—that later made the crossing of the Scheldt by our troops an operation testing Yankee dash and heroism to the full. Above the ever-receding roar of the enemy's heavy artillery the methodical staccato of their terrible weapons sounded its steady menace. Among the sheltering reeds of the further side of Lake Blankaert and the still flourishing trees of the old castle park other "wasp nests" still unidentified were silently awaiting our further advance.

CHARACTERISTIC BATTLE SCENE

Leaving our horses in the shelter of a captured German "pillbox" (now turned into a ghastly little emergency dressing station), we proceeded on foot toward the ill-defined front line. That we were well under observation was apparent from the bullets that occasionally sang close overhead. Bodies of German infantrymen caught by the fire of our advance lay about in the tall grass.

Beyond, toward Lake Blankaert, birds sang in the trees and the reedy shores offered a picture of peaceful beauty. Yet we were now in the very centre of what had been the most bitterly disputed part portant part in the history of the following days.

IMPEDED BY A STORM

The tornado of wind and rain which broke over the battleline of the Army of Flanders at the end of the first day's offensive, Sept 29, greatly impeded the development of the operations so successfully carried out by King Albert's troops. Had it been physically possible to bring into line the French supporting divisions and the Belgian cavalry (which under General Degoutte's plan were to exploit the capture of the first objectives) the enemy would probably have been readily thrown back from the high ground of Clercken Ridge and Houthulst Forest. But the extraordinary weather conditions, the quagmires of mud and the streams and canals swollen by the down-pour across which our troops were forced to advance, enabled the enemy to retire in good order from their front line positions.

It would have been hard to imagine a picture of deeper gloom than that presented by headquarters of the Army of Flanders following the first day's attack. To the news that a whole division of Belgian cavalry had bogged down during the night on the road we had followed the day before was added the report that even the field telephone and other means of communication with the advancing army had been put out of commission by the extraordinary weather conditions. Nevertheless, all the information that came through from the front tended to confirm the extent and completeness of the victory won. Heroic details were, moreover, not lacking in the fragmentary accounts we were able to obtain of this opening phase of the Flanders campaign.

Near Houthulst Forest a Walloon regiment, finding itself face to face with Saxon troops bearing the numbers of the unit which wrote such a dark page of history during the Dinant massacres of 1914, succeeded in partially surrounding them during their retirement. Little did the brutal victors of four years before, who had driven a screen of helpless civilians at the point of the bayonet before their advancing columns, dream that the of the entire battlefront, where the Belgian loss relatively to the forces engaged was the heaviest. The park of the château just beyond us was still strongly held by the enemy's machine gunners. To attack such a position in daylight against an enemy sheltered by the overgrown jungle of the old gardens would have been sheer madness. Yet we found the young Lieutenant commanding the little garrison of a captured pillbox facing this point, with difficulty preventing his men from "carrying-on" regardless of the unknown danger. After giving him all the news that was possible and leaving directions for continuing the attack at nightfall we returned to headquarters in the face of the rising storm, which was to play such an im-final reckoning would be so complete and overwhelming. Scarcely a prisoner was taken during the fury of the Belgians' just revenge, and the short trench knives, which the Walloon infantry have inherited from the Spanish in Flanders, played a terrible rôle in this wholesale military execution.

RATIONS BY AIRPLANE

As the day advanced it became apparent that many of our forward units, after consuming their emergency rations, were in imminent danger of being placed hors de combat through lack of food. To revictual these troops along the obliterated roads or to reinforce them by ordinary means of transport seemed an impossibility. It was the resourcefulness of Colonel van Cronbregge, commanding the Belgian aviation, that saved many of these heroes from starvation in this moment of their victory. The least accessible points of the front were supplied with bread and canned meat rations dropped like manna from the skies by bombing planes. Belgian and English airmen flying low in the face of enemy machine-gun fire succeeded in carrying out this difficult mission.

In spite of the obstacles met with in reinforcing and provisioning the troops engaged, the Belgians on Sept. 21 took the towns of Zarren, Staden, and Morslede. On Sept. 30 Roulers itself was taken, while the British completed their occupation of the Passchendaele Ridge. By Oct. 2 the full force of the supporting French divisions was brought into play, and the Army of Flanders, operating on the splendid roads along which the Germans were retreating, began the series of masterly operations which ended in the freedom of Lille and Tourcoing.

AMERICAN DIVISIONS ARRIVE

On Oct. 16 I returned from a mission to the American Grand Headquarters in time to assist in the arrival of the two American divisions—the 91st and the 37th—which had been assigned to the Army of Flanders to aid in the operations designed finally to clear Belgium of the enemy's forces. Already evidence was not wanting that the Germans were preparing to give up the formidable defenses of the Flanders coast, on which but a few weeks before their chief hope of victory had been based. But, although a complete abandonment of Belgium was a foregone conclusion, every indication pointed to a determined resistance during the enemy's retreat, and his intention to use to the full this last opportunity to inflict all possible damage. The wide extension of the front brought about by the advance of the Army of Flanders in the direction of Roulers and Thourout made essential its reinforcement by the two large American divisions now brought into line.

The first American units began to arrive at Dunkirk on Oct. 18, and on the same day Bruges was evacuated by the German forces. On the 19th I had the honor of presenting General Johnson, commanding the 91st Division, to General Degoutte, and afterward accompanied him to the Divisional Headquarters he intended to occupy near Ypres. On Oct. 21 General Farnsworth, commanding the 37th, also visited the headquarters of the Army of Flanders at La Panne.

The picture afforded by our two great divisions—almost twice the size of the war-worn divisions of our allies—as they marched through the ruined streets and squares of Ypres was perhaps one of the most significant, even dramatic, events of our participation in the war. Certainly no spectacle calculated to stir the crusading spirit which had brought the Americans overseas could have been better imagined than the via crucis of that Belgian road from Ypres to Wareghem. In a drizzle of rain and mist they passed before the shattered remnants of the splendid old Cloth Hall, then out across the "blasted heath" of the battlefields of Langemarck and Poelcappelle.

As I looked in the faces of these men of our Far and Middle West it was easy to read the effect produced by the tragic scene of this massacred countryside. By October 24 the 37th and 91st Divisions occupied a line astride the Oudenarde Road, following part of the railway line from Courtrai to Thielt. The embankment of the destroyed line, about twelve feet high and a hundred in width, was in many places the No Man's Land separating the German first line and the American attacking forces.

It was across this formidable obstacle that the American divisions were called upon to make their first attack—with Oudenarde and the Escaut as their principal objectives.

FIRST AMERICAN ATTACK

On Oct. 31 at 5:30 A. M. the American divisions made their first attack upon the German troops, stubbornly defending the retreat of the divisions to the south of Ghent. During the next five days of fighting the brunt of the assault was borne by "ours," who gladly accepted the dangerous honor of forcing a crossing of the southern branch of the Scheldt, locally known as the Escaut. The right of the American line was held by the 91st Division in conjunction with the 128th French Division. The 37th American Division, with the 12th French Division, occupied their left.

After heavy artillery preparation the 37th advanced behind a well-timed barrage, (high explosive and shrapnel), to which the enemy replied with a heavy gas barrage. Through this obstacle the Allies continued steadily to progress, and at 8:15 reports reached headquarters that the first objective had been successfully taken. The enemy nevertheless continued to defend himself with desperation, notably about the village of Olsen and the high ridge between the Lys and the Escaut. At some cost our troops captured Olsen, where the civilian population, which the enemy had taken no steps to evacuate, suffered a severe bombardment. Between 10 and 11 the important village of Chrysohotem and its neighboring ridge were evacuated by the enemy, who left 317 prisoners, including eleven officers, in the hands of our troops.

While these events were taking place the 91st Division—supported by General Price's brigade of Pennsylvania artillery—after rushing the enemy from their defenses along the railway, advanced through a rough and broken country covered with low fir trees, in which the enemy's machine gunners made a last stand. This fighting, to which our troops had been schooled by their recent experiences in the Argonne, while costly, ended in a perfectly timed capture of the indicated objectives. Smoke screens were successfully used in many places to conceal our attack.*

On Nov. 1 the attack was renewed along the whole line, and by 11 A. M. the American divisions had consolidated a position parallel to the Escaut about a mile from that stream. The night was passed in preparations to cross this difficult obstacle. Nov. 2 saw the climax of the American effort in Flanders. In the face of fierce machine-gun fire from the heights beyond, small detachments of the 37th reached the banks of the Escaut as early as 3 A. M. The crossing of this broad and deep river was one of the heroic feats of the war.

Small parties were able to reach the opposite banks by swimming in the face of a raking fire from the machine-gun nests arranged on tiers on the broad slope beyond. Others crossed by means of trees so felled that they partially bridged the stream. Although, from the nearly demolished village of Heurne, our men protected these courageous efforts by rifle and machine-gun fire, it was not until late afternoon that the 145th Infantry (forming part of the 37th Division) was able to establish a bridgehead on the opposite bank. In the meantime their attack was impeded by a terrific gas bombardment. One regiment of the 91st also succeeded in crossing at a point further up the river.

The morning of the 3d thus found two American divisions in a position to place their entire strength beyond the formidable obstacle offered by the Scheldt. The actual crossing in force was still disputed by machine-gun fire and enemy bombing machines, which, with some courage, flew low over their advancing columns. Later in the day the 12th French Division was able to cross a bridge built by the American engineers.

The town of Oudenarde, whose outskirts had been captured after fierce hand-to-hand fighting by troops of the 91st Division, offered a point of considerable resistance. The part held by the Americans, including the quarter surrounding the ancient church and the famous Hôtel de Ville, was subjected to a ferocious bombardment by enemy gas shells, to which many of the residents hiding in their cellars fell victims.

The houses lining the opposite bank of the Escaut, which runs through the town, were tenaciously held by the enemy's machine gunners, effectually preventing any crossing in spite of repeated heroic efforts. Again and again our soldiers (most of them troops from California, Nevada, and Oregon) attempted to cross in the face of almost certain death, throwing themselves from the windows of the houses overhanging the stream and trying to gain a foothold on the slimy masonry of the old buildings on the opposite bank. Heroic efforts were also made by our engineers to rebuild the destroyed bridges, but the enemy, using his advantage to the full, prevented the success of these ventures. An attack planned by General Johnson to force a crossing by swimming the river in company front was happily rendered unnecessary by the cessation of operations, due to the armistice.

Shortly after the armistice I had the honor of accompanying King Albert on a visit to the Headquarters of the 37th and 91st Divisions. The Royal Commander in Chief of the Army of Flanders was received with rousing cheers by the American troops under his command. In company with Generals Farnsworth and Johnson he visited the scenes of the struggle along the Escaut, where the green slopes were still freshly torn and furrowed by the shell fire of our guns—and by little mounds of new-turned earth more eloquent still. Later, surrounded by General Johnson's staff, he addressed the mixed crowd of soldiers and civilians fraternizing in the public square of Oudenarde. Standing on the balcony of the splendid Hôtel de Ville, the King paid a touching tribute to the men, who, in the square before us, had traveled so far to lay down their lives for the defense of liberty and right.

The King of the Belgians, the first reigning sovereign to visit the United States, is the only monarch who has ever held command over American troops.

The Betrayal of Edith Cavell

Trial and Conviction of Quien, the Spy Who, After Receiving Aid From Her, Caused Her Death

GEORGES GASTON QUIEN, charged with having had intelligence with the enemy and betraying Edith Cavell and others to the Germans, appeared for trial before the sixth court-martial of Paris on Aug. 25, 1919, and on Sept. 5 was convicted and condemned to death. Fifty-eight witnesses had been summoned by the prosecution, including Brand Whitlock, United States Minister at Brussels, and Mlle. Thuillez, whom the Germans had condemned to be shot with Miss Cavell, but who was saved by the King of Spain. While posing as a French officer seeking to escape from Brussels into Holland Quien had gathered information against those who befriended him and had returned to Brussels and denounced the whole of Miss Cavell's organization to the Germans.

The official report of the charges brought against Quien throws an interesting light on the organization for aiding British, French, and Belgian soldiers to escape from the territories held by the Germans into Holland, of which Edith Cavell was the central figure. Quien, who was 40 years of age, was serving in St. Quentin jail his third term of imprisonment when the Germans took possession of the town in August, 1914. He was discharged from prison on Sept. 14, 1914. He found himself penniless in a town under the rigors of martial law.

According to the report, Quien was not long in choosing a means of livelihood. The Germans needed spies among the French population, and, as witness at the trial testified, Quien was soon observed to be spending riotous evenings in company with German soldiers, returning to his own quarters when he chose, although it was obligatory for all inhabitants of the town to be in their homes by 10 o'clock at night. In March, 1915, the Germans sent Quien ostensibly as one of a large number of civilian prisoners to Landrecies. He was allowed every liberty by his jailers, and went where he wished in the town. It was there that he met a girl named Jeanne Balligan, who was working for Miss Cavell's organization, and who in purest good faith and supposing him to be loyal offered to help him to escape, and gave him information as to the means whereby British, French, and Belgian soldiers and patriotic young men anxious to escape from the German grip were being continuously passed northward through Belgium into Holland under the noses of the German Kommandanturen.

Up to that time the secret had been rigorously kept. The German authorities knew that numbers of British and French officers and men, wounded or stragglers, had been left behind their front during the retreat from Mons, and knew that men were constantly being passed out of the country into neutral territory. They did not know that Miss Cavell's ambulance in Brussels was the headquarters of the organization, and that the Château of Bellignies, belonging to Prince Reginald of Croy, who was living there with the Princess Marie, his sister, was a half-way house between the German lines and Holland, through which nearly all the fugitives passed.

"Generally each member of the association," says the report, "worked in carefully defined limits, and knew nothing of what happened to the fugitives confided to their care after their personal task was accomplished. They had to take fugitives from a certain point to another certain point, there to leave them in charge of a given person. This person they could of course recognize, but often did not know his real name. Beyond this they knew nothing of the association of which they were members."

By working himself into the confidence of Jeanne Balligan, Quien was able to reach the Château of Bellignies and to meet the Prince and Princess of Croy, to whom he represented himself as a French officer. From Bellignies, his credentials being considered sufficient, he was passed on to Mons with another fugitive, a certain M. Motte, to the care of local agents of the association, one of whom, Mlle. Thuillez, was among the principal witnesses against him. Next day Mlle. Thuillez took both men to Brussels, where she introduced Quien to Miss Cavell at her hospital.

Quien's first step was to demand money. Miss Cavell gave him 300 francs, not without surprise that he should ask for so much from her, seeing that once across the Dutch border he, being, as she supposed, a French officer, could obtain what he needed from the nearest French Consulate. He remained in Brussels about a fortnight. Miss Cavell could have sent him into Holland within two or three days, but he put off his departure, pretending that he would make his escape in company with certain agents of the Brussels police. During this time he learned to know the members of the organization and the houses and hotels where they could shelter the hunted men.

Miss Cavell finally decided to get rid of him. She confided her embarrassment to Mme. Baudart, a member of the association, through whose agency he was conveyed with sixteen other fugitives to Holland. In Holland Quien presented himself to the French Military Attaché, who believed his story that he was a French officer, and gave him 500 francs.

Quien immediately returned to Brussels, and saw Miss Cavell, who sent him to Mme. Baudart. It was at this meeting that Quien learned the address of the architect Baucq, Miss Cavell's chief collaborator, who shared her tragic fate. Two days later M. Baucq was arrested at his house, together with young Baudart and Mlle. Thuillez. Quien, according to the prosecution, delivered not only these three to the German police but several others connected with the association, who were arrested during the next few days. The Princess Croy was condemned by the Germans to ten years' imprisonment at hard labor. Quien had told Mme. Jacobs, another member of the organization and a friend of Mme. Baudart, that M. Baucq would not escape condemnation, and that Miss Cavell was about to be arrested. She was arrested on Aug. 5.

After bringing about the break-up of this organization, Quien remained in the service of the German espionage system until 1917, when he returned to France through Switzerland. He was immediately arrested and imprisoned on a charge of theft, and on his release, being of military age, was sent to serve in the special group in French North Africa. It was not until the release of Miss Cavell's associates from German prisons that the espionage charges were brought against him.

ECHOES OF CAVELL AFFAIR

Since the condemnation of Quien further details of the Cavell organization have come to light with the publication of a remarkable story told by Père Meeus, a heroic Belgian priest, one of the editors of the clandestine La Libre Belgique and an associate of Miss Cavell in her patriotic and dangerous activities. Prisoners who were escaping, he said, were taken into Brussels in disguise and there met by "La Grande Espionne," a little girl of 11, who carried a big doll, ran about, and gazed into shop windows, till she finally stopped before Miss Cavell's house, where the disguised soldiers had followed her. The arriving soldiers were here bandaged up as hospital cases, and introduced to Père Meeus, who would get them across the frontier.

Some of this daring priest's adventures and disguises are equally interesting. Once, as a cattle driver, he got to Ostend and found the real lurking place of the German submarines. It was known that previous to an air raid into England it was the custom of the officers of the Zeppelins and Gothas to meet at dinner. Père Meeus disguised himself as a pastry cook and thus was able to find out when such dinners were to be given, and by means of carrier pigeons sent into Holland to inform the British Admiralty by 6 P. M. of an impending raid.

It was only by chance that the priest was not taken with Miss Cavell. He was to have attended a conference with her, but Cardinal Mercier had sent for him to get an important message into Holland, and thus he was forced to be absent on the night the nurse was arrested.

It was announced at Brussels on Nov. 10 that the cells occupied by Edith Cavell and Gabrielle Petit, another victim of the German rage, were to be transformed into miniature museums by decision of the Court of Justice. Clothes worn by the two women, their books, and other belongings have been collected and placed in the cells. Plates bearing appropriate inscriptions will be attached to the doors.

Repairing the Ravages of War

Progress in Rebuilding the Devastated Areas of France and Belgium

RECONSTRUCTION of the war-torn regions of Europe is slowly but surely taking shape. France is devoting all her energy to hasten the work, and has established a group of co-operative societies whose duties are to repair the material damage done by the invading Germans.

The reconstruction work—"reconstitution" the French call it—falls into three distinct divisions—agricultural, providing for the peasants and farmers of the devastated areas; industrial, providing for the machinery in the mills and factories, and the village, town, and planning work, providing for the housing of the repatriated French. The channels through which this task is being accomplished are three—the French Government, the French organizations, functioning through individual efforts of Frenchmen, and the various relief societies supported in the main by Americans. Altogether the total damage in the north of France, including agriculture, industry, furniture, and public works, is estimated at about $15,000,000,000.

In July, 1919, a vast reconstruction program for the whole of France at an estimated cost of 40,000,000,000 francs was announced in the Chamber of Deputies by M. Bedouce, budget reporter, in a debate on public works. The plan included the reconstruction of railroads, some of which would be electrified, and large projects for building canals and improving harbors. M. Bedouce stated that the public works budget for the year 1919 amounted to 1,600,000,000 francs, as compared with 300,000,000 in 1914. For road repairs in the invaded areas 176,000,000 francs had been allocated, and these were to receive primary attention. The entire road construction program will cost nearly 2,000,000,000 francs.

Albert Claville, Minister of Public Works, told the Chamber that in Alsace-Lorraine all the mines save one were in working order; they could not all be put into full operation, however, owing to the scarcity of furnace coke, the Germans having failed to carry out their obligations under the terms of the armistice to supply a specified quantity per day of suitable coke. Marked progress also in restoring the transportation systems was shown in M. Claville's report to President Poincaré. Since the armistice 564 miles of double-track railway lines and 567 miles of single-track lines had been restored on the North and East Railway. Of 645 miles of canals that were closed to navigation, 198 miles had been opened to commerce. Seven thousand miles of highway had been put in good condition out of 24,000 miles of roads that were damaged.

IN NORTHERN FRANCE

The remaking of Northern France is progressing rapidly. A year ago not a building in Arras was unscathed; whole districts were leveled, cathedrals, churches, institutions, the railway station, all were in ruins. By the Autumn of 1919 the station had been restored, and in nearly all the houses injured by shells, business and residential, occupations had been resumed. Light railways had been constructed to carry away the débris and bring back refashioned masonry. For this work German prisoners are employed. A beginning has been made toward rebuilding the Hôtel de Ville and the ruined churches. This labor is being done by the Belgians.

The Entreprise Général d'Etude, with kindred organizations, has educated the French in the north in the work of restoration; it has been carrying on an active propaganda since 1917, and last Autumn gave an exhibition at Amiens of the means of restoring the devastated regions, or of making arrangements to meet temporary needs. The main idea behind the French scheme is economy and speed in construction, not only of houses, but of temporary schools, churches, and hospitals.

The situation of the French invaded provinces, however, compares unfavorably with conditions in parts of Belgium. The inhabitants last Spring asked, without success, that the whole undertaking be placed under one administration with full power; later they made an attempt to take matters into their own hands, in a spirit of sectionalism that was not popular with the administration. In the Summer about a hundred Mayors of the communes of the Pas de Calais met in Arras and drew up a statement to the effect that, in spite of the promises of the administration, an insufficient number of huts had been furnished, and that unless the situation were remedied immediately an evacuation of the district in September must be faced. In order to help them, M. Lebrun, Minister of the Liberated Regions, allotted to them a section of the Service of Work of Prime Urgency, which was charged with supplying the most urgent needs and distributing huts as temporary dwellings. There was still some dissatisfaction in the last months of the year.

At the beginning of 1919 American engineers, architects, and builders who went to France with proposals for reconstruction were received rather coldly, and were told that the work would be done by the French. But by the end of the year it was realized that help was needed from other countries. The desire for cooperation was expressed by Hector Franchomme, one of the chief manufacturers of Lille. His plant was almost totally destroyed, the damage to his factory buildings amounting to 2,000,000 francs, for which he has received in reparation only a quarter of a million, and that is far above the average. France, he says, is now not only unable to meet the needs of the situation in a financial way, but also lacks materials and skilled engineers and architects.

The first contract for reconstruction work apparently was given to the Vulcan Steel Products Company of New York City for rebuilding the war-destroyed area in the Nancy district. Associated with the Vulcan company are two large contracting concerns, the McClintic Marshall Construction Company and MacArthur Brothers Company. The contract at tentative figures involves $250,000,000, but it is estimated that half a billion dollars will be spent. It calls for replacing public buildings, factories, houses, roads, bridges, and churches.

The country around Verdun, battered and fought over again and again, is to be restored by the Society of Friends. The American Red Cross already in 1917 found English Quakers all through the valley of the Marne and groups in the Somme. They found the work so satisfactory that later they co-operated with American Quakers, adding a million francs to their budget. The Quakers had experience, they were on the spot, and already at work.

The ruined City of Verdun will probably be left as a monument to German guns, and a new town built outside the old walls. Eight hundred houses—small, red-tiled, white or brown walled, with two, three, or four rooms—have been set up in Northeastern France by the Quakers. Several hundred partially ruined houses and stables have been repaired, and likewise hundreds of thrashers, reapers, binders, and other machines that had been lying about rusting have been restored. Nineteen out of twenty refugees from the Verdun villages wanted to go back to their former homes. Three thousand families will eventually return to the Verdun region.

In an article in the Berliner Tageblatt

it has been proposed to use the tank, the tested war machine, for aims of peace. Not only can the tank cross ground unsuitable for the ordinary vehicle, but it can haul ten tons, and it may be fitted with a crane or a windlass and will then be able to lift objects weighing approximately two tons. These suggestions originated with Louis Renault, the inventor of the French tank. Experiments have also been made with tanks in wrecking crumbling walls instead of taking them down in the old way.

In the building of houses, foundation holes for rows of buildings are being dug with machines in the same manner as trenches during the war. The French have for a number of years studied the problem of using substitute materials the manufacture of which calls for as little coal as possible. The aim is to build walls with hollow bricks or frames, which are afterward filled in solidly with cement. This method had already been employed in the construction of the New York Grand Central Terminal.

It is planned to build houses in Lens with cement blocks. Also the French have turned to the use of sun-dried clay, to save materials in the manufacture of which coal is used. They have established special courses to improve the old methods in building clay houses, for the construction of small settlements and villages.

RESULTS IN ELEVEN MONTHS

According to a pamphlet, "France: The Reconstruction," issued in New York with the indorsement of Maurice Casanove, director of the French Mission in the United States, 90 per cent. of the double-track railroad lines in France and 93 per cent. of the single track had been restored by Sept. 1, 1919. Of the 1,160 railway bridges and tunnels destroyed, 588 had been reconstructed. Work on the waterways had been nearly completed, and a large part of the damage to highways had been repaired. The pamphlet gave these further facts and figures of interest:

The total number of houses partially or wholly destroyed was 550,000. Up to Sept. 1, 1919, the following results had been accomplished: Temporarily repaired, 80,000; shelters provided, 16,225; shelters under construction, 60,000; total, 156,225. Nearly a million of the people who fled from their homes at the time of the invasion have returned, and out of 4,023 communities which were invaded, municipal administration has been resumed in 3,872.

Of the total area of the invaded territory of France, 6,950 square miles of tillable lands were devastated by military operations. By Sept. 1, 1919, 1,540 square miles, an area larger than the State of Rhode Island, had been made fit for cultivation. Much of this work has been performed under handicap of barbed wire, trenches, and the constant danger from unexploded shells. Since the signing of the armistice, however, more than 25,000 acres have been cleared of barbed wire and approximately 74,000,000 cubic yards of trench excavations have been filled in.

The republic has already expended more than 10,000,000,000 francs in restoring the devastated regions, and it is reported at present to be advancing about 1,000,000,000 francs, or $193,000,000, a month for reconstruction.

Before the war the invaded areas furnished from 20 to 25 per cent. of the total revenue of the country. The restoration of this territory in addition to Alsace-Lorraine, and the fact that the manhood of the nation is returning to productive pursuits, will greatly increase the taxing power of the Government. During the first eight months of 1919, 5,100,000,000 francs ($984,300,000) were collected from taxes, representing an increase of 1,400,000,000 francs ($270,200,000), as compared with the corresponding period in 1918.

IN BELGIUM

The work of reconstruction in Belgium is moving slowly, according to Adolphe Max, Burgomaster of Brussels, and it will take at least five years for the return of normal conditions. Other Belgian officials are more optimistic and declare that Belgium will be richer than ever in ten years. What Belgium needs more than foreign money is raw materials—leather, rubber, wool, cotton, steel, &c.

There is still havoc in Belgium's factories caused by the Germans' removal or destruction of the plants, and though many are working, hundreds are still desolate. Moreover, there has been an exodus of workmen to France from districts where the factories are either closed down or not working to full capacity, owing to the temptation of high wages offered by the French. A Belgian laborer can get 11,000 francs a year in France instead of a third of that in Belgium.

The spirit of the Belgians is good; strikes are almost unknown, Socialist Ministers in the Cabinet having played an essential part in discouraging strike tendencies among the workers.

The organization of transport is proceeding steadily; the canal system is being repaired in a fairly rapid way, and the entire Belgian railway is working, except for some fifty unimportant kilometers. Temporary bridges and wooden stations are in general use, although the rebuilding of permanent structures is in progress. On main lines like that between Brussels and Antwerp the passenger service reaches about three-quarters of the pre-war service, elsewhere three-fifths to one-fifth. Of the 74,000 freight cars, one-sixth are under repair. Before the war there were 82,000 cars and only 5 per cent. ordinarily under repair.

BRUSSELS AND ANTWERP

Conditions in Brussels seem more hopeful than in the devastated areas; business is fast reviving. A considerable amount of reconstruction has been done in the country as a whole, in spite of the impossibility of rebuilding such cities as Ypres and Dixmude. The future of Ypres is still uncertain. There are more than a thousand people living there, but these are mainly adventurers attracted by the chance of making money out of visitors.

The port of Antwerp is busy once more; commerce is starting up and Belgian exports are mounting again, especially coal. The output is not far short of pre-war figures. France, which needs coal desperately, gets the main bulk of the Belgian output, and it is for that reason that for the first time in history the Belgian franc is worth more than the French.

The small farmers of Belgium are prosperous as never before and receive enormous prices for their products. Virtually all the glass factories are in operation; 30 per cent. of the textile looms are spinning raw cotton imported from the United States and her beet sugar industry has substantially increased.

Belgium seizes every opportunity to add to the grass acreage when this can be done to advantage—when the land reclaimed is better suited for agriculture than for forestry. In the sand belt of Campine, agricultural reclamations have proceeded alongside the afforestation projects, and with equal success have transformed the wastes of sand dunes, marshes and heather into crop-producing land.

CONSTRUCTIVE KULTUR

It is said that a large staff of experts in Germany are pushing work on preliminary plans for the restoration of devastated Northern France and Belgium. These plans are to be submitted to the Allies. The work of the organization is being pushed, so that if accepted wholly or in part, the restoration can be begun immediately.

It is an atonement scheme, and the experts declare Germany will have no trouble raising an army of 500,000 high grade laborers, and could recruit, if necessary, 1,000,000 volunteer workmen. The tentative scheme bars anything like slave labor, peonage, or the drafting of workmen. The restoration work is to be purely a State enterprise, and is to eliminate all private profiteering in furnishing materials and labor. The best results, the experts say, will be attainable only by free union labor, receiving union wages and working union hours under a high standard of living conditions. Special inducements are offered, such as free clothing and equipment, the promise of good rations, and free housing in attractive sanitary barracks.

German Socialists and labor leaders see in the obligatory restoration of France and Belgium a great opportunity of convincing the world of Germany's good faith and new spirit. One labor leader said: "We are anxious to show the world what we can do to atone for the sins of the old régime by doing a monumental piece of Kultur work of which we may justly be proud."

Winning Freedom for Alsace-Lorraine

How the National Council Held Out Against German Repression Throughout the War

By COUNT JEAN DE PANGE

The part played by the Lower House of the Alsace-Lorraine Parliament in checkmating German imperial measures and holding the disputed provinces in a position for their full return to France was told by Count de Pange in the Revue des Deux Mondes and is here translated in somewhat abridged form for CURRENT HISTORY.

AT the moment when the legitimate claims of Alsace and Lorraine are being satisfied, it is not without interest to place before the eyes of the public the history of the "National Council of Alsace and Lorraine," the name borne by the Lower House of the Alsace-Lorraine Parliament since the revolutionary coup d'état of Nov. 11, 1918, delivered the supreme power into its hands. Elected by universal suffrage, it was the only body which really represented the population of France's new province. Its history, little known in France and elsewhere, will enable the reader to appreciate the part played by this assembly, which did great service to the cause of France, and which, on transferring its powers to the French authorities, traced out the way that France was destined to follow in her administration of these provinces.

This is the first and only chamber elected by universal suffrage in Alsace and Lorraine. The distrust which it inspired in the rulers of the German Empire appeared clearly in the powers which the latter reserved to itself with a view to stifling all desire for independence. Though the Constitution which the Germans drafted and had voted by the Reichstag in 1911 granted a Parliament to the imperial province, the latter still remained subject to the rule of a "Statthalter," an agent of the Emperor, who appointed and dismissed him at his pleasure. The Reichstag had vainly proposed to the Federal Council that the Statthalter should be appointed for life, which would have assured him relative independence. The Emperor also appointed half of the thirty-eight members of the Upper Chamber. The other half included the Bishops of Strasbourg and Metz, the President of the Upper Consistory of the Church of the Confession of Augsburg, the President of the Synodal Committee of the Reformed Church, a delegate of the Jewish Consistories, the President of the Court of Appeals of Colmar, a university professor, representatives of the Agricultural Councils of the Departments, Municipal Councils and Chambers of Commerce of Strasbourg, Metz, Colmar, and Mülhouse. This small conservative Senate, where the Government's majority was assured, to use the words of the German Chancellor Bethmann Hollweg, was "to be, at all costs, a rampart against all non-German policy in the imperial province."

AN INSTRUMENT OF LIBERTY

But the Second, or Lower, Chamber, elected for five years by universal suffrage, marked considerable progress over that of the previous régime, when the country was represented only by a delegation (Landesausschutz) elected by limited suffrage. The Second Chamber counted 60 members, divided into four groups—the Lorrainers (11), the Centre (28), the Liberals (10), and the Socialists (11). The Lorrainers and the Centre, generally associated, made up the majority. On Dec. 6, 1911, in his opening address, the President, M. Ricklin, declared:

We are opening the first session of the Parliament of Alsace-Lorraine, this Parliament which the people of Alsace and Lorraine have elected on the basis of universal, equal, secret suffrage, and not only Germany, but the whole political world, will have their eyes fixed on our deliberations.

The Lower House soon began to justify the anxieties which the Prussian conservatives had expressed when it was created. On Dec. 7, 1912, it interpellated the Government concerning the annulment of orders given by the Imperial Bureau of Railways to the Alsatian Society of Mechanical Construction. This was a French enterprise, which, since the annexation of the provinces to Germany, had kept up its factory at Grafenstaden, near Strasbourg, where it employed more than 2,000 workmen, "amongst whom," to quote from the charges brought against the association, "native Alsatians are preferred to Germans." Its director, M. Heyler, "combats in the commune everything which is German or connected with Germanism." He was also accused of having displayed a French flag at a festival and of having allowed the "Marseillaise" to be sung. But in spite of the long requisition of the Under Secretary of State, M. Mandel, the Chamber voted an order of the day in which it "blamed in the most energetic way the attitude of the Government of Alsace-Lorraine." It also insisted that in future the Government "should defend in the most effective way the interests of Alsace-Lorraine and should use every means to repair the injury done to the Alsatian Society."

Such language, to which the Government was not accustomed, showed that the imperial province had undergone an evolution. The Second Chamber had gained the consciousness that it was the interpreter of the country. On Jan. 15, 1914, it voted unanimously an order of the day reproaching the Government for not having sought more energetically to obtain satisfaction for offenses committed against the people of Alsace-Lorraine, and demanding autonomy for the country, the reform of military justice, and the limitation of military power in conformity with modern ideas.

OUTBREAK OF THE WAR

As a logical consequence of this attitude, following the mobilization and the establishment of the state of siege, when all powers were given over to the military authorities, these authorities declared that they would prevent the recurrence of "certain agitated sessions of the Landtag." The council was thus pitilessly gagged by a régime which, four years later, the Alsace-Lorraine Deputies judged in the following terms:

The military régime, with a despotism destitute of all consideration, has stifled the whole political life of the country, suspended the organization of all parties, suppressed the freedom of association and of the press, and even despoiled the Landtag of Alsace-Lorraine of its constitutional rights. Thus for four years the expression of all public opinion has been made impossible.

In 1915 the convocation of the Landtag was made subject to the following conditions: The session should not last more than a week; in the plenary sessions and at committee meetings there should be no criticism of military measures; no mention of any political question should be made of any nature whatsoever. As a matter of fact, the Landtag session was so short that the Assembly had time only to vote the credits without discussion. The High Command laid down the same conditions for the session of 1916. On the arising of opposition of the parties of the Lower Chamber, it was finally agreed that discussion would be allowed at strictly secret sessions of the Budget Committee. The stenographic account of those meetings, recently printed, brings to our ears the echo of the moving complaints provoked by the barbarity with which the inhabitants of Alsace-Lorraine were treated by the German military authorities.

The latter, before the war, in their secret reports to the Military Council of the Kaiser, had constantly depicted Alsace-Lorraine as an enemy country. When mobilization occurred, the civil authorities had to issue a warning that a single shot from a house would be sufficient to warrant the burning of the house and the shooting of its owner. * * * The feeling of the German military officials regarding the provinces was summed up by the German General Gaede, who, in response to a plea in favor of the people made by one of the Vice Presidents of the Lower Chamber, said: "In all this population a treacherous current flows."

At the beginning of 1917 the Pan-

German circles, disquieted by the state of mind which the multiplicity of convictions revealed in the imperial province, began more and more to favor suppressing the relative autonomy which the province had enjoyed since 1911. They spoke openly of giving Lorraine to Prussia, Lower Alsace to Bavaria, and Upper Alsace to the Grand Duchy of Baden or Württemberg. By dismembering these provinces their capacity of resistance would be diminished, and it was hoped that each of them would be swiftly absorbed by the German organization to which it was delivered. Negotiations to this end had already been begun in the Bundesrat, the Federal Council, in which the different German States were to decide on the fate of the imperial province before presenting their proposals to the Reichstag for ratification.

It was in this oppressive atmosphere of disquietude that on June 6, 1917, the fifth session of the Landtag opened. The liberal members of the Imperial Government, and, above all, Chancellor von Bethmann Hollweg, sought to defend the Constitution of Alsace-Lorraine against this coalition of greed, and made every effort to obtain from the two Chambers a declaration of loyalty. In the Upper Chamber, still devoted to the ruling power, this was an easy matter. Its President, Dr. Hoeffel, in his address closing the session, lauded the benefits of the German rule, and insisted on the economic, ethnographic, and linguistic bonds which united Alsace-Lorraine to the empire. But of what value were these declarations of a Chamber, half of whose members were appointed by the Emperor?

DECLARATION OF LOYALTY

It was accordingly on the Lower Chamber that the Government concentrated all its efforts. At a secret session it had a German liberal member propose a declaration of loyalty to Germany. Abbé Müller replied that such a declaration could not be asked from the Alsations, after all the bad treatment to which they had been subjected, and which had literally thrown them into the arms of France. The Secretary of State, Herr von Tschammer, who was present at the discussion, then renounced the attempt, which he himself had provoked, and the proposal, opposed by the Centre, the Socialists, and the Lorrainers, failed of acceptance.

The passing of such a declaration, however, was considered so important that the German Chancellor himself came to Strasbourg and persuaded the President of the Lower Chamber, M. Ricklin, to make this concession. On June 12, at the closing of the session, to the great astonishment of all present, (many members, especially the Lorrainers, suspecting what was coming, had left,) he made the following statement:

The people of Alsace-Lorraine reject absolutely the idea that the frightful bloodshed of this war should be continued on their account; they aspire only to develop their culture, their economic and political interests, and to maintain, in indissoluble union with the German Empire, the special situation to which they are entitled.

This declaration was at once seized on by the Germans for worldwide propaganda. It made a painful impression on the French.

ELEVENTH-HOUR CONCESSIONS

It was only at the moment when the empire was succumbing under its defeats and the defection of its allies that it resigned itself to granting autonomy to Alsace-Lorraine. On Oct. 5, 1918, the new Chancellor, Max von Baden, in explaining his program to the Reichstag, declared: "The empire is essentially a Federal State, each member of which determines independently its internal Constitution, a right which Alsace-Lorraine may also claim absolutely." It was announced at the same time that the imperial empire would be given a Ministry made up of Alsations and presided over by M. Hauss, a Catholic Deputy from Lower Alsace, who knew France well, and who was one of the most prominent members of the autonomist party. On Oct. 9 Herr von Dallwitz, who had fought with all his energies against these projects of autonomy, abandoned the post of Statthalter, and Herr von Tschammer resigned his functions as Secretary of State. With them abdicated the Pan-

German policy, which, by treating Alsace-Lorraine like an enemy country, had done so much to stir up hatred of Germany there.

At the same time it was learned that the mission of inaugurating the Parliamentary régime in Alsace-Lorraine had been given to M. Schwander. A Protestant of a modest family of Upper Alsace, M. Schwander had been since 1906 the Mayor of Strasbourg. As the result of his initiative and genius for organization, the city had undergone a remarkable development. Assisted by the new Secretary of State, M. Hauss, and by several Under Secretaries, he was charged with the direction of affairs until the population of the country itself should appoint a permanent head for the administration of the Government. He kept provisionally the name of Statthalter. It was his intention to convoke the Landtag within a week, as soon as he had reached agreement with the various parties regarding the appointment of the Under Secretaries of State. Various names were cited. But successively all parties—the Centre, the Lorrainers, the Socialists, and the Liberals—refused office on the pretext that the uncertainty of the situation made it necessary for them to await the outcome. Thus they refused to aid in the establishment of that new order of things which they had striven to attain for thirty years! It was no longer enough for them to be their own masters. The first use they wished to make of their liberty was to give themselves to France.

AUTONOMY NO LONGER ENOUGH

It was now the oppressors who begged the oppressed to accept autonomy. On Oct. 16, at a meeting of the Reichstag Deputies from Alsace-Lorraine, the Germans proposed to read from the gallery a collective statement in which all the Deputies of the imperial province should claim for it the right to direct her own destiny. Speaking for the Alsace-Lorraine Deputies, M. Peirotès replied that he had claimed this right throughout his whole political career and even during the bad days of the war, but declared that he now declined to associate himself with his former adversaries, so tardily converted to his program. Abbé Delsor made a similar declaration.

Again M. Ricklin, President of the Landtag, was invited while in Berlin to visit Herr Lewald, Under Secretary of State in the Ministry of the Interior. The latter admitted his efforts to persuade Alsace-Lorraine to decide by a plebiscite in favor of Germany, and announced the speedy formation of a Ministry composed of Alsace-Lorraine Deputies. M. Ricklin replied that the separation of Alsace-Lorraine from the German Empire would be voted by 90 votes against 100, and that union with France would be voted for by at least 75 out of 100. Subsequently, on Oct. 23, M. Ricklin stated before the Reichstag that all German projects of reform in Alsace-Lorraine would be fruitless, so far as the state of mind of the people of these provinces was concerned, as it had developed during the war, and that the solution of autonomy had been "relegated to the past by actual events." Another Alsatian Deputy made a similar declaration.

Both Schwander and Hauss soon after this went to Berlin to offer their resignations in view of the impossibility of fulfilling the duties laid upon them in Alsace-Lorraine by the German Government. The latter declined to accept their resignations, and sent them back to the imperial province to find collaborators, at a time when the Alsace press was openly declaring for union with France.

THE ARMISTICE PERIOD

On Nov. 9 news reached Alsace of the handing of the conditions of armistice to the German plenipotentiaries, the abdication of the Emperor, and the proclamation of the republic at Munich. The German revolution had begun. Demonstrations in honor of France occurred in Strasbourg on Nov. 9 and 10. From Kiel and Hamburg trainloads of armed sailors left to proclaim the German Republic in all important cities. One of these trains reached Strasbourg in the night of Nov. 9-10, occupied the station, the Post Office, and forced the Governor to resign. The military authorities, having received instructions from General Headquarters to cause no bloodshed, offered no resistance. A council of soldiers and workmen was formed at the City Hall, and issued a proclamation. Soldiers stopped all German officers in the streets, tore off their insignia, and broke their swords. The Municipal Council took measures to establish and maintain public order.

But the main authority was that of the Council of Soldiers, German of origin, anti-French in tendency, militaristic in scope. Only one representative, native, anti-German, pro-French power remained, that of the Lower Chamber, which took its mandate directly from the country, by universal suffrage. It was from this Lower Chamber, which had long acted virtually as a council, that the National Council of Alsace-Lorraine was officially born.

REVOLUTIONARY COUP D'ETAT

The newspapers had announced that the Chambers would be convened on Nov. 12 by imperial decree, (auf allerhöchster Verordnung), presumably to receive notification of autonomy. On Nov. 9 the President of the Lower Chamber, M. Ricklin, informed the Statthalter that this Chamber declined the imperial convocation and would meet of its own initiative on Nov. 12. But following the events of the 10th, the majority of members of the Second Chamber assembled at an urgent call on the afternoon of the 11th, and addressed to the people of Alsace-Lorraine a proclamation which began as follows:

The members of the Second Chamber of Parliament of Alsace-Lorraine, assembled here today, have constituted themselves a National Council of Alsace and Lorraine, and have named a Provisional Administrative Ministry composed of the following members: Burger, Minister of Justice and Religions; Heinrich, Agriculture; Imbs, Social Welfare; Jung, Finances; Meyer, Public Works; Dr. Pfleger, Interior and Public Instruction; Peirottes and Ricklin, without portfolios.

The National Council and the Ministry expect that the people of Alsace and Lorraine will receive with confidence this administration created from its elected representatives, and that it will do everything to facilitate its task in this period of transition, which will probably be very short.

Two concluding paragraphs of the proclamation, "The penal laws remain in force," and "The National Council grants full amnesty to all political prisoners," show clearly that the National Council was acting with plenary powers. * * * Memorable revolution in the history of Alsace and Lorraine, which for the first time in forty-eight years became the masters of their destiny!

M. Ricklin withdrew the following day from the Government, but, on the motion of M. Peirottes, was elected President of the National Council. The coup d'état met with no resistance. The President of the Chamber officially notified the Statthalter that the Second Chamber had assumed power and named a Ministry. M. Schwander yielded without opposition. He was only the Vice Regent; after the abdication of William II., what authority remained to him? The same announcement was sent to the Council of Soldiers. The latter, representing the German majority, did not oppose the formation of the new power, but it was openly hostile to the pro-French demonstrations which had been going on in the cities for two days. It threatened to intervene, and exacted even the suppression of the French flags and cockades. The National Council was obliged, therefore, to renounce the act of immediate union with France which had been originally planned. Meanwhile the Council of Workmen and Soldiers hoisted at the top of the cathedral tower an enormous red flag, announcing to all Alsace the triumph of socialism. Fifteen years before, in an electoral proclamation, M. Peirottes had written: "We will hoist the red flag over the old Cathedral of Erwin * * * and no power in the world will be able to lower it."

THE DAY OF TRIUMPH

The German troops withdrew. At last, for France, "the day of glory had arrived." Her soldiers, over all the roads leading to Lorraine, through all the gorges of the Vosges, began their triumphal march into the promised land. Those who took part in this march, who saw the reception given by every village of Alsace and Lorraine to its "liberators," as they were called in repeated inscriptions over all the triumphal arches, will never forget this procession in the midst of acclamations, in the beflagged streets, under the gaze of ancestral portraits placed before the windows, the subjects of which seemed to be personally present to behold the realization of their dream.

With this accomplished fact of union with France, the main task of the National Council was accomplished. One last act remained to be performed—that of renunciation. On Dec. 5, while awaiting the announced visit of the President of the French Republic, the National Assembly voted unanimously the following resolution, which was passed by all the groups of the Chamber and displayed in all communes of Alsace-Lorraine:

The Deputies of Alsace and Lorraine, chosen by universal suffrage and incorporated in the National Assembly, greet joyously the return of Alsace and Lorraine to France, after a long and cruel separation. Our provinces will be proud to owe to the mother country, with which they are reunited, together with the safeguarding of their traditions, their religious beliefs and their economic interests solemnly guaranteed them by the leaders of the victorious army, a new era of freedom, prosperity, and happiness.

The National Assembly, desirous that not even the slightest doubt of the true sentiments of the Alsatians and Lorrainers should remain either in France and the allied nations, or among the neutral or enemy nations, declares that the neutralist agitation was the work of a small minority or of German agents, and states solemnly that, faithfully interpreting the firm and irrevocable will of the people of Alsace and Lorraine, expressed already in 1871 by its representatives in the Assembly of Bordeaux, it considers as inviolable and unrecalable the right of the Alsatians and Lorrainers to remain members of the French Nation. The National Assembly esteems it a duty, before adjourning, to proclaim in its turn the return of Alsace and Lorraine as legal, and their union with France indisputable and definitive.

So the National Council abdicated its sovereignty in favor of France. The President of the French Republic arrived in Strasbourg on Dec. 9. He proceeded to the City Hall and addressed the people in the open air. He paid no visit to the palace of the National Council. The latter, however, did not yet consider its task completely finished. On Dec. 19 it addressed a petition to the newly elected council in Paris asking for co-operation with the French High Commissioner in administering certain important inter-departmental and other questions in which the new French provinces were vitally interested. On Jan. 14, 1919, however, the President of the council sent an answer which, while declaring that the interests of Alsace-Lorraine would be fully safeguarded, insisted that the necessity of a further continuance of the National Council no longer existed.

The new régime has already in large measure fulfilled the desires which the National Council interpreted. The object which I proposed in beginning this study will be attained if I have succeeded in showing how the National Council (both as Chamber and council) did not cease for seven years to represent Alsace and Lorraine, whose rights it defended, sometimes in the most tragic circumstances, and whose reunion with France it finally sealed by a solemn official act.

Alsatian Deputies Again in French Parliament

Elections for the return of Deputies from Alsace and Lorraine to the French Chamber were held on Nov. 16, 1919, and in the course of the preliminary campaign Premier Clemenceau visited Strasbourg and delivered one of the most eloquent speeches of his career. The results of the election showed an overwhelming sentiment in favor of full reunion with France. When the Chamber of Deputies reopened on Dec. 8 it gave a memorable welcome to the twenty-four new members from Alsace and Lorraine, a welcome only superficially disturbed by the "booing" that greeted the attempts of French Socialists to utilize the occasion for their own ends. M. François, who read the declaration on behalf of Alsace and Lorraine, began by quoting from the famous declaration read before the National Assembly at Bordeaux in 1871, and continued:

The Bordeaux protest, renewed in 1874 in the Reichstag by the newly elected

Deputies from the annexed provinces, has lost none of its force. Today, on the morrow of our liberation, we, the legitimate heirs of the Bordeaux protesters, at the moment of taking possession of their seats, vacant for half a century, wish to signify to Germany and the whole world that the heart of Alsace-Lorraine has never ceased to belong to the family of France and now feels profound joy on re-entering therein.

We wish solemnly to record that no protest has been raised by our two provinces against the Versailles Treaty, which gave us back our French nationality. On the contrary, the candidates of every list presented, even those who were defeated, proclaimed in their programs, manifestos, and speeches their unflinching affection for their country, France.

The declaration expressed gratitude for France's heavy sacrifices, and saluted "the great Lorrainer," who was President of the republic during the long war, and also M. Clemenceau, the last representative of the Bordeaux protest, and concluded:

Alsace and Lorraine will resume their guard along the frontier of the Rhine. They will not fall in their mission as the advance sentinels of French thought.
* * * The Germans have not renounced Alsace-Lorraine. The decision of the people against Germany has not reconciled the Germans to the loss of the two provinces. Germany does not understand the verdict of the election of Nov. 16 last. By every artifice Germany has tried to falsify that vote. For ten months past she has been flooding the retrieved provinces with so-called autonomist literature. The nation of pillagers has one sentimental romance—the possession of Alsace is now, as ever, a casus belli.

Germany never dared organize a referendum in her subject provinces. France obtained a unanimity of votes at the elections, which constituted a true plebiscite, on Nov. 16. In virtue of the now universally recognized right of peoples to dispose of themselves, Germany can never again by any title reclaim the territory she held only by the obsolete right of conquest.

More than 32,000 Germans left Alsace in the Autumn of 1919, during the French Government's campaign to stamp out disturbing propaganda. Statistics show that up to the end of October 2,800 Germans were expelled, 18,500 left voluntarily, and 4,800 German railroad employes were "repatriated." Another 6,000 left the country under various conditions, and only 12,000 Germans remained in Alsace on Nov. 1. Similar developments took place in Lorraine.

An English Hill

BY I. MAY

[IN THE SUNDAY TIMES, LONDON]

An English hill beneath an English sky,
Swept by strong sweetness of the chanting wind;
A hill uplifted to the solemn stars
Where first, when Dawn her opal gate unbars,
Shows the sun's pageantry;
And where, when grows the West incarnadined,
The light, that from the valley all has gone,
Lingers as if in voiceless benison.

An English hill that golden lads have trod,
Racing, fleet-footed, to th' empurpled crest,
Watching the pigmy village in the plain,
Leaping and laughing and, brief weary, lain
Stretched on the flowing sod,
A hill whose river on its ocean quest
Sets to its singing all the changing hours,
Through careless hedges starr'd with English flow'rs.

Such were their dreams on that immortal day,
When death than life more beautiful had grown;
Not unto marble statues, mold'ring brass,
Or fading names writ on some painted glass
Did their hearts, wistful, stray,
But to green ways, and sweet grass, all unnown,
In cool fields. In hallowed mem'ry still Give them their dreams upon an English hill!

Wartime Feats of French Railways

How the Stupendous Tasks of Mobilization and Troop Transport at the Front Were Handled

By GENERAL G. GASSOIN

[DIRECTOR GENERAL OF FRENCH MILITARY TRANSPORT]

The railways of France, like those of England and the United States, were taken over by the Government for war service. A complete summary of what they did in the four years of conflict, written by the man who controlled the movements of all trains in that period, appeared in a special French number of The London Times on Sept. 6, 1919, and is here reproduced as one of the most valuable records of the war.

THE following telegram was placarded throughout France at 4 P. M. on Aug. 1, 1914: "General Mobilization Order—Sunday, Aug. 2, is the first day of mobilization." From this moment onward there began an era of multiple difficulties for the railway service of France, which had been requisitioned by the State and placed under the control of the military authorities.

On Jan. 1, 1914, the French railway system comprised over 25,000 miles of lines worked by 357,000 employees. The number of locomotives was 14,047, with a rolling stock of 373,000 units. With this material at its disposal, the new department of military transport, which had not to date enjoyed an opportunity of working together as a whole, had, in the first place, to assume the immediate charge of the transports for couverts mobilization and concentration, and subsequently to maintain the economic life of the country.

On July 31 the Germans having occupied the railways and having seized the telegraphic installations in the immediate vicinity of the frontier, the French Government ordained the enforcement of the program of couverture. These transports, which were conveyed without any interruption of the ordinary commercial traffic, particularly intense at that moment, required no less than 385 loaded trains for the Northern and Eastern systems alone.

On Aug. 2 mobilization proper began. The number of trains now running amounted to thousands. From Aug. 5 onward concentration had to be carried out, and the armies had to be grouped in the zones assigned to them by the plan of general mobilization. Nearly 3,000 trains, comprising 147,000 cars, had to be dispatched. On Aug. 9 the first detachments of the British Expeditionary Force landed in France. On the Northern line 345 trains were employed for the concentration of the British troops, and on the State railway a nearly equal number.

During this period the intensity of traffic reached such a pitch that at certain control stations as many as 200 trains per day had to be cleared, an average of one train every eight minutes.

The troops had to be supplied with fresh provisions and munitions, reinforcements had to be brought up, the wounded had to be evacuated, and large units summoned from one point to another of the line had to be carried to their destination.

HOSTILITIES BEGUN

These commitments were still further increased by events in the field during August. The retirement of our army involved both in the fighting zone and behind the front the dispatch of countless evacuation trains, including French and Belgian rolling stock, material stores of all kinds, public funds, archives, military depots, and other establishments where withdrawal was called for, and added to these there was the formidable exodus of the civilian population of the invaded territories and of the French capital, which the enemy was daily approaching. On Sept. 3, 50,000 persons left Paris from the Orleans station alone.

In order not to overburden the lines, already strained to their utmost, and in order not to endanger the running of indispensable trains, 83 locomotives and rolling stock amounting to 45,000 units had to be abandoned. Many railway servants were killed, and a considerable number fell into German hands.

The battle of the Marne brought this first period to an end. We recovered part of the invaded railway system. But forthwith there followed the "race to the sea," in which from Nov. 1 to 13 the Northern Railway cleared no fewer than 1,271 troop trains on the Amiens-Boulogne-Calais line alone, without counting rolling stock returned empty and trains for supply and evacuation, &c.

In 1915 the Paris-Lyon-Méditerranée carried 70,000 Sikhs and Gurkhas, who were landed at Marseilles from 52 troop ships arriving from India. In 1915, moreover, the Orleans company dispatched from Toulouse to Orleans 400 trains carrying Indian troops.

These transports, however, represent little, as compared with the strain imposed by strategic troop movements. The Northern Railway alone, which served the districts where the British and French were fighting side by side, had to carry no fewer than 60,000,000 men during the war. Each offensive demanded a fresh effort on the part of the railway services. The Somme battle alone, in 1916, rendered necessary the dispatch of 6,768 trains, not counting return loads. During the most critical period of the battle of Verdun, between March and June, 1916, the Eastern Railway had to provide the transport of 90 divisions, or more than 1,500,000 men, necessitating the dispatch of 3,592 trains.

From 1917 onward the difficulties with which the railways had to contend continued to increase. In October of that year the Austrians broke through the Italian front. French and British troops had to be hastened to the assistance of the Italians. The Paris-Lyon-Méditerranée had immediately to deal with this urgent situation. Between Oct. 29 and

Nov. 18, 384 troop trains were dispatched to Italy, and between Nov. 13 and Dec. 21, 810 trains were dispatched.

AMERICAN TRANSPORT

Then America entered the war. The American transports over the French railway lines deserve a page to themselves. The movement of over 2,000,000 men accompanied by 5,000,000 tons of material across the whole breadth of French territory represented in itself an impressive achievement. Unlike the British Army, which, concentrated in a favorable position, was operating at only a slight distance from its bases, and could group the whole of its transport in a single corner of France, and, so to speak, on a single railway system, the American Army established its bases in nearly every French port and imposed upon the French railway system long journeys on lines that were least prepared to cope with such a task. From St. Nazaire and from Bordeaux, and later from Brest, Nantes, La Rochelle, and later even from Havre, Cherbourg, Bayonne, and Marseilles, American trains started, with the result that all the railway services of the interior found themselves set in motion. The American transport and supply program initiated during the Winter of 1917-18 suddenly expanded in the Spring of the latter year, in consequence of events in the field, with the result that all estimates had to be doubled. During the dramatic months of the Summer of 1918, which saw the railway crisis in France become acute, American transport trains continued ever more frequently to cover the lines assigned to them, adapting old-fashioned installations to their needs, and finally converging upon the front in Lorraine.

During April, 1918, there were carried from ports and camps and from the supply bases of the American Army 77,000 men and 195,000 tons of material; in July, 245,000 men and 290,000 tons, and in October, 430,000 men and 640,000 tons. For the Western State, Orleans and Paris-Lyon-Méditerranée lines alone, these figures represented for the month of April, 303 trains with a train mileage of 75,000; for the month of July, 848 trains with a train mileage of 240,000, and for the month of October, 1,600 trains with a train mileage of nearly 400,000. There were days on which, for example, 72 trains were crossing France in every direction and averaging nearly 250 train miles.

With 1918 there began the final act of the great drama which was to impose upon the railways a greater strain than ever. At the end of March the Germans suddenly attacked. Troops had urgently to be sent to every threatened point. Every day 172 trains were dispatched. On the Northern system the train mileage in May reached the unprecedented figure of 1,200,000. On the Eastern system the figure stood at over 1,000,000 train miles. The enemy continued to advance, and his guns commanded the important railway junction of Amiens, while his troops, after occupying the lines converging on Soissons, seized in May the main line from Paris to Nancy, between Château-Thierry and Epernay. The control station had to be withdrawn to the rear, together with all stocks and stores, railway and aeronautical material, factory installations, and other stores and products of all kinds. Notwithstanding these successive evacuations, which necessitated the employment of thousands of railway cars, and notwithstanding the necessity for equipping and supplying lines that became more and more removed from the original front, from May 5 onward a service of 198 troop trains in 24 hours had been instituted. By July the German advance had been definitely stopped. To the anxious question whether the overtaxed resources of the Northern and Eastern systems would be able to respond to the growing requirements of the military situation, these two lines replied by exerting an effort which exceeded by far their previous records. On Aug. 28, 35,000 loaded cars were run over the Northern system in the twenty-four hours, and nearly equaled the record train mileage achieved by it in May, while the Eastern Railway surpassed its figure for that month. And this intensification, be it remembered, was achieved while the railway works destroyed by the enemy during his retreat were being repaired.

Meanwhile there were leave trains requiring 2,728 cars to be provided for, together with 162 hospital trains, with 2,455 cars.

Similarly, the supply services for the army imposed upon the railways heavy additional burdens. In 1915 the Northern Company cleared 60,000 complete trains at the rate of 160 a day for these services, while the Southern line during the same year carried 617,000 tons of supply goods and 584,000 tons of other traffic.

These figures were doubled and quadrupled in succeeding years, and did not cease increasing until well into 1918. The preparation for supplying Paris against the eventualities of a siege in 1914, from Aug. 20 to Sept. 30 of that year, alone accounted for 117,000 tons of provisions carried by the Orleans line, together with 66,000 tons of fodder, 107,000 bullocks, and 211,000 sheep and pigs.

OTHER SERVICES

In 1915 the Orleans line carried 11,000 guns and gun carriages, and in addition there was an unceasing flow of machine guns, trench mortars, airplanes, tools, wire, road macadam, petrol, &c., as well as clothing, equipment, and camping material. The army postal service from 1915 onward required no fewer than 200 railway cars a day for the delivery of the army's 3,000,000 letters, not to speak of the mountains of parcels and newspapers that had to be carried.

In order, moreover, to compensate the deficiency in French agricultural production, labor had to be imported from outside. In addition, raw material had to be imported in order to keep the war factories at work, and these, too, required coal, the supply of which had been cut short by the seizure of the greater part of the northern coalfields. The provision of all these needs was the prime duty of the railways, and hand in hand there went the necessity for maintaining a continual stream of empty trucks on all lines leading to the coast in order to prevent the French ports from becoming choked. The problem was complicated by the progressive increase of imports as shown by the tonnage returns of the French ports, which amounted in 1913 to 31,384,516, and, after a fall in 1914 to 27,224,000, to 40,156,000 in 1915, and to 51,502,000 in 1916.

PERSONNEL AND MATERIAL

It has already been mentioned that the French railways entered upon the war with 357,000 servants, 14,047 locomotives, and 373,000 cars. The two latter figures were reduced respectively to 12,361 and 358,343 by normal withdrawals for repairs. From 1914 to 1918 ton mileage increased 41 per cent.; in order to deal with this increase the establishment of the French railways in 1918 ought to have numbered 402,808 employes, 15,641 locomotives, and 457,426 cars. But the actual figures were 352,431 employes, 13,580 locomotives, and 388,050 cars. Requirements were increasingly in excess of existing resources. Everything possible was done to reinforce the personnel by recruiting discharged railway servants, women, wounded soldiers, exempted men, colonial labor, and prisoners of war. But the professional standard of these new employes was far inferior to that of the regular hands. From 1916 onward the British provided their own railway personnel for nearly the whole of their transports, but some months elapsed before the Americans provided labor commensurate with the additional burden which they threw upon the French railways. The locomotives, for their part, were in no better case. Repairs were in arrear, and the bad quality of the coal which the railways were compelled to burn put a number of boilers out of action. The number of locomotives withdrawn from service rose from 1,720 in January, 1914, to 2,854 in January, 1919, while the number of cars withdrawn rose from 14,840 to 38,520. Important repair shops like Hellemmes and Tergnier were from the start of the war in the hands of the enemy.

During the four years of war French railways showed themselves fully equal to their task and to every demand that was made upon them. No military plan had to suffer in its execution owing to any failure on the part of the railways. It was the thanks of all France that the Minister of War, in conjunction with the Minister of Public Works, returned in the order of the day in which he paid striking tribute to the admirable devotion of the railway personnel. In this order he declared:

The whole Government expresses to officials of all ranks its gratitude for the patriotic activity which they have exerted without stint and without ceasing, day and night. In the name of the army, whose victorious labors they have so modestly and methodically promoted, the Minister of War addresses to them his warmest thanks.

Armenia's Struggle for Independence

By W. D. P. BLISS

Dr. Bliss, an American, born in Constantinople, knows the Near East intimately. He has been a lifelong student of social and political questions, and has been in Europe twice recently on investigations for the Federal Government. During the Peace Conference in Paris he obtained from the Armenian Peace Commissioners—and others—valuable documents and inside information.

TO understand the Armenian struggle for independence, one must remember that Armenia, like Poland, has had a tripartite division. Armenia, meaning by this, historic Armenia, centring around Mount Ararat, near the meeting place (before the war) of Turkey, Russia, and Persia, has been divided among those three countries.

Turkish Armenia, with an area of 101,000 square miles and a pre-war population of 3,788,000, of which 1,403,000 were Armenians, was made finally Turkish in 1451, though portions of it were conquered before that date. Russian Armenia, with 26,130 square miles and a pre-war population of 2,072,000, of which 1,295,000 were Armenians, was annexed to the Russian Empire partly in 1828, partly in 1878. Persian Armenia, with an area of 5,789 miles and 165,000 Armenians, has been definitely Persian since 1472, while much of Armenia, and sometimes all of it, was under ancient Persian suzerainty for centuries before that.

It is thus evident that even before the war Armenia was a divided country and the Armenians a much scattered race. It is estimated that in 1914 there were 520,000 Armenians in Turkey, outside of Turkish Armenia; 758,000 in Russia, outside of Russian Armenia, and some 250,000 in India, Egypt, Europe, and America, making nearly 4,500,000 Armenians in the world.

But, though scattered, these Armenians were by no means wholly divided. Political unity being lost, the Armenian Church, with its Catholicos or Primate at Etchmiadzin in the Caucasus, to a considerable extent bound the Armenians of the world together as forming one nationality.

FROM AUTONOMY TO INDEPENDENCE

At the opening of the war, in 1914, Armenians generally, both in Turkey and Russia, aimed only at autonomy. It is true that, beginning in 1888, with a few Armenians in Geneva, Switzerland, and extending to the Armenians of every country, an organization called the Dashnakzoutiun (Federation) aimed at independence for Armenia. But when, in 1908, the Young Turk revolution proclaimed a Constitution, recognizing all races and religions in the Turkish Empire as having equal political rights, the majority of the members of the Dashnakzoutiun in Turkey took the Young Turk movement at its face value, worked with the Committee of Union and Progress (the Young Turks) for the development of a new and liberalized Turkey, and, for the time at least, abandoned all thought of independence.

At first the outbreak of the great war did not change the Armenian political situation. To a council of Armenians of the Caucasus, assembled in Tiflis in August, 1914, the Russian Imperial Government, through Prince Varentzov Dashkov, promised autonomy for Russian Armenia after the war, if the Armenians would loyally support the Russian armies during the war. To this the Armenians of the Caucasus assented, though with some hesitation; 160,000 Armenian reservists served in the Russian regular army, while some 20,000 more Armenians served as volunteers.

In Turkey, during the same month, there was a conference of the Dashnakzoutiun in the theatre at Erzerum and before this conference came a delegation of twenty-nine leading members of the Turkish Committee of Union and Progress, then in power in the Government, and made a proposition somewhat similar to that which Russia had made to the Russian Armenians, but with important differences—differences destined to affect the history of the world. Turkey asked her Armenian subjects not only to support her during the war, but also to induce the Russian Armenians to rise against Russia, the Turks, under a German guarantee, promising that if the Armenians would do this there should be formed a new Armenia, to include Russian Armenia to be won from the foe, and three Turkish Armenian vilayets, this new Armenia to be autonomous under Turkish suzerainty.

PURPOSE OF THE TURKS

There was in this proposition more than at first appears. The hope of the Young Turk Party, at the outset of the war, was to make it a Hejad, a Holy War, Pan-Islamic, and Pan-Turanian. Against Russia the Turks hoped to unite with themselves the following: Persia with its 9,000,000 inhabitants, Tartars numbering 3,000,000, Kurds 1,125,000, all Moslem races, with 2,000,000 Georgians, and others in the Caucasus whose interests might ally them with the Turks. But between Turkey and those races lay Armenia. A hostile Armenia would make it very difficult for the Turks to co-operate with the Moslem millions the other side of Armenia. But if Armenia, as a whole, would side with the Turks, it would be comparatively easy to bring against Russia in the Caucasus a Pan-Turanian force, which Russia, fighting also on the west, could scarcely resist.

Some believe, indeed, that this Armenian question was largely decisive of the war. Had Armenia as a whole gone on the side of Turkey, and had overwhelming forces attacked Russia in the Caucasus, she could not have done what she did in the early part of the war on her western front, and the Central Powers, far earlier than they did, could have transferred large forces from the east to the west front, with results perhaps fatal to the Entente; while Turkey, triumphant or at least secure in the Caucasus, could have turned her whole army to meet and defeat the English advance from the south.

Certainly the Turkish proposal to Armenia was a momentous one, and the Turks, at least, knew it. They sent a very weighty delegation to the Armenian conference at Erzerum. They argued from the basis of friendship, and also threatened. They declared, probably with truth, that the Tartars, Kurds, and Georgians were already committed to the side of Turkey, and that if the Armenians refused they would be surrounded on all sides by foes and would suffer accordingly, as indeed they did—how terribly all the world now knows.

THE ARMENIANS REFUSE

But the Armenians at Erzerum said no; they affirmed themselves loyal citizens of the Turkish Empire; they declared that they would faithfully support the Turkish cause and serve in the Turkish Army; but for them to turn the Russian Armenians against Russia, they said, was beyond their power. The view of the conference was that, since Armenia could not be independent and must be attached to some greater power, it was for their economic and educational interest to belong partly to Russia and partly to Turkey, since if they were wholly swallowed up in either empire they would be left helplessly in its power. Loyalty to Turkey they were therefore willing to promise and to fulfill; but turn Russian Armenians against Russia they declared they could not.

With this response to their proposition the Turks were deeply embittered. It meant to them, and perhaps meant in fact, the defeat of the whole Turkish campaign. From that moment the destruction of Armenia was determined. Armenia became the Belgium of the war in the East. Soon the leaders of the Erzerum Conference found themselves persecuted, arrested, and some of them killed. A little later began the massacres of Armenians, and then the policy of deportation, by which the Armenians of Turkey were to be annihilated.

That terrible tale has been often told; but Armenia, perhaps unwittingly, at Erzerum had chosen for herself. She could no longer look for autonomy, scarcely even for existence, in Turkey; her one hope lay in independence, freed from the Turkish Empire.

ARMENIANS IN RUSSIA

A different line of events drove the Armenians of Russia to practically the same conclusion with respect to the Russian Empire. The Armenians of Russia were loyal to the Imperial Government so long as there was an Imperial Government; but the imperial bureaucracy was not faithful to the Armenians. The Armenian regiments were not allowed to defend Armenia, but were kept chiefly on the western front. When the capture of Erzerum made the Russians believe for the moment that they no longer needed Armenian help, the Grand Duke Nicholas Nikolaievitch ordered the disbanding of the Armenian volunteers. In truth, Imperial Russia cared little for the Armenians. Twenty years before, in 1896, when the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Count Rostonsky, was asked why Russia did not occupy Armenia and save the Armenians from the massacres then going on, he replied, cynically: "We need Armenia, but without the Armenians."

Russia's attitude to Armenia in 1916 was largely the same. To the Armenian refugees, fleeing from massacres, Russia gave little or no relief or protection, even when it might easily have been given. Nevertheless, the Russian Armenians fought steadfastly for Russia with heroism and brilliancy. Even when the Russian revolution overthrew the Imperial Government, the Armenians supported the Kerensky Administration. When, however, in November, 1917, Kerensky fell and the Russian Army of the Caucasus disbanded, leaving the Caucasus in chaos, the Armenians of Russia felt that they had nothing to hope from the Bolsheviks, and, like so many of the subject races in Russia, came to believe that there was a possibility of independence for them, and that here lay their hope. Thus by the stern logic of events both Turkish and Russian Armenians were practically driven into efforts for independence.

Against their terrible massacres and deportations the Armenians in Turkey could do little or nothing. One of the first steps in the Turkish program was, so far as possible, to deprive Armenians of arms. Even the Armenian soldiers in the Turkish Army were rarely trusted with arms, but were assigned to camp and manual work. Nevertheless, in the few cases where they had some arms, in hopeless but magnificent bravery, the Armenians did what they could. In April, 1915, the Armenians of Van, by a gallant defense, kept the Turks at bay for a whole month, until some Armenian volunteers in the Russian Army under General Nikolaev came to the rescue of the city. The Armenians of Van kept busy a whole division of Turkish regulars, with thousands of Kurds, and so had contributed largely to defeat the Turkish plan to crush the Russian left wing in Persia.

In June of the same year, when Turks and Kurds were laying waste Moush and the surrounding villages, a little band of Armenians from Sasoun, which had been able to maintain a virtual independence of Turkey even to the nineteenth century, marched down from the mountains and enabled the Sasounians, though only 10,000 in number and equipped with antiquated weapons, for two months to keep from their city some 50,000 Turks and Kurds fully armed and equipped. The Sasounians also hoped that Russia would come to their aid; but Russia did not, though her armies were only thirty-one miles away.

At Sivas an Armenian patriot, Mourat, escaped with a little band into the mountains and resisted the Turks for a year and a half, when he escaped into Russia. At Urfa, Armenian men, with women also in their trenches, resisted a Turkish division for forty days. At Shabin-Karahissar nearly 5,000 Armenians resisted another Turkish division for twenty-seven days. When their ammunition gave out nearly 3,000 Armenian women are said to have drunk poison rather than fall into Turkish hands. In Cilicia some 5,000 Armenians of the village of Sudiah, near Zeitun, fled into the mountains, and for forty-two days resisted Turkish regulars, till, succeeding in signaling a French cruiser, they were rescued and conveyed to Port Said in Egypt, where many of them enlisted in the British Army or in the French Oriental Legion.

Thus what the Armenians in Turkey could do, heroically they did. They kept five divisions of Turks and innumerable Kurds from joining the Turkish offensives.

IN THE CAUCASUS

The Armenians in the Caucasus were not braver, but they could do more. They had arms. The part they contributed to the Turkish defeat is not generally known, but the Turkish General, Ihsan Pasha, commanding the right wing of the Turkish Caucasus Army, said in 1915: "I must confess that had it not been for the Armenians we would have conquered the Caucasus." General Liman von Sanders, the German commander in Syria, said after the Turkish surrender: "The collapse of the Turkish Palestinian front was due to the fact that the Turks, against my orders and advice, sent all their available forces to the Caucasus and Azerbaidjan, where they fought the Armenians." Ex-Premier Kerensky said on Aug. 20, 1918: "Of all the races of the Caucasus, the Armenians alone stuck to their posts, organized volunteer forces and by the side of their Russian comrades faced the formidable assaults of the enemy and turned his victorious march into a disastrous rout." Lord Robert Cecil wrote on Oct. 3, 1918: "The service rendered by the Armenians to the common cause can never be forgotten."

Turkey during the war made five distinct offensives in the Caucasus and four of the five were defeated principally by the Armenians, while in the fifth the Russian forces which chiefly defeated it were led by the Armenian General, Nazarbekoff.

FIRST TURKISH OFFENSIVES

The first offensive was in 1914, when Enver Pasha, considering himself a Turkish Napoleon, endeavored to reach Tiflis by shattering the right wing of the Russian Army. He had under him three army corps. One corps was to capture Sarikamish and cut off the retreat of 60,000 Russians; but in the Barduz Pass it was held up for twenty-four hours by a comparative handful of Armenians, who lost, it is said, only 600 men. But it gave the Russians time to concentrate at Sarikamish; and instead of the Turks capturing 60,000 Russians, the Turks were disastrously defeated and lost, it was reported, 30,000 men, and failed in their offensive.

The second Turkish offensive was in 1915, when the Turks endeavored to turn the extreme left wing of the Russian Army by marching through Persia. The Russians had only one brigade under the command of the Armenian General, Nazarbekoff, and one battalion of Armenian volunteers. The Turks had a whole division of well drilled, equipped troops, sent especially from Constantinople under Khalil Bey, and nearly 10,000 Kurds. The Turks easily captured Urmia and took nearly 1,000 Russian prisoners; but at Dalmost the Armenians met them in one of the fiercest battles between the Armenians and Turks, and for three days repulsed the Turks, until Russian reinforcements came and the Turkish Army was put to flight. Armenians declare that 3,600 Turkish soldiers fell before the Armenian trenches.

The third Turkish offensive in the Caucasus was in the same year, when eleven divisions of Turks, again under Khalil Bey, advanced against the Russian centre. The Russian Army retreated for a week till its left wing came to its aid, and under the Armenian General, Nazarbekoff, the Russians succeeded in driving back the Turks.

AFTER RUSSIA'S COLLAPSE

The first three offensives were won before the collapse of the Russian forces. It was, however, after the collapse that the Armenians accomplished their most important work. When the Russian Caucasus Army of 250,000 abandoned the country to its fate, the Tartars armed themselves and arose en masse, expecting to unite with the Turks and carry all before them. Against them were only 30,000 Armenians. The Turkish Army had from 50,000 to 75,000 men, besides the Tartars.

When, however, by the Brest-Litovsk treaty, the Bolsheviki agreed to surrender to Turkey large portions of Russian Armenia and Georgia, the Georgians, Armenians, and Tartars of the Caucasus united for their own defense. A temporary Government composed of representatives of the three races was called, with Chekhenkeli, a Georgian, as President, and in April, 1918, an independent federated republic of the Caucasus was declared. This republic did not endure. Racial enmities were too strong.

Already in 1917, when the Tartars rose against the Bolsheviks, there had been gathered at Baku a considerable body of Armenians returning from Russia, and these the Tartars attacked, declaring them partisans of the Bolsheviks. The Tartars expected to make quick work of the Armenians. But instead, in a severe battle, while the Armenians, as they declared, lost only 2,500 men, the Tartars lost over 10,000, and the Armenians remained possessors of Baku and its oil wells. For five and a half months the Armenians, with the aid of a few Russians, held Baku against the combined offensives of Tartars and Turks. A small British force of 1,400 men—with only 800 rifles among them—reached Baku, but too late, and finally the Armenians and the British were compelled to take refuge in Persia.

Even the Georgians were induced to favor the Turks by the promise that they should have Batoum. Consequently the Georgian President of the Federation ordered the Armenians to deliver to the Turks the fortress of Kars, and they had to obey. In such circumstances it was not to be expected that a republic of federated Georgians, Tartars, and Armenians could endure. As a matter of fact it lasted less than five weeks. On May 26, 1918, Georgia, depending on aid from Germany, declared herself an independent republic. Two days later the Tartars declared the republic of Azerbaijan, and the same day, May 28, 1918, Russian Armenia declared herself as an independent Armenian Republic, with Erivan as its capital.

But the Armenians alone had to fight for their republic and did so with marvelous success. At Sardarabad and Karakilissa, in two fierce battles, one of them lasting four days, they routed the Turks, who, it is said, lost 6,000. The Turks retreated almost to the frontier and consented to negotiate for peace with Armenia. On June 4, 1918, preliminaries of peace were signed subject to ratification within thirty days. These preliminaries were, however, never ratified by the Armenian Republic and eventually Turkey surrendered to the Allies.

ARMENIA SINCE THE ARMISTICE

After the Turkish surrender to the Entente, Armenia's efforts for independence had to be transferred to the fields of diplomacy. In arms in the Caucasus they had been successful, but the Armenians had also fought elsewhere. In France 900 Armenian students enlisted in the Foreign Legion, while at the end of the war scarcely 50 survived, the majority of the remaining 850 giving their lives in 1916 at Verdun. In Syria and Egypt some eight battalions of Armenians enlisted in the French Oriental Legion or in the British Army. General Allenby said of them: "I am proud to have Armenian contingents under my command. They fought brilliantly and took a leading part in the victory."

But now Armenia had to plead before the nations. An Armenian Republic, indeed, existed in the Caucasus, but Turkish Armenia was helpless, starving, and largely depopulated. The United States generously sent large aid in the way of food and relief. England and France declared themselves favorable to Armenian independence, but their acts scarcely tallied with their words. In 1916 Armenians in the midst of their heroic sacrifices for the Entente had learned, almost with despair, that England and France had come to a secret agreement that Asia Minor; including large portions of Armenia, should be divided between them, at least as spheres of influence.

In the circumstances, who can wonder that the Armenians turned for hope to the United States, grounding their appeal partly on President Wilson's words in behalf of oppressed nationalities, and partly on the fact that for nearly one hundred years Americans had been interested in educational and religious progress among the Armenians.

AT THE PEACE CONFERENCE

Consequently in February, 1919, there met in Paris an assembly of thirty-one elected representatives of the Armenians of the whole world, including four from the United States; and these representatives selected a delegation of six to present Armenia's claims before the Peace Conference. The President of this delegation was the Excellency Boghos Nubar Pasha, an Armenian from Egypt, Chairman of the Railway Directorate of Egypt, whose father had been twice Egyptian Prime Minister. This delegation represented Turkish Armenia, while A. Aharonian was President of the delegation of the Republic of Armenia. This republic had been formed of the Armenians in the Caucasus in 1918, but intentionally its organization had been left provisional in order that Turkish Armenia might be added to its territory, and that then permanent organization might be effected by the elected representatives of both Turks and Armenians, united as one nation. For political and diplomatic reasons Persian Armenia had to be left out.

On Nov. 30, 1918, the Armenian National Delegation at Paris proclaimed the independence of Integral Armenia and placed it under the guarantee of the League of Nations. The Republic of the Caucasus and the Armenians of Turkey, and indeed of the whole world, came therefore before the conference as a unit and presented an earnest and dramatic appeal for independence.

SUPPORT FOR ARMENIA'S PLEA

Their demand has received almost universal support. Mr. Balfour, in a letter addressed to Boghos Nubar Pasha, Oct. 12, 1918, said: "The liberation of Armenia is one of the war aims of the allied powers." Mr. Clemenceau, in a letter to the same, of July, 1918, said: "I am happy to confirm to you that the Government of the republic, like that of Great Britain, has not ceased to place the Armenian Nation among those peoples whose fate the Allies intend to settle according to the supreme laws of humanity and justice." On Dec. 10, 1918, Senator Lodge offered the following resolution in the United States Senate:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, Armenia (including the six vilayets of Armenia and Cilicia), Russian Armenia and the northern part of the province of Azerbaidjan, Persian Armenia, should be independent, and that it is the hope of the Senate that the Peace Conference will make arrangements for helping Armenia to establish an independent republic.

Senator Thomas, a Democrat, member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said: "I heartily approve of the Lodge resolution and of every resolution which favors Armenian independence." June 22, 1919, Judge Hughes, Elihu Root, John Sharp Williams, James W. Gerard, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, and four other prominent Americans cabled President Wilson at Paris: "We believe that without regard to party or creed the American people are deeply interested in the welfare of the Armenian people and expect to see the restoration of the independence of Armenia." On Nov. 30, 1918, the Italian Parliament adopted a resolution favoring an independent Armenia.

The Greeks and Armenians in the Turkish Empire, though for centuries divided by jealousies, have been brought together by their common need, and a memorandum, signed by both the Greek and Armenian Patriarchs of Constantinople, was laid before the Paris conference asking independence for the Armenians in Turkey and the union of Greek Asia Minor with the Kingdom of Greece.

ARMENIA'S NEED OF HELP

Nevertheless, in spite of all this encouragement, the Armenians feel that they have by no means won their case. A recent recrudescence of the Young Turk Party in Turkey once more threatens a Pan-Turanian movement and the final extinction of all the Armenians in Turkey. England has withdrawn most of her forces from Asia Minor. Inevitably the Armenians look chiefly to the United States.

It is generally agreed that if Armenia be made independent or even autonomous it must be under the mandate of some power to assist in the reorganization of her devastated resources and to defend her from the attacks of Turks, Kurds, and Tartars. England and France, by secret agreement during the war, largely portioned between them Asia Minor, including much of Armenia; if either of these countries should accept a mandate for a united Armenia, the other would regard the agreement as having been violated. America is the only country that can aid Armenia, without rousing suspicion and jealousy.

The proposition is sometimes made that for political and religious reasons Turkey should be allowed even yet to retain nominal suzerainty over Armenia; but Armenians declare that, after centuries of oppression, ending in forty years of massacres and deportations by the Turks, for the Armenians to be united in any way with the Turks is impossible; it would give rise to such complications that the peace could not be kept. They declare that Armenians, having aided and perhaps having saved the Entente at critical periods, the Entente must now save them, and that Armenia needs to receive aid from the United States or perish from the earth.

Dwindling of the Turkish Empire

A Tragic Romance of History

WHEN Generals Maude and Allenby captured Bagdad and Jerusalem in 1917-18, crushing the resistance of the last remaining Turkish armies, they wrote practically the final chapter in the long, dark history of the Ottoman Empire. The sketch maps on the four succeeding pages tell at a glance the story of more than four centuries of Ottoman imperialism. There was a time, after the capture of Constantinople by Mohammed II. in 1453, when all Eastern Europe, if not the whole Continent, seemed destined to pass under the Mussulman sword. By the end of the sixteenth century almost the whole of Hungary, as well as Transylvania, Bukowina, Bessarabia, most of modern Rumania, Bosnia, and Serbia, the Balkan Peninsula, Greece, Morea, and most of the Aegean Islands were under Turkish sway. The Black Sea was practically an Ottoman lake, and the Turkish fleet in the Eastern Mediterranean, despite the great defeat of Lepanto in 1572, was a formidable power.

The failure of the great Moslem assault on Vienna in 1683—thanks to the sovereign of Poland—and the loss of Budapest in 1686, marked the commencement of the ebbing of the Turkish tide, and from that day to this the Ottoman frontier has been slowly pushed back, until now the Peace Conference at Paris has intimated its intention to confine Turkish rule to a small region in Asia Minor between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, as shown on the fourth map of the series.

Until the middle of the eighteenth century Austria was Turkey's most serious foe. The Hapsburgs recovered Hungary, Transylvania, and much of Slavonia and Croatia. By 1770 Turkey's second great European competitor, Russia, had definitely appeared upon the scene. By 1796 the buffer State of Poland, which had done some of the most effective fighting against the Turkish invasion, had ceased to exist, and Russia was claiming the right to protect the Christian subjects of the Sublime Porte. The modern phase of the Turkish question had practically begun.

In 1830 the Greek war of independence ended in the establishment of modern Greece—the first independent State created out of the Turkish Empire. Russia, too, was still advancing. The status of Turkey at that period is shown in the second of the four maps. From 1873 to 1876 a series of revolts against Turkish misrule in the Balkans precipitated the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, which brought the Russian Army to the door of Constantinople and the British fleet to the Sea of Marmora. Other wars in the succeeding decades nibbled still other portions from the dwindling empire of the Sultans until, in 1908, Bulgaria renounced Turkish suzerainty. The formation of the Balkan League by Montenegro, Serbia, Bulgaria, and Greece in 1912 was followed promptly by the first Balkan war, which forced Turkey, already weakened by a war with Italy in which she had lost Tripoli, to cede to the Balkan allies all her territory north of the Enos-Media line, together with Crete. When the Balkan States quarreled and fought the second Balkan war in 1913, Turkey regained Adrianople and some minor shreds of what she had lost, but the diminished size of the Ottoman Empire is indicated in the third map of the accompanying series.

Finally, Turkey's entry into the world war on the side of the Central Powers in 1914 sealed her fate and made the difference between the third and fourth maps presented herewith. Though at this writing the terms on which the Allies will make peace with Turkey are still unsettled, their larger aspects have already been determined by events. General Maude's conquest of Bagdad and Mesopotamia gave that region, with the sanction of an international mandate, into the hands of British rulers; the progress made there in the last year is described elsewhere in this issue. General Allenby's successful campaign in Palestine likewise determined a future under British control for that historic region; the British Government's promise of a Zionist refuge there for the persecuted Jews of Eastern Europe remains still to be worked out into tangible form. Several secret treaties made early in the war also are having a powerful influence in reshaping the map of the former Ottoman Empire.

In 1915 the British made a treaty with the Shereef of Mecca, now known as King Hussein, promising him the sovereignty of the new Arab kingdom of Hedjaz in return for the military assistance which he and his son, Emir Feisal, were to give and did give in the war against the Turks. This Arab kingdom, though not yet delimited, will include the mass of the population south of the highlands of Anatolia and Armenia, and in the regions south of Syria and Palestine, between the seacoast and the desert. The original promise seems to have included Bagdad, Damascus, and most of Syria and Mesopotamia; the extent to which this is to be fulfilled remains one of the problems puzzling the Peace Conference.

Later France and Great Britain made a secret treaty which divided this same area into spheres of influence, with the Haifa-Tekrit line dividing them, and with France controlling the territory north of that line and Great Britain the region south of it, including Palestine. When the Italians entered the war the Treaty of London undertook to give them a sphere of influence on the Black Sea coast in Anatolia. British troops at the close of the war were occupying Syria, as well as nearly all the rest of the regions involved in all these changes; France, however, had protected the Syrian Christians ever since the days of the Crusades, and had very considerable interests in that country; hence there followed a rather serious misunderstanding between the two nations for a time, until a sort of modus vivendi was arranged. The French Government then appointed General Gouraud as Commissioner in Syria and Commander in Chief of the French

TURKEY IN 1913, AFTER THE LOSS OF ITS POSSESSIONS IN AFRICA AND IN THE BALKANS

Army in the East. He organized the French forces at Saloniki into a division, which he united with another division already in Syria under General Hamelin, and arrived at Beirut on Nov. 23, 1919, to take up his new duties. By previous arrangement with the British Government his troops relieved the British forces of occupation in Syria, and now the French and Arab armies are in control of the chief regions tentatively assigned to France and the Hedjaz.

But the problem of an independent Armenian State, which still further complicates the rivalries in Asia Minor, and which has remained unsolved because of the long delay of the United States in determining whether or not to assume a mandate for that region, still further puzzles the makers of the new map of what once was Turkey. Nor does this exhaust the list of complications and causes of possible conflict. The Greeks, who form a large element of the population along the Aegean Sea, in the neighborhood of Smyrna, are making strong efforts to obtain a mandate for that region. Their claims are contested by the Italians, who landed at Adalia and occupied the seacoast, and who have clashed with the increasing forces which Greece is sending to protect its nationals.

It has recently become known that in 1917, when the adhesion of Greece to the Entente was greatly needed, Mr. Lloyd George made with M. Venizelos a secret treaty promising Greece a slice of Anatolia about one-third the size of France. M. Venizelos sought and obtained permission to send troops across the Aegean last May. It was understood that his intention was to occupy only Smyrna and the immediate neighborhood; but the Greeks proceeded immediately to push out into the hinterland, and have ever since waged war on the whole country around Aidin and devastated the beautiful valley of the Meander River. The Turks offered resistance there, and for months a war characterized by the most cruel methods has been going on. The City of Aidin has been pillaged and burned, and the garden region around it has been laid waste.

There remains the problem of Constantinople—whether it shall be internationalized or left partly in the hands of the Turks. The efforts of the Turks themselves for continuance of power also cannot be ignored, as they have had a certain degree of support from France.

Such is a bare outline of the complex situation which the break-up of Turkey has presented for the solution of the Peace Conference. Pending the publication of the treaty that shall determine the political fate of the remnant of the Ottoman Empire, the best official summary of the case, from an optimistic viewpoint, is that given by Premier Lloyd George in his Guildhall speech, Nov. 8, 1919. He told his audience:

I think I can venture to say that there is complete agreement among all the Allies on the fundamental principles of a settlement with Turkey. First of all, we are all agreed that the Turkish misgovernment in lands populated by Greeks, by Arabs, and by Armenians shall come to an end. We are all agreed that the gates of the Black Sea must be free to all nations, and that their guardianship can no longer be entrusted to the power that betrayed its trust and closed those gates in the face of the Allies at the behest of the Prussian military power. As to all other questions there ought to be no insuperable difficulty in the distribution of the responsibility among the Allies for guaranteeing this policy, distribution among the nations whose friendliness has borne the test of a great war and whose continued co-operation is essential for the peace and freedom of the world.

Bagdad Under British Rule

How Englishmen Administered the City of Haroun al Raschid After Driving Out the Turks*

THE British occupation of Mesopotamia began immediately after the declaration of war, with an advance on Basra, from which the Turkish armies fled so hastily that all records were left undamaged and public buildings intact. Soon after came the advance to Nasiriyah on the Euphrates, to Amarah, Kut, and Ctesiphon on the Tigris. In the Spring of 1917 General Maude recaptured Kut and marched on Bagdad. The British advance on Bagdad, unlike the occupation of Basra, had been expected, and all records considered valuable had been destroyed or removed by the Turks; the Arts and Crafts School had been deliberately bombed, and fires had been started in the city. What furniture the Turks left was ransacked by the mob in the interval between the departure of the Turks and the arrival of the British, and the Government offices were a confusion of broken furniture, dirt, and piles of paper.

Order was at once restored by the Military Governor, but for some time it was difficult to obtain open assistance from the inhabitants. Too vivid was the memory of the butcheries at Kut, when those who had assisted the British were brutally massacred, together with their families. Those officials who still remained at their post, as, for instance, the officials who administered the public debt, were passively resistant, and the British were obliged practically unaided to bring order out of chaos.

BAGDAD'S POSITION

The capture of Bagdad was of transcendent importance to Great Britain. It vindicated British prestige in the East, which had undoubtedly been shaken by the failure to force the Dardanelles and relieve Kut-el-Amara. It meant the disruption of the Turkish Empire in Asia, the liberation of Persia from the Ottoman occupation of nearly 30,000 square miles of her territory, and the security of the Indian frontier. It also stilled Mohammedan unrest in this region and prepared the way for the ultimate British victory in the East. For Bagdad, situated on both banks of the River Tigris, about 200 miles north of the confluence of that river with the River Euphrates and about 400 miles north of Basra, has always been important for its position. About a day's journey from the treeless, fertile plain of Mesopotamia, in which Bagdad lies snugly within its fringe of orange groves, date palms, and pomegranate gardens, are the ruins of the ancient cities of Babylon and Nineveh, respectively the capitals of the Chaldean and Assyrian Empires, and the Tower of Babel, all of Biblical fame.

One of the four great gates of the city that face north, south, east, and west, the Bab-ul Muazzam, an open square with bazaars, is the eastern terminus of the overland route to Aleppo and Europe, and here the caravans arrive from Central Arabia and pilgrims set out for Kerbela. Bagdad, indeed, has always been the key of the desert route to Damascus and Asia Minor and the entrance to the waterways leading to Mosul and Armenia. Germany thought so much of Bagdad's position that, with Turkey's consent, she made it one of the termini of her Berlin-Bosporus-Bagdad Railway, by which, in the event of future war, she could reach the British dependency of India.

A PAGE OF HISTORY

Bagdad was founded by Abu Jaafe-el-Mansur, the first of the Abbasia Caliphs, in 762. He built the city on the west bank of the Tigris, on the place which the Persians had named Bagadata, or the "Gift of God." For 500 years Bagdad remained the seat of the Caliphate, until, in 1258, Hulagu, grandson of Genghis Khan, at the head of his Mongol hordes, put it to the sack. At its zenith Bagdad was the city described in "The Arabian Nights," orientally magnificent, under the rule of the famous Caliph of romantic memories, Haroun al Raschid, or Aaron the Just, who reigned from 786 to 809. Tennyson described the throne of Haroun as follows:

Six columns, three on either side,
Pure silver, underpropt a rich Throne of the massy ore, from which Down droop'd, in many a floating fold,
Engarlanded and diaper'd
With inwrought flowers, a cloth of gold.
Thereon, his deep eye laughter stirr'd
With merriment of kingly pride,
Sole star of all that place and time,
I saw him in his goodly prime,
The good Haroun al Raschid.

After the Mongol invasion Bagdad ceased to be the spiritual home of Islam. Again, in 1410, the city was sacked by Tamerlane; Suleiman conquered it in 1534, and the Persians in 1624. On Christmas Day, 1638, the city surrendered to Murad IV., Sultan of Turkey, and it remained in Turkish hands until March 11, 1917, the date of its capture by the British.

The Turkish administration which the British replaced had been in the hands of a Pasha, assisted by a council. The rulers were the tools of Constantinople, and were unpopular with the Arabs on account of religious differences. The population consisted of Persians, Jews, Turks, Chaldeans, Arabs, Armenians, Greeks, and Levantines, and numbered about 200,000, as against the 2,000,000 of the time of the Caliphs. Of these 200,000, about 120,000 were Mohammedans, 60,000 Jews, and 20,000 Christians, including 5,000 Armenians. Turkish and Arabic were the main languages spoken.

A DISTRIBUTING CENTRE

In ancient times Bagdad was a most prosperous city, but it had declined in importance under the inefficient and slovenly Turkish rule. Yet it had long been a busy forwarding centre. From Damascus silks and embroideries were brought to it by caravans of camels and distributed to the various Persian towns, and Persian rugs, carpets, fruits, drugs and other commodities were sent back in exchange. Goods from Europe and India were transported by sea to Basra, thence up-river to Bagdad and Mosul in the picturesque dhows of which we read so much in books of the slave trade. Most of the business of the city was conducted through the Imperial Ottoman Bank, though "sarrafs" (small Jewish banks) also received their quotas.

When the British occupied the city they found that the finger of time had passed lightly over the manners and customs of the town, leaving an intact, unchanged picture of the east of ancient days. The irrigation of the fields was still carried on in primitive fashion, the water being drawn from the river by means of waterwheels driven by teams of horses; the men still spun with old-fashioned looms in the open air, the patient ox still trod out the corn, the women still ground the grain between the upper and nether millstones, the shepherd still led his flock to the green pastures.

British observers saw the travelers coming down the turbulent Tigris on rafts composed of inflated goatskins, and Bible scenes rose again before their eyes as they saw the Arab ride past on a steed worthy of the name, the goatherd surrounded by his flock, the money-changers plying their trade in the dusty streets, the Jews shuffling by, with their long white beards, the camels swaying slowly over the sands, and heard the raucous cries of the water-sellers, the patter of water-donkeys, the clatter of vehicles driven at top-speed. But under the setting sun they saw the Bagdad redolent of romance, a glorified Bagdad, pervaded with the atmosphere of mystery and adventure evoked by Sir Richard Burton's translation of "The Arabian Nights."

Bathed in this sunset the river seemed to be a stream of liquid fire, while the domes and minarets of the mosques stood clearly outlined against a pale blue background.

benches under the shade of palm trees—the merchants met to discuss business, and as they sat cross-legged, drank the thick, delicious coffee served in cups without handles. Beyond, the city bazaar offered a feast of color. The gorgeous Eastern dyes made vivid splashes of color; the gleam of silver and gilt-embroidered goods from Damascus caught the eye.

THE BRITISH RULE

But these were only the romantic and picturesque features of Bagdad. When the British came in they found the city almost wholly lacking in the essentials of good government. At first they had to play their civilizing hand alone, and were the object of much distrust and suspicion. The Arabs of the Euphrates had never been much governed, and it was not until the Sheiks had come to Bagdad and been personally received by the British Political Officer, and had seen and heard what was being done under British rule, that real progress was possible.

There was much to give them confidence. Bagdad, from a picturesquely beautiful but disorderly, unhygienic, unpoliced and drink-loving city, had in a very short time become orderly; it possessed clean streets, electric lighting, a municipal government under a military Governor, a police force, night watchmen, a prison, a hospital, and even a fire brigade. Religious and civil tribunals had been established. The liquor laws were reformed, and all drinking shops licensed. The salt monopoly was suspended, the tobacco supply was regulated officially as a necessity to the Arab population. The functions of the public debt were taken over by the British authorities in such a way as to increase confidence.

Bagdad had always prided itself upon its learning, its libraries, and its traditions, and education was a problem that required immediate attention. An education committee was appointed consisting of five of the notables. Of eighty schoolmasters who applied for positions and who were obliged to take an examination, only five were found qualified to teach, and these five had been headmasters. A primary school was opened at once under these five, while for the remainder an advanced class was started, and lectures in Arabic, geography, history, and the science of teaching were arranged. Fifteen teachers declined to attend this course, and of the remaining sixty only twenty-seven passed the examination held at the end of the first three months. Another course was begun at the Normal School, private schools were reopened, and on passing inspection were granted substantial financial assistance. The Boy Scout movement was inaugurated, Arabic was made the official language and the vehicle of instruction. English also was taught, and eagerly enrolled for. Map drafters and engineers were trained and put to work. By the Summer of 1918 the work had become so heavy that an education department under a director was established, and the Revenue Office was relieved of what till then had been an additional duty.

All this was not without influence on the Sheiks of the agricultural tribes, but what appealed still more to them was the attention which the British administration paid to the agriculturist. The oil-driven pumping plants, of which there were over 300 in the neighborhood of Bagdad, were again busy on the banks. The oil-fuel, of which the natives had been deprived for two years, was provided by military transport; stolen parts were traced and recovered; assistance was given; and eventually a separate branch of the military workshop was established for the repair of agricultural machinery. Seed, including that of the potato, hitherto unknown, was distributed, and advice on cultivation given.

dences of British good-will was the ever widening influence of Sir Percy Cox, who had been appointed Chief Political Officer in the Autumn of 1914. "Kokus," as his name was Arabicized, had become a hero; songs in his honor were sung at the camp-fire; and a mythical Saga of his doings and the motives therefor was passed on from Arab to Arab, and repeated by those who had never seen him.

MESOPOTAMIA'S REVIVAL

So the ancient city of Bagdad was transformed. Elsewhere throughout Mesopotamia the same story of British achievement could be told. All towns occupied were at once placed under military Governors, districts were shaped, guarantees were exchanged with Sheiks, revenue contracts were revised, and courts of civil justice were established. Sympathetic treatment when the crops were bad and the elimination of oppressive taxation went far to gain native confidence. Sheiks, subject to Governmental control, were made responsible for order among their tribes, and for the payment of revenue. Justice was summary, and sentences were more varied and effective than those found in the Code. A public servant found stealing Government property, for instance, was sentenced to carry through the bazaar an inscription in either hand, one reading: "With this hand I receive from the Government," the other, "With this hand I steal from the Government I serve." Dispensaries were opened, and much of the blindness that cursed Mesopotamia even more grievously than India was relieved. Measures for the training of competent teachers were taken, and as these became available schools in which Arabic was the medium of instruction were opened.

The general situation in 1917 throughout Irak gave reason for disquietude; the agricultural situation was serious, and there was also a general feeling^o of insecurity. Kerbala and Hillah had openly risen against the Turk, and there had been pillage and massacre; Nejef was raw with irritation. It was stated that Turks had invaded harems on the plea of searching for men in hiding to evade military service. The populace was nervous of all authority. The British military situation at this time, also, was none too secure in the eyes of the calculating Arab. The British were indeed at Bagdad, and their forces were established at Falujah on the Euphrates and at Samarra on the Tigris, but Turkish guns commanded the headworks of the five canals that are drawn from the Diyalah, Ramadi still held out, and there was an unsubdued little garrison in Diwaniyah.

The influence of the Chief Political Officer and the Revenue Board, however, soon made itself felt. The canal system, which had gone to pieces during the war, was repaired and made available for active use; an agricultural development scheme was devised and applied with considerable success; meanwhile military operations were continued which led to the capture of the points still held by the Turks; Diwaniyah fell in August, Ramadi in the early Autumn, and the Turks were also driven from their position commanding the Diyalah canals. Relieved at last of the fear that the Turks would return and take revenge, the Sheiks came in and brought their submission, and the work of regeneration throughout Irak went on smoothly and without obstruction.

AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT

The success of the agricultural development scheme exceeded all expectations, for it produced 253,000 tons of crop and 50,400 tons of revenue. By October, 1918, 49,000 tons of revenue corn had been handed over to the army for its support; by February, 1919, approximately 80% of advances had been repaid. The total area under cultivation in 1917-18 was calculated at 1,000,000 acres, of which 600,000 were in the Bagdad vilayet. It was proposed for the 1918-19 cultivation to increase this to 1,500,000 acres, the maximum for which water could be made available, population found, and cattle provided.

Of many urgent schemes of improvement considered, one of the most important was the provision of a new head for the Khalis canal. This engineering feat, which involved the driving of a passage through the rocks of the Jabal Mansuriyah, saved a valuable cereal and garden area of over 100,000 acres from a precarious situation, a bend of the river having dangerously threatened the old headworks. Two additional canals made available on the Euphrates brought 60,000 new acres under cultivation. Plow oxen were introduced from India, valuable results from cotton experiments and tests of sugar, beet and wheat were obtained, and cattle breeding received great attention.

At this point the war ended. Both Irak and the rich province of Mosul were provisionally in British hands. Mesopotamia was a country of great promise, and though the difficulties in the way of reconstruction were still considerable, though land problems and the adjustment of rights between Arab cultivators and city proprietors called for skillful handling, it was already clear that, given continued good government, the future of this portion of Arabia might develop a prosperity reminiscent of the semi-mythical and romantic days of good old Haroun al Raschid.

Meanwhile the fate of Mesopotamia, and of Bagdad, the "City of the Gift of God," has remained undecided by the Peace Conference at Paris, and what the future will bring to this Arabic-Turkish country in the way of government no man as yet can tell.

Persia and the Young Shah

Picturesque Scenes Marking the Ruler's Visit to London— The Anglo-Persian Agreement

SULTAN AHMED SHAH KAJAR, the ruler of Persia—a young man of only 21 years—arrived in London on Oct. 31, 1919, and received a welcome of international significance, in view of the recent agreement between the two nations. At the Victoria Station a large company of British royalty, statesmen and notables awaited the guest; the platform had been reserved, carpeted and decorated for the occasion. The outer walls of the royal waiting room were covered with crimson cloth, and on each side of the doorway leading from the platform to the waiting room were banks of flowers and plants, above which floated the Persian flag. The interior was beautifully decorated, and the station yard outside was hung with British, Persian and other national flags. A guard of honor of the Coldstream Guards, with band, was posted in the station yard; a sovereign's escort of Household Cavalry was in waiting at the exit; and the King sent five four-horse open carriages with attendants in royal scarlet to convey the Persian ruler from the station to Buckingham Palace.

As the time of arrival drew near, distinguished personages began to arrive, and took up their positions on the carpeted platform in readiness to meet the Shah. Among these were included the Prime Minister, Earl Curzon of Kedleston, Mr. Balfour, Viscount Milner, Mr. Shortt and other Ministers; the Marquis of Crewe, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London, the Mayor of Westminster, Lord Downham (Chairman to the London County Council), Earl Haig (Commander in Chief, Great Britain), Field Marshal Sir Henry Wilson (Chief of the Imperial Staff), the Earl of Chesterfield (Master of the Horse) and many others.

Presently a sharp military command and the playing of the national anthem indicated to those inside the arrival of a member of the royal family. It was Prince Arthur of Connaught, who almost immediately joined the group on the platform. Still later the national anthem again was played as the King arrived.

When the Persian ruler, arriving from Dover, stepped from his special train, King George shook hands with him very cordially and said a few words of warm welcome. The young ruler, who has a very portly figure and an intelligent-looking face, wore a Persian military uniform. A notable feature of his dress was an Astrakhan fez, ornamented in front with a richly jeweled white aigrette. The King presented Prince Arthur of Connaught, and immediately afterward the Prime Minister.

The next few minutes were occupied in a series of presentations on both sides, and then the visitor and the members of the reception party passed through the royal waiting room to the station yard. The guard of honor gave a royal salute, the band played the Persian national anthem and the Shah proceeded to make an inspection of the guard. At the close of this ceremony the visitor stepped into the leading carriage and was driven to Buckingham Palace amid cheers and friendly demonstrations from the crowds in the streets.

HONORS AT THE GUILDHALL

Among the many honors paid to the Persian ruler in the next few days the most important were those at the Guildhall on Nov. 1, when the Lord Mayor presented an address to the Shah from the City of London and entertained him at a luncheon.

On arrival at the Guildhall, where a guard of honor was furnished by the Grenadier Guards, the Shah was received by the city officials and a procession was formed to the library, where the presentation ceremony took place. Headed by the city trumpeters, in their picturesque golden tabards, the procession comprised the City Marshal and the Under Sheriffs, the Chairman and members of the Reception Committee, the Town Clerk, the Sheriffs, the Recorder, the royal suites, Prince Arthur of Connaught, Prince Albert, the sword bearer and mace bearer, the Lord Mayor, in his robes of black and gold, with Princess Arthur of Connaught, and the Shah with the Lady Mayoress. His Imperial Majesty, who was received with cheers, wore a blue coat with scarlet facings, and a fez with an immense diamond and an aigrette.

LORD MAYOR'S ADDRESS

The Lord Mayor, rising at the close of the luncheon and after the toast of the King had been honored, proposed that of the Shah. He said:

His Imperial Majesty is the ruler of a people whose ancient glories are without a parallel even in the wonderful history of the great empires of the East. Five hundred years before the opening of the Christian era, the power established by Cyrus and Darius united under a single sway all the races of the Near and Middle East. From age to age the Persian national genius endured. In the fourteenth century the vast conquests of Tamerlane in Asia and Eastern Europe were made; and as lately as the eighteenth century Nadir Shah marched through Northern India and gave the empire of the moguls its deathblow. The Persian name has stood not merely for conquest, but for civilization and the things of the mind. Persian poetry is the finest flower of Oriental culture. The arts in Persia have known periods of the most splendid development.

With such memories to inspire them it is no wonder that the Persian people in recent years have felt more and more the impulse to play an active part in the new life which has opened for the nations of the Middle East. The talents and the gifts of character which have made so much history are still strong in the Persian race; and those Englishmen who have most deeply studied the life of modern Persia are the most fully convinced that a future of new greatness lies before it.

That is a prospect in which Great Britain must feel the keenest and most sympathetic interest. For more than a hundred years the relations between the two countries have been of cordial friendship. The great-grandfather of our Imperial guest visited this country on three occasions. His grandfather came among us in 1902. Both monarchs received the warmest popular welcome. The visit of his Imperial Majesty the present Shah takes places in profoundly changed conditions and under still more favorable auspices. Two of the powers which were the neighbors of Persia are today in ruins; there remains Great Britain, so long her firmest friend, the power to which the Persian State has always been most ready to turn for such assistance and counsel as we were able to give.

The Anglo-Persian agreement, so happily concluded three months ago, brings the two countries into a more intimate relationship than has yet existed, and will bring about, I am convinced, a yet closer and more cordial friendship. With the new strength and security which it is the purpose of the new agreement to confer on Persia, she will, we trust and believe, play that important rôle in the world to which her remarkable history entitles her.

ANGLO-PERSIAN AGREEMENT

Lord Curzon, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in supporting the toast, said many complimentary things about the guest of honor, and at length referred to the Anglo-Persian agreement, which had been concluded at Teheran, Persia, on Aug. 9, 1919. (See November CURRENT HISTORY.) The London Times summarized Lord Curzon's statements on this subject as follows:

What did we desire to do by that agreement? We wished to assist his Majesty and his Government in the restoration of peace and order to his country, sadly vexed and agitated by the disturbance of the recent war. We wished to assist him in developing the resources of his native land. Those resources were indeed considerable; resources both above and below soil. They were the resources of trade and the resources of a naturally industrious and capable population. What Persia wanted at the present time was security of her frontiers to prevent their being crossed by any foe; and internally, order and law, the authority of his Majesty to be felt in every quarter of his country; pacification of the trade routes along which she carries goods in exchange for produce with foreign lands. In this respect land transport and communication were lamentably difficult. Then there was the administration of justice for her people, and, above all (which was the secret of all successful administration), a sound and economic finance.

If his Majesty's Government with Great Britain's friendly assistance could develop the resources to which he had referred, Persia had a great future before her. Her trade could develop and her soil could be made to sustain a much larger population than at present. There was no reason why Persia should not recover a great and resounding position as one of the independent Mussulman nations of the world. The object of the present Government—as it was the object of every patriotic Englishman—was to assist Persia in the maintenance of her independence and integrity and to render easy the execution of that task. I recall—and I see it blazoned on one of the flags at the end of this hall—the national emblem of Persia. It is the Lion and the Sun. May we not find in that juxtaposition [concluded Lord Curzon] a happy omen; the British Lion stands forth as the proud and vallant champion of the rights and liberties of Persia. Over his shoulders rises the orb of the steadily increasing progress and prosperity of Persia itself.

THE SHAH'S REPLY

The Shah, who responded in French, said he was profoundly touched by the welcome accorded to him in this ancient and historic hall. He continued:

As, representing a new and liberal régime from which my people expect a regeneration of the country, a regeneration unhappily retarded up to now by external influences, I am happy to take this opportunity to refer to the strong bonds of friendship which have existed for so long between Persia and Great Britain. This moment is particularly well chosen for the strengthening of them, thanks to the new spirit of co-operation and fraternity between the peoples, consecrated by the League of Nations, which guarantees the free development of all countries in the full enjoyment of their independence and their integrity.

Not only does Persia, on account of her great riches, open a vast field of economic enterprise, but, thanks to her geographical position in the Middle East, she affords the easiest access to the immense resources of Central Asia. Even as Persia in the olden days was the most direct road between the West and the East, so today she will provide a new and important thoroughfare between neighboring countries and will bring to the heart of Asia the civilizing influence of the West. She will serve at the same time to develop the economic relations between the Western Hemisphere and that part of the world.

I have come to your country for the purpose of studying your methods, and I intend to visit some of those great industrial centres for which, quite rightly, you are famous throughout the world. The advancement of the material and social progress of my people and the improvement of their position, are my most cherished wish, and I am confident that I shall take back with me most valuable suggestions and instructive ideas on which we can base our program of reform and reorganization.

I express faithfully the feelings of my people when I say that Persia is resolutely determined to co-operate in the establishment of law and order in the Middle East, a condition which is essential to economic relations and commercial enterprises. Persia is helped in this by the removal of certain restrictions which hitherto had hindered international commerce between her and neighboring States. For myself I shall take every occasion to advance commercial relations by or with my country.

As a consequence, my attention is specially directed to the importance of the improvement of the communications by the construction of railways and the improvement of roads for motor transports—two conditions which are absolutely essential for the development of our country. My earnest desire will be to assist my country to become the intermediary connecting the industrial countries of the West with those of the Middle East, which are possessed of such vast natural resources.

After attending various other functions the Shah left London a few days later to visit various cities of the British Isles, including Edinburgh.

PERSIAN RULER'S CAREER

Born on Jan. 20, 1898, Ahmed Shah was a boy of 9 when he exercised his first important duty of statecraft. As heir-apparent he added his signature to that of his father, the Shah Mahomed Ali, to the ratification of the newly written Constitution drawn up by the Majlis (National Assembly) on Western lines. Within two years Mahomed Ali lost his throne in consequence of his futile attempts to stamp out the constitutional system and to regain the absolutism of his ancestors. On July 18, 1909, Ahmed Shah, then in his twelfth year, was proclaimed sovereign, his father being a refugee at the Russian Legation. For five years the boy was under the regency, first of Azad-ul-Mulk, a member of the royal family, and after his death of Nasir-ul-Mulk, a man of European education and high character.

His coronation took place with impressive ceremonial on July 21, 1914, so that he attained ruling powers on the very eve of the great war. In the preceding five years the administration was carried on largely in accordance with the views of the Majlis, though considerably tempered by the ominous power of Russian troops, not only in the "sphere of influence" assigned to the Czarist Government by the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907, but also in the "neutral sphere." The Teheran Government was most impecunious and the country beyond the reach of Russian Cossacks was in a state of continuous turbulence.

These were favorable conditions for Teutonic intrigue, which had long been active in the region of the Persian Gulf. German and Turkish emissaries did their utmost to force Persia into an open, or at least a covert, breach of the neutrality Teheran had declared. The die was definitely cast by the action of the young ruler in November, 1915, when there was a close trial of strength between the hostile powers. Torn by conflicting advice, Ahmed Shah, a mere boy of 17, took a strong stand for the Allies, and refused to leave Teheran to join the German, Austrian, and Turkish emissaries waiting for him six miles away. But further difficulties were created by the subsequent collapse of Russia, whose troops had dealt harshly with the Persians. The situation was not secure from the allied point of view until the overthrow of the military prestige of the Turk put an end once for all to the danger of Turkish aggression across the border.

Though the tendency of some of the greybeards in power had been to treat the Shah as little more than a figure-head, he showed through these critical years a growing capacity for statesmanship. His careful education at Teheran, mostly by foreign professors, had provided him with keys to first-hand study of the case of the Allies.

He knows English and Russian, and talks French fluently and accurately, though with a marked accent. He has shown himself friendly to European influences. In appearance he is short and stout. He is a good lawn tennis player and a staunch supporter of outdoor sports. As a boy he was much attached to his father, and he visited him in his exile at Prinkipo when traveling westward last August. He has had some military training at the hands of young Persians who had been attached to the French Army. There can be no doubt of his intention to adhere to constitutional rule or of the popularity he has attained, while still on the threshold of manhood, among his people.

Inner Aspects of China's Civil War

By FELICIEN CHALLAYE

M. Challaye, a French publicist, made extended visits to China in 1917 and 1919, each time obtaining interviews with party leaders, and at length completing a unique and illuminating study of all the political parties of new China, their inter-relations and programs, and the profound differences that have long caused the republic to be torn by civil war. The results were contributed to the Revue de Paris, Oct. 15, 1919, in an article, "Inner Politics in China." The present study, translated and abridged for CURRENT HISTORY from that article, throws new light on Chinese parties and leaders, the forces underlying China's declaration of war on Germany, and the main political events of the civil war up to the present period.

CHINESE politics resembles Japanese politics in its mingling of remote traditions and ancient national customs with institutions imitated from Europe and America. China, however, is differently situated in time and space from Japan. Its civilization is the older, but the introduction of European civilization, apart from the coast regions, was more recent in China than in Japan, and it still remains more limited.

While the Japanese Empire remained faithful to tradition, though adhering to a Constitution, China suddenly leaped from the most retrogressive form of government to the most advanced—from the empire to the republic. The inner politics of modern China is the work of parties created on the European model, opposing really modern programs, but struggling bitterly for material advantages of power, at the risk of disorganizing the whole country, according to the most immemorial traditions of Chinese history.

Three fundamental tendencies are observable in present-day Chinese political life, two of which correspond to organized parties: (1) The reactionary tendency, represented, above all, by the Manchus, who regret the empire and the former advantages which they enjoyed; (2) the Shin-pu-tang, or Party of Progress, representing the tendency of moderate reform, and (3) the Kuo-min-tang, or Party of the People, representing the tendency of radical and revolutionary reform. The Shin-pu-tang is the successor of the Reform Party, which, under the Manchu rule, through the paper of its principal representative, Kang Yu-wei, demanded a constitutional empire. The Party of the People originated in the secret societies which, under the direction of Sun Yat-sen, succeeded in replacing the empire by the republic. Besides these parties, corresponding to profound and enduring tendencies, and representing an opposition of ideas, there are two other groups, representing powerful interests: (1) The military group, called in the North, Pei-yang, and (2) the Chiao-tung-si, or "communication" group, representing particularly financial and material interests.

MANCHU REACTIONARIES

The reactionaries, first of all, are adherents of the past. They push their attachment to tradition so far that they refuse to adopt the modern organization of the political party, thus depriving themselves of a useful instrument of action. They lament the past, rather than seek to revivify or reconstruct it. The restoration of the monarchical power, made effective at the beginning of July, 1917, by General Chang Hsun, gave the reactionaries more disquietude than satisfaction. Distrustful of the permanence of this new empire, and fearing the serious consequences to themselves of the failure of this bold enterprise, they did nothing to support the General who had replaced their Emperor on his throne. There are all kinds of possibilities in China, and even the most clear-sighted hesitate to prophesy; but the permanent restoration of a Manchu Empire is the one solution which all agree in admitting is the most improbable of all.

PROGRESSIVE PARTY

The Shin-pu-tang, or Progressive Party, was represented mainly by Liang Chi-chao, Minister of Finance, when I was passing through Peking, and Tang Hua-lung, then Minister of the Interior. Liang Chi-chao was born in Kuang Tung in 1863. He was early converted to the ideas of the Reform Party, which demanded a constitutional monarchy, and became the favorite disciple of Kang Yu-wei. Forced to flee to Japan after the abortive coup d'état of 1898, he published there a Chinese paper with the object of spreading the new revolutionary ideas. He returned to China after the revolution, edited a paper at Tientsin, was named Vice Minister of Justice in the first Cabinet of President Yuan Shih-kai, but declined to accept office; he became Minister of Justice in the Hsiung Hsi-ling Cabinet in September, 1913, and Minister of Finance in the Tuan Chi-jui Cabinet of April, 1916. He is not only an influential statesman, he is also the greatest writer of contemporary China, one of the greatest writers of modern China, the author of lyrics, dramas, criticisms, and philosophical essays. In subject matter and the abundance and diversity of his ideas he has been compared to Voltaire, and in matters of form, for his light and elegantly simple style, to Renan.

Tang Hua-lung was born in Hupé in 1873, studied law in Japan, was member and then President of the Provincial Assembly of Hupé, Vice President of the National Council, Minister of Education, and Minister of the Interior. I had the honor of being received by both of these leaders of the Progressive Party, in a room of their Ministry, furnished in the European style. They answered my questions courteously, sipping from time to time their tea. I give below a summary of their statements, which were completed, on certain points, by some of their political friends.

The Progressive Party is strongly republican. It believes in utilizing European and American institutions, but only on a basis of adaptation to China's traditions and conditions. Universal suffrage is only the far-off goal, dependent on the development of education, which is still extremely low. A Government centralized like that of France is advocated by the party. The United States were States before they were united, said Mr. Liang, while China has been unified for centuries. The decentralization of the revolution led to anarchy. The army also must be "nationalized." This has already been begun by standardizing uniforms, arms and military grades. A limited degree of decentralization may be admitted in the case of educational instruction and unimportant economic matters and the appointment of small local functionaries. Popular instruction must be encouraged on a strong democratic basis. The monetary and tax system must be improved.

From the point of view of foreign policy, the Shin-pu-tang declares itself in favor of the Entente. Liang Chi-chao is proud of having been the first of the Cabinet to call for the intervention of China on the side of the Allies. China declared war on Germany, first, because Germany showed herself by her acts "the enemy of all mankind," and also because the rights and the interests of China are in accord with the essential interests and ideals of the Allies. The latter, he declared, because of their own principles, will be obliged to guarantee the integrity and independence of China.

Such is the program which the leaders of the party described to me. The Shin-pu-tang fundamentally has the same ideal as the Kuo-min-tang, but it wishes to realize it by peaceful means. It is the party of the juste milieu, which wishes progress along the lines of order. And Liang Chi-chao sums this difference up in a very neat metaphor: "The old conservative Mandarins are the past. The Kuo-min-tang is the future. But the present belongs to the Shin-pu-tang."

THE PEOPLE'S PARTY

As with the Ministers of the Shin-pu-tang and their friends, so also I entered into touch with the principal representatives of the People's Party, the Kuo-min-tang, first at Peking and subsequently at Canton.

At Peking, one of my friends brought together one evening in a hotel room four former Ministers, the leaders of the Opposition Party, who at that time were staying in the capital. I also saw several times the main representative of an important tendency of the Kuo-min-tang, Mr. Tsai Yuan-pei. Mr. Tsai was born in 1867 in Che-Kiang. After brilliant literary studies he was made a member of the Academy of Letters of Peking and occupied the post of professor at the Shanghai College, the National Institute of Shanghai, and the School of Modern Languages at Peking. From 1908 he studied philosophy and esthetics in the universities of Berlin and Leipzig. On his return to China, after the outbreak of the revolution, he was appointed Minister of Education in the Provisional Government of Nankin, and then in the first republican Cabinet. In 1913 he went to France. He is one of the founders of the Chinese Society of Rational French Education—whose object is to diffuse a system of democratic instruction for laymen in China on the French model, with the aid of France—and the Chinese President of the Franco-Chinese Educational Society.

Mr. Tsai, at the time I saw him, was rector of the University of Peking. He is the author of numerous philosophical works and of a Utopistic novel called "The Dream of the New Year," in which he expounds a plan for the constitution of a harmonious society based on universal liberty. Personally he belongs to a small group of Chinese who practice austere morality, monogamy, vegetarianism and temperance.

But the principal representatives of the Kuo-min-tang were in Canton. It was to that large southern city that the members of the Chamber dissolved by the Minister, Tuan Chi-jui, withdrew, and it was here that they formed a new Parliament at the instigation of their leader, Sun Yat-sen.

SUN YAT-SEN

Dr. Sun Yat-sen was born in the Province of Kuang-Tung in 1866. Educated in the College of Honolulu, then at Queen's College in Hongkong, in an atmosphere of European culture, he studied medicine at the Canton Hospital and at the School of Medicine of Hongkong. He was especially interested in political and economic problems, accepted the boldest solutions, joined the secret society, The Triade, and was appointed its President. On the verge of being arrested at Canton he fled to New York, then to London, where in broad daylight he was seized and imprisoned by members of the Chinese Legation; he was released only on the intervention of the English authorities. He lived subsequently in Japan, in Singapore, at Saigon, in Chinese circles converted to revolutionary ideas. It was he who formulated the program conceived in common.

Sun Yat-sen, by means of an active propaganda, prepared the revolution which broke out at the end of 1911. On Dec. 29, 1911, the delegates of the provinces which proclaimed independence named Sun Yat-sen President of the republic. But the revolutionists, fearing that the triumph of the republic could not be effected by their own efforts, offered the permanent Presidency to Yuan Shih-kai, a Mandarin of the old régime affiliated with the republican cause, who accepted office. Sun Yat-sen was appointed by the latter Plenipotentiary Commissary of the Railways at an annual salary of $30,000. Sun Yat-sen refused the salary, but consented to undertake a loan for the railways. In this venture he lost much of his prestige, and was accused of having "sold out to the tyrant." He opposed Yuan Shih-kai, however, when the latter openly manifested his desire to become dictator and even Emperor. Subsequently he also opposed Tuan Chi-jui, whom he accused of aiming to become dictator. He then convoked at Canton the Parliament which Tuan Chi-jui dissolved, and was named General in Chief of the republican armies which the rebellious provinces of the South raised against the Peking Government.

Unable to see Sun Yat-sen personally because of the latter's illness, I had interviews with his Chief of Staff, General Hoang Ta-wei, with the former President of the Senate, Chang Ki, and other eminent representatives of the Kuo-min-tang, including the President of the Chamber and Wang Chao-min, celebrated for having attempted the life of the Regent under the empire. The principal tenets of the party, as I learned them from these interviews, were as follows:

AIMS OF PEOPLE'S PARTY

The Kuo-min-tang, combining elements which we might call radical and socialist, is ardently republican; but at the present time China is not a republic, since the powers do not proceed from the people, since the Constitution has been violated, since the Parliament has been illegally dissolved. "We have no proper form of government," General Hoang said to me, "since there is no representation of the people." And Chang Ki said to me: "The Prime Minister, Tuan Chi-jui, lived in Germany at the time of Bismarck; he has preserved a keen admiration for the man and his country; he is an autocrat, a Prussian militarist, the antithesis of a democrat in the French sense."

First of all, say the People's Party, the republic must be actually realized, the provisional Constitution must be re-established, the dissolved Parliament which was spontaneously created in Canton must be reconvened officially in Peking. The Constitution to be re-established must not contain the clause of universal suffrage. The Kuo-min-tang denies that it intends to establish universal suffrage immediately, as its opponents declare. The imperial régime has lasted too long, its consequences will endure too long: the Chinese people are not sufficiently enlightened. Yet even now a very wide degree of suffrage may be basically established, and every educated man, every merchant, every rice-owner should have the right to vote, at least in the first degree.

The leaders of the Kuo-min-tang protest energetically—and those of Canton more than those of Peking—against the accusation of federalism. "It is for a united China that we are struggling," the members of the Parliamentary delegation told me; "we are all Chinese, we wish to remain Chinese." Not the North and the South, but the partisans of the old and new ideas are in conflict. It is only because they find more partisans in the southern provinces of China that the republicans have established their centre of activity there. But they are working to conquer all China, and they declare that they desire to perpetuate a united China.

With regard to foreign policy, like the Shin-pu-tang, they favor the Entente, condemn Germany, and declare for the cause of right as opposed to despotism. All the leaders, except Sun Yat-sen, are in sympathy with the aims and aspirations of the Entente; Sun Yat-sen intervened personally against the declaration of war, and is considered an admirer and partisan of Germany. The friends of Dr. Sun reply that he is only one member of the Kuo-min-tang, and that on this point he represents only the ideas of a very limited number of Germanophil Chinese. On the larger issues the members of the Kuo-min-tang say: "The Shin-pu-tang is the party of the minority of the people; we are the party of the majority."

Though each of the two parties just studied has a program of its own, the two groups which have most actual influence represent interests and not ideas. It is only by analogy and a misuse of words that they are also called parties. These two further groups are respectively of the Military "Party" and the Communications "Party."

MILITARY PARTY

Under the convenient title of the Military Party are grouped the most influential Generals, although their attitude is often quite opposed, and it is quite impossible to find any link of common ideas. The power of these Generals is one of the characteristic features of modern China, but it is by no means a modern development. There have occurred constantly in the past revolts of Generals seeking to make themselves independent of the Court and to gain power to satisfy their ambitions and their greed. The republican cause was won by Chinese Generals. The Generals continue to exert in republican China a predominant influence. Their armies, even though they are maintained by the nation's resources, are less in the service of the nation's interests than in the service of the special interests of their leaders. Often composed of former brigands, more feared by the great mass of the population than the piratical bands that infest the country, these armies are the "great companies" of modern China. They afford an excellent means of pressure on the Government, which is obliged to furnish their leaders with the funds necessary for their support. (These leaders are accused of drawing sums of money for a greater number of soldiers than they have under their command and pocketing the difference.) The Government makes every effort to obtain the support of certain of these Generals, who hold the real power, and the latter link their fortune with the fate of one political personage or another.

In the Pei-yang, the Military Party of the North, there were distinguished in Peking in October, 1917, the partisans of the President of the republic and those of the Prime Minister. The President of the republic was Fong Kuo-chang. Born in the Province of Chih-li in 1863, he was alternately under the empire director of the College of Nobles, director of the Military Council, and chief director of the General Staff. He commanded the First Imperial Army, and took Han-yang from the revolutionists on Nov. 27, 1911, for which he won the title of Baron and the command of the Imperial Guard. Under the republic he was named head of the Military Council of the President. He abandoned Yuan Shih-kai when the latter sought to become Emperor. He became Vice President of the republic in October, 1916, and succeeded Li Yuan-hong as President when the latter resigned after the coup d'état of July, 1917.

The President of the Council was then General Tuan Chi-jui, the most eminent personality of the Military Party of the North. Born in the Province of Anhui in 1865, he was the principal military counselor of Yuan Shih-kai when he was Viceroy of Chih-li. He contributed especially to modernize and organize on European lines the army of Northern China. He succeeded Fong Kuo-chang at the head of the First Army, and was one of the principal Generals who demanded the Emperor's abdication. He was Minister of War in the first Republican Cabinet, from which he subsequently resigned. Charged in May, 1913, by Yuan shih-kai with the Presidency of the Council, he renounced office after two months and a half and opposed the President when he sought to become Emperor. They say at Peking that he was the only man whom Yuan Shih-kai feared; that he escaped several times attempts made upon his life; some say that he had a share in the mysterious death of Yuan Shih-kai. In April, 1916, he became Prime Minister. He is considered a convinced republican, and even his opponents do not question his loyalty to the new régime. But they reproach him with "despotism," "militarism," tendencies toward dictatorship. No one denies his energy; many consider him the greatest man of action of the republic, and some say the only man of action, the only realizer of present-day China.

In the south, the great leaders are General Lu Yun-ting—a former pirate master of a powerful army and Inspector General of Kuang-Tung and Kuang-Si—and General Tang Chi-yao, the master of Yunnan, the successor of the remarkable military leader and good republican, General Tsai Ngo. These important leaders are accused of wishing to establish hereditary fiefs and to inaugurate a species of military feudalism under the name of republicanism.

"COMMUNICATIONS" GROUP

The party, or rather group, of Communications, the Chia-tung-si, is composed of a certain number of politicians and business men who seek to enrich themselves through their influence on the Government. This group has no fixed program, and limits itself to following the dictates of its own interests. A former Deputy of Sze-chuen gave me this definition of the group: "It is a capitalistic party: it steals a great deal of money." The means of action of the group is the Bank of Communications, from which its name is derived. It was this bank which loaned the President, Yuan Shih-kai, the sums necessary for the projected restoration of the empire, sums which the republic is now reimbursing.

Under Yuan Shih-kai the principal representative of the group was Liang Cheu-yi, born in Kuang-Tung in 1858, who was alternately in charge of the Bureau of Communications, the railway service, the Bank of Communications, the Ministry of Communications. He was the General Secretary and financial agent of Yuan Shih-kai. He compromised himself to such an extent that at the death of the dictator he was compelled to flee to Japan. In October, 1917, the leader of the group was Tsao Ju-lin, born in 1876 in Kuang-Su, one of the first Chinese students who studied in Japan, a man who knows Japanese thoroughly, Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs in 1913, Minister of Communications from April, 1916. I do not believe that there is a more unpopular man in China. He was considered by many as being the agent of the Japanese in the Cabinet of Tuan Chi-jui. Certain papers publish the sums which he is said to have received from them (amounting to a million dollars) for obtaining for the Japanese company the German and Austrian ships interned by China. The press coldly announced that certain members of the secret society, Rather Death Than Slavery, had arrived at Peking to kill Mr. Tsao and his accomplices, who, it was said, were unable to protest otherwise against his selling China out to the nationals of a foreign power.

PARTIES IN POLITICS

[After having thus analyzed the ideas and tendencies of the various parties or groups, M. Challaye studies their reciprocal relations in the complexity of Chinese political life, and gives an interpretation of matters now a record of history in the light of inter-party oppositions and jealousies. Briefly this interplay of political forces may be summed up as follows:]

of Tuan Chi-jui in March, 1917, at the specific request of the leaders of the two main parties in the Ministry, Liang Chi-chao of the Shin-pu-tang, and Chang Yu-tseng and Ku Tsung-sui of the Kuo-min-tang. The further step of declaring war officially was opposed by Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the revolutionary leader of the latter party, who, influenced by Germany, as some charge, or at least by his pro-German sympathies, as well as by his suspicions of Tuan Chi-jui's intentions of becoming dictator, argued publicly that China should content herself with breaking relations and should not go to war, and addressed an appeal to Lloyd George, invoking the fear of Chinese hatred of foreigners and a Mahometan-Chinese outbreak.

Tuan, thereupon, fearing that the Kuo-min-tang would oppose the declaration of war on Germany, at Sun Yat-sen's urging, convoked a number of Generals in Peking in May, and had all Parliamentary deputies opposed to war hissed down by his paid partisans. The Ministers of the People's Party withdrew from office, but the Parliament, moved by opposition to Tuan's projected dictatorship and his arbitrary methods, refused to vote the declaration of war. At this juncture the President of the Republic stepped in and dismissed Tuan, and called on Wu Ting-fang and then on Li King-si to form a new Cabinet, thereby evoking a strong protest from the Military Governors, who demanded Tuan's recall and the dissolution of Parliament and proclaimed their respective provinces independent. An advance on Peking and the restoration of the empire was also threatened.

COUP OF GENERAL CHANG

Then came the coup of General Chang Hsiun, the commander of the imperial troops during the revolution, who had withdrawn with 30,000 men to the frontiers of Shantung, Kuang-su, and Nganhoei, and who, on the pretext of mediation between the President and the rebellious Generals, entered Peking with several thousand soldiers, who wore the queue and smoked opium contrary to the edicts, demanded and obtained the dissolution of Parliament from the President, and on the Ministers' refusal to approve this act had the decree countersigned by the commander of gendarmes, whom he named Premier for this especial purpose. Pushed on by Germany, who had financed his expedition, on July 1 General Chang proclaimed Pu Yi, a boy of eleven years, Emperor before the frightened Manchus. This coup, however, ended in disastrous failure; Chang was abandoned by all his supporters, and Tuan himself at the head of a large army entered Peking, drove Chang's troops out in confusion, and Chang himself was forced to take refuge in the Dutch embassy.

Fong Kuo-chang, the former Vice President, assumed the Presidency. Tuan then called to office the leaders of the Shin-pu-tang, Liang Chi-chao, and Tang Hua-long, and Tsao Ju-lin of the Communications group, formed a Cabinet, in which he himself represented the Military Party of the North, on a coalition basis, from which only the leaders of the People's Party were excluded, and proceeded to rule without a Parliament. He pushed through the declaration of war on Germany, which was made on Aug. 14. The Kuo-min-tang, however, from the middle of July contested his authority, declared his Ministry illegal, and sent an appeal to France and other democratic countries to aid the cause of the republicans against Chinese military rule.

THE SOUTH REVOLTS

Subsequently, on Aug. 25, 1917, Dr. Sun Yat-sen, supported by leaders of the navy, convoked the dissolved Parliament at Canton; a military Government was organized, and Dr. Sun himself was made General in Chief of the army of opposition. War with Germany was also approved by this Canton Government.

The arbitrary procedure of Tuan, however, led the new President to establish secret relations with the new Government, and the opposition to Tuan became so strong in various quarters that on Nov. 17, 1917, Tuan was virtually forced to hand in his resignation. The President then named General Chang Che-tseng to take Tuan's place, who, on taking office, naively admitted his complete ignorance of the duties to which he had been assigned, and further declared that he had learned that all things were impossible for mankind. One of his most useful acts was to appoint Lu Cheng-hsiang, a distinguished linguist and diplomat of European training, as Minister of Foreign Affairs. The tendency of the new Cabinet was to make peace with the Southern Government, though influenced by the Military Party, which demanded war to the bitter end. At the end of December, nevertheless, the President signed a decree suspending hostilities. Since this time the deadlock between the two opposing Governments has continued, the Peking Government declining to recall the old Parliament and the Canton Government refusing to admit the election of a new Parliament.

EFFORTS TO RECONCILE

It will be remembered that a conference held at Shanghai during the first months of 1919 tried to reconcile the political parties violently opposed in China. Representatives of the North and South, delegates from Peking and Canton, respectively, tried vainly to find a ground of agreement and arrange a compromise. Negotiations were alternately broken off and resumed. The honest-minded President, Hsu Chu-chang, had made every effort to bring about an understanding indispensable to the re-establishment of order and progress in the country, and the great allied powers had intervened to advise the reaching of such an understanding. Their last action in this regard was taken in August, 1919. The Minister of Great Britain at Peking, Sir John Jordan, dean of the Diplomatic Corps, at that time handed to the President of the Chinese Republic a memorandum in which Great Britain, the United States, France, Italy, and Japan expressed their wish for a speedy peace between the North and the South; meanwhile the memorandum voiced the hope that hostilities would not be resumed.

The question of Shantung might have and should have brought about an understanding between the Chinese of all parties. The solution of this problem offered by the Peace Conference was troubling China deeply when I crossed the country for the second time in May, 1919. From one end of the country to the other the Chinese were aroused by this decision. In all legations and consulates of friendly nations patriotic people gave utterance to noval protests. Manifestations occurred everywhere; the boycott of all Japanese products was everywhere announced. One might have believed that the common sorrow would have brought the conflicting parties nearer. On the contrary, it separated them still more: the defeat of the Peking Government's policy exasperated the Canton Parliamentarians, and offered them an excellent opportunity to renew their opposition. Meanwhile China remains disunited and disorganized by this interparty strife, and exposed to the danger of falling a victim to the first strong power that attacks her independent existence as a nation. This is the greater pity, because of the remarkable progress that China has made in the last decades, and still is making, despite the heavy handicap of a dual Government and a state of civil war between the two most important sections of the country. The younger elements of all parties and sympathies are accomplishing this evolution, and in this transformation China must be helped by the modern powers, by her allies of Europe and America, and even by Japan. But this assistance must free and not enslave her. China must have her chance.

Forces Behind Japan's Imperialism

By PUTNAM WEALE

[AUTHOR OF "THE FIGHT FOR THE REPUBLIC IN CHINA"]

TO have an adequate appreciation of Japanese policy today, as in the past, it is necessary to set down in the very centre of the canvas one fact and always to remember it. It is that the Clans of Choshu and Satsuma, which carried out the so-called Restoration of the Meiji Emperor in 1868, not only fought their way to power solely by the use of the sword, but are today as solidly intrenched in the old Tokugawa capital as they were half a century ago.

It is indeed no exaggeration to declare that the power of the clans since 1905 has been increased and that they hold the imperial family and the Ministry of the day so firmly in their grasp that both are prisoners. The incumbents of the two supreme Cabinet offices—supreme in the sense that they overtop the others—the Choshu Minister of War and the Satsuma Minister of the Navy, not only have the right of audience at any time but, as has been recently disclosed, have established since 1908 the iron rule that no civil functionary of any description may be present when they report to the Emperor.

As an additional guarantee, there are the old regulations which prescribe that both appointees shall be officers on the active list, thus making them virtually independent of Cabinet changes, as each new Ministry must bargain with the army and navy chiefs before an officeholder is provided. The Prime Minister is thus quite powerless to control them. The limited intervention in Siberia in 1918 clearly proves this, for the civil authorities were honest in their arrangement with the United States to send only 7,500 troops, the army chiefs of their own volition deliberately changing this to 70,000 men and defying the Cabinet to interfere.

The budgeting for both services is likewise practically independent of the civil budget, a system having been evolved whereby expenditure for expansions of the services is spread over a long period of years and placed beyond the control of the Treasury, large additional funds often being spent which the Audit Office, established under the Constitution, is powerless to recover. Inasmuch as the only authorities in practice superior to these two Ministers—the Genro or Elder Statesmen—are mainly composed of military clan leaders such as Prince Yamagata, it can be said that there is today in full vigor in Japan, in spite of the new industrial conditions, a replica of the Shogunate, with this reservation—that the double-capital system of yore has been abolished and all power concentrated at the gates of the Imperial Palace in Tokio.

NO POPULAR CONTROL

The franchise, even with the recent lowering of voters' qualifications to the payment of direct taxes amounting to $1.50 per annum, is limited to 3,500,000 persons out of a total population of 60,000,000, the device of the direct-tax qualification disfranchising most of the modernized urban population and concentrating the vote in the conservative country districts, tens of thousands of educated men paying no direct taxes at all. Furthermore, the Cabinet, under the Constitution, is not responsible to the Diet; that is to say, it has no direct responsibility whatsoever toward the people's representatives in the lower house, an adverse vote simply bringing about a forced dissolution of the whole Diet by imperial rescript. This has happened so often that it has become a commonplace.

Moreover, by an article deliberately introduced into the Constitution, it is specifically provided that when the budget has not been voted by the Diet the budget of the preceding year is automatically enacted by the Ministry. Thus there are three deliberately devised checks to prevent the people from exercising control. A Ministry responsible only to the Emperor; a limited franchise concentrating the vote in the agrarian districts; a device whereby the essential prerogative of every popular chamber, the money power, is deliberately taken out of the hands of Representatives. * * * Superimposed on these civil disabilities you have an all-powerful military autocracy of the nature already described.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN POLICY

The foreign policy of Japan is based on power-politics in a conscious and well-thought-out effort to crush and assimilate all neighboring peoples. This is the considered policy in Korea in spite of the great passive resistance movement of the present year and the brutal suppression by soldiery, which has aroused so much indignation throughout the world. Although all newspapers in the Far East now agree that assimilation of the Korean people is a physical and moral impossibility, the Japanese do not relax their efforts to bludgeon the national consciousness of the Koreans into insensibility, disregarding the argument that it would be child's play to work out a system whereby "the subject-nation" would be conciliated by a modified form of autonomy.

In reply to the assertion that there is "a civil war in China every week," the plain fact is that there has been very little fighting in China since Yuan Shih-kai died, three and a half years ago, the marshaling of the rival forces of north and south over the constitutional issue having been attended by slight bloodshed, comparatively speaking, the greatest harm being economic and moral. When we remember that the populations of Europe and China are roughly equal (440,000,000) and their areas practically the same, an accurate statistical survey would probably show that in spite of the armed posture of the northern and southern provinces the actual loss of life due to battle during the last three years has been smaller per hundred million than the normal loss of life for the whole of Europe by murder.

But, as in mediaeval Italy, armies manoeuvre backward and forward as "political gestures" rather than to destroy their fellows. It is this which has been largely responsible for the accounts of battles that have never been fought and for the slaughter of thousands who are still peacefully living the lotus life. And that this sensational journalism has been promoted by Japan is self-evident when the rôle her soldiers play as advance agents is duly considered.

INFILTRATION TACTICS

It is supremely important to get the idea that the Japanese soldier is an advance agent firmly fixed to understand that the tactics followed are the Luden-dorff battle tactics of the period March-July, 1918, namely, infiltration—i. e., pushing in in small numbers to find weak spots, and then by means of these small groups turning the main positions. For fifteen years—ever since the Russo-Japanese war—Japan has always pushed soldiers into every troubled situation and then attempted to exploit the crisis politically, commercially, and economically in any way that has seemed feasible. Thus she maintains today in Hankow, 600 miles up the Yangtze River, one infantry battalion with machine-gun detachments absolutely illegally, these men having been landed nearly eight years ago during the revolution of 1911-12, although a few days before they arrived a commission of foreign naval officers at that port, presided over by the ranking Japanese Admiral, had officially announced that no further protection from foreign detachments was needed.

The files of the State Department in Washington can be consulted for official confirmation of this singular fact, which in an almost perfect illustration of the working of Japanese policy. Had Great Britain protested in 1912 at this invasion of her "sphere of influence," as it was then the fashion to call it, Japan would have retreated, pointing to the decision of the Naval Council, presided over by her Admiral, as the binding one for her, the other being "a mistake." But as there was no British protest, the infantry battalion remains in 1919 precisely where it was placed in 1912. And it will still be there in 1929, unless China fights, or alternately unless the world takes the Far Eastern problem more seriously.

JAPAN POLITICALLY ISOLATED

And this is precisely why the Tokio War Office sent 70,000 men to Siberia instead of 7,500, as had been agreed upon at Washington. For the Japanese General Staff is so hidebound and so blinded by its power that it has not yet caught sight of the fact that the collapse of all the military empires of the world has automatically isolated Japan, and that exploiting situations by this method of infiltration may yet bring an ugly corrective from sea power, if it does not lead to internal explosions owing to the growing labor crisis in Japan due to the great rise in prices.

It was the late Herbert Spencer who many years ago wrote a letter to the Japanese strongly counseling them not to allow foreign ownership of land in Japan,* as, in his opinion, if they did so foreigners would gradually buy up the country, the Japanese being weaker than white men and unable to resist their pressure and their superior organization. This letter is the secret of Japanese policy in China.

For, given a true open door and true equal opportunity, the Japanese know that three things must infallibly occur in China before many years have passed: First, that Western nations will supply capital and equipment at a far more rapid speed than Japan can do, and therefore will outstrip her; secondly, that the effect of this will be that in open competition, with their superior banking and industrial facilities and their abundant supplies of raw materials, Western nations will command the market with better and, relatively speaking, cheaper goods; third, and most important, that the Chinese, being apt pupils and good workers by hand and by machine, and very excellent accumulators of wealth, will in the end acquire by purchase all established Western interests, the net effect at the end of the present generation—say by 1940—being that China, with her teeming population, which is now increasing at the rate of 38,000,000 every decennium, will be the dominating power in Eastern Asia—commercially, economically, politically.

This is the secret of Korea, Manchuria, and Shantung. The whole policy of Japan since 1905 and the Russian war has been a last desperate mistaken attempt to be saved, as she thinks, from being cast back into the sea by climbing on China's back and holding on there like grim death. Every move made by her during the world war to prevent China from participating in the struggle has been dictated by this policy; for that Japan is destined to fall back in the international race and resume the position she occupied prior to 1894 is certain unless there are great revolutionary changes in her constitutional structure and a complete destruction of her militarism.

* The Tokio newspaper, Nitchi Nitchi, announced on Dec. 6, 1919, that the revised Land Ownership bill to be offered by the Government in the Diet early in the new year removes practically all limitations on foreign ownership of real estate in Japan. The new law is announced as a step toward fuller harmony with modern international principles—EDITOR.

OVERFLOW OF POPULATION

There is a last point, which has some significance—the implication that since Japan is excluded from directing her emigration to the white man's lands she must have a quid pro quo.

This statement is as misleading as the rest, for the assumption is that her population must overflow in some direction. The plain fact is that in fifteen years she has sent less than 350,000 emigrants to Korea and that in other eastern regions, notably Formosa, Japanese appear to be actually decreasing. Why is this? Because it is the presence of the white man, the development work he has put in, and the great markets and high wages in his countries, which are attractive to the Japanese—not the land as land. That is to say, if California and Australia were today totally uninhabited, no Japanese of any sort would ever think of going to them. It is the white man and his wealth that form the attraction. This magnet has nothing to do with the overflow of Japanese population, which is still far less dense than in many industrialized regions of Europe. That the Japanese as a man is congenitally disinclined to go abroad is proved by the embittering experience of the colonization companies in Brazil and other South American countries.

Finally, China is changing, not fast but slow and surely. Her commerce and industries are creeping up; her education is improving; the student classes are influencing public opinion more and more; her communications are on the eve of a vast development. This year her commerce will exceed $2,000,000,000 for the first time in her history. She has now fifty complete cotton mills on order, and when these are added to the seventy already working a chain of mills from Tientsin to Shanghai will be throbbing with life, and the cotton industry will be well established in the cotton-growing areas.

China's political reorganization depends upon her industrial awakening; it is the growth of the coal and iron trade, now commencing on a heavy scale, and the building of railways and hard-surface roads which will insure her stability and her peace, much more than making of paper constitutions or agreements between political leaders. It has been industrial backwardness, the absence of modern communications, and the non-development of a modern credit system, coupled with the double-dealing of Japan, which have led to "civil wars"—really armed provincial rioting. To talk of Japan as the master of the destiny of Asia is a pre-war conception of the period 1911-13, remembering that Japan cannot even control Korea.

Torture of Prisoners in Korea

Evils Under Japanese Rule

Dr. Frank W. Schofield contributed to the Seoul Press in October, 1919, an article in regard to the prevailing custom of torturing Korean prisoners to make them confess. After professing his faith in the promises of reform made by the present Japanese Governor General of Korea, and after remarking that the higher officials seemed to be unaware of the barbarous methods of their subordinates, Dr. Schofield continued:

ONE of the highest officials in the Police Department, when asked why he did not employ torture to find out who had burned the Christian churches, absolutely denied the existence of torture in the police system of Korea. It is, therefore, necessary that the high officials in the Police and Judiciary Departments should be made fully cognizant of the fact. This is the more imperative because of the attitude of the under officials who believe torture to be necessary. Recently a Judge when speaking on the subject of torture said that he deplored its existence, as it made the administration of justice difficult at times, yet he continued, "Torture is an old Korean custom, and the Korean will frequently only tell the truth when placed under torture." The fact is that the Koreans rarely tell the truth when tortured, but merely say what the torturer demands of them. * * *

For the information of those officials who are unaware of the existence of torture I will mention a few of the most common forms used by the police.

Suspending the body from the ceiling by a cord tied around the middle finger, the toes just touching the ground; suspending in a similar way with the cord tied around the wrists; suspending or merely lifting the body by a cord tied to the wrists after the hands have been first tied behind the back; squeezing the body in a box, the sides of which can be made to draw in equally; holding in a fixed position and pouring water over the face until the person almost suffocates; burning the body with red-hot irons; placing a heavy stick above the ankles, the person being in a kneeling position, and two policemen standing one on either end of the projecting stick, which almost causes dislocation of the ankle joints; pricking the body with small sharp splints; twisting the joints till they almost dislocate; placing some solid object between the fingers and then tightly squeezing the hand; beating over the head and body until unconscious; refusal to give water until, as in some cases, the prisoner is forced to drink his own urine; stripping of women. These and many more forms of torture which the writer has not been able satisfactorily to verify are frequently practiced by the police on suspected criminals.

The strongest argument against torture is that it is inhumane and has long since been abolished in all civilized countries. In what other civilized country except Japan do prisoners constantly state to the Judge that the evidence being brought against them is false and was extorted under torture? Apart from being inhumane, torture results in gross injustice. When a prisoner is under torture he will not only make false statements with regard to himself, but also with regard to other innocent people. While I was informed by a Judge that few innocent people are finally condemned because of such false testimony, yet many suffer detention and other injustices. Spies and torture form the stronghold of the police system of Korea, the police relying upon these two agencies instead of learning the native language and studying the methods employed by European detectives.

In closing I briefly cite two cases which have been satisfactorily authenticated by the writer.

In one case a young man of about 19 was beaten unconscious three times in six days and burned once with a red-hot iron. This was done to make the young man divulge where the Independence newspaper was being printed. Having taken an oath of secrecy he refused to tell. When I last saw this young man he was a physical wreck.

The other is the case of a student who had been arrested no less than three times in the last six months and various charges brought against him. On one occasion the police found a letter in his pocket which, after falsely translating into Japanese, they used as evidence against him. He absolutely denied the truth of one sentence which the police had added to the letter, stating that he was connected with the Independence movement. He demanded that the original letter be produced, so that he could prove his innocence. This the police refused to do, and continued to beat him, trying to obtain a false confession that would only result in his own condemnation. After beating him until he was unconscious the police desisted, realizing that their efforts had failed. A few days later they tried another method; the young man was informed that a foreigner while under police examination had admitted that he—the prisoner—was connected with the Independence movement. But the young man stood firm, and, although severely beaten, refused to tell a lie that would most likely result in his imprisonment. After being detained for sixteen days and beaten three times he was released as innocent.

About ten days ago—since the reform of the police administration—he was again arrested and this time subjected to torture. He was made to kneel on the ground, his hands tied behind his back, then a cord was placed around his wrists which when pulled upward by the police almost caused dislocation of the shoulder joint. The man, being innocent, received his discharge a day or two later.

I could cite several cases which clearly show that instead of getting the truth the torturer generally extorts from his victim lies. * * * Ought not the police system to be further reformed so that innocent and guilty people alike might be saved from the terrible cruelties of the police "preliminary examination"?

REMEMBRANCE

By HAROLD BEGBIE

[On the first anniversary of Armistice Day, Nov. 11, 1919, every city and village throughout the British Isles paid a unique tribute to the allied dead. At the stroke of 11 o'clock everybody stood silent and uncovered for two minutes, wherever he happened to be. This impressive memorial, known as "the great silence," is the theme of Mr. Begbie's poem, which appeared that day in The London Chronicle:]

Stay the hammer, stay the wheel,
Stay the arm, and bow the head;
Silently let every place
Take the roll-call of its Dead.

By the furnace, at the forge,
In the dark mines lantern-lit,
These two moments fall like drops
Cooling Dives in his pit.

Silent lie our British Isles
On the bosom of the sea,
Silent while two minutes knit
Time into Eternity.

While from Heaven fall the thoughts
Of our loved ones and our brave,
Blessing work they left to us
In the land they died to save.

Stay the thunder of the mill,
Stay the needle, stay the pen;
Britain prays. Arise, and make Work her seven-fold Amen—

Work, to fill their parents' store:
Work, to clear their children's way:
Work, to make their dying dreams
The sunrise of a nobler day.

PEACE WITH GERMANY

Final Exchange of Ratifications on January 10, 1920, Puts the Treaty of Versailles Into Operation— Other Peace Conference Activities

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 20, 1920]

ALMOST exactly fourteen months after the date of the original armistice with Germany the Peace Conference at Paris ended its long verbal conflicts with the German delegates and made the final exchange of ratifications which brought complete peace with Germany and set into operation all the complicated machinery of the Treaty of Versailles, including the League of Nations. The United States alone of the great powers was without a representative at this historic ceremony—owing to the Senate's failure to ratify the treaty.

The event had long been delayed, partly by the Allies' hope that America might yet come in, and partly by the reluctance of the German delegates to sign the protocol articles demanding reparation for the scuttling of the German battleship fleet at Scapa Flow. Agreement on this point was finally reached, however, and on Jan. 10, 1920, the allied and German representatives met in the Clock Room of the French Foreign Office at Paris, and signed the protocol and the procès-verbal which placed the final seal of ratification upon the German Peace Treaty. The deposit of these documents with the others in the French Foreign Ministry archives completed the required formalities. After five years of tragedy and many months of disputation, Germany was again at peace with the rest of the world, and was, at least officially, a friendly member of the family of nations.

While handling this main problem the Peace Conference had been busy with other matters that remained to be settled before peace could come to certain portions of Eastern Europe and the Near East. Peace treaties with Turkey still remain to be signed, and the German envoys were then escorted to the Clock Room, where the diplo-

the final ratification of the Austrian and Bulgarian treaties was still to come, and of several bitter territorial disputes were calling for settlement. In special conferences between the allied and Italian Premiers a substantial adjustment of the Fiume dispute was reached, and a draft of its terms was forwarded to Belgrade for Yugoslav concurrence. By the terms of this agreement the Italian character of Fiume was recognized, but the port and railways were internationalized under the League of Nations.

Another important task was disposed of with the delivery to a Hungarian Peace Delegation headed by Count Albert Andrássy of the terms of peace to be imposed on Hungary, and Count Andrássy took this treaty draft back with him to Budapest for submission to the Hungarian Parliament. Various other questions were discussed and acted on when necessary. The question of peace with Turkey was still deferred, though important discussions of this perplexing problem were held by the Supreme Council.

Regarding Russia, the policy of non-interference in the war on Bolshevism was approved by all the allied nations. It was announced on Jan. 16, furthermore, that the Supreme Council had decided to open trade relations with the many co-operative societies of the interior of Russia, to embrace exchange of clothing, medicines and agricultural machines for grain and flax; this change of policy in the partial raising of the blockade against Soviet Russia, it was specifically stated, was in no way to be interpreted as a change of policy toward the Soviet régime.

by a special German shipping commission, which arrived on Dec. 15, were begun anew after several interruptions, and the prospect of a speedy solution of all outstanding difficulties looked bright shortly before Christmas. The allied experts had presented figures showing that Germany possessed some 700,000 tons of docks, dredges and other maritime equipment. The Allies demanded 400,000 tons of it in payment for the Scapa Flow fleet, leaving 300,000 for Germany's needs. The German experts said Germany had 600,000 tons, and that she needed 400,000. It was the German contention that the allied figures included 80,000 tons at Danzig, which did not exist, and 20,000 tons at Hamburg, equally mythical. The allied diplomats asked the British Government about the apparent discrepancy, and received the reply that the British figures were correct.

The allied note bearing on this question which was sent to Germany, however, was accompanied by a promise that if the Germans could prove that they really needed 400,000 tons the Allies would reduce their demands to 300,000, but would retain the allied experts' total of 700,000 tons as a basis for calculations.

It developed that the difference between the allied and German estimates of available floating dock tonnage would occasion a considerable delay, and the hope of winding up the business of making peace by Christmas was abandoned. The Supreme Council, therefore, adjourned until Dec. 26.

The Supreme Council on Dec. 27 decided to send an allied naval commission to Hamburg and Danzig to review the allied estimates on German dock facilities in those ports. Further action was made contingent on the report of this commission. Meanwhile matters of subsidiary importance were taken up.

HITCH OVER PLEBISCITES

The council, among other matters, received information of the results of the first meeting between German and allied military experts to discuss arrangements for the execution of the Versailles treaty. It appeared that on the first change of views the railroad material offered by the Germans for the transportation of allied troops to plebiscite districts was considered insufficient. The report of these negotiations was laid before the council by General Weigand. The report stated that the Germans had declared that because of lack of material it was impossible to supply the six trains daily demanded by the Allies, and that they had offered four trains for this purpose.

General Weigand subsequently reported that the allied and German military experts had reached an agreement on this question. Difficulties, however, arose in arranging for the plebiscites to be held in Upper Silesia, Allenstein, Memel and other territories. Herr von Simson, head of a special delegation sent by Germany, declared that he had no power to change the German interpretation of these arrangements.

Meanwhile the Supreme Council received a letter from Marshal Foch stating that his agents had observed that in Upper Silesia, one of the main plebiscite districts, there were stationed 80,000 German soldiers, including large numbers of the former troops of General von der Goltz, who had made trouble in the Baltic Provinces until the allied powers forced them out. In this letter Marshal Foch expressed his strong belief that before the 20,000 allied soldiers agreed upon should go to Upper Silesia to conduct the plebiscite it was expedient that the German troops be withdrawn. The Supreme Council approved the suggestion and decided to ask Germany to see that this was done. This new note was dispatched on Jan. 2.

SCAPA FLOW AGREEMENT

Baron von Lersner on Dec. 30 asked the Supreme Council to put into writing the verbal assurance given him by M. Dutasta that if the Germans proved their figures regarding maritime equipment the Allies would reduce their demands by 100,000 tons. M. Dutasta was authorized to reply that this request would be complied with, and the German envoy communicated this new phase to the Berlin Government.

The terms of the Supreme Council for the final settlement of the Scapa Flow sinkings were handed to Baron von Lersner on Jan. 5. They embodied a diminution of 125,000 tons from the 400,000 tons of naval material originally demanded from Germany. The ultimate figure conceded by the Allies was 275,000 tons, to which the German delegates agreed. The final settlement was delayed by failure of the Germans to fix terms relating to the plebiscite arrangements. On Jan. 6, however, on the strength of an assurance given by Baron von Lersner that Germany would consent to the signing of the protocol, the Supreme Council announced that the ceremony of exchanging ratifications would take place on Jan. 10.

One last difficulty arose over a request from Germany that the allied forces to be sent into Upper Silesia be reduced one-fourth, in order to lower the cost for Germany. On the advice of Marshal Foch the council granted this request, which had already been virtually met by the inability of 25 per cent. of the American contingent to participate in any such activities, owing to the Senate's failure to ratify the treaty.

THE FINAL CEREMONY

In order to have everything ready for the ceremony M. Clemenceau, the Supreme Council, and the various commissions worked feverishly day and night. No new obstacles arose, and on Saturday, Jan. 10, the final act of the great European tragedy was staged. Fourteen allied and associated powers on one hand and Germany on the other met at 4 o'clock in the afternoon in the Clock Hall of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs to consummate the ratification of peace.

The representatives of England, France, Italy, and Japan had already met in secret session with the two German envoys, Baron Kurt von Lersner and Herr von Simson, in the office of the French Foreign Minister, and the Germans had signed the much-disputed protocol binding their nation to pay for the sinking of the German fleet at Scapa Flow and to carry out the unfulfilled terms of the armistice. The Premiers and the German envoys were then escorted to the Clock Room, where the diplomats of nearly all the nations of the world had assembled, for many Ambassadors and statesmen had been invited to attend the ceremony.

Around the long, green-covered tables gathered the allied Premiers and Foreign Ministers, with Germany's representatives at a separate small table. As they were designated by the master of ceremonies they rose each in turn and affixed their signatures to the procès-verbal spread upon a stand in the centre of the long chamber.

It was two minutes after 4 o'clock when Premier Clemenceau took his seat, closely followed by Premiers Lloyd George and Nitti, with Baron Matsui of Japan not far behind. The ceremony began without any formality. The Master of Ceremonies called the name of Baron von Lersner. The German envoy arose, and, walking quickly to the stand, affixed his signature to the document that ended the war. He was followed by Lloyd George, and then by Signor Nitti and Baron Matsui. The delegates of the following nations signed in the order named: Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Guatemala, Panama, Peru, Poland, Siam, Czechoslovakia, and Uruguay. America, China, Greece, and Rumania, not having ratified the treaty with Germany, did not sign. The ceremony of signing lasted until about 4:16 o'clock.

A letter from the Supreme Council promising Germany in writing, as agreed, that the Allies would reduce their demand for maritime equipment to 275,000 tons to pay for the ships sunk at Scapa Flow was then handed to Baron von Lersner. This done, M. Clemenceau rose and said:

The protocol between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany has been signed. The ratifications of the treaty with Germany have been deposited. From this moment the treaty enters into effect. It will be enforced in all its terms.

At the conclusion of M. Clemenceau's remarks, all the delegates rose, and the Germans, after slight hesitation, led the way out, with no attempt to greet or to hold converse with any of the other delegates. Clemenceau and the British and Italian Premiers remained in the Foreign Ministry for consultation.

The outstanding comment after the ceremony was that it left the United States the only great power still technically at war with Germany. The allied Governments did not even have the satisfaction of seeing Ambassador Wallace at the ceremony. The American envoy had received a pressing invitation to attend, and had telegraphed to Washington for instructions; receiving no answer in time to attend, he had returned his invitation to M. Clemenceau.

VON LERSNER'S COMMENTS

Interviewed after the ceremony, Baron von Lersner said:

I am naturally happy that peace has finally become effective. My great regret is that the United States is the only country with which Germany is still in a state of war. I hope, however, that the situation will soon be changed.

Execution of the Treaty of Versailles imposes on Germany the heaviest sacrifices ever borne by a nation in modern times. We have lost in the west and in the east territories that belonged to Prussia for many centuries. We have assumed enormous economic obligations. Nevertheless, I am glad that peace is at last re-established, because it will give back to Germany her beloved sons and prisoners abroad.

Regarding the execution of the terms of the treaty Germany will do her utmost. We have already, even without being obliged by the terms of the treaty, delivered a considerable quantity of products, including two and one-half million tons of coal to France, and I can say that Germany will go to the utmost limit of possibility in fulfilling all the obligations she has incurred. It will mean hard times for Germany, but with the recovery of our ardor for labor and production we hope to meet every emergency.

The recovery of our economic prosperity is as much to the interest of the Entente as it is to us, on account of the great economic difficulties that threaten all Europe. It is obvious, speaking chiefly of France, that her economic prosperity depends upon the economic recovery of Germany.

Baron von Lersner said he had had several very satisfactory conferences with Louis Loucheur, French Minister of Reconstruction, regarding the resumption of trade relations between Germany and France, and added that he hoped the European nations, working together, would solve the great economic problems. The most thorny remaining problem appeared to him to be the question of the extradition of a considerable number of German officers, officials, and soldiers to be tried abroad for crimes alleged to have been committed during the war. In this regard he said:

I do not want to give up all hope that among the Allies the conviction will finally prevail that by availing themselves strictly of rights conceded in the treaty for the extradition of those accused they may cause the gravest consequences not only for Germany but for quiet and order in Europe generally. We pointed out two months ago very frankly to the Allies the harmful consequences that might ensue if their right to demand extradition should be executed literally. At the same time we submitted written suggestions for the solution of the delicate problem.

The principal features of this proposition were that Germany would undertake to arraign before the Supreme Court of Germany all persons accused by the Entente, would except all such from the law of amnesty, and would consent to the presence of the representatives of the Entente at the trials as public prosecutors, with fullest rights of control. Germany in the meantime has enacted laws to this end.

The Entente did not accept our proposal before peace became effective, but that does not preclude serious examination anew of the problem after the establishment of peace. Your conviction must be the same as mine, that the desire of the Entente is by no means to satisfy revenge, but to punish the guilty with equity and justice.

The Entente proposal for obtaining this object, however, far exceeds the demands made by Austria upon Serbia for the punishment of the assassins of the Archduke—demands which were rejected by Serbia, with the approval of the Entente. I cannot believe that our former adversaries have any interest in compromising the re-establishment of normal life in Germany by insisting on this question of extradition, upon availing themselves unsparingly of rights the real end of which might be attained otherwise.

After the settlement of a few details concerning the execution of the treaty Baron von Lersner returned to Germany for a short rest.

TEXT OF PROCES-VERBAL

The procès-verbal of ratification which the allied and German representatives signed at the Foreign Ministry contained the name of the United States, though the Americans did not sign. The text of this instrument is as follows:

Procès-verbal of the ratification of the treaty of peace signed at Versailles June 28, 1919, between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hedjaz, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Siam, Czechoslovakia, and Uruguay on the one hand, and Germany on the other hand, as well as of the following acts:

Protocol signed the same day by the same powers, arrangement of the same date between the United States, Belgium, the British Empire, France, and Germany concerning the occupation of the Rhine Provinces.

In the execution of the final clauses of the treaty of peace signed at Versailles June 28, 1919, the undersigned have met at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Paris to proceed to deposit ratifications and to consign them to the French Government.

Instruments of ratification or notice of their dispatch by four principal allied and associated powers—that is to say, the British Empire for the treaty of peace, protocol, and arrangement; France for the treaty of peace, protocol and arrangement; Italy for the treaty of peace and protocol, and by the following allied and associated powers: Belgium for the treaty of peace, protocol, and arrangement; Bolivia for the treaty of peace and protocol; Brazil for the treaty of peace and protocol; Guatemala for the treaty of peace and protocol; Panama for the treaty of peace and protocol; Peru for the treaty of peace and protocol; Poland for the treaty of peace and protocol; Siam for the treaty of peace and protocol; Czechoslovakia for the treaty of peace and protocol, and Uruguay for the treaty of peace and protocol have been produced and after being examined have been found in good and true form and are confided to the French Government to be deposited in its archives.

Conforming to the provisions of the final clauses aforesaid, the French Government will give notice to the contracting powers of the deposit of ratifications at another time by States which are signatories of the aforesaid treaty, protocol, and arrangement, but which have not been ready to proceed today to this formality.

In confirmation of which the undersigned approve the present procès-verbal and affix their seals.

Done at Paris, Jan. 10, 1920, at 4:15 o'clock.

LETTER ON THE PROTOCOL

The text of the letter which the Supreme Council handed to Baron von Lersner after the exchange of ratifications was as follows:

Now that the protocol provided for by the note of Nov. 2 has been signed by qualified representatives of the German Government, and in consequence the ratifications of the Treaty of Versailles have been deposited, the allied and associated powers wish to renew to the German Government their assurance that, while necessary reparations for the sinking of the German fleet in Scapa Flow will be exacted, they do not intend to injure the vital economic interests of Germany. On this point, by this letter, they confirm the declarations which the General Secretary of the Peace Conference was charged with making orally to the President of the German delegation on Dec. 23.

These declarations are as follows:

First—The General Secretary has been authorized by the Supreme Council to assure the German delegation that the Interallied Commission on Control and the Commission on Reparations will conform with the greatest care to the statements in the note of Dec. 8 relative to safeguarding the vital economic interests of Germany.

Second—The experts of the allied and associated powers, believing that part of the information on which they founded their demand for 400,000 tons of floating docks, floating cranes, tugs and dredgers may have been inaccurate on certain points and details, think they have committed an error as concerns 80,000 tons of floating docks at Hamburg.

If the investigation to which the Interallied Commission on Control will proceed shall show that there has really been an error, the allied and associated powers will be prepared to reduce their demands proportionally in a manner to lower them to 300,000 tons in round numbers, and even below that if the necessity of such reduction shall be demonstrated by convincing arguments. But most complete facilities should be accorded to authorized allied and associated representatives to enable them to make all necessary inquiries, with a view to verifying the German assertions, before any reduction from the original demands of the protocol can be definitely admitted by the allied and associated powers.

Third—The allied and associated Governments, with reference to the last paragraph of the letter which contains their reply, do not consider that the sole act of sinking the German ships at Scapa Flow constitutes a crime of war for which individual punishment will be exacted in conformity with Article 228 of the Peace Treaty.

On the other hand, the allied and associated powers wish to point out that, without losing sight of the vital economic interests of Germany, they have presented a demand for 400,000 tons on the inventory established by them.

German experts have furnished details, which we will verify, and which give a smaller figure. Consequently there will eventually be deducted from the 400,000 tons of floating docks, cranes, tugs and dredgers claimed by the Allies a tonnage of floating docks, which, after verification, we will recognize as figuring by mistake on the interallied inventory and which consequently does not exist. Nevertheless, such deduction shall not exceed 125,000 tons.

The allied and associated powers add that the 192,000 tons proposed by the German Government, of which a list was handed over during the deliberations of the Technical Commissions, must be delivered immediately. For the balance of the tonnage, as shall be determined by the Commission on Reparations, a delay will be allowed the German Government, which cannot exceed thirty months, for delivery of the total amount.

CLEMENCEAU.

BITTERNESS IN GERMANY

On the evening of ratification the bells of London were pealing in celebration of the conclusion of peace. Otherwise, neither in London nor in Paris were there any unusual demonstrations of rejoicing; all these had found vent on the termination of armed hostilities and the signing of the treaty. In Berlin, likewise, the event aroused no special interest. The press comments, which were not given first place in the various papers, were, however, pervaded with a distinct bitterness. The heading chosen by the Lokal-Anzeiger was "Under the Knout of the Enemy!" The Tägliche Rundschau said: "This peace is worse than war!" It denounced the regulations of the Interallied High Commission for the Rhineland as a breach of the ratified treaty. The Berlin Tageblatt declared that Germany had shown political unwisdom in not refusing to sign the treaty. Since it had been signed, this paper said, Germany had only one course to follow: to carry out the treaty to the best of her ability and to strive for revision. The Vossische Zeitung said: "It is not the written word, but the creative deed that can remove the traces of physical and spiritual damage caused by the war. For Germany the first duty is to honor her pledged word and to work so determinedly that she will help the world's kultur forward."

Lord Kilmarnock left London on Jan. 12 for Berlin to take up his duties as British Chargé d'Affaires in the German capital. The British Government had announced its intention to maintain only a legation until Germany had proved her honest intentions of carrying out the terms of the treaty, when the Ambassadorship would be restored. Germany was not expected to send a diplomatic representative at once. German affairs in London were still in care of the Swiss Legation, which had taken over that responsibility at the departure of Prince Lichnowsky. Sir Harold Stuart had been named the British High Commissioner for the Rhineland. France and Belgium at this time were preparing to dispatch representatives to Berlin.

POSITION OF UNITED STATES

The Department of State at Washington issued a statement on Jan. 10, announcing the signing of the procès-verbal, as agreed upon in the Treaty of Versailles, and added:

Inasmuch as the United States has not ratified the treaty, it is the position of this Government that the armistice continues in full force and effect between the United States and Germany, and that accordingly the provisions of the armistice of Nov. 11, 1918, as well as the provisions of the extensions of that agreement, remain binding on these two nations. Notice of this was given to the German Government by the United States.

Another statement issued on Jan. 13 announced that the United States had refused to accept any part of the indemnity to be paid by Germany for the destruction of the German fleet at Scapa Flow. This decision was based on the ground that the United States Government objected in principle to the settlement made by the Supreme Council. An allotment of 2 per cent. of this indemnity had been made to the American Government. Just before Frank Polk, the American representative at the Peace Conference, left Paris, the Allied Governments drew up a plan for reparation which gave Great Britain 70 per cent. and divided up the rest among the other powers. Mr. Polk's experts estimated that the 2 per cent. assigned to America would give this country one German cruiser and one U-boat. It was further specified that America must sink her share received after one year. The share of maritime equipment would have been one 8,000-ton dock. Mr. Polk protested against this apportionment, refused to give his consent to the scheme, and referred the matter to Washington.

EXTRADITION OF KAISER

After the ceremony of signing the final procès-verbal had been accomplished, the Supreme Council resumed its activities. Despite the forebodings of Baron von Lersner, there was every indication that the allied Governments intended to insist on the extradition of the German officers accused of atrocities in Northern France and Belgium, as well as on the extradition of the Kaiser himself from Holland. On Jan. 15 a note was drafted to the Dutch Government asking for this extradition. It referred to Article 227 of the Treaty of Versailles, and invited Holland to join the allied powers in the accomplishment of this act. Besides taking up the text of the demand on Holland, Premiers Clemenceau, Lloyd George, and Nitti inspected the lists of German officers and soldiers accused of war crimes. This list comprised 880 names, of which 330 were those of men demanded by France. The list had been completed at a meeting held on Jan. 13 by Baron Birkenhead, Lord Chancellor of England; Edouard Ignace, French Under Secretary for Military Justice, and representatives of other allied nations.

INTEGRITY OF AUSTRIA

The Supreme Council profited by the visit of the Austrian Premier, Herr Renner, undertaken to discuss Austria's financial and economic situation, to notify the Austrian Republic of the decisions reached by the allied and associated powers concerning the separatist movements which had shown themselves, or that might show themselves in the future, on Austrian territory. A letter bearing on this question was addressed by M. Clemenceau to M. Renner on Dec. 16, mentioning specifically the Provinces of Vorarlberg, Salzburg, Tyrol, and Western Hungary as secedent units, and assuring Austria, in a resolution forwarded, of the allied Governments' intention to oppose all such separatist movements and to see that the territorial integrity of the Austrian Republic was not impaired.

The question of commercial relations between Turkey and the Central Powers was discussed at the sessions of Jan. 5, and it was decided that the status created by the armistice should continue until peace was signed with Turkey. By the terms of the armistice, such relations were prohibited.

PEACE TERMS TO HUNGARY

The long-awaited Hungarian Peace Delegation arrived in Paris on Jan. 7. It came to receive the treaty with Hungary, which had been held for three months pending the establishment of a stable and representative Government. The delegation, made up of sixty-four members, was headed by Count Apponyi, who stated that he expected to take the treaty terms back with him to Budapest, where the Hungarian Parliament would act upon them. Count Apponyi had previously described the scope of his mission as follows:

We are going to Paris with the hope of obtaining the integrity of Hungary for ourselves and for the future of Europe. Hungary, intact, has been a barrier in that trouble-breeding area between the Occident and the Orient. We stood firm for 1,000 years against invasions from the East and we saved the West. Remove that barrier, and the reservoir of evil will infect all Europe. * * * If the integrity of Hungary is refused, I will have to ask that the disposition of the people be submitted to themselves. I will inquire whether people can be exchanged like cattle. There are 400,000 Hungarians under the Rumanians, who are remaining along the Theiss River, laughing at the Entente's orders. We will never submit to this. If we are refused a plebiscite to decide the fate of Hungary, we will ask: "Can one believe the word of a President of the United States in the future?"

On Jan. 14 Count Apponyi sent a rather aggressive letter to M. Dutasta, Secretary General of the Peace Conference, demanding to know where America stood with regard to the Hungarian treaty. A reply was sent saying that Ambassador Wallace would represent the United States at the Supreme Council meeting when the treaty was delivered.

DELIVERY OF THE TERMS

The terms of peace between the allied and associated Governments and Hungary were handed to the Hungarian delegation in the afternoon of Jan. 15. The Hungarians were given fifteen days in which to present their reply.

The treaty was received by Count Apponyi from the hands of the Secretary General in the office of the French Foreign Ministry, in the presence of Premiers Clemenceau, Lloyd George, and Nitti, and of Ambassador Wallace and Baron Matsui, the Japanese Ambassador. Premier Clemenceau made a short address, in the course of which he specified the time allowed Hungary to reply. He added that the council had unanimously decided to grant the request of Count Apponyi that he be permitted to explain verbally before the allied council the present situation of the Hungarian Government, provided that no discussion ensue. The entire ceremony of the presentation of the treaty lasted barely five minutes.

The Hungarian peace treaty provides that Hungary shall formally waive claim to Fiume and all the former Austro-Hungarian territories awarded to Italy, Rumania, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia. Hungary must adhere to the clauses of the treaty with Austria, signed at St. Germain, concerning national minorities.

Under the terms of the treaty the Hungarian Army must not exceed 35,000 men, with guns of not more than ten centimeter calibre. Hungary assumes a proportional share of the Austro-Hungarian debt. Most of the remaining clauses are similar to those of the treaty of St. Germain.

A special economic clause provides that an arrangement shall be made for the exchange of foodstuffs, raw materials and manufactured goods between Austria and Hungary. By the provision of this clause Hungary undertakes not to restrict the export of foodstuffs to Austria, and insures to Austrian purchasers terms as favorable as those given to the Hungarians.

THE FIUME AGREEMENT

It was announced on Dec. 18 that Premier Nitti and Foreign Minister Scialoja had been invited to meet Premier Lloyd George and Premier Clemenceau in an endeavor to settle the question of Fiume. On Jan. 5 Signor Nitti arrived in London with his colleague, Signor Scialoja. After conferences with members of the British Government they left with the British Premier for Paris. On Jan. 11 the Italian envoys discussed with Lloyd George and Clemenceau the whole Adriatic problem. The Fiume question was particularly difficult because of the uncompromising attitude of Gabriele d'Annunzio, who had ordered the taking of a third plebiscite in Fiume and who was virtually defying the Italian Government, the Peace Conference, and the decisions of President Wilson.

Long discussions were held, and on Jan. 15 Premier Nitti stated in Paris that he regarded the Adriatic problem as on the verge of settlement. An agreement, he said, had been reached by Italy, France and Great Britain, to which it was hoped that the United States would give its sanction. The details of this agreement he did not disclose. He admitted that Italy had made important concessions in renouncing sovereignty over Fiume, and in agreeing that it should be a free city touching on Italian Istria. Its Italian character, however, was to be recognized and its port and railway facilities were to be placed under the League of Nations.

When asked how Italy intended to oust d'Annunzio from Fiume, he replied that this was easy, but was non-committal as to the means to be employed. The agreement reached was sent to Belgrade for Yugoslav consideration, with an intimation that if it were not accepted the allied Governments would insist on the execution of the Treaty of London. No answer from the Yugoslav Government had been received up to the time when this issue of CURRENT HISTORY went to press.

THE RUSSIAN QUESTION

Another big question was the policy to be adopted toward Russia. In an important statement made by Lloyd George in the House of Commons on Dec. 18 the British Premier disclosed the fact that all the allied representatives in Paris had agreed to keep hands off in the war against the Bolsheviks, though Japan and the United States were negotiating with a view to future action should the Bolshevik advance progress beyond Lake Baikal.

An official communiqué was issued, however, by the Supreme Council on Jan. 16, embodying a distinct change of policy with regard to trade relations with Soviet Russia. The text of this statement is given herewith:

With a view to remedying the unhappy situation of the population in the interior of Russia, which is now deprived of all manufactured products from outside of Russia, the Supreme Council, after taking note of the report of a committee appointed to consider the reopening of certain trade relations with the Russian people, has decided that it would permit the exchange of goods on the basis of reciprocity between the Russian people and allied and neutral countries.

For this purpose it decided to give facilities to the Russian co-operative organizations which are in direct touch throughout Russia so that they may arrange for the import into Russia of clothing, medicines, agricultural machinery and the other necessities of which the Russian people are in sore need, in exchange for grain, flax, &c., of which there is a surplus supply.

These arrangements imply no change in the policies of the allied Governments toward the Soviet Government.

OTHER QUESTIONS CONSIDERED

In a response to a communication regarding the Eupen-Malmédy districts on the frontier between Germany and Belgium, the Council on Dec. 5 sent a reply saying that the interpretation of the German Government regarding these districts, for which plebiscites had been arranged, conformed neither to the letter nor to the spirit of Article 34 of the Versailles Treaty. The impartial attitude of Belgium in administering this plebiscite was defended by the council's note.

Measures were also taken to send allied troops to Slesvig for occupation during the plebiscite in this territory. Word came from Copenhagen on Jan. 13, that Entente ships had arrived at Flensburg, and that the inhabitants were already anticipating the passing of Prussian rule; the gendarmerie was being replaced by natives, and German County Judges were being superseded by Danish officials. The International Plebiscite Commission was scheduled to leave Copenhagen for Flensburg on Jan. 17. The Danish capital was planning a warm welcome for the allied troops, and entertainment committees had formulated plans for parades of foreign and Danish troops, and other festivities. On Jan. 12, President Wilson received a cable dispatch from King Christian X. thanking him for his part in the Slesvig settlement, whereby "Danish Slesvig would be given an opportunity to be reunited with its old fatherland." In reply President Wilson congratulated Denmark on this result, which he characterized as "one of the ideals for which I strove."

Toward the end of December the Supreme Council received a memorandum from the Pan-Epirotic Union in America, setting forth the allegedly Greek character of the City of Korytsa in Northern Epirus (Albania), in opposition to claims made on Albania's behalf by the Pan-Albanian Federation in America. Besides allotting Eastern Galicia to Poland, the council early in December approved the draft of a treaty between the principal allied powers, Poland and Czechoslovakia, including the settlement of the frontier of the two latter States. Regarding the Teschen coal fields, the council adhered to its decision of Sept. 27, 1919, for the holding of a plebiscite there, to decide how the region was to be divided between the Poles and the Czechoslovaks.

League of Nations Created

World Organization for International Peace Holds Its First Sessions in Paris

WITH the proclamation of peace with Germany, which occurred on Jan. 10 in Paris, the way to the initiation of the League of Nations, whose establishment was provided for explicitly by the Versailles Treaty, was cleared of obstacles. President Wilson had accepted the duty of calling the first meeting, and on Jan. 16 he sent out the formal call to the principal nations concerned, which made the League a reality.

The first meeting of the League was held in the Clock Room of the French Foreign Ministry, the same room in which the Peace Conference had met and in which peace had been proclaimed. This new-born League of Nations faced problems such as no assembly, national or international, has ever had to solve. Numerous disputes between nations, large and small, over boundaries, plebiscites, right of free determination of ethnical minorities, and the formidable task of issuing and controlling mandates confronted this tribunal at its birth. And before it, in the future, lay all the possibilities connected with the object for which the League was formed, the prevention of war among the races and nations of mankind.

PROBLEMS DISPOSED OF

Some of its problems had been simplified by agreement. After long conferences in Paris, the allied Ministers had reached a quasi-agreement with the Italian Premier and Foreign Minister regarding the internationalization of Fiume. By decree of the Supreme Council, the district of East Galicia had been given to Poland for a provisional period of twenty-five years. Belgium had assumed control of the plebiscite in the Eupen-Malmédy regions on the German frontier. The first zone of Slesvig had been evacuated by the Germans, and allied troops had been dispatched to Denmark to control the plebiscite there. Disputes between the military experts of the allied nations and of Germany over the providing of transportation trains for the allied troops to be sent to East Prussia and other districts of Germany where plebiscites were to be held had been finally settled before the proclamation of peace. Various mandates had already been assigned to certain of the powers over other nations, notably to the French for Syria, to the British for Persia, to the Japanese for Shantung, to the Belgians, British, French, Japanese, and Australians for the former German colonies. Yet a multiplicity of matters were left for the new international body to resolve.

QUESTIONS OF MEMBERSHIP

The question of the adhesion of the neutral nations to the League still remained unsettled. The invitation to the thirteen neutrals named in the annex to the covenant of the League of Nations became effective from the coming into force of the Versailles Treaty. None of the nations in question had declined to join the League, though several had shown a disinclination to take any action until ratification by the United States. A few had ratified.

Japan's official ratification of the treaty and covenant was received by the Secretariat of the Peace Conference on Dec. 26. It was transmitted by Baron Matsui, the Japanese Ambassador to Paris. Up to Jan. 2 the Secretariat had received the ratifications of England, France, and Italy, the last-mentioned country having ratified the treaty by imperial decree. The failure of the United States to ratify had no effect upon the coming into force of the treaty and League of Nations, but the League had to begin its life without an American representative.

It was stated in Paris on Dec. 24 that Japan's representatives in the Supreme Council had objected to the form of the mandates under which Japan would administer the former German colonies in the Pacific allotted to her charge, and that time had been asked to submit the matter to the Tokio Government. The details to which the Japanese delegates objected were not officially disclosed, but it was stated semi-officially that they involved the question of Japanese migration to colonies which would come under the Australian mandate, as well as the economic advantages the Japanese formerly enjoyed under the most-favored-nation clause. In connection with the promulgation of the Versailles Treaty, however, the Japanese Government issued an imperial rescript which, in referring to the League of Nations covenant, called upon all Japanese subjects to work "for the attainment of that durable peace contemplated by the institution of the League of Nations, always abiding by the principle of universal justice and following the path of progress in the world."

SENTIMENT FOR LEAGUE

Sentiment for the league, despite the failure of the United States to ratify, had grown steadily abroad, especially in Great Britain. The momentous significance of the new institution was eloquently set forth by Mr. Arthur Balfour and the Archbishop of Canterbury at a great meeting held in London on Armistice Day.

The attitude of America was deplored. In the course of an appeal for the ratification of the League covenant General Smuts, the South African Prime Minister, on Nov. 17 urged the United States to give its official sanction to the covenant, which he characterized as "the hope of the world." A special article was devoted to the American situation by Winston Churchill in The Illustrated Sunday Herald of Nov. 29, in which he argued that the whole idea of the League had been conceived and urged upon the Peace Conference by America, as a consequence of which the whole plan for peace had been affected, and that a half-way policy on America's part would leave Europe disrupted. The article concluded by predicting that the United States would eventually ratify.

As a result of the sessions of the third Congress of National Associations, which met at Brussels on Dec. 1, all national societies for the establishment of the League were drawn together into a federation, and four commissions, one, presided over by M. Albert Thomas, who had been appointed Director of the International Office of Labor of the League, dealing with labor and international education; a second, dealing with international law; the third, with disarmament, and the fourth, to deal with all questions relative to the composition and powers of the League.

Information reached Washington on Dec. 31 that plans had been perfected to permit the extension of invitations to certain jurists of international reputation to form a managing committee for the elaboration of the details of the Permanent Court of International Justice and the definition of its activities.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S CALL

The first meeting of the Council of the League of Nations was set in the call issued by President Wilson for the morning of Friday, Jan. 16, 1920. This date was fixed immediately after the ratification of the treaty with Germany by Premiers Clemenceau, Lloyd George, and Nitti, at the session of the Supreme Council on Jan. 10. Premier Clemenceau then notified the powers concerned to have their delegates in Paris on the day set. The place designated for the first meeting was the French Foreign Office.

The text of President Wilson's call for this first meeting was addressed to the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Brazil, and Spain. The invitations were telegraphed through the American Embassies to the respective Foreign Offices, and the text of the call was given out publicly by Mr. Lansing after receiving notice of delivery to each of the countries called. The form was the same in all cases, except for the name of the Government addressed. The invitation to Great Britain, typical of all the rest, was as follows:

In compliance with Article V. of the covenant of the League of Nations, which went into effect at the same time as the Treaty of Versailles of June 28, 1919, of which it is a part, the President of the United States, acting on behalf of those nations which have deposited their instruments of ratification in Paris as certified in a procès-verbal drawn up by the French Government, dated Jan. 10, 1920, has the honor to inform the Government of Great Britain that the first meeting of the Council of the League of Nations will be held in Paris at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Friday, Jan. 16, at 10:30 A. M.

The President ventures to hope that the Government of Great Britain will be in a position to send a representative to this first meeting. He feels that it is unnecessary for him to point out the deep significance attached to this meeting, or the importance which it must assume in the eyes of the world.

It will mark the beginning of a new era in international co-operation, and the first great step toward the ideal concert of nations. It will bring the League of Nations into being as a living force devoted to the task of assisting the peoples of all countries in their desire for peace, prosperity, and happiness. The President is convinced that its progress will accord with the noble purposes to which it is dedicated.

INAUGURATION OF LEAGUE

On Jan. 16, 1920, the League of Nations became a reality. At 10:30 o'clock the Executive Council of the League opened its first meeting in the Clock Room of the French Foreign Ministry. At one end of the salon, tapestried in crimson and gold, around a green-covered table, gathered nine men to set in motion the machinery of this unprecedented experiment in government, while a hundred or more diplomats from the four corners of the world looked on at the historic event. Only the chair of the United States was empty. Through the windows overlooking the Seine shone bright sunshine.

The nine men who sat about the table were M. Bourgeois, in the centre; on his right, Lord Curzon; next, Ambassador Matsui of Japan; then M. da Cunha for Brazil and Premier Venizelos for Greece. On the left of M. Bourgeois sat Signor Ferraris for Italy, Ambassador Quinones de Leon for Spain, and M. Hyman for Belgium. Across the table from M. Bourgeois sat Sir Eric Drummond, Secretary of the League.

OPENING ADDRESS

In his speech as presiding officer, M. Léon Bourgeois opened the historic session in the following words:

Today, gentlemen, we are holding the first meeting of the council, convened by the President of the United States. The task of presiding at this meeting and of inaugurating this great international institution should have fallen to President Wilson. We respect the reasons which will delay the final decisions of our friends in Washington, but we may all express the hope that the difficulties will soon be overcome, and that a representative of the great American Republic will occupy the place which awaits him among us. The work of the council will then assume that definite character and that particular force which should be associated with our work.

M. Bourgeois added that of the thirteen neutrals invited to become members of the League, Spain, Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, and Persia had accepted. He continued as follows:

Jan. 16, 1920, will go down to history as the date of the birth of the New World. The decision to be taken today will be in the name of all the States which adhere to the covenant. It will be the first decision of all the free nations leaguering themselves together for the first time in the history of the world to substitute right for wrong.

M. Bourgeois then made a plea for patience with the League. If the world should be disappointed in its first achievement it must remember that each act, however small, was great in its significance.

SPEECH OF LORD CURZON

Lord Curzon spoke for England, and expressed her belief in the League. He said:

Alone through the League can we hope to insure that such horrors and miseries as the world has experienced in the last five years shall not be repeated, and that a new era of international relationship shall dawn.

The League of Nations is an expression of the universal desire for a saner method of regulating the affairs of mankind. It is not a mere expression in platonic language of the necessity for international friendship and good understanding. It provides the machinery by which practical effect may be given to these principles.

Lord Curzon concluded his address with an appeal for American participation in the League. In this regard he said:

While I am in entire accord with all that M. Bourgeois has said I should wish especially to express my full concurrence in his observations regarding the United States of America. The decision must be her own, but if and when the United States elects to take her place in the new council chamber of nations a place is waiting for her and the warmest welcome will be hers.

Ambassador da Cunha of Brazil laid emphasis upon the honor he felt in being the only representative of the Western Hemisphere in the Council. He said he felt empowered to say that he represented not only Brazil, but the Pan-American Union.

Signor Ferraris said that Italy entered in the best spirit into the work of the League, and that the Rome Government had the fullest confidence in the ultimate success of the great project.

The English, Japanese, and Belgian members of the Sarre Basin Commission were then named. France and Germany will name the other two. This business done, London was chosen as the next meeting place, and M. Bourgeois declared the meeting adjourned.

The United States and the German Peace Treaty

THE German Peace Treaty had not been brought before the United States Senate for further consideration up to Jan. 20, 1920. Its status remained unchanged since its rejection by the Senate on Nov. 19, 1919. There were continual conferences between groups of Senators in an endeavor to reach a compromise agreement, but there was no word from President Wilson.

The President's first and only public declaration regarding the treaty after the beginning of his illness in September was in the form of a letter read at the Jackson Day dinner in Washington on Jan. 8 to representative Democrats who had assembled from all parts of the country to celebrate the anniversary. In this declaration President Wilson came out strongly and squarely for the treaty without any textual changes. After deploring the failure of this country "to effect the settlements for which it had fought throughout the war," he said:

None of the objects we professed to be fighting for has been secured, or can be made certain of, without this nation's ratification of the treaty and its entry into the covenant. This nation entered the great war to vindicate its own rights and to protect and preserve free government. It went into the war to see it through to the end, and the end has not yet come. It went into the war to make an end of militarism, to furnish guarantees to weak nations, and to make a just and lasting peace. It entered it with noble enthusiasm.

He said the maintenance of the peace of the world depended upon the wholehearted participation of the United States, the "one nation which has sufficient moral force with the rest of the world to guarantee the substitution of discussion for war. If we keep out of this agreement, if we do not give our guarantees, then another attempt will be made to crush the new nations of Europe." Referring to the action of the Senate he wrote:

I have asserted from the first that the overwhelming majority of the people of this country desire the ratification of the treaty, and my impression to that effect has recently been confirmed by the unmistakable evidences of public opinion given during my visit to seventeen of the States.

I have endeavored to make it plain that if the Senate wishes to say what the undoubted meaning of the League is I shall have no objection. There can be no reasonable objection to interpretations accompanying the act of ratification itself. But when the treaty is acted upon, I must know whether it means that we have ratified or rejected it.

We cannot rewrite this treaty. We must take it without changes which alter its meaning, or leave it, and then after the rest of the world has signed it, we must face the unthinkable task of making another and separate treaty with Germany.

But no mere assertions with regard to the wish and opinion of the country are credited. If there is any doubt as to what the people of the country think on this vital matter, the clear and single way out is to submit it for determination at the next election to the voters of the nation, to give the next election the form of a great and solemn referendum, a referendum as to the part the United States is to play in completing the settlements of the war and in the prevention in the future of such outrages as Germany attempted to perpetrate.

On the same occasion William J. Bryan, who was President Wilson's first Secretary of State and was responsible for his first nomination for the Presidency—and who himself had been three times the Democratic nominee for President—delivered an address in which he directly joined issue with the President. He argued that the treaty should be ratified without delay; that there should be compromise on the part of the Democratic Senators if necessary to bring about this outcome. To Mr. Bryan the main thing was to ratify the treaty and establish peace with Germany. With the Republicans controlling the Senate, he held, theirs should be the responsibility, and the Democratic minority should not put obstacles in their way. He added:

We cannot afford, either as citizens or as members of the party, to share with the Republican Party responsibility for further delay. We cannot go before the country on the issue that such an appeal would present.

Neither can we go before the country on the issue raised in Article X. If we do not intend to impair the right of Congress to decide the question of peace or war when the time for action arises, how can we insist upon a moral obligation to go to war which can have no force or value except as it does impair the independence of Congress? We owe it to the world to join in an honest effort to put an end to war forever, and that effort should be made at the earliest possible moment.

A majority of Congress can declare war. Shall we make it more difficult to conclude a treaty than to enter a war?

The President's implied suggestion for a referendum was not indorsed by any of the Democratic leaders; it was maintained that to submit the treaty to a vote of the people would involve a further delay of fourteen months in ratification, with no prospect that there could be elected enough Senators favorable to unconditional ratification. Senator Lodge, leader of the Republicans and sponsor for the reservations, declared he was willing to let the matter go before the people, and this position was indorsed by the Senators who were opposed to the treaty in any form. It was clear, however, that there was no sentiment of any importance for the referendum, and discussion regarding it ceased in a few days.

Meanwhile private and unofficial discussions between the Senators continued. The most promising development came on Jan. 15, when five Democratic leaders and four Republican leaders met for a round-table discussion in an endeavor to reach a basis of compromise. Both parties announced that all political phases of the question had been eliminated, and that the treaty was being approached strictly from a non-partisan point of view. Considerable progress was made toward a compromise, the chief stumbling block being Article X., wherein the military and naval strength of the country is pledged to repel external aggression against the territory of any member of the League. It was conceded by all Senators favorable to the treaty that it could not be ratified without definite reservations, the only question being how broad they would be.

All the indications on Jan. 20 pointed to an ultimate compromise, which would be a practical acceptance of the original reservations with the clause omitted which required a formal acceptance of the reservations by the other powers.

An interesting side light on the sentiment of the country respecting the treaty was a referendum ballot by 410 colleges. Votes were cast by 158,078 students and professors. As originally submitted, the referendum covered six propositions, and 43,125 ballots in eighty-nine colleges were registered on this basis. Later the referendum was limited to four propositions, 114,953 votes being cast in 311 colleges on this basis. For both sets of propositions, of 158,078 ballots, 61,494 favored a compromise to permit immediate ratification, 48,232 opposed any reservations, 27,970 expressed themselves for the Lodge program, 13,943 favored killing the treaty and the League, and 6,449 would negotiate a new treaty with Germany.

The preponderant vote in the four proposition basis was given to Proposition 4, favoring a compromise between the Lodge and the Democratic reservations in order to facilitate the ratification of the treaty. This received a combined Faculty and student vote of 44,789 out of a total number of 114,953 votes cast.

IRELAND AND ENGLAND

Official Statement by Premier Lloyd George—Irish Republicans Reject Plan—Sinn Fein Wins Elections

THE Sinn Fein movement, seeking the secession of Ireland from Great Britain and the establishment of an independent republic, received fresh impetus on Jan. 15 at the municipal elections. Coming closely on the heels of the proposal for home rule, to which the Lloyd George Government is irrevocably committed, the elections indicated that the Irish Republicans do not accept the home rule measure, and are stronger for complete independence than ever before. The municipal elections were held to fill 1,470 vacancies; the Sinn Fein won 422, Labor 324, Nationalists 213, Unionists 297. The Sinn Feiners made some gains in Ulster and won Dublin by a considerable majority. The reports cover 1,256 of the 1,470 vacancies; the results indicate an overwhelming sentiment against the Unionists, who represent the present Government.

Mayor Hylan of New York City, who a few weeks previously had conferred the freedom of the city on the Prince of Wales, performed a similar service on Jan. 16 for Eamonn de Valera, who was elected President of the proposed Irish Republic by the Sinn Fein. Mr. de Valera has been in the United States for months to promote the cause he represents. The freedom of the city was conferred on him at the City Hall, and the Mayor lauded the independence movement in his address. The exercises were held to inaugurate the movement to raise a fund of $10,000,000 in this country to aid the Irish Republicans. The first subscription was for $1,000, made by Archbishop Hayes of New York; it was announced that the first day's subscriptions had reached $2,550,000, and that the $10,000,000 would be easily raised. The subscribers receive certificates to be exchanged for bonds to be issued when the republic is established.

On Dec. 19 an unsuccessful attempt was made in Phoenix Park, Dublin, to kill Lord French, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and three days later the Prime Minister outlined the new home rule scheme in a speech in the House of Commons.

These two events shaped the course of Irish history through the month under review. In spite of the fact that the assault on Lord French was denounced by the higher Irish clergy as both wicked and futile, similar attacks under the direction of the Sinn Fein continued to be made against the constituted authorities. Counter-raids were made upon Sinn Fein quarters, particularly in Dublin, by the Constabulary and troops. Sinn Fein raids, principally in County Cork, were made upon the farms of known sympathizers with the Home Rule bill, and cattle and produce were carried off or destroyed.

Meanwhile, the Irish Unionists, principally of Ulster, showed their antipathy toward the home rule plan as expounded by the Prime Minister, and their Executive Committee adopted a resolution on Jan. 8 declaring that he had placed a "dangerous weapon in the hands of the declared enemies of the empire."

Failing to gain the approbation of the Unionists for the scheme, the Government promoters turned to the Irish Nationalists, who at the last elections were superseded in almost every seat by the Sinn Fein, practically leaving Ireland without representation in the House of Commons, as the Sinn Fein members declined to sit. John Dillon, ex-leader of Constitutional Irish Nationalism, was approached by the Blackrock Urban District Council, County Dublin, and replied in part as follows:

The military Government which has been placed in complete control of Ireland by the policy of Sinn Fein is determined, so far as its power goes, to make any constitutional movement in Ireland impossible, and to goad the people to acts of violence and folly and to crime in pursuance of a policy of providing plausible grounds for still further developments of military rule, and with a view to defeating any attempt to arrive at a rational and friendly settlement of the Irish question.

I am convinced more firmly than ever that the object aimed at by the Sinn Fein is unobtainable, and that the policy of the Sinn Fein leaders has been disastrous to the Irish cause, and is bound, if persevered in, to lead to even greater disasters. To throw away, in the face of able and unscrupulous enemies, one of the most effective, if not the most effective weapon ever possessed by Ireland—an Independent United Party in the British House of Commons—and to declare war against the British Empire when Ireland had no means of carrying on that war in a civilized or decent fashion, was foolish in the extreme.

The results are already painfully evident, and if this policy be persevered in there can, in my judgment, be no doubt that it is bound to plunge the country deeper and deeper in chaos and disorder; play into the hands of the military party and all the bitterest enemies of the Irish people, and alienate from the cause of Irish nationality the sympathies of democratic nations throughout the world.

Holding these views as I do most strongly, I am unable to give any support to the Sinn Fein Party now in control of Irish Nationalist politics; and, on the other hand, in face of the last election and of the infamous character of the present Government in Ireland, I do not feel free at the present time to take any prominent part in any attempt to reorganize Ireland on constitutional lines.

The Home Rule Proposal

The British Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, delivered his address on the Irish problem in the House of Commons on Dec. 22, 1919, at the time the Government measure for Irish Home Rule was introduced. He went at length into the whole Irish question and analyzed the proposal in detail. It is a historic utterance of much importance and for that reason it is given herewith in full:

MR. SPEAKER: I feel I have a task which is about as difficult as one as any Minister has ever been presented with to perform.

It is to attempt to compose an old family quarrel—a quarrel which has engendered many a time a bloody feud. It is difficult under any circumstances, but difficult indeed immediately after such a disgraceful outrage as was perpetrated recently in Dublin. [The unsuccessful attempt on Dec. 19 to assassinate General French, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.] An atmosphere charged with a reek of attempted assassination is not a favorable one in which to promote a measure of reconciliation.

The dastardly attack on a brave Irish soldier—who by his gallantry had added lustre to the renown of his race—is not merely one of the most cruel, it is one of the most foolish incidents in the history of political crimes. Unfortunately, such incidents have happened before.

I recall the time when, in 1882 I think it was, Lord Cavendish had been sent over to Ireland with a message of peace and reconciliation, came that terrible crime at the mere memory of which we still shudder. The history of Ireland is full of untoward incidents. I am glad that the chiefs of the Catholic Church in Ireland have lost no time in denouncing in unmeasured language the outrage. Experience of the past has shown us that these murder societies which arise now and again are small and disreputable. They choose opportunities like this because they do not seek conciliation. They want to make reconciliation impossible, and to turn back when we had started on the path would be to play into their hands.

It makes the task of statesmanship more difficult, but it also makes the test of statesmanship more real. On similar occasions in the past the British Parliament has declined to allow its judgment to be swept away even by honest indignation, and it would be to play the game of these miscreants to take any other course now. They fortunately missed the object of their crime. They inflicted a serious injury alone upon the interests of the country they were pretending to serve.

I should like to review shortly the present position with reference to self-government for Ireland. The first fact the House will take note of is that there is a Home Rule act on the statute book. Unless it is either postponed or repealed or altered, it comes automatically into operation when the war ceases. That is the first fact the House will take cognizance of. Legislation, therefore, is indispensable. We may be asked—"Why not allow it to come into operation?" I am afraid it is no answer to that question to say, "Because no one wants it." There is no section in Ireland that wants the act of 1914. That is not a sufficient answer, because, I am sorry to say, that I cannot think of any proposals that you can put forward from this court which would be in the least practicable or acceptable to British opinion at the present moment or which would have any chance of acceptance now in the present condition of Ireland.

We must get that fact right into our minds. Therefore we must take our responsibility and propose what we think is right, fair and just. Settlement will be found not in the enactment, but in the working. But there are two reasons why the Act of 1914 is inapplicable. The first is, it is not workable without fundamental alterations. That, I think, is acknowledged on all hands. The second is that when it was placed on the statute book its promoters gave an undertaking that it would not be brought into operation until an Act of Parliament had been carried dealing with the peculiar position of Ulster. That was a definite undertaking given with the assent of the Irish Nationalist representatives. It was given by Mr. Asquith. Therefore we cannot contemplate allowing the Act of 1914 to come into operation without changes adapted to the changing conditions, and the changes which would deal with the case of Ulster, which has been recognized by the leaders of all parties in this house. Now, what is the problem we have to meet?

TWO BASIC FACTS

There are two basic facts which lie at the foundation of any structure you are going to build up in Ireland. The first is this, that three-quarters of the population of Ireland are not merely governed without their consent, but they manifest the bitterest hostility to the Government. That is the fact. It is the one country in Europe, except Russia, where the classes who elsewhere are on the side of law and order are out of sympathy with the machinery of the law. What makes this more serious is the fact that it is not due to material grievances. I remember when it used to be argued that if you improved social and economic conditions, if you got rid of agrarian trouble, improved housing, if you created a peasant proprietorship and built railways, constructed harbors, and did everything possible in order to make Ireland as prosperous as conditions would allow, all this objection to British rule would vanish. What has happened? Ireland has never been so prosperous as she is today.

Mr. J. Jones (Lab., Silvertown)—She has never been so national.

Prime Minister—The vast majority of the cultivators of Ireland are the possessors of their own soil. Houses and comfortable cottages for working men have been built at the expense of the British taxpayer.

Men who traveled through Ireland a generation ago and revisit that country would not know it today. It is completely transfigured. The fact remains that Ireland has never been so alienated from British rule as it is today. Therefore the grievance, such as it is, is not a material one. Irishmen claim the right to control their own domestic concerns without interference from Englishmen, Scotsmen or Welshmen. That is the fundamental fact. They have fought for it for hundreds of years. They have never held it so tenaciously as they do today. Now, what is the second fact? It is also a fundamental one—that there you have a considerable section of people of Ireland who are just as opposed to Irish rule as the majority of Irishmen are to British rule. Both those facts must be taken into account—the first perhaps disagreeable to one body of members of the House; the second equally disagreeable perhaps to another body. It is not our business to seek for agreeable facts for anybody, but to seek for the facts, whether they are agreeable or otherwise. In the Northeast of Ireland you have a population—a fairly solid population; a homogeneous population—alien in race, alien in sympathy, alien in religion, alien in outlook, from the rest of the population of Ireland, and it would be an outrage upon the principle of self-government to place them under the rule of the remainder of the population.

In the northeast of Ireland, if that were done, you would inevitably alienate the best elements from the machinery of law and order. I do not say it would produce exactly the same results, but it would recreate exactly the same condition which you are trying to remedy in the south and west.

THE CASE OF ULSTER: TWO PRIESTS' VIEWS

This point is so important, and has been challenged on such a scale, and the case for it has been so little stated outside the United Kingdom, that I think it vital that I should dwell for a short time upon it. It is not because I attach less importance to it than I do to the first proposition; it is because the first proposition is accepted, outside. In the Dominions, in the United States of America, in European countries, the second has not been stated, and it is not known. I shall state it, not in my own words, but in two quotations from witnesses who certainly are not biased in favor of the northeastern part of Ireland. The first is a quotation from a very remarkable letter written in June, 1916, by Father O'Flanagan, a very able Irish Catholic priest. He, I believe, afterward became Vice President of Sinn Féin. I do not know whether he holds the position still, and no one can doubt at any rate that he is in sympathy with Nationalist claims in Ireland. This is what he says upon this particular subject:

"If we reject home rule rather than agree to the exclusion of the Unionist part of Ulster, what case have we to put before the world? We can point out that Ireland is an island with a definite geographical boundary. That argument might be all right if you were dealing with a number of island nationalities that had these definite geographical boundaries. Appealing as we are to Continental nations, with shifting boundaries, that argument can have no force whatever. National and geographical boundaries scarcely ever coincided. Geography would make one nation of Spain and Portugal. History has made two of them. Geography did its best to make one nation of Norway and Sweden; history has succeeded in making two of them.

Geography has scarcely anything to say upon the number of nations on the North American Continent; history has done the whole thing. If a man were to try to construct a political map of Europe out of its physical map he would find himself groping in the dark (well do we know that who attended the Peace Conference in Paris). Geography has worked hard to make one nation out of Ireland; history has worked against it. The island of Ireland and the national unit of Ireland simply do not coincide. In the last analysis the test of nationality is the wish of the people. A man who settles in America becomes an American by transferring his love and allegiance to the United States.

"The Unionists of Ulster have never transferred their love and allegiance to Ireland. They may be Irelanders, using a geographical term, but they are not Irishmen in the national sense. They love the hills of Antrim in the same way that we love the hills of Roscommon, but the centre of their political enthusiasm is London, whereas the centre of ours is Dublin. We claim the right to decide what is our nation. We refuse them the same right. We are putting ourselves before the world in the same light as the man in the Gospel who was forgiven ten thousand talents and proceeded to throttle his neighbor for one hundred pence. After three hundred years England has tired of compelling us to love her by force. We are anxious to start where England left off, and to compel Antrim and Down to love us by force."

That is a very remarkable letter. I quote it not merely because it is a forcible, pregnant, eloquent statement of the case, but because no man can say that that comes from the lips of a reviler of Ireland or one who has no sympathy with national and Catholic Ireland. I think I must trouble the House with one other short quotation, because it is so much better that this testimony should come from the lips of those whose right to speak on this subject cannot be challenged, and whose sentiments toward Ireland cannot be disputed even by the strongest Nationalist. Now I will give another quotation from another very able Irish priest, a professor of theology in Maynooth College—Father Macdonald:

"Were Ireland made a republic, fully independent of Great Britain, it seems to me that she would be bound to allow home rule for the northeast corner on the principles underlying our claim for home rule in the United Kingdom, which I regard as well-founded. The Protestants of Ulster differ from the majority of the race of the island, not only in religion, but in race, mentality, culture generally. They are at once homogeneous and heterogeneous—homogeneous in their districts and heterogeneous as compared with the rest of Ireland. A minority in Ireland, they are a majority in the northeast corner, and therefore, on the principles we have been advocating, are entitled to home rule."

TO FORCE UNION WOULD PROMOTE DISUNION

These two quotations state the case in favor of the treatment of Ulster. If they unite they must do it of their own accord. To force union is to promote disunion. There may be advantage in union. I do not deny that geographically the conditions are such as to make it desirable. There is an advantage in mingling races and religion so as to constitute a variety of ideas, so as to have a different outlook, and there is undoubtedly an advantage in having industry and agriculture working side by side in the same Parliament, but that is a matter for these populations themselves. Lord Durham attempted to force Quebec and Ontario—Lower and Upper Canada—into the same Parliament. That plan had to be abandoned. Separate Parliaments had to be given them; and it was only after that was done that federation became possible. Keeping them together would simply have created antagonism.

The third fundamental condition is that any arrangement by which Ireland could be severed from the United Kingdom, either nominally or in substance or effect, would be fatal to the interests of both. You have only to look at what happened in the late war to realize what would have happened if Ireland had been a separate unit. A hostile republic, or even an unfriendly one, might very well have been fatal to the cause of the Allies. The submarine trouble was difficult enough in all conscience. There were many moments when we were full of anxiety. Our experts were full of anxiety, not of fear, for they were men of great courage, but because they knew the difficulty. But if we had there a land, one whose harbors and inlets we had no control of, we might have had a situation full of peril, a situation which might very well have jeopardized the life of this country. The area of the submarine activity might have been extended beyond the limits of control. Britain and her allies might have been cut off from the Dominions and from the United States. We cannot run the risk of a possibility such as that, and it would be equally fatal to the interests of Ireland.

IRELAND'S BEST CUSTOMER

Irish trade interests are intertwined with those of Great Britain. Britain is Ireland's best customer. If Great Britain, with all its infinite resources, found it difficult to govern a hostile Ireland, I cannot see how Ireland could control a hostile northeast. There would be trouble; there would be mischief; there might be bloodshed; and then the whole black chapter of misunderstanding between Great Britain and Ireland would be rewritten all over again. We must not enter upon that course, whatever the cost; and I think it is right here, in the face of the demands put forward from Ireland with apparent authority, that any attempt at secession will be fought with the same determination, with the same resources, with the same resolve, as the Northern States of America put into the fight with the Southern States. It is important that it should be known not merely throughout the world, but in Ireland itself.

Subject to these three conditions, we propose that self-government should be conferred upon the whole of Ireland. Our plan is based upon the recognition of these three fundamental facts: First, the importance of not severing Ireland from the United Kingdom; secondly, the opposition of Nationalist Ireland to British rule; thirdly, the opposition of the population of Ulster to Irish rule.

The first involves the recognition that Ireland must remain an integral part of the United Kingdom. The second involves the confirming of self-government of Ireland in all its domestic concerns. The third involves the setting up of two parliaments, and not one, in Ireland. That is the first proposal we recommend to Parliament. What, then, should be the two parliaments, two legislatures, set up in Ireland?

TWO PARLIAMENTS

I will deal first of all with the areas—one will be the Parliament of Southern Ireland and the other will be the Parliament of Northeastern Ireland. There are four alternative proposals which have been discussed with regard to boundaries. The first is that the whole of Ulster should form one unit, the other three provinces to form another unit. The objection to that is that this would leave large areas in which there is a predominant Catholic and Celtic population in deep sympathy with the southern population.

The second suggestion is county option. The objection to that is that it would leave solid communities of Protestants who are in complete sympathy with the northeastern section of Ireland outside under a Government to which they are rootedly hostile. It is sometimes impossible to avoid that, but it is desirable to avert it wherever practicable, and no boundary has ever been fixed in the United States of America or in the dominions by that process.

The third suggestion is that the six northeastern counties should form a unit. There is the same objection to that because there are solid Catholic communities in at least two of these counties which are co-terminous with the southern population, and it would be undesirable from the point of view of the northeastern province to attach them to the Ulster Parliament. The fourth suggestion is that we should ascertain what the homogeneous northeastern section is and constitute it into a separate area—take the six counties as a basis, and eliminate wherever practicable the Catholic counties, while including Protestant communities co-terminous with the Catholic counties, and produce an area as homogeneous as it is possible to achieve under these circumstances.

I now come to two additional features in the Government proposals which differentiate them from the act of 1914 and even from the American precedent. The first is that we propose that every opportunity should be given to Irishmen, if they desire it, to establish union, but the decision must rest with them if they agree. It would require no act of the Imperial Parliament in order to enable them to accomplish it. But there are two proposals which we have got in mind to attain that object.

THE COUNCIL OF IRELAND

The first is that there should be constituted from the outset a Council of Ireland consisting of twenty representatives elected by each of the two Irish legislatures. This council would be given the powers of private bill legislation from the outset, but otherwise we propose to leave to the two Irish legislatures complete discretion to confer upon it any powers they choose within the range of their own authority. The council, therefore, will not only serve as an invaluable link between the two parts of Ireland—an assembly of the leaders of the North and South, wherever they may come together and discuss the affairs of their common country—but it constitutes the obvious agency upon which the two parliaments, without surrendering their own independence, may secure that certain common services which it is highly undesirable to divide can be administered jointly as a single Irish service.

The Government does not propose in the bill to lay down what services should be so controlled. It is proposed to leave this matter to be settled by the two Irish legislatures themselves by agreement. Nothing can be done except by agreement. For instance, take transportation, railways and canals. They are great trunk systems, which serve both areas. If the two Irish legislatures agree, they can leave the control to this National Irish Council. That is an illustration of the kind of subject which might very well be delegated by the two Irish legislatures to this council, which represents both and which can only be delegated by agreement. Now I come to the second proposal we have put forward, with a view to enabling Ireland to attain unity, if both sections desire it.

We propose to clothe the Irish legislatures with full constituent powers, so that they would be able, without reference to the Imperial Parliament and by identical legislation, to create a single Irish legislature, discharging all or any of the powers not specifically reserved to the Imperial Parliament. It would then rest with the Irish people themselves to determine whether they want union and how they want union. The British Parliament will have no further say in the matter. If the Irish elect or determine, they can return a majority to the Irish Parliament, even in the very first election, to bring about a union of the North and South.

The Government propose that certain additional taxing powers, which I shall refer to later, shall be handed over to the Irish Parliament as soon as the Irish Parliament agree to that. With regard to the Irish representation in this Parliament, we propose to adhere to the scheme of the act of 1914, that is, a reduction to the number of forty-two members for all purposes.

THE FEDERAL POWERS

I now come to the powers of these two legislatures. We propose to proceed on the basis of the act of 1914—that is, reserving Federal power to the Imperial Parliament and leaving the rest of the powers to the two legislatures. What I call the Federal or Imperial power, which is reserved for this Parliament, will include the Crown, peace and war, foreign affairs, army and navy defense, treason, trade outside Ireland, navigation including merchant shipping, wireless and cables, coinage, trade marks, lighthouses, higher judiciary, until an agreement is established by the two Parliaments as to how they are to be appointed.

Sir E. Carson (C. U., Duncairn)—When you say the higher judiciary do you mean there is to be a different judiciary for each parliamentary area?

Mr. Lloyd George—It is proposed that all the Judges should be appointed by the Imperial authorities until there is an agreement between the two Legislatures as to their appointment. I do not mean Magistrates.

Sir E. Carson—I am referring to the question of areas.

Mr. Lloyd George—With regard to the area the appointment will be made by the Imperial Parliament, and the Imperial Parliament will have to make arrangements as to the areas to which they will be allocated. These powers correspond to the powers preserved wherever there is a Federal Constitution, whether in America or on the Continent of Europe.

IRISH PARLIAMENT'S POWERS

The powers of the Irish Parliament will be very considerable. There will be full control over education, government land, all roads and bridges; transportation, including railways and canals; old age pensions, insurances—may I say that under the act of 1914 they were reserved for the Imperial Parliament—and municipal affairs, local judiciaries, hospitals, licenses, all the machinery for the maintenance of law and order, with the exception of the higher judiciary, of the army and navy, and housing.

Mr. A. Henderson (Lab., Widnes)—What is the position of the two Parliaments in regard to labor legislation?

Mr. Lloyd George—Labor is not a reserved power, and labor legislation will also be dealt with by the local Legislatures.

I come now to the question of constabulary. The Irish Legislature must be responsible for the maintenance of law and order. It would be idle to set up a Legislature in a country with administration that was not responsible for the administration of the law. It is the first duty of any Government. There is no provincial Legislature in the world which has not got this for one of its primary duties. If that duty is not discharged that Government has no right any longer to remain a Government. It is inconceivable that should happen. It is inconceivable that it should be tolerated, but no administration can undertake the responsibility of order unless the machinery of maintaining order is placed at its disposal. It is therefore proposed not to retain the control of the police in imperial hands beyond three years. The Government proposes to give security to all members of the police force and all Irish civil servants by making provision whereby their pension rights will be secured on Irish revenue in the event of their dismissal or resignation.

I now come to the Post Office. Under the act of 1914 that was an Irish service, but if Ireland is divided into two areas the administrative difficulties, we are advised, would be so serious that we have come to the conclusion it would be preferable to postpone the transfer of the Post Office to Irish control until such time as the two Parliaments unite in asking that it should be transferred to the control of the Council of Ireland or of any other common machinery they may set up. There will be a clause for the protection of the rights of minorities in Ireland.

Now I come to the all-important problem of finance. I think the best method of approach would be that I should take the proposals of 1914 as the basis of explanation. The act of 1914 transferred no existing taxes. There was no power to impose new taxes if any one could find them, but they must not be substantially the same in character as any imperial taxes. There was power to vary imperial taxes within limitations. Home rule administration was financed under that act by a lump sum taken out of the Imperial Exchequer. There was also a provision for a surplus. To deprive Ireland of the right of taxation, and to simply give her a sum of money equal to the cost of the service at that time, without any margin, was to start the Parliament bankrupt. There was a surplus of £500,000, which was reduced by £50,000 a year until it reached the figure of £200,000. I need hardly say that was obviously an inadequate figure, and one can say now that surplus was like the sand castles, which have disappeared.

IRISHMEN AND THE WAR

Since then we have had a great war, which has produced two-fold consequences which have altered the whole character of the problem. The first is that the national debt has increased; and the second, that the cost of the whole of the services has doubled. Taxation and the value of money has depreciated. Under the act of 1914 there was no contribution toward the maintenance of the empire. That was a supreme injustice, especially under present conditions, to the taxpayers of Great Britain.

Irishmen throughout the world are bearing their share of the burdens of this great war. It was undertaken in order to emancipate a small Catholic nationality on the Continent of Europe, and it has achieved emancipation for several other Catholic nationalities. Irishmen of the United States are bearing their burdens in consequence of the wars—also in Canada, in Australia, and in Great Britain. I am sure Irishmen should be ashamed not to pay their share of the burden so much in sympathy with their ideals.

How is that to be ascertained? There are two alternative methods of arriving at the contribution to imperial taxation and the sum available for Irish loyal services. The first was that of the 1914 act, which was to transfer a lump sum equal to the cost of the services. It has its advantages, but there are conspicuous disadvantages, to which at the present moment great weight must be attached. In the first years, before Ireland has felt her way and expressed her contentment with this experiment, it must be remembered that the machinery for the enforcement of the law will be in the hands of Irishmen—the machinery for the enforcement of law against those who do not pay the duties or taxes. The Government, therefore, suggests another method, which will give the Irish Government the whole advantage of the duties and taxes raised in Ireland in excess of a fair contribution to the imperial service. Commission after commission has been appointed to ascertain what a fair contribution is.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

It is quite obvious that no fair apportionment is possible as long as the expenditure is abnormal. Therefore we propose to take the present yield of existing taxes as the basis, and for a short period of two years to assume that a fair contribution shall be the amount contributed after deduction of local services. In the year 1919-20 there will be, in addition to that, a free gift in order to finance the Irish Parliament, or rather to give it a margin for development and improvement.

I think the best plan will be to give the actual figures by way of illustration. The total estimated revenue for 1920 derived from Ireland is £41,430,000. Local services, including old age pensions and insurance, come out at £12,750,000. Reserve services, including police, Post Office, and Revenue Department, bring that up to £19,550,000. Now the House of Commons has incurred additional liabilities during this session. One of them was incurred on Friday last, and the others are in respect of local loans in Ireland, old age pensions, education, housing, and health insurance. Then there is another item which the House must take into account. Under the Irish Land Purchase act agreements have already been entered into which, in the aggregate, amount to £1,701,000,000 to £1,702,000,000. It is an imperial obligation which the Government has undertaken to put through on terms very favorable to the Irish tenants, but which, under present conditions, is extraordinarily unfair to the Exchequer. That will cost another £500,000, which brings the total of Irish expenditure up to £23,500,000. If you deduct that from the total revenue of £41,500,000 that will leave a contribution of £18,000,000 toward imperial expenditure.

This is the amount which at the present moment, taking all these things into account, the Treasury derives out of Ireland, and which can be applied to the cost of the national debt, the army and navy, to trade, the running of the machinery, and war pensions. Before the end of the two years' period a Joint Exchange Board will settle a fair contribution for the future, having regard to the relative taxable capacity of North and South Ireland and the United Kingdom. In the south it will hold for five years. The Joint Exchequer Board will consist of an equal number of representatives from the United Kingdom and the two Irish Parliaments, with an independent Chairman. This method does justice to the two Governments in Ireland. It is based upon the taxable capacity. There are means of revision. There is room for economy in local services.

BRITISH FINANCIAL AID

Now I come to the surplus, which we propose to recommend to the House of Commons should be placed at the disposal of the two Irish Parliaments for the purpose of improvement and development in Ireland. No doubt there are many services which stand greatly in need of it. There are education, payment of teachers, and pensions. No doubt public opinion in Ireland expects that a sum of money should be spent in industrial, economical, and agricultural development.

I think it is desirable that the Imperial Parliament, having regard to the past of Ireland, for which we are largely responsible in this country, should deal generously with the two Irish Legislatures, so that they should not start with crippled finances. I believe to this end it would be wise expenditure for Great Britain if we could achieve contentment in Ireland by this process. We propose, first of all, to deal with the initial expenditure which the two Parliaments must necessarily incur before they can set things going. The North of Ireland will need new buildings. It is proposed that there should be a grant to each Government of a single sum of one million pounds to cover the initial expenses of setting up the machinery of government within the two areas, but there ought also to be a provision of a permanent character, and the Government have proposed to provide this sum out of the land annuities in Ireland. These annuities at present amount to three million per annum.

In the southern part of Ireland it reaches a figure of £2,440,000, and in the northern part £560,000. When the agreed purchases have been completed there will be another £600,000, but I am not in a position to make an apportionment between the North and the South of the figure. The proposal of the Government is that these annuities shall be handed to the Irish Governments as free gifts for the purpose of development and improvement in Ireland, that these Governments shall collect these annuities themselves and retain them, and that the Imperial Government should undertake the burden which is now cast upon it of paying interest on the redemption of stock.

The next point in the scheme of finance is the taxation proposals. Under the act of 1914 there were no taxation proposals. It is proposed that each Irish Parliament should have a taxing power, broadly speaking, equivalent to that of the State Legislatures of the United States of America. The power of taxation is, of course, limited. The revenue distributed and collected by the Irish Legislatures under this scheme will consist of land annuities, death duties, stamps, entertainment taxes, licensing duties, and any new taxes that ingenuity can devise.

The resources altogether would on the 1920 basis amount to £6,250,000 per annum for the whole of Ireland. The three great taxes—Income tax, including excess profits and super-tax, customs, and excise—would be levied and collected imperially. I will give you quite shortly the considerations which have determined our Government in this respect. The first is that the Imperial Government must have substantial guarantee for the payments and contributions; the second, the uncertainty and difficulty of collecting these taxes, except by the machinery common to the whole of the United Kingdom.

INCOME TAX AND CUSTOMS

If income tax in Ireland were transferred to the Irish Legislature no one would suffer more than Ireland herself, but the Irish Parliaments may levy a surcharge by way of additional income tax. That corresponds to the power which is given to the State in America. I say quite frankly it is rarely exercised. The Irish Parliaments may give abatement out of the surplus at their disposal. Now, I come to customs. The Government proposed to follow the course which I believe is pursued in every Federal Constitution in the world. This is not merely a question of customs, but of barriers between the North and the South, of trade, industry, commerce, and considerations which might promote friction between North and South and between Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

When Ireland is united it will be open to the Imperial Parliament to review the situation and consider whether it would be possible to give the customs to a United Irish Parliament. We are of opinion that in a divided Ireland it would be quite impracticable to set up customs barriers between North and South. With regard to the excise, we should have been glad if it had been possible to give the power of levying excise duties to these two Legislatures, because obviously you are ruling out a considerable source of revenue by not transferring it to the Irish administration. There is the same difficulty here if you give excise duties to the two Legislatures. It would involve customs barriers between North and South, and, certainly until union is achieved between North and South it would be undesirable and impracticable to give power with regard to the excise to either of the two Legislatures.

However, the position is this: The Irish Government will receive and retain the whole of the proceeds of all taxes levied by itself, the whole of the surplus proceeds of all taxes and duties levied by the Imperial Government in its territories, after deducting a fair contribution toward imperial expenditure. In addition, a million will be over for establishment expenses to each of the two Legislatures; and lastly, there will be a free gift of the annuities, resulting from the land already sold to tenants. Those are the outlines of the proposals which the Government intends to embody in a bill, and to submit for the consideration of Parliament at the earliest opportunity.

FOR FAIR CONSIDERATION

I would appeal not only to the House of Commons, but to Irishmen and to all concerned in this problem to give these proposals fair consideration. This is not the time to waste on recriminations. I am not sure that they are ever useful; in fact, I am sure that they are not. They do not contribute to the settlement of any problem, and they hinder and embarrass the settlement of every problem. There have been plenty of mistakes on both sides. One would imagine, listening to one side of the story, that all the mistakes had been on the other. It is not true. No race or country attempting to govern another has ever succeeded in doing it without a long array of blunders, and we are constantly taunted with these mistakes, up to this hour. I am not concerned to deny the charge. Have there been no mistakes on the other side? Has Irish leadership always been blameless? I do not want to enter even into recent debates. There have been mistakes, there have been follies, there have been crimes on both sides, and we want the chapter to be closed forever. The question is not who is to blame, but how are we to set it right, and that is not easy to answer.

The worst of it is that, looking around, I find no section that can accept anything except the impossible. There is no section in Ireland which would stand up and say, "We accept this or we accept that," except something you cannot put through. Under those circumstances the British Parliament must accept the responsibility, offering what wisdom and justice it contains, and trusting to the working of those two attributes to win acceptance and success at the end in solving the problem. It is important that both countries should realize thoroughly the limitations of acceptance. What is our limitation? Unless Irishmen in Ireland have real control of their purely domestic affairs it is idle to proceed. Shams exasperate, they provoke. Despair is the mother of disorder. On the other hand, let it be made clear that Britain cannot accept separation. It would be fatal to the security of these islands. It might be fatal to this country, and this is no time to imagine, when we have the memories of the late war, that Britain can be compelled by force to concede anything which is either unjust to her own people or to any one else—anything which would be fatal to her own life and security. A man that could imagine that Britain can be forced cannot have read the story of the last five years.

There are many who say, and I must say with some appearance of reason and sense, "Is this the time to propose such a thing?" My answer is, "There never has been, there never will be a perfectly acceptable time." Read the history of the two countries. There is a fatality which makes them eternally at cross purposes. Sometimes Ireland demands too much; sometimes, when Ireland has been reasonable, England has offered too little. Sometimes, when Ireland was friendly, England has been sullen; sometimes, when England has been friendly, Ireland has been angry; and sometimes, when both Britain and Ireland seem to be approximating toward friendship, an untoward incident sweeps them apart, and the quarrel begins again.

So the fitting time has never been, and never will be. But it is always the right time to do the right things, and Britain can afford now, more than ever and better than ever, to take the initiative, for this is not the time when any one can suspect Britain of conceding this through fear. The land that destroyed the greatest military empire in the world, largely through its own power, no one can taunt with quailing before a band of wretched assassins. The world will know, if we pursue this course, that we enter upon it prompted by that deep sense of justice which has sustained this land through these years of suffering.

Sir Donald Maclean (L., Southern Midlothian and Peebles) said he welcomed most warmly the fact that throughout the speech of the Prime Minister there was an entire absence of any proposal of further coercion of Ireland. For four or five years there had been in Ireland nothing but a series of ghastly blunders on the part of the Executive in Ireland. When the Irish Convention met in March, 1918, by common consent, there had never been a greater agreement among differing men on this question.

Sir E. Carson—There was no agreement at all.

Sir D. Maclean—I do not mean any formal agreement, but I will not press it, because my right honorable friend speaks from knowledge.

Prime Minister—I am sorry I must meet that. As a matter of fact, the report was carried by a minority of the convention, not by a minority of those who voted. The members from Ulster would not accept the report, the Sinn Feiners would not accept it, Mr. William O'Brien would not accept it, Mr. Devlin would not accept it, the Catholic Bishops did not accept it, and now, what is the good of pretending that there was any agreement? If there was any agreement at all, it was in rejecting the report.

Sir D. Maclean said at the end of the convention there was a larger amount of friendly interchanged opinion than had ever happened previously in regard to Ireland. The outcome of the Irish Convention was most disappointing, and when conscription was introduced the mischief done was very great—a complete change taking place in the political atmosphere of Ireland—and the friends of Ireland threw up their hands in despair. The position in which they found themselves today was one of extreme complexity and difficulty. So far as he was concerned, any influence or efforts which he could exercise to press forward even a step along the road would not be lacking. The times were too serious for party recrimination. No true friend of Ireland or of England desired for one moment but that this running sore should be closed and a fresh start made. The proposals of the Government did not go far enough. If they were to be useful at all, they must be a broad, generous, noble gift which these proud people could accept. He hoped no more repressive measures would be attempted. They solved the difficulties of South Africa by a broad policy, and he urged that by a similar open-handed policy they might solve that in Ireland.

CARSON MAKES A STATEMENT

Sir E. Carson (C. U., Belfast, Duncairn) said he had completely failed to grasp what it was Sir Donald Maclean wanted. He had spent his whole life in fighting this question. The real reason why the attempts to conciliate Ireland had failed was that Irishmen themselves, out of hatred of England, had refused to take part in the government of their country under the Imperial Parliament. He was as firmly convinced as ever that a united Parliament was still the best solution of this question for Ireland, the United Kingdom, and the Empire. They would make a great mistake in the face of foreign nations if they proceeded in this matter as though Ireland had no political liberty or freedom at all.

Having lived through the history of three previous Home Rule bills, he was not going to pronounce an opinion on the present proposal until he saw it in print. He would not even go to Ulster until two things happened, one being to see the bill in print and the other being that he was assured by the Prime Minister that he meant to go through with the bill to the end. Nothing could be more damaging than that, after recommending certain proposals to be embodied in a bill, the bill should be afterward abandoned. The admission of Ulster as a separate unity was, he admitted, a great advance toward a settlement. The North of Ireland was as different from the South as it was possible to imagine. He appealed to the Government to keep Ulster under the British Parliament, or at any rate to leave over the question of a separate Parliament for Ulster until the whole devolution problem came up for consideration. Why put Ulster under a separate Parliament which she had never demanded and did not want? It was not his object to turn down the Government proposals. When he saw the bill and received the necessary assurances he would go over to Ulster and take counsel with those with whom he acted. He thought they might take it for granted that Sinn Fein would have nothing to do with the bill. If afterward the Sinn Feiners captured the Irish Parliament, was it not likely that the first thing they would do would be to proclaim a republic in Ireland for the whole of Ireland? Being in the position of a Government they would be able to resort to arms under a pretext, and was it not likely that they would immediately proceed to try and annex Ulster? Or the Sinn Fein Party might refuse to take any part in an Irish Parliament, and they might thus have no Parliament there to function. He maintained that it would be better to keep Northeast Ireland under the present Parliament. What his followers would determine he could not say, but he would advise them with full reason and the fullest courage.

Mr. A. Henderson said that in regard to this question more delay meant more danger. He thought Sir E. Carson was unnecessarily gloomy in some of his anticipations. He thought the Government scheme conflicted with sincere aspirations of the great majority of the Irish people for self-government. At best it could only be regarded as a half-hearted, unsatisfying compromise. The Government might have produced a scheme of what was usually described as Dominion Home Rule, minus the army and navy, but giving to the respective counties what was known as a county option. Another course which he would have preferred to see followed was to see an Irish Parliament summoned under the late act, leaving that Parliament to work out its own constitution. The present proposals would be regarded in many parts of Ireland as a triumph for the dictatorship of the minority.

American Aftermath of the War

Progress in Readjusting Our Military and Economic Systems to a Peace Basis

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

THE end of American participation in the war, in a military sense, may be said to have been marked by the final withdrawal of the American Expeditionary Forces from French soil on Jan. 9, when Brig. Gen. Connor and about 300 officers and men left Paris for the United States. There remain, it is true, some thousands of American volunteers who are serving as an army of occupation on the Rhine, but neither in personnel nor in organization are these a part of the A. E. F. that made history in 1918.

The draft army that was raised so swiftly and trained so rapidly is a thing of the past, and the United States military establishment in its transition form is again a volunteer creation. In the last eight months of 1919 the regular army—according to figures made public in Washington on Jan. 6—obtained 159,843 recruits. Those enlisting for one year numbered 79,978 white and 5,981 colored, while the number enlisting for three years was 69,854 white and 4,030 colored.

The total enlisting for service in the infantry was 58,203, or only 36.4 per cent. of the total needed. In other branches the proportion was much lower.

Revised figures furnished by the War Department Dec. 29 show that the American flying forces abroad sustained 583 casualties during the war. The figures show the number of casualties among the aviators in each branch of the air service and also among American fliers serving with the allied armies. The figures include the killed and injured in flying accidents at the aerodromes in the zone of advance. The casualties were distributed as follows:

American Armies.	Number.	Per Cent.
Pursuit pilots	184	31
Observers	150	26
Observation pilots	105	18
Bombing pilots	48	8
Balloon fliers	4	1
Total with A. E. F.	491	84
With British	64	11
With French	25	4
With Italian	3	1
Total	583

Of the 583 casualties 36 per cent. consisted of deaths in combat, while 11 per cent. occurred at aerodromes. The record in this respect follows:

	Number.	Per Cent.
Killed in combat	208	36
Prisoners	145	25
Wounded in action	132	22
Killed in action	41	7
Missing in action	29	5
Injured in accident	25	4
Interned	3	1

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILLS

Sub-committees of the Senate and House Committees on Military Affairs have reached a decision on the tentative Army Reorganization bills to be placed before their respective committees. The chief point of difference between the legislation proposed by the two houses is that the Senate measure provides for universal military service, while the House bill rejects it.

The legislation agreed on by the Senate sub-committee has protection from outside attack as its primary purpose and provides for compulsory military training for youths from 18 to 21 years of age as a leading feature. In its tentative form the bill calls for a standing army of 280,000. A reserve or citizens' army is also provided, of which the National Guard would be a part. "While the bill will provide for compulsory military training," Senator Wadsworth said, "there will be no provision made for compulsory military service."

The House bill in tentative form provides for an army of not more than 318,000 officers and men, as against the 575,000 recommended by the War Department, and the War Department estimates will be cut to $600,000,000, a decrease of $382,800,000.

REMOVAL OF OUR DEAD

It was reported from Paris on Jan. 3 that the French Government had granted permission for the removal to the United States of the bodies of 20,000 American soldiers buried in France. It is understood that the policy of the American Government will be to remove only those bodies requested by relatives of the dead soldiers. These 20,000 bodies are scattered in 600 cemeteries, the two largest of which are at Brest, where there are about 5,500 graves of men who died of influenza at Brest and on transports. Other large cemeteries outside the army zone are at Bordeaux, Nantes, St. Nazaire, Tours, Le Mans, and other service of supply centres.

It will probably be a year before the removal of these bodies begins, as the plan is first to remove to the United States the bodies of about 1,000 American soldiers buried in Germany, about 200 of whom died in prison camps. The remainder died while serving with the Army of Occupation. There are 500 American graves in Coblenz alone.

Seventy-six Americans are buried in Italy, two in Holland and a few in Austria. The American dead in England will be removed before the work in the French cemeteries begins. Civil employes, many of them veterans of the war, will aid in the work. One company has already arrived in England, where metal caskets to receive the bodies are now being sent from the United States. The work there, it is expected, will probably be finished by next Fall, when a start will be made on the exhumations in Germany.

Negotiations between the French and American Governments over the removal of American dead from the big military cemetery at the front are continued, but it is thought probable, if this is agreed upon, that two years will elapse before the task is undertaken.

FRENCH PURCHASES OF ARMY GOODS

Brig. Gen. W. D. Connor, Chief of Staff of the American Department of Supply, stated on Jan. 4 that almost $800,000,000 had been realized from the sale of American army stock remaining in France after the departure of American troops for home. General Connor said he had estimated the value of the stocks at $1,700,000,000, and declared it would have cost $75,000,000 to take them back to America. The United States, therefore, received a little less than 50 cents on the dollar for the supplies that were sold.

The selling of army stocks was the best thing the American Government could do, the General declared. Had they been retailed in various countries great loss would have been entailed, as the expense would have been heavy. France paid $400,000,000 for stocks it took over, while other allies and smaller nations purchased supplies for $360,000,000. As an offset against the stocks bought by France, that country undertook to pay damage claims amounting to nearly 1,000,000 francs as a result of American operations in training areas. When the American army went to France it was agreed that farms and buildings used by it in training would be left in the same condition as found. Miles of trenches were dug and buildings were demolished, and American forces were rushed into Germany before the land could be restored to its former condition.

General Connor again emphatically refuted the old story that the French made the American army pay for the trenches it occupied in France. "The whole truth," he said, "is that the American army has not paid a cent for any ground used or for anything destroyed at the front."

WAR RISK INSURANCE

In a Washington report of the conference between delegates of the American Legion and officials of the War Risk Insurance Bureau regarding claims of disabled service men the statement was attributed to R. G. Cholmeley-Jones that "only 23,400 of the 324,900 claims for compensation for disability filed with the War Risk Bureau up to Dec. 15 had been settled definitely." Mr. Cholmeley-Jones, in correcting this statement, said: "As a matter of fact, up to Dec. 12, 1919, out of 327,275 compensation claims received 241,822 had been definitely settled, including awards and disallowances. There remain pending, all told, 85,453 cases."

The House bill increasing war risk insurance allowances of American soldiers, sailors, and marines disabled in the war was passed Dec. 19 by the Senate with amendments requested by the American Legion. The House was expected to accept the Senate amendments.

The measure known as the Sweet bill was passed by the Senate in less than five minutes and without a record vote. It provides for additional payments to war risk beneficiaries of about $80,000,000 annually, and the War Risk Insurance Bureau was authorized to make December payments on the increased basis. The bill also provides simplified administration of the war risk insurance plan and modifies requirements as to proof of disability.

THE NAVAL CONTROVERSY

A sharp division of opinion among navy men as to the conferring of decorations was revealed on Dec. 23 when a letter of Admiral W. S. Sims to Secretary Daniels was published in which the Admiral refused to accept a Distinguished Service Medal. He complained that his recommendations as commander of the fleet overseas were not followed, mentioning particularly the work of his staff.

Among other things the Admiral asserted that "the commanding officer of a vessel that is sunk by a submarine should not receive the same reward as the commanding officer of a vessel which sinks a submarine." This was apparently a reference to the action of Secretary Daniels in awarding a Distinguished Service Medal to Commander David W. Bagley, brother-in-law of Mr. Daniels, who was in command of the destroyer Jacob Jones when she was sunk by a German submarine.

Secretary Daniels gave out the Admiral's letter Dec. 23, together with a reply which was in the form of a letter to Senator Page, Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee. The Secretary's statement put the controversy in the form of the old navy dispute over the relative value of sea duty and shore duty. Secretary Daniels declared that first place had been given to men in sea duty and in contact with the enemy. In the case of ships sunk by submarines the commander got the higher award where his conduct was meritorious.

Captain Raymond Hasbrouck, commander of the Minnesota, confirmed the report that he had declined to accept the Navy Cross awarded him by the Navy Department. He said that he "thoroughly concurred" in the views of Admiral Sims. Captain Hasbrouck was in command of the transport Covington when she was sunk on July 1, 1918, returning to the United States after having landed troops in Europe. Six men lost their lives.

SECRETARY DANIELS'S STATEMENT

It became evident before the end of the Christmas holidays that Congress would take up the naval controversy and make a sweeping investigation not only of the awards, but of the whole policy of the department. Members of both of the naval committees were determined to conduct such an investigation. Secretary Daniels asserted on Dec. 24 that he welcomed any investigation that Congress might wish to make in the matter, and that he, as well as the records and officers of the navy, would be at the service of any Congressional investigating body. He expressed regret that the "glory of the achievements of the navy in the world war were being spoiled by petty rivalries of some officers over decorations."

Secretary Daniels stated that some 4,000 officers and men of the navy had been recommended by officers from Admiral down for D. S. M.'s or naval crosses. He stated that every recommendation that had been received, including those that had been submitted by Admiral Sims, had been submitted to the board of which Rear Admiral Austin M. Knight, former President of the Naval War College, now a retired officer, is Chairman. This board went over the records and made certain recommendations. The Knight board's recommendations were followed in some instances by Secretary Daniels and were rejected or modified in others. Mr. Daniels said that the net result of the recommendations of the board and the action of himself upon those recommendations was the decision so far to award naval crosses to about 1,400 officers and men and Distinguished Service Medals to about 120 officers.

ADMIRAL DECKER'S RECALL

Secretary Daniels announced on Dec. 31 that Rear Admiral Benton C. Decker, who declined a Navy Cross awarded him for services as Naval Attaché in Madrid during the war, was withdrawn from his post for insubordination to Joseph E. Willard, Ambassador to Spain. In declining the Naval Cross Rear Admiral Decker had declared in a letter to Secretary Daniels his belief that his services had had the effect of keeping Spain out of the war, and that a Naval Cross was not commensurate with the services he had rendered.

Rear Admiral Decker also said that he thought his services at Madrid were superior to those of any dreadnought commander or any officer of the navy who served on shore. Secretary Daniels took issue with this statement.

"I did not consider that Admiral Decker's services were greater than those of any dreadnought," said Mr. Daniels. "Nor do I think his services were superior to those of Admiral Benson or Admiral Sims, both of whom served on shore duty of a most important character during the war." He added that, while he had no doubt that Rear Admiral Decker had tried to serve his country at Madrid according to the dictates of his patriotism, it was his view that the officer made a mistake when he disagreed with Ambassador Willard.

ADMIRAL SIMS'S TESTIMONY

The whole naval controversy was taken up by Congress for investigation early in the new year. Admiral Sims, head of the Navy War College and formerly in command of the American naval forces in European waters, asserted on Jan. 16 before the Senate Naval Affairs Subcommittee that the morale of the navy had been "shot to pieces" because of "flagrant injustices" in conferring decorations on naval officers. The Admiral resented the action of Secretary Daniels and the Knight Board in revising recommendations as to decorations submitted by himself. Recommendations inserted by Secretary Daniels, including one for his brother-in-law, Commander David Worth Bagley, who lost the destroyer he commanded in a fight with a submarine, had been greeted with ridicule throughout the navy, Admiral Sims asserted.

"When such recommendations were made regardless of my explanations that they would injure the morale of the service, and when a man of my forty-five years' experience and association with naval officers states that will be the effect, you can imagine why the morale of the navy has been shot to pieces, and why there is no navy left," Admiral Sims said heatedly.

He contended that the officers immediately in command should make recommendations for awards. They alone were in a position to appreciate fully the relative merits of heroic actions, he insisted.

As these pages were going to press the naval investigation was widening into more sensational aspects, which will be recorded in the March CURRENT HISTORY.

TRIBUTE TO OUR SAILORS

"A sum of £6,000," Secretary Daniels announced on Jan. 6, "has been allocated to the American people from the fund recently raised by popular subscription in Great Britain to perpetuate the memory of the Dover patrol and the part it played in safeguarding the English Channel during the war. Acceptance of the generous offer by the Navy Department has been forwarded through the State Department."

The memorial will take the form of a large monolith, erected near the entrance of New York Harbor in plain view of incoming and outgoing vessels.

"The offer was made to the American Ambassador to Great Britain," Secretary Daniels's statement continued. "A committee, headed by the Lord Mayor of Dover, called on him and made a formal tender of the sum with no restriction as to the use to be made of it. The memorial there to the Dover patrol will take the form of monuments erected at Dover and Calais, respectively, as a tribute to the English and French forces.

"The work of this famous patrol was the chief factor in making the Channel the graveyard of so many U-boats and in keeping the stream of troops and supplies moving from England to France. The important part played by the American forces in this was the work of the naval air force, which from Dunkirk and Killingholme did its share of the patrol work in all sorts of weather, hourly on the lookout for the elusive submarines."

NAVAL RECOMMENDATIONS

recommended to the House Naval Committee on Jan. 15 a naval force of 638 ships as compared to 231 in 1916. Appropriations for 1921 were estimated at $573,000,000, as compared with $613,000,000 in 1920.

The navy still has 261 vessels to sell, Admiral Koontz said, mostly submarine chasers, but including several pre-dreadnought battleships, old cruisers, gunboats and monitors, in order to get down to the strength estimated to be necessary. A general "housecleaning" of ships of doubtful military value is in progress, he added, the force to be retained including 17 dreadnoughts, 13 pre-dreadnoughts, 8 armored cruisers, 18 cruisers, 14 gunboats, 299 destroyers, 141 submarines, 11 destroyers' tenders, 55 Eagle boats, 36 minesweepers, 2 minelayers, 5 submarine tenders, 4 hospital ships, 3 fleet repair ships and a number of auxiliary vessels.

To keep this force at sea or ready to go, with only 65 per cent. complements, would require 91,000 men, Admiral Koontz said. Great efforts are now required to keep going on less than half complements for all ships, he added.

"There are ships that on paper are part of the Pacific fleet that are still on the Atlantic coast because we simply cannot get men enough to send them to sea," Admiral Koontz said, adding that the navy was unable to bid against the Shipping Board and private companies.

American Chair in British Universities

THE principal educational proposal of the British program for the tercentenary celebration of the Mayflower and Pilgrim Fathers, in response to an appeal of the Anglo-American Society, was the foundation and endowment on a basis of $100,000 of a chair in American history, literature, and institutions in order to promote such studies in all the British universities.

This endowment was offered by Sir George Watson on Dec. 5 and will be named for the donor, despite the latter's suggestion that it should bear the name of the Prince of Wales. In a letter conveying the offer to the Duke of Connaught as President of the Anglo-American Society Sir George Watson characterized the foundation as a permanent memorial of America's loyal partnership with the British Empire during the war, of historic ties, and of a mutual effort to overcome prejudice. Especially from this last viewpoint the Prince of Wales wrote to Sir George Watson highly commending this foundation and saying that his visit to America had assured him that there existed a common underlying sentiment in all parts of the English-speaking world. Misunderstandings were due mainly to false impressions, he declared, which the foundation projected would contribute greatly to dispel.

Constitutional Prohibition

Advent of the Permanent Ban on Alcoholic Drinks Under the Eighteenth Amendment—Attempts to Fight It

NATIONAL prohibition by constitutional amendment became effective at midnight Jan. 16, 1920, throughout the United States. The Department of Justice and the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the two Government agencies intrusted with the enforcement of the law, were fully prepared to compel the rigid enforcement of the all-embracing act.

The inauguration of the new law, as embodied in the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution and in the Volstead act providing for its enforcement, was not attended by any of the dire consequences that had been predicted. The various steps that had been taken by the Federal and State authorities to enforce wartime prohibition had measurably prepared the way for the more drastic constitutional amendment, and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court on various phases of the legislation were uniformly so favorable to the constitutionality of the act that the public was prepared for acquiescence, and the new regulations went into effect throughout the nation without a hitch. Everywhere reports indicated that the Federal agents were alert for any violation, and, on the whole, the law was very closely observed.

The United States Supreme Court on Jan. 5 upheld as constitutional the wartime prohibition law, which defines beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent. or more of alcohol as intoxicating; the Court at the same time refused to vacate an injunction which forbade the manufacture of 2.75 per cent. beer. While the opinion of the Supreme Court did not specifically touch upon the constitutional prohibition amendment, it was regarded by competent legal authorities as indicating a favorable attitude of the court on the validity of the amendment.

Justice Brandeis read the majority opinion, which was concurred in by Justices White, Pitney, McKenna and Holmes. The minority report was read by Justice McReynolds, and was concurred in by Justices Day, Van Deventer and Clarke. Justice Brandeis, in handing down the majority opinion, said:

The right of Congress to suppress the liquor traffic is not an implied power, but one specifically granted. That power has not ended through the cessation of hostilities.

On the other hand Justice McReynolds declared that as the Eighteenth Amendment, which carried out constitutional prohibition, had not become effective, Congress had no general power to prohibit the manufacture or sale of liquor.

The Supreme Court on Jan. 12 again indicated its attitude when it denied, for lack of jurisdiction, motions filed on behalf of the Retail Liquor Dealers' Association of New Jersey seeking permission to institute an original suit to determine the constitutionality of the prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution.

The order denying permission to bring the New Jersey suit was made orally by Chief Justice White, who held that the motion to file the case "rested upon a plain disregard of two principles of jurisdiction that have been settled from the beginning." One, he said, was that a citizen of a State could not bring a suit against the State without its consent, while the other was that the Federal Constitution does not create jurisdiction but only apportions it, and accordingly under the Constitution the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction in such a case as that from New Jersey.

The same question in another form came before the Supreme Court in a petition filed by the Attorney General of Rhode Island in behalf of that State. The Attorney General, in attacking the constitutionality of the act, questioned the validity of its ratification as well as of the passage of the resolution by Congress, and asserted that the amendment was an interference with State police powers and was "usurpatory, unconstitutional, and void."

In a brief filed with the court the Rhode Island Attorney General further argued that enforcement of national prohibition would affect injuriously the rights of Rhode Island, and that because the defendants named in the case are outside the boundaries of that State the Supreme Court was the proper tribunal in which to bring the suit.

On Jan. 18 the Supreme Court decided to permit Rhode Island to bring this suit, and to pass upon the validity of both the prohibition amendment and the enforcement act.

The constitutionality of the measure was attacked in suits filed in various other States, and the Supreme Court will have before it the clear issue whether the amendment was legally adopted and whether the use of the word "concurrent" in the amendment, referring to its enforcement by State as well as Federal authorities, implied that each State could fix its own provisions as to what should constitute an intoxicating beverage, and how the law should be enforced. Governor Smith of New York, in his message to the Legislature, recommended that the legislative approval of the amendment by the State of New York be withdrawn; the Governor-elect of New Jersey took a similar position and indicated that he would favor separate State action as to what constituted an intoxicating beverage. The Anti-Saloon League announced that all these efforts would prove fruitless, and that the law was on the statute books to remain and would be rigidly enforced.

Some excitement was produced during the holiday season by a number of deaths throughout the country, chiefly in sections of Connecticut, from drinking wood alcohol, which had been sold surreptitiously as whisky. The source of the supply which caused fifty or more deaths in Connecticut was traced, and those responsible for the traffic were arrested on the charge of homicide.

Sunday, Jan. 18, was designated as "Law and Order" Sunday, which the Federal Government through the Internal Revenue Commissioner asked the clergy of America to participate in. In his proclamation, issued Jan. 1, 1920, Daniel C. Roper, the Commissioner, called upon the people of America to observe the National Prohibition act. He said:

Whether prohibition is a wise national policy is no longer a question for debate or contention among good citizens. This step on the part of our people has been incorporated as an integral part of the Constitution of our country, and all law-abiding citizens will demand its observance. * * *

It is not for the success of the Bureau of Internal Revenue that we appeal, but for the success of the American people in sustaining the majesty of the law and the honor of our American institutions. To this end we need for this law, and for all our laws, an aroused public conscience with respect to law observance and law enforcement.

I observe that it is being suggested that Sunday, Jan. 18, 1920, be set apart and designated as "Law and Order Sunday" throughout the country. I sincerely trust that this will be generally observed; that clergymen throughout the land will bring to the attention of their congregations the vital importance of law as the cornerstone of Americanism. Law and order has always found in the clergy its strongest champions. Their clear expression of right and their ringing challenge to the American spirit of our citizenship was never more urgently needed than it is at the present time.

An address was issued Jan. 17, signed by 1,000 pastors of more than twenty-five denominations from every one of the fifty-seven counties of New York State, urging the public to aid in the observance of "Law and Order Sunday" and to push enrollment in the "Allied Citizens of America, a Statewide system of local organization as a basis upon which all law-abiding citizens can unite to uphold the supremacy of law, particularly the Eighteenth Amend"ment to the Constitution of the United States."

The advent of national prohibition was observed in various ways throughout the country, according to the attitude of the celebrants. In many cities mass meetings and parades were held to celebrate; the anti-prohibitionists held mock funeral services and in other ways expressed their disapproval.

Just before the law went into effect millions of gallons of whisky were exported, but at the time of its execution there still remained in the country other millions of gallons in bonded warehouses, which, under the law, cannot now be exported, and can be sold only for medicinal purposes. Hundreds of barrels of liquor belated on the wharves of the Atlantic seaboard were seized by the Federal authorities the morning after the law had become effective.

Returning the Railway Lines

President's Proclamation Relinquishing Government Ownership—Contest Over Cummins and Esch Bills

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

PRESIDENT WILSON announced on Dec. 24 by proclamation that the railroads and express companies would be returned to private ownership on March 1, 1920. Accompanying his proclamation was the following statement by Joseph P. Tumulty, his private secretary:

Last May in his message to the Congress the President announced that the railroads would be handed over to their owners at the end of this calendar year. It is now necessary to act by issuing the proclamation. In the present circumstances, no agreement having yet been reached by the two houses of Congress in respect to legislation on the subject, it becomes necessary in the public interest to allow a reasonable time to elapse between the issuing of the proclamation and the date of its actually taking effect.

The President is advised that the railroad and express companies are not organized to make it possible for them to receive and manage their properties if actually turned over to them on Dec. 31, and if this were done it would raise financial and legal complications of a serious character. The railroad and express companies should be given ample opportunity to adequately prepare for the resumption of their business under the control and management of their own stockholders, Directors, and officers.

Therefore, the transfer of possession back to the railroad companies will become effective at 12:01 A. M., March 1, 1920.

TEXT OF PROCLAMATION

The President's proclamation was as follows:

WHEREAS, in the exercise of authority committed to me by law, I have heretofore, through the Secretary of War, taken possession of and have, through the Director General of Railroads, exercised control over certain railroads, systems of transportation and property appurtenant thereto or connected therewith; including systems of coastwise and inland transportation engaged in general transportation and owned or controlled by said railroads or systems of transportation; including also terminals, terminal companies and terminal associations, sleeping and parlors cars, private cars and private car lines, elevators, warehouses, telegraph and telephone lines, and all other equipment and appurtenances commonly used upon or operated as a part of such railroads and systems of transportation; and

WHEREAS, I now deem it needful and desirable that all railroads, systems of transportation and property now under such Federal control be relinquished therefrom;

NOW, THEREFORE, under authority of Section 14 of the Federal Control act approved March 21, 1918, and of all other powers and provisions of law there-to me enabling, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, do hereby relinquish from Federal control, effective the 1st day of March, 1920, at 12:01 o'clock A. M., all railroads, systems of transportation, and property, of whatever kind, taken or held under such Federal control and not heretofore relinquished and restore the same to the possession and control of their respective owners.

Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, or his successor in office, is hereby authorized and directed, through such agents and agencies as he may determine in any manner not inconsistent with the provisions of said act of March 21, 1918, to adjust, settle and close all matters, including the making of agreements for compensation, and all questions and disputes of whatsoever nature arising out of or incident to Federal control, until otherwise provided by proclamation of the President or by act of Congress; and generally to do and perform, as fully in all respects as the President is authorized to do, all and singular the acts and things necessary or proper, in order to carry into effect this proclamation and the relinquishment of said railroads, systems of transportation and property.

For the purposes of accounting and for all other purposes this proclamation shall become effective on the 1st day of March, 1920, at 12:01 A. M.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done by the President, through Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, in the District of Columbia, this twenty-fourth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-fourth.

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

ROBERT LANSING,

Secretary of State.

NEWTON D. BAKER,

Secretary of War.

CUMMINS AND ESCH BILLS

Meanwhile both houses of Congress had for some time been at work to frame the law under which the railroads are to operate under private ownership. The House of Representatives had passed a bill prepared by Congressman John J. Esch of Wisconsin, and on Dec. 20 the Senate passed the bill fathered by Senator Albert B. Cummins of Iowa, the vote standing 46 to 30. At the same time the Senate rejected by 65 to 11 a substitute bill offered by Senator La Follette which would have continued Government operation of the railroads for two years in accordance with organized labor's demands. The Cummins bill contains a provision, strongly opposed by labor, forbidding all strikes of railway employees.

Both bills were referred to a joint committee, whose difficult task it is to reconcile the wide differences between the two measures and to fuse them into one organic law that can meet the approval of the majority of Congress and of the people. The differences are fundamental, involving many bitterly contested points, and well-informed Senators expressed the opinion that final enactment of the law could not reasonably be expected for many weeks to come.

By Jan. 7 the conferees had agreed upon $300,000,000 as the amount of the revolving fund on which the carriers would be allowed to borrow during the period immediately following the return of the roads to private ownership. The Cummins bill had fixed the amount at $500,000,000 and the Esch bill at $250,000,000. The most knotty problems still faced the committee—the guarantee regarding dividends, the control of rate making, and the labor section, with its anti-strike provision.

The Senate and House bills are alike in prescribing exclusive Federal regulation of capital issues and expenditures, and in establishing Federal regulation of intrastate rates affecting interstate commerce.

Among major differences are the creation of a transportation board and a new statutory rule of rate making, to guarantee fixed dividends, both proposed only in the Senate plan.

The transportation board, under the Senate bill, would determine the country's transportation needs with the Interstate Commerce Commission being directed to grant rates sufficient to meet these demands. The House bill, while directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep informed on the transportation needs, facilities, and services, would greatly extend the commission's authority and not make it subject to order from another Government body.

The Senate's rule of rate making, guaranteeing 6 per cent. return to the carriers, was rejected by the House, which proposed the present rule that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix "fair and reasonable" rates.

Regarding labor, the drastic anti-strike provision in the Senate bill is opposed by the House provision for voluntary mediation. The House bill sets up three boards of adjustment during Federal control, with the addition of three appeal boards to consider cases in event of failure of the adjustment boards. On all these boards employees and rail owners would have equal representation, with decisions to be made by majority vote, and without any machinery or law for compelling acceptance of rulings.

With respect to consolidation and competition, the two measures differ in detail, but with some agreement in general principle. The House bill permits consolidation or merger by purchase, lease, stock control of two or more carriers, or the pooling of their earnings and facilities to such an extent as the Interstate Commerce Commission shall determine to be in the public interest. Federal incorporation is required by the Senate, but not by the House measure. The Senate also provided that twenty to thirty-five competing systems shall be planned by the Transportation Board, and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, such consolidation to be voluntary within seven years, and compulsory thereafter.

Important provisions, included in both bills, are designed to give adequate revenues and capital to the carriers with their renewed private operation. Rates established during Government control are continued until changed under authority of existing law by both bills, which also direct the carriers to apply for rate increases within sixty days after the return of the roads to their owners.

THE ANTI-STRIKE CLAUSE

The provision of the Cummins bill forbidding railway labor unions to strike has caused a sharply defined issue between organized labor, on the one hand, and the farmers and general public on the other. Representatives of the four railroad brotherhoods and heads of affiliated trades adopted on Dec. 29 a resolution opposing legislation which would make strikes of railroad workers unlawful. At the conclusion of a five-hour session President Gompers dictated this statement:

On Friday last a number of the representatives of the railroad organizations, both shopmen and the train service, met at my office. We discussed the situation regarding the railroad legislation, and I issued an invitation to the executives of the ten shopmen's organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and to the four railroad brotherhoods, asking them to meet in conference with me here today. We began our meeting at 3 o'clock and adjourned after 8. The entire time was taken up with a discussion of the parliamentary situation of the railroad bills. We reached these conclusions:

That it is the sense of the conference that the control of the railroads should be exercised by the Government of the United States for a period of not less than two years, in order that a proper test may be made as to Government control.

That such test has not been given a fair opportunity during wartime or since.

That this conference is opposed to legislation making strikes of workers unlawful. It is the sense of this conference that penalty clauses in pending legislation on railroads against workers ceasing their employment should be eliminated.

That the conference favors the enactment of beneficial features of the bills which tend to establish better relations between the employes and the carriers.

That the beneficial clauses should be extended to the sleeping car and Pullman Company employes.

While there were many animated speeches and general discussion of the Cummins Railroad bill, with its drastic anti-strike provision, it was said that the railway men were of one mind in opposing the section making strikes illegal. Before and after the conference, however, the union representatives, discussing informally the railroad situation, said they had assurances that the House would not accept the labor section of the Cummins bill.

On the other hand, the organized farmers of the country have expressed themselves in favor of the anti-strike clause. Their attitude, as expressed through a referendum vote on the subject, was thus stated on Jan. 7 by S. J. Lowell, Master of the National Grange:

We have taken a referendum of the thirty-three State masters, and so far as replies have been received, they are unanimously in favor of retaining the anti-strike provision. The Cummins bill protects the public's right to say to any organization of individuals created or permitted under the laws that such organizations shall not deliberately create conditions so one class has a strangle hold on the rest of the public and then proceed to use that strangle hold under the guise of individual liberty.

HINES ADVOCATES MERGERS

In an address before the Bar Association of New York City, Jan. 7, Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, advocated compulsory consolidation of railroad systems. Pointing out what he termed the almost impossible situation of the railroads prior to Federal control, owing to the difficulty of financing the lines, Mr. Hines declared that past experience had demonstrated that the old system will not succeed. He advocated the establishment by Congress of a general standard of rates to allow earnings "clearly in excess of a reasonable return" which must go largely to providing adequate reserves to take care of lean years and to provide adequate stimulus for efficiency.

It was a grave mistake, Mr. Hines said, to assume that capital alone could manage the situation. He continued:

The scheme of the past has been on that false theory, and the result has been that the public has injected itself into the management through all sorts of agencies and labor has injected itself into the management through its own organizations. We have all three elements participating in the management in all sorts of ways, and yet there is no common ground on which these three elements can meet and exchange views and endeavor to reach conclusions. I believe the only sort of management which can be permanently effective is one which provides for an orderly participation at the outset of all three of these interests instead of the past scheme which leaves each interest to pursue its own methods, irrespective of the others, until an eventual contract is established in some form of controversy.

Mr. Hines said it was impossible for these consolidations to come about gradually by voluntary action.

RAILROAD DEFICIT

The Government deficit from railroad operation in November was approximately $64,500,000, the largest of the year, according to figures compiled and made public Jan. 2 by the Bureau of Railway Economics. Net operating income for the month was estimated to have fallen below $20,000,000, which the Bureau of Economics declared to be the lowest in thirty years when computed on a basis of percentage of investment.

Gross revenues for the month were estimated at close to $436,000,000. This was only slightly below the high mark of a year ago, but the heavy expenses, due in part to the coal strike, which also reduced the revenues, left as net little of the operating revenues.

The Government's net loss, the bureau estimated, on the basis of Interstate Commerce Commission figures, had reached $548,000,000 in the twenty-three months of railroad operation. The bureau placed the loss for the eleven months of 1919 at more than $331,000,000.

The Coal Strike Commission at Work

Its Personnel and Its Task

THE strike in the bituminous coal industry was ended Dec. 10, 1919, by acceptance of President Wilson's plan granting 14 per cent. immediate increase of wages to the miners and promising the appointment of a special commission to adjust other points in the dispute after the men had gone to work. President Wilson announced the personnel of this commission on Dec. 22, naming as its members Henry M. Robinson of Pasadena, Cal.; John P. White, former President of the United Mine Workers of America, and Rembrandt Peale, an independent coal operator. All three men had held positions in the Government service during the war.

It was the task of this commission to determine whether the miners' wages should be still further increased, and, if so, whether the price of coal should go higher. The mine operators at once showed some distrust of the commission by challenging President Wilson's public statement that they had "agreed to and adopted" the plan of settlement now being carried out. The miners, on the other hand, expressed satisfaction that Mr. White, representing the workers, and Mr. Peale, representing the operators, both were thoroughly acquainted with the coal mining situation.

The first meeting of the commission was held in Washington in the Cabinet room of the executive offices on Dec. 29. With the three members there were also Secretary of Labor Wilson and Joseph P. Tumulty, Secretary to the President. By that time the operators had decided to co-operate with the commission to the extent of furnishing statistical information covering every bituminous mine field in the country when called for. The mine workers held a convention at Columbus on Jan. 6, where the attitude of the unions was finally determined in favor of full and final acceptance of the agreement which their leaders had made with President Wilson. A motion to defeat the acceptance of the international officers' action was submitted to a referendum vote of the convention on the 7th and the settlement was supported by the overwhelming vote of 1,634 to 221. Acting President Lewis pointed out that throughout the forty days' strike not a single life had been lost.

Meanwhile the commission continued its preliminary sessions at Washington, and on Jan. 10 chose Henry M. Robinson, representative of the public, as Chairman. At this meeting T. T. Brewster, one of the chief mine operators, appeared and presented a list of ten questions concerning wages, working conditions and coal prices, to which he requested answers before being pressed for a decision as to the operators' future course. Answers were promised to him. John L. Lewis, for the mine workers, announced that the unions were prepared to accept the decisions of the commission without reservation.

The formal sessions of the commission began on Jan. 12, and from that time forth a flood of argument and fact on both sides began to be poured out in the commission's permanent headquarters, which had been established in the building formerly occupied by the Fuel Administration. On the 13th the operators of the Central Competitive Field agreed to accept the commission's verdict in all particulars except one—they could not be bound by a decision that would fix prices beyond the life of the Lever law, they said, as this would be illegal. Six spokesmen for the mine workers appeared on the 14th, one of them, Frank Farrington of the Illinois Miners' Union, contending that living costs in Illinois mining centres had advanced from 110 to 178 per cent. since 1914, whereas miners' wages had increased only from $700 in 1913 to $1,390 in 1918. In the light of these figures he said the miners' claim of a 60 per cent. increase was justified. The operators had another inning on the 15th, and the work of the commission was fairly under way when these pages went to press.

Secretary McKinney of the Southern Ohio Coal Exchange estimated that the coal strike had cost the country a total of $126,000,000, of which $60,000,000 was loss in miners' wages, $40,000,000 loss to the railroads, and $26,000,000 loss to the operators. He added that the production of coal had already been 40,000,000 tons short of normal before the strike began, and that on account of the strike the Ohio mines alone lost production to the extent of 7,500,000 tons. The coal loss for the entire country he put at 1,000,000 tons daily.

An echo of the conflict thus being adjusted by peaceful methods was heard in Indianapolis on Dec. 22 when United States Judge A. B. Anderson committed Alexander Howat, President of the Kansas district of the United Mine Workers of America, to prison for contempt in having "openly and defiantly disobeyed the law" in violation of a court injunction against furtherance of the general strike. Judge Anderson refused to continue Howat's bond in the form of a $10,000 check on a Kansas bank, and sent him to jail. In the afternoon of the following day the Judge agreed to accept Howat's promise to use all his influence to get the men back to work, and set him at liberty on his former bond. The incident was terminated by the Kansas mine workers' officials ordering strikers protesting against the imprisonment of their President to resume work on Dec. 24.

A Federal court order of importance issued by Judge John M. Killits at Toledo, Ohio, on Dec. 27, granted a permanent injunction preventing the pickets of labor unions from interfering with workers in the Willys-Overland Automobile Company. Judge Killits declared that striking workers who had remained off the payroll since the labor disturbances of last June could no longer be classed as employees. He also ruled that the court could not recognize the rights of individuals to prolong a labor controversy "after its substance had fled." At the time of making the injunction permanent 13,566 persons were at work in the plant.

The strike in the steel mills, which had begun on Sept. 22, and which had at first involved 367,000 men, but had completely failed within a month, was officially called off by the National Committee of the Steel Workers' Union in a session held at Pittsburgh on Jan. 8. At the same time the committee accepted the resignation of Secretary-Treasurer William Z. Foster, who had been a leading promoter and storm centre of the strike, to take place Feb. 1.

The Second Industrial Conference

Its Plan for Reducing Strikes

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

PRESIDENT WILSON'S second industrial conference, which has been in session at intervals in Washington since Dec. 1, and whose personnel was given in last month's CURRENT HISTORY, made an important statement on Dec. 28, setting forth a tentative plan for the settlement of labor disputes. It proposed the creation of new Federal machinery for the adjustment of differences between employers and employees.

The plan provided, in brief, for the establishment of a National Industrial Tribunal and Regional Boards of Inquiry and Adjustment. The National Industrial Tribunal would consist of nine members, to be appointed by the President, but confirmed by the Senate, with headquarters in Washington, and it would be generally an appellate tribunal. The United States would be divided into industrial regions, probably twelve, with boundaries similar to those of the Federal Reserve districts, and there would be a Regional Board of Inquiry and Adjustment set up in each district.

Besides submitting this plan for what it described as "new machinery of democratic representation to suit the conditions of present industry," the conference made a declaration of its views as to Government employes. In this part of the statement—less than 300 words—the conference took a firm stand against "police strikes" and the affiliation of Government public safety employes with any organization that uses the strike as a weapon.

"No interference by any group of Government employes, or others, with the continuous operation of Government functions through concerted cessation of work, or threats," declared the commission, "can be permitted."

The conference members thought that Government employes should have the right to associate for mutual protection, the advancement of their interests, or the presentation of grievances, but declared that "no such employes who are connected with the administration of justice or the maintenance of public safety or public order should be permitted to join or retain membership in any organization which authorizes the use of the strike, or which is affiliated with any organization which authorizes the strike." The conference reserved judgment on the question whether other classes of Government employes might affiliate with organizations that authorize the use of the strike.

The statement was signed by William B. Wilson, Secretary of the Department of Labor, as Chairman of the conference; Herbert Hoover, former Federal Food Administrator, as Vice Chairman; Martin H. Glynn, Thomas W. Gregory, former Attorney General; Richard Hooker, Stanley King, Samuel W. McCall, former Governor of Massachusetts; Henry M. Robinson, Julius Rosenwald, Oscar S. Straus, Henry C. Stuart, former Governor of Virginia; F. W. Taussig, William O. Thompson, Henry J. Waters, George W. Wickersham, former Attorney General, and Owen D. Young.

This conference was called by President Wilson after the failure of the original National Industrial Conference, which met under the Chairmanship of Secretary Lane, last October. It is a smaller and more compact body, and contains no distinctively labor union delegates. Its plan for the creation of new machinery for dealing with industrial disputes was advanced for consideration, study and constructive criticism by interested individuals and organizations throughout the country.

The conference pointed out that its plan did not propose to do away with the ultimate right to strike, to discharge, or to maintain the closed or the open shop. "It is designed," the statement continued, "to bring about a frank meeting of the interested parties and cool and calm consideration of the questions involved, in association with other persons familiar with the industry. The plan is national in scope and operation, yet it is decentralized. It is different from anything in operation elsewhere. It is based upon American experience and is designed to meet American conditions. To facilitate discussion, the plan submitted, while entirely tentative, is expressed in positive form and made definite as to most details."

When the Industrial Conference published its plan, Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, said its failure to recognize definitely the organizations of workers—trade unions—as the basis for representation was a fatal omission, while Frank Morrison, Secretary of the federation, noting the absence of reference by the conference to collective bargaining or the necessity for organizations of workers, said any one who would avert or postpone industrial conflicts could not ignore these principles.

Mr. Gompers declared the commission should reconsider the question of definite recognition of trade unions, "in order to make possible the confidence and co-operation of wage earners, which can be expressed only through organizations of their own making." He added:

Any plan to establish or maintain anything like fair relations between workers and employers must avoid compulsory features. The mass of America's workers are American citizens, and in that sovereign citizenship they are free men. Any proposal for compulsory labor is repugnant to American sovereignty and citizenship.

In order to promote constructive and permanent changes that will eliminate causes of much industrial unrest, the conference should consider governmental agencies to provide the necessary information and assistance in securing continuous betterment of working conditions.

That problem must ultimately be worked out by employers and employees, but the Government should advise and assist.

It should always be borne in mind that our social fabric is based on mutuality and voluntary institutions. It is something not yet fully understood how perfectly safe freedom is.

The conference reassembled on Jan. 12 to consider any constructive criticism that had been submitted to it.

Fighting the High Cost of Living

Dissolution of Packers' Trust

A STATEMENT made public Dec. 28 by the National Industrial Conference Board showed that the cost of living in the United States had advanced more than 80 per cent. since July, 1914, and 5.8 per cent. since July, 1919. The figures were based on the study of family budgets reported by the United States Bureau of Labor statistics, supplemented by reports of clothing and food dealers, civic organizations, real estate agents, and public utility corporations.

Clothing has increased most in price since July, 1914, the percentage being 135, according to the board's figures. Food comes next with an advance of 92 per cent., fuel, heat and light next with 48 per cent., and rent 38 per cent.

Food had advanced only 1 per cent. in price during the last five months, the board reported, while clothing prices again led the van with an increase of 15 per cent. Rent advanced 7.8 per cent., and fuel, heat and light 4 per cent. Items listed generally as sundries advanced 75 per cent. during the five-year period, and 7 per cent. since last July. Sundries include carfare, candy, and soda, amusements, insurance, and household furnishings. Movie admissions advanced more than 100 per cent. in price. It also costs nearly double to furnish a house.

THE PACKERS' AGREEMENT

Among the month's activities to combat high prices must be included—theoretically at least—the voluntary surrender of the Chicago packers to the Government's anti-trust pressure. Attorney General Palmer announced Dec. 18 that the "Big Five"—Armour & Co., Swift & Co., Morris & Co., Wilson & Co., and the Cudahy Packing Company—had agreed to retire from all business except that of meat packing and dairy products.

Under their agreement with the Department of Justice, the packers and their subsidiaries will sell all their holdings in public stock yards, stock yard railroads and terminals, and their interests in market newspapers and public cold storage warehouses, and will forever dissociate themselves from the retail meat business and food lines unrelated to meat packing.

The proposed Government dissolution suit will not be pressed. Under agreement reached, it was stated, the so-called packing monopoly would practically end its activities, except as meat packers, by disposing of its holdings in other business, and thus avert the danger of a monopoly in foodstuffs. The Department of Justice held that the decision was a complete victory for the Government and that the results would be more satisfactory than any it could hope to obtain by a long-drawn-out suit.

In accepting the agreement the packing companies consented to the entry of an injunction decree in the Federal District Court under which the terms of settlement are to be worked out. Two years are allowed for them to comply with the terms of the agreement.

Under the injunction decree the "Big Five" are compelled, as stated by Attorney General Palmer, to do the following things:

1. To sell, under supervision of the United States District Court, preferably to the live-stock producers and the public, all their holdings in public stock yards.

2. To sell, under the same supervision and in like manner, all their interest in stock yard railroads and terminals.

3. To sell, under the same supervision and in like manner, all their interests in market newspapers.

4. To dispose of all their interests in public cold storage warehouses, except as necessary for their own meat products.

5. To dissociate themselves forever from the retail meat business.

6. To dissociate themselves forever from all "unrelated lines," including wholesale groceries, fresh, canned, dried, or salt fish; fresh, dried or canned vegetables; fresh, crushed, dried, evaporated, or canned fruits; confectioneries, syrups, soda-water fountain supplies, &c., molasses, honey, jams, jellies, preserves, spices, sauces, relishes, &c., coffee, tea, chocolate, cocoa, nuts, flour, sugar, rice and cereals (with an exception to be noted), bread, wafers, crackers, biscuit, spangnetti, vermicelli, macaroni, cigars, china, furniture, &c.

7. To abandon forever the use of their branch houses, route cars and auto trucks, comprising their distribution system, for any other than their own meat and dairy products.

8. To submit perpetually to the jurisdiction of the United States District Court under an injunction forbidding all the defendants from directly or indirectly maintaining any combination or conspiracy with each other or any other person or persons, or monopolizing, or attempting to monopolize, any food product in the United States, or indulging in any unfair and unlawful practices.

"The decree further provides," says Mr. Palmer, "that jurisdiction is perpetually retained by the court for the purpose of taking such other action, or adding at the foot of the decree such other relief, if any, as may become necessary or appropriate for the carrying out and enforcement of the decree, or for the purpose of entertaining at any time hereafter any application which the parties may make with respect to this decree."

PLAN TO CUT LIVING COST

In an address to 400 city officials, heads of civic organizations and club-women of Illinois, Attorney General

Palmer at Chicago on Dec. 16 outlined the plan of his department to combat the high cost of living. A plea for the assistance of every man and woman in the country in a national fight against high prices was made by Mr. Palmer at the meeting, which was called by Governor Frank O. Lowden. Mr. Palmer laid down the following program, which, if carried out, he said, would do much to deal a deathblow to the high cost of living:

1. Organization of fair price committees in every city and county, backed by mayors and prosecuting attorneys, with the committees supporting United States District Attorneys.

2. Organization of women to refuse to buy anything but actual necessities until prices come down.

3. Holding of "conservation" and economy meetings in every community under the auspices of civic bodies.

4. Influence of mayors and prosecutors to be brought to bear on the warring elements to prevent factional disturbances in industry and particularly to bring about an industrial peace of at least six months' duration.

5. Remobilization of the Four-Minute Men to deliver "work and save" addresses in theatres each night.

On Dec. 16 it was stated in Washington that an army of 4,000,000 women representing ten national organizations had been enlisted by the savings division of the Treasury Department in a campaign to reduce expenditures.

Beginning Jan. 1 and extending to April 1, a great thrift campaign was to be conducted in an effort to induce women to keep strict accounts of their daily expenditures in order by study of them to eliminate unnecessary items. According to the plan, amounts saved by this means would be invested in Government securities.

Women's organizations which have been enlisted in the campaign include: The Association of College Alumnae, Daughters of the American Revolution, General Federation of Women's Clubs, National Catholic War Council, National Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, National Council of Jewish Women, National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, National League for Women's Service, Woman's Department of the National Civic Federation, and the Y. W. C. A.

CO-OPERATIVE SCHEME

Failing to obtain satisfactory relief from the high cost of living, officials of the four railway brotherhoods and the railroad shop crafts affiliated with the American Federation of Labor at a meeting in Chicago on Jan. 7 decided on a co-operative plan of buying and distribution, the main outlines of which were published Jan. 8. They announced the formation of a body to be known as the All-American Farmer-Labor Co-operative Commission. Warren S. Stone, Grand Chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and one of the organizers of the Chicago meeting, is General Treasurer of the Co-operative Commission, and other officials of the railway employes' organizations are officers.

Bert M. Jewell, Acting President of the railway employes' department of the Federation of Labor, declared that "an increase in pay will not solve the problem." He asserted that higher wages accompanied by a proportionate increase in prices result in a "vicious circle," which leaves the railroad man no better off after the increase in pay than he was with the smaller salary. The only way to deal with an economic situation was with economic factors.

An alliance of the farmers, the organized producers, on the one hand, with the laborers, or organized consumers, on the other, was the purpose of the Co-operative Commission, said Mr. Jewell, who is a member of the commission. It aims to "conduct a vigorous campaign for direct dealing between farm producers and city consumers, and, as soon as feasible, between city producers and farm consumers."

SUGAR CONTROL BILL

Announcement was made at the White House on Jan. 1 that President Wilson had signed the McNary Sugar Control bill on Dec. 31. The statement, which was issued by Secretary Tumulty, read:

The President has signed the Sugar Control bill. This bill confers discretion on the President in the matter of purchasing sugar from Cuba. It is doubtful whether it will be practicable or wise for the President to exercise the power conferred so far as the purchase and distribution of sugar are concerned. Some of the Cuban sugar has already been purchased, and there is no central control over sugar in Cuba, as there was last year, and it might therefore be impossible for the Government now to step in and purchase the sugar without increasing the price to the consumer. The bill, however, continues the licensing power also, and this power may be used to assist in controlling profiteering among distributors. Much Cuban sugar is coming in now, and the indications are that prices have reached their peak and that there will be a tendency for prices to fall in the next few weeks.

Under the new law the Sugar Equalization Board is continued in power for a year.

Deportation of Alien Anarchists

Shipload Sent to Soviet Russia

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 19, 1920]

IN the course of an unprecedented campaign against Red agitators in the United States, the Washington authorities conducted raids in many parts of the country and arrested thousands of anarchistic plotters. A large number of these were railroaded to New York and interned at Ellis Island to await trial and deportation. A first shipload of such agitators, including the anarchist Emma Goldman, and her associate Berkman, was deported back to Soviet Russia via Germany and Finland on the Buford, the so-called Soviet "ark."

On Dec. 18 some twenty-seven members of the Industrial Workers of the World had been convicted by a Federal Jury at Kansas City on four counts, three under the war program, including obstruction of recruiting and the draft, and a fourth under the law forbidding curtailment of food production. Sentences given were from three to nine years' imprisonment, with fines ranging from $3,000 to $10,000. On the same date a train arrived at Jersey City bearing sixty-one prisoners for deportation who had been arrested in San Francisco, Seattle, Chicago, and St. Louis. Drastic amendments to the immigration law were adopted in the House on Dec. 20, providing for the deportation or exclusion of all aliens who belonged to anarchistic classes, for control of the foreign language press, and for an extensive investigation of Russian Soviet propaganda in the United States. Meanwhile the Department of Justice, under Attorney General Palmer, organized a wide campaign against the agitators, issuing special instructions to govern the conduct of the extensive raids on radicals undertaken.

One unit of the radical, anti-Government press, The Call of New York, made an appeal against the Postmaster General's order of Nov. 13, 1917, excluding that paper from the mails. The Postmaster's reply, filed on Dec. 22, asked that The Call's case be dismissed on the ground that it published matter favoring world revolt and the overthrow of the United States Government and tending to incite "arson, murder, or assassination." A large number of excerpts proving the Postmaster's charges accompanied his reply.

THE SOVIET "ARK"

In the last week of December occurred the deportation of 249 alien residents of the United States who had been found guilty of revolutionary agitation against the Government. All were former citizens of Russia who had been arrested following a number of Federal raids on well known radical centres. On the eve of their deportation back to Russia the State Department cabled to all foreign capitals an explanation of this step, in which the men involved were defined as "undesirable," a "menace to law and order" and "opposers of government, decency, and justice." While enjoying the protection of the United States, this statement said, these men had acted in a most obnoxious manner, and plotted the overthrow of the Government whose benefits they enjoyed.

Two of those deported, the notorious Emma Goldman and her associate Berkman, used every legal means to resist the decree of deportation, but met with failure.

On Dec. 22 the former troop transport chosen for the deportation, the Buford, which the newspapers dubbed "The Soviet Ark," sailed from New York at dawn with the 249 agitators on board, destination unknown, but supposed to be Finland. A guard of marines went with them, and revolvers had been given to 125 men of the crew, in case of trouble arising during the trip. The deported persons were not allowed to bid their relatives farewell, and riotous scenes occurred among the latter when they were informed of this decision as the Buford was about to sail. The ark carried a great quantity of baggage and a quarter of a million dollars in cash belonging to those deported. Some seemed happy on leaving; others threatened and cursed. A radio on Dec. 26 reported that the ark was heading toward the Azores, and that all was well. On Jan. 8 the Buford had reached the entrance to the Kiel Canal.

"ARK" REACHES FINLAND

The Buford left Kiel late on Jan. 13 for Finland, with which country the United States Government had made arrangements for transportation to the Russian frontier. The ship arrived at Hangö, Finland, on Jan. 17, after a perilous passage through former mine areas, and in the afternoon of that day the undersirables were disembarked, and marched to the special train which would carry them back to Russia.

When the passengers landed they were the object of many curious gazers. Emma Goldman, in conversing with a reporter, denounced the deportation as "unfair and stupid," declaring that the anarchist or Bolshevist idea could not be killed by such methods. She declared that she and Alexander Berkman would not remain in Soviet Russia, but would return to America "to save it." The train that took the agitators from Hangö reached Viborg the following day, where it was sidetracked to await the British prisoners' relief train. In anticipation of their arrival, which had been announced by the Finnish Government, the Soviet military forces ceased all shooting on the front for twenty-four hours. The train was taken to Terijoki (about two miles from the Soviet frontier) under Finnish military guards and American marines.

In the afternoon of Jan. 19 the deportees entered Soviet Russia and were received by a delegation which included the wife of Maxim Gorky. Laden with suitcases and boxes they trudged through the deep snow, laughing and singing revolutionary songs as they neared the border. Cheers were raised by the Russians, waiting for them on the other side of the frozen Systerbak River, which separates the Finnish and Bolshevik lines. Willing hands helped them to scramble up the steep banks, and amid the ruins of the war-wrecked town of Blelo-Ostrov, overlooking the stream, the Bolsheviks gave the exiles a vociferous greeting. The nature of their reception by the Soviet Government was still uncertain.

LEGISLATURE EXPELS SOCIALISTS

Another event in the campaign against persons of anti-governmental tendencies was the exclusion of five Socialist members, duly elected, from the New York State Legislature. Lined up before Speaker Sweet at the opening session of Jan. 7, they were severely arraigned for their adherence to a party whose platform was inimical to the State and to the country alike, and then excluded pending an investigation by the Assembly Judiciary Committee on their qualifications for membership. The excluded men were Samuel A. Dewitt, Samuel Orr, Charles Solomon, Louis Waldman, and August Claessens. This action of the House, which created a sensation, was taken under a resolution introduced by Majority Leader Simon L. Adler and adopted by a vote of 140 to 6. In the preamble to the resolution introduced was included the fact that the Socialist Party had taken a stand in direct opposition to the war, even after the United States had become a belligerent.

The unseated Socialists at once issued a joint protest and found many defenders, including Governor Smith, Justice Hughes, and others not in sympathy with the cause which they represented, but disapproving of the method by which their exclusion had been effected. Many articles in the press voiced disapproval of the method of exclusion. The Socialist organization in New York City at once formulated plans for the defense and reinstatement of the excluded members, including an appeal for aid to the labor unions. Charges made by the unseated Socialists that in the anti-radical campaign of the Lusk Investigation Committee, Soviet papers revealing trade secrets had been transmitted to the British Secret Service were denied categorically by Senator Lusk in person. Subsequently the barred Socialists reiterated these charges. The Young Republican Club and twelve churches on Jan. 12 denounced the action of the State Assembly, and the commotion grew. Speaker Sweet, meanwhile, in his reply to the letter of Justice Hughes criticising the Legislature's action, again condemned the attitude of the Socialist Party and promised the disbarred Socialists a "square deal."

ANTI-RED DRIVE CONTINUES

Meanwhile the Government's campaign against all Red agitators continues. Some 200 Reds were taken in Chicago on Jan. 1, and the authorities of this city declared their intention to wipe out all sedition in their boundary. Raids from coast to coast were published on the day following. Wholesale arrests had been made in thirty-three cities throughout the country; the total number of arrests reached nearly 2,000. Thousands of agitators of the Communist Party of the United States were apprehended. Raids on thirteen radical centres of New York occurred on Jan. 3, including a raid on the offices of the radical Russian local paper, the Novy Mir (New World); 800 warrants had been issued in New York and New Jersey alone. At the same date some 800 additional Reds were arrested in New England, and quantities of radical literature and several Communal charters were seized. The Federal authorities had issued in all some 4,000 warrants and declared that they would serve them all. Out of 5,000 arrests Department of Justice figures showed that 2,635 aliens were held on evidence thought sufficient to cause their deportation. This number was subsequently increased to nearly 3,000 "perfect cases." Evidence had been revealed that the aliens had deliberately fomented two large strikes, the steel and coal strikes, with a view to revolution, had conducted widespread propaganda among laborers, and had accumulated a large fund with which to bail out arrested workers in the interests of the revolutionary cause.

A drastic sedition bill was presented to the House on Jan. 5 by Representative Graham of Pennsylvania, which provided for deportation of convicted aliens, as well as a death penalty for citizens proved guilty of treason against the United States Government or who, through riotous incitements, caused the death of an innocent person.

Among the papers seized, it was stated by the Federal agents, evidence had been obtained of the collusion of C. A. K. Martens, the Soviet "Ambassador" to the United States, with subversive agitators. A Federal warrant on this ground was issued on Jan. 8, at a time when Martens and his secretary, S. Nuorteva, and other assistants were lodged in Washington at a hotel within three blocks of the Department of Justice. Martens himself could not be found by the Federal agents, but when summoned to appear before the Senate Investigation Committee assurance was given by Nuorteva that he would appear. The subpoenas served involved Martens himself, Mr. Nuorteva, and Gregory Weinstein, chief clerk of the Soviet Bureau, interned at Ellis Island, and were devised to obtain evidence whether the activities of Martens in the United States had been of a seditious character or not. Meanwhile the Federal warrant was held in abeyance and Martens's arrest deferred.

It was stated on Jan. 5 that Ellis Island was overcrowded with arrested Reds, who numbered nearly 2,000. All new arrivals, it was stated, would be sent to Camp Upton. Meanwhile legal activities were proceeding to expedite the trials and deportation of all proved guilty.

CURRENT HISTORY IN BRIEF

FRENCH DEAD SINCE ARMISTICE

SIX HUNDRED French officers and 28,000 men died in the year following the armistice of wounds received in battle, according to the Home Sector, the ex-soldiers' magazine. France's total war deaths, according to the most recent official statement of losses issued at Paris, were thereby brought to 1,383,000. It was further shown that France had suffered half her casualties in the first third of the war, and up to two months before America entered it, with 491,000 casualties from August, 1914, to February, 1916. The most dearly won victory was the first battle of the Marne, with a total loss for August and September, 1914, of 329,000. By adding to the number of dead, 1,383,000, the 507,800 prisoners alive at the close of the war and the 2,800,000 poilus wounded in action, a French casualty total of 4,690,800 is obtained. In presenting the loan bill before the Chamber of Deputies on Dec. 29, M. Klotz, French Minister of Finance, made the statement that France had mobilized 9,000,000 men for war. The total expense of the war had been 220,000,000,000 francs.

GERMANS SEVERED CABLES

IN the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army, Major Gen. George O. Squier tells the story of how the German submarines, while operating off the Atlantic Coast, succeeded in accomplishing part of a gigantic German-Austrian plan to cut all cables and destroy all high-power radio stations on the American coast. The army was informed of this plot by the navy, which based its knowledge on reliable sources. Two submarine cables were cut on May 28, 1918, at a point about 100 miles from New York. Both the New York-Canso, Nova Scotia, and the New York-Panama cable failed to function on this date. Both were soon repaired. German submarines were operating at this time off the coast. Cable experts established the fact that the cables had been cut, and not merely worn out or damaged by ordinary causes.

ITALY'S TRIUMPH OVER AUSTRIA

WHILE Marshal Foch still warns the world of Germany's future menace to France, Italy looks with satisfaction at the treaty of St. Germain, beholding to the east the accomplished destruction of her age-long enemy, Austria. A contributor to the Rassegna Italiana says in this connection:

The Treaty of St. Germain, which consecrates with the destruction of the Austro-Hungarian Empire the vast victory of our arms, was signed at a time when the indecent tumult of Red demagoguery and the turpitude of the neutral Giolittian doctrine raged in Italy over that monument of squalid political mentality known as the Investigation of Caporetto. The agitators, in stirring up the dregs of our nation, sought to cover up the significance of the act and its effects. They also sought, profiting by the disorder and excitement created in the minds of the Italians by the painful events at the Peace Conference at Paris, to transform our indisputable triumph into an essential defeat. But the Italian people know that, although a coalition of interests opposes the realization of all Italy's aspirations, it is no less true that the victory won through her decision, her sacrifice, her endurance, is infinitely great. And of this the Treaty of St. Germain is proof.

While France still trembles before the slow reorganization of her implacable adversary, we Italians can look both toward the east and toward the north with complete and calm assurance. The formidable empire which threatened and plotted against our future is no more. To the north it is reduced to a small, unstable republic, which we, from the strong summits of the Brennero, look down upon watchfully, and which perhaps magnanimous to the weak and vanquished we may even protect. Toward the east it has dissolved into a series of little States which a blind and absurd diplomacy has vainly sought to confederate for a little space. And though our Adriatic situation is not yet fixed, it is certainly not Yugoslavia that can frighten us in the future! So, we repeat, we may now breathe freely, for we have thrown from off our shoulders an enormous weight. With full freedom of movement we shall now be able to take up again our triumphant way of world expansion.

After asserting that the Yugoslavs have inherited the Austrian traditions of hostility toward Italy, as shown at Paris and at Zagreb (Agram), the capital of Yugoslavia, and protesting against the decision of the Peace Conference to throw all the onus of reparation on Austria and Hungary, although the Slav elements of the former empire fiercely and consistently fought against Italy and her allies, this writer continues:

Peace in the Adriatic still remains, therefore, in abeyance. But with the Treaty of St. Germain peace in the Alpine region has been solidly established. The question of the Germans of Upper Adige will be solved by the generosity of Italy. Within a few years that population of diverse races like the Slavs of Italian Dalmatia, will be glad to have our aid and protection. * * * The Alps will always remain our natural bulwark. They will be, with their crests and formidable ridges, the most worthy monument for that resplendent victory which the Treaty of St. Germain has forever consecrated.

BELGIUM'S NATIONAL HEROINE

MLE. GABRIELLE PETIT, the Belgian national heroine, who suffered the same fate as Miss Edith Cavell, is to have a monument erected to her memory in Brussels. The Ligue des Patriotes of that city has opened a public subscription for this purpose, and the British Chamber of Commerce is making an appeal for support of the movement, documented with a short history of Mlle. Petit, from which The London Times prints the following extracts:

At her mock trial, alone, without aid of any kind, she stood up and faced her judges, telling them to put an end to such a parody of justice. To the question: Why did you enter the service of espionage? She replied:

"From hatred of your system and from love of my country. But I am not a spy like your spies. You have no business to be here at all. You have broken all your promises and are acting against every principle of right."

"If you are pardoned what would you do?"

"Begin again."

"You were at the head of hundreds of men, who are your agents?"

"Don't insult me; you know I am incapable of such infamy."

"Your crime is enormous. You have been the cause of the loss of several thousand German soldiers."

"You make me very happy. I have taken all my precautions, and the service will continue just as though I were there."

"You will be pardoned if you will only give some indications about your organization."

"No, a thousand times, no."

Condemned to death on March 3, 1915, Gabrielle Petit was not executed until April 1. It was during this interminable month that her brutal persecutors tried by every means in their power to induce her to betray her accomplices, but all to no purpose.

She refused to sign a petition for mercy, and at the execution insisted upon not having her eyes bandaged. With head erect, facing the firing squad, she cried, "Viva la Belgique, Vive le R * * *"

FOCH DIVINELY INSPIRED

IN an interview published in Paris on Jan. 1 Marshal Foch declared that he was divinely inspired to defeat the Germans, and that the allied victory was willed by God. In religion Marshal Foch is a devout Catholic. In this interview, written by the Marshal's friend, André Demaricourt, and printed in the Echo de Paris, the French commander describes how he dreamed of revenge on Germany from the age of 17.

His victories, he said, were won by refusing to get excited and "smoking his pipe." The war was a war of Governments. Germany had the advantage of a powerful and well-trained army, but the handicap of the Kaiser, not very intelligent, a bluffer, a man of hasty action, and a bad judge of his acts. The method which Marshal Foch followed most successfully was to do his work on the formula, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." He allowed himself only two emotions, because they were agents of power, the two opposed ideas of the consequences of defeat and victory.

He had willed victory. To attain it he had always remembered that fundamental human nature never changes. The will to conquer must be based on confidence, but also it must be combined with the skillful use of means. The two together were bound to be irresistible in the long run. His first task was to inspire his war-weary, jaded soldiers with his own will to victory. This he succeeded in accomplishing. The Marshal continued as follows:

And now do not speak to me of glory or the beauty of enthusiasm. They are only words. Guard yourself in France against these expressions. They are useless. They are lost strength. "The war is finished." That is one expression that is good, but epithets as well as fancy phrases are worth nothing. Nothing survives except acts, because acts alone count.

Here is one act that gives me satisfaction. It was the meeting at Rethondes. That was an act. That act marked the decomposition of the German Empire, and I saw Erzberger with rage seize his pen and sign that act. And then I was content to have willed it and to have known how to employ the means, for the business was done.

When in a historic moment a vision is given to a man and when in consequence he finds that this vision has determined movements of enormous importance in a formidable war, I believe that this vision—and I think I had it at the Marne, on the Yser and on March 26—comes from a providential power in the hand of which one is the instrument, and I believe that the victorious decision was sent to me from on high by a will superior and divine.

FRANCO-ITALIAN PACT

IN an address made by Camille Barrère, the French Ambassador at Rome, on New Year's Day, the existence of a secret treaty concluded between France and Italy in 1902 unknown to the Central Powers was for the first time publicly revealed. M. Barrère denied that this was an example of "secret diplomacy" and pointed out the unwisdom of giving out public negotiations, perfectly legitimate in themselves, such as this defensive and offensive alliance between France and Italy was, at moments when their publication would have had unfortunate results. M. Barrère continued as follows:

Proof of this has just been demonstrated in a striking manner. The Franco-Italian agreement of 1900, eliminating all causes of conflict in the Mediterranean and tracing reciprocal spheres of influence in Africa, was followed by an agreement in 1902 establishing that in case of an aggressive war either country would maintain strict neutrality, even in case one of them was obliged to declare war to defend her honor and safety. What the two Governments agreed to contained nothing clandestine, nothing which could not be confessed. But if we recall the situation in Europe than it will be easily understood that knowledge of the agreements by those who had an interest in making them ineffective would have been a grave danger.

France still wanted peace while the Central Powers prepared for war. If the Teuton powers had known the ties about to be established between the two great Latin peoples they would have done everything to break them off. Such an attempt would have put the peace of the world in danger, hastened the hour in which our adversaries determined to consolidate their hegemony by iron and fire. The French and Italian Governments were therefore wise to keep their agreements a secret, which was never violated.

DUNKIRK'S ORDEAL

THE courageous part played by the City of Dunkirk on the English Channel during the world war is the subject of a book by Henri Malot, "Dunkerque, Ville Heroique," recently published in France. The book portrays the dauntless attitude of the little city's inhabitants during four years of ferocious bombardment. The Mayor of the city, Henri Terquem, was a man equal to the crisis, and his sane judgment and unshakable calm were of infinite value during those trying years. His official notices, many of which M. Malot gives as an appendix to his work, show all the difficulties he had to meet, and how he met them.

From its value as a port of communication with England, Dunkirk, itself once the inveterate enemy of England, naturally became the object of incessant German attack. The impossibility of capturing the town became apparent to the Germans after the battle of the Yser in October, 1914. Its destruction was then attempted by bombardments which lasted from October of that year to the October following. Airplane attacks were of daily occurrence, until defense by gunfire from below and by counter-attack in the air was organized.

In April, 1915, shells from a long-range gun on the land side began to cause heavy damage and the loss of more lives; later, bombardment from the sea by German destroyers was resorted to whenever the allied fleet could be outwitted. On some occasions all three methods of attack were used against the martyred town at the same time. The month of September, 1917, was one of the most trying which the Dunkirkers had to endure.

The spirit of the population throughout was one of calm resolution. All persons whose presence was unnecessary were removed; civic activities, largely increased by the war, were continued; schools and institutions remained open; the work of the port proceeded, and retail trade was vigorously pursued. No needless risks were run, but it soon became a tacit obligation to clear up the debris resulting from each raid and each terrific bombardment as soon as possible, and to go on with work as before. By their fortitude, under trying circumstances, the Dunkirkers proved themselves both good Frenchmen and good Flemings, and well deserved the approbation bestowed on their town by a General Order of the French Army in the phrase Ville héroïque, qui sert d'exemple à toute la nation.

WAR MEMOIRS

A NOTEWORTHY aftermath of the great war has been the multiplicity of war memoirs published by former Generals, statesmen, and diplomats. This whole series, one may say, was begun in England by Lord French in his sensational and much attacked book "1914," and continued with scores of other similar works, such as "The Grand Fleet," by Lord Jellicoe; "Memories" and "Records," by that original and temperamental Admiral of the navy, Lord Fisher, and the complete collection of Lord Haig's dispatches, supplemented by his own notes and provided with a preface by Marshal Foch.

But it was not only the victors who had to explain their conduct of the war. The German failure and defeat have been discussed in detail in "My War Memories," by General Ludendorff; in "Memoirs," by General von Hindenburg; in "My Memories," by Grand Admiral von Tirpitz; "Reflections of the World War," by von Bethmann-Hollweg; "In the World War," by Count Czernin; "General Headquarters, 1914-16, and Its Critical Decisions," by General van Falkenhayn, and a series of memoirs by Dr. Helfferich, former Vice Chancellor of the German Empire.

Some of these memoir writers have made vast sums from the sale of domestic and foreign rights of publication. Hindenburg, for instance, received 4,000,000 marks; Ludendorff, 3,500,000; Tirpitz, 900,000; Bethmann Hollweg, 250,000; Falkenhayn, 180,000; Helfferich, 275,000. At the end of December both Admiral von Scheer, who asserts that he won the battle of Jutland, and Count von Bernstorff were also busily engaged upon their memoirs.

GOTHEIN ON U-BOATS

ONE of the memoir writers included in the enumeration given above, Dr. Helfferich, then Vice Chancellor of the German Empire, in September, 1916, spoke certain words which were destined to be prophetic. They were:

If the card of ruthless U-boat war is played, and it is not a trump-card, then we are lost for centuries to come.

The card was played, it was not a trump card, and Germany, if not lost for centuries to come, must expiate her crimes through many bitter years. On the reasons why the card played was not a trump card, an article in the Achtuhr Abendblatt by the Reichstag Deputy Gothein, published in December, throws considerable light.

The main cause of the German submarine failure, says Deputy Gothein, was the quarrel between the German U-boat Inspection Department and the Armament Department of the Imperial Ministry of Marine over the calibre of the guns with which the submarines were mounted. The U-boat Inspection demanded guns of 88 millimeters; the Armament Department, jealous of its prerogatives, insisted on retaining guns of smaller calibre. The Inspection continued trying to get the guns, but even Admiral von Tirpitz favored the smaller calibre. The Inspection by insistence finally induced a change, but too late to influence the result.

The merchantmen of the Entente were armed with 102 and 125 millimeter guns, says Deputy Gothein, yet it was not until 1916 that 105s were allotted to German submarines. When the Germans discovered their mistakes, the Allies had already perfected their defensive measures against submarine attack. With at least 88 millimeter guns from the beginning of the war, Deputy Gothein declares Germany could, without even violating international law, have destroyed so much tonnage that England would soon have been eager for peace.

RHEIMS SHELLING WANTON

IN reminiscences of the first battle of the Marne, published in Berlin toward the end of December, Lieut. Gen. Baron von Hausen, who had commanded the Saxon Third Army, admitted that Rheims Cathedral was damaged by German shell fire for the first time on Sept. 4, 1914, when the Prussian Guard of von Buelow bombarded the city for two hours, after it had been occupied an entire day by von Hausen's Saxon troops. From his own statements, however, it appears that he took the city ahead of the time scheduled by von Buelow, and did not notify the latter of its capture. Ostensibly, he says, the bombardment was ordered because of the failure of three couriers to the city to return, although none of these couriers had actually reached the city. After the bombardment on Sept. 4, von Buelow sent word that he had imposed a fine of 50,000,000 francs, which would be increased to 100,000,000 if the couriers were not released within two days. Discussing the question in the light of von Hausen's memoirs, the Vossische Zeitung threw the chief guilt "for the fearful act" unquestionably on Lieut. Gen. von Hausen for his failure to notify von Buelow of the city's capture, thus exposing his own troops in Rheims to the subsequent bombardment.

PERSHING DENIES LIFE WASTE

CHARGES made before a House War Investigation Committee at Washington that lives of American soldiers had been wasted in needless attacks on armistice day were absolutely denied by General Pershing in a letter made public on Jan. 10, addressed to a Republican Representative. General Pershing said that the American forces were acting under instructions issued by Marshal Foch to all allied commanders on Nov. 9, 1918, and that orders for attack were withdrawn as soon as possible after he was advised of the signing of the armistice. He also said statements that American troops were ordered to attack, while French divisions remained stationary, were wholly erroneous. The signing of the armistice, he pointed out, was at 5 A. M., the exact time when the 92d Division charged. On Nov. 11 not only the Americans, but also the French, British, and Belgian lines attacked and advanced. Neither the French nor the American military authorities, General Pershing declared, had been wasteful of the lives under their command. General Pershing's letter was written in reply to charges contained in a letter to the same Representative from Captain George K. Livermore of Winchester, Mass., formerly Operations Officer of the 167th Field Artillery Brigade of the 97th (negro) Division.

CHINA'S EX-PRESIDENT DIES

FORMER PRESIDENT FENG KUO-CHANG died in Peking on Dec. 30. In a circular telegram issued from his deathbed to warring Governors of China he urged cessation of civil strife and reconciliation between the factions of the north and south. Feng Kuo-chang had won considerable fame in China as a General; his successes in suppressing two revolutions had gained for him the rank of Field Marshal. On the establishment of the republic, he was appointed Chief of the President's Military Council. After the revolution of 1913, when he received his Marshal's baton, he was elected Vice President of the republic, with Li Yuan-hung as President. On the latter's resignation, in 1917, Feng Kuo-chang became Acting President, and retained the office until the regular election of Shu Shi-chang in September, 1918. When the Chinese Cabinet declared war on Germany and Austria in August, 1917, President Feng approved its decision.

IT was announced on Jan. 9 that construction work on the giant Lafayette radio station at Bordeaux, which was begun about two years ago, was being finished at the request and at the expense of France by the American Navy. When completed this will be one of the most powerful wireless stations in the world. Its original object was the facilitation of communication between the United States and the American Expeditionary Forces in France. When the armistice was signed the French Government asked the United States Navy to complete the station because it was familiar with the plans and had a force of experienced workmen on the spot.

HOME RULE FOR MALTA

THE British Government has decided to give the inhabitants of Malta full control of their domestic Government. This decision emerges with prominence, as a result of the rioting in Malta in the Summer of 1919. The step was taken with the full agreement of the Governor, General Plumer, who arrived in the island immediately after the disorders had occurred. The decision was phrased by the Under Secretary of the Colonies as follows: "To intrust the people of Malta with full, responsible control of their purely local affairs." The details of the proposed Maltese Constitution still remain to be worked out.

FRENCH DEMAND 26,000 DOGS

THE French Ministry of Agriculture on Dec. 29 asked the Reparations Commission to demand of Germany 26,000 dogs which Germany took away from occupied France. M. Noulens, the Minister of Agriculture, contended that Germany should be forced to restore the stolen dogs, and that in cases where this was impossible they should be compelled to replace them by dogs of equal value. The list for 26,000 dogs was presented at the same time, and M. Noulens announced that he was working out a plan for the allotment by French Mayors of the dogs that Germany must restore to France. Among those named as instigators of such thefts were General von Kluck and Crown Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria.

HUNS AND FRENCH ART

IN an article by Mrs. A. Kingsley Porter in January Architecture, the malevolence of the German treatment of French works and monuments of art is described. Often great works were destroyed and others of small value preserved. At St. Quentin, which the Germans took in 1914 and held until 1918, they removed the stained glass windows and took them to Maubeuge. The thirteenth century choir grilles were wrenched from their sockets and shipped to Germany. But the rose window sketched on stone by Villard de Honecourt—a treasure six centuries old, and the most interesting antiquary of all—was left untouched. The blasts in forty-eight holes drilled in the piers and charged with dynamite, for some reason were never exploded—a German mystery still unexplained.

GERMAN ARMY'S COLLAPSE

A DOCUMENT issued by the German General Staff on Oct. 31, 1918, and published in Berne on Jan. 8, 1920, disproves the contention of von Hindenburg and Ludendorff that the collapse of the German Army was caused by the front being stabbed from behind, that is, that Germany collapsed from internal revolution. This document reads as follows:

The beginning of our retreat dates from Aug. 1, 1918, from Amiens owing to the constant pressure of the armies of Goutraud, Mangin, and Degoutte.

On Aug. 8 the First French Army, under Debeney, with the Fourth British Army, under Rawlinson, dealt a decisive blow with superior forces against our southeastern position near Moreuil, when we lost all our heavy artillery. The enemy here succeeded by tremendous dash in breaking through our front and driving us back on Roye. Similarly we lost Soissons. In three days we had to abandon twenty-five kilometers of front, thus losing Montdidier, while to the north the British troops inflicted a similar loss on us, obliging us to abandon Péronne, &c.

Our exhausted and used-up men, incessantly engaged since Spring in heavy fighting, could no longer hold their own against these united exertions of the enemy, who were supported by fresh American and British troops. One blow followed another, and loss upon loss became inevitable from lack of reserves. The question of an armistice was daily becoming more urgent.

LIQUOR CONTROL IN ITALY

ITALIAN prohibitionists in Rome on Jan. 2 claimed their first notable achievement in Italy in the issuance of a decree by which the sale of liquor containing more than 20 per cent. alcohol would be permitted only between 8 o'clock in the morning and 3 in the afternoon on week days, and until 4 on Saturdays. Sales by this decree must cease at noon on Sundays and are completely prohibited on holidays.

FIRST AUSTRALIAN ENVOY

MARK SHELDON, Australia's first permanent Commissioner to the United States, arrived in New York in the first days of January. A man of wide knowledge and experience in European matters as well as one versed in American affairs, his personality justified his appointment by Premier Hughes. Formerly Mr. Sheldon had been the Managing Director of a great mercantile house and Vice President of the Sydney Chamber of Commerce.

END OF W. A. A. C.

IT was decided toward the end of December, 1919, that Queen Mary's Woman's Army Auxiliary Corps, which had rendered most valuable service during the war both in England and behind the lines in France, would cease to exist as an organized body with the close of the old year. It was understood, however, that a small detachment would be retained in connection with the registration of war graves in France, and a few others for administrative work in England.

AMBASSADOR GREY DEPARTS

VISCOUNT GREY, British Ambassador to the United States, who had arrived on Sept. 27, sailed back to England on Jan. 3. Because of the illness of President Wilson he had had no opportunity to present his credentials as provisional Ambassador to the United States. In a short typewritten statement the departing envoy left behind him a message of good-will toward the United States.

PARIS BIRTHS AND DEATHS

A LARGE increase in the birth rate for Paris was shown by statistics for December, the rate having doubled since the beginning of 1919. The percentage had risen from approximately 10 to 18 per thousand. The number of deaths had decreased from 18 to 14 per thousand. The number of marriages was increasing.

Mineral Wealth of the Sarre Basin

What Germany Has Lost

THE terms imposed upon Germany by the Treaty of Versailles, which went into force on Jan. 10, 1920, involve the loss of 70 per cent. of her iron ore, a third of her coal, 20 per cent. of her potash, and between 7,500,000 and 8,000,000 of her pre-war population. Nearly all the loss of mineral wealth is in the Sarre Basin, whose iron and coal mines have been awarded to France as indemnity for the mines which the Germans destroyed in the Briey Basin and in the north of France. The mining and industrial region of the Sarre Valley is bounded on the north by Merzig, Tholey, St. Wendel; on the east by Frankenholz and St. Ingbert; on the south by Sarreguemines, Merlenbach, St. Avold, Falkenberg, (Faulquemont;) on the west by Bolchen (Boulay) and Hemmersdorf. The pit-coal deposits run northeast and southwest, from Frankenholz in the Bavarian Palatinate to Faulquemont, and are prolonged through Lorraine to Mousson; hence the coal basin of the Sarre and the mineral basin of Briey are intimately connected, both economically and geologically; one of the mining enterprises near Spittel even bears the double name of Sarre et Moselle.

In the region belonging to Rhenish Prussia, comprising Sarrebrück City, Sarrebrück County, Merzig, Sarrelouis, Ottweiler, and St. Wendel, the basin of the Sarre has a population of 616,000 souls, mostly workmen. Under the armistice a distinct territory was organized here under General Andlauer, commanding the 18th French Division. He administers it through officers who control the German civil officials.

As early as the end of the eighteenth century the coal pockets of the Sarre were exploited, though in an elementary way, by the Princes of Nassau-Sarrebrück, then masters of the country, who saw here a means of augmenting their revenue.

Later the Imperial Government had methodical studies made by its engineers, while it exploited some mines and opened up others. It was preparing a general plan of concessions when the events of 1814 occurred. Prussia, enlightened especially by a large manufacturer, Henry Roecking, claimed these mines; half of them were taken by the first treaty of Paris; the second treaty, signed in 1815, transferred to Germany the remainder; furthermore, all the studies and plans made by French engineers were demanded and received. "So," says Gustave Babin, "there was taken from us a possession which had been ours since Louis XIV. and the Treaty of Ryswick."

The majority of the Sarre mines are fiscal mines belonging to the State and exploited by it, two belonging to Bavaria and twelve to Prussia; the Frankenholz concession, however, belongs to a French company; Hostenbach in the Rhine province, and three others in Lorraine, La Houve, La Petite Rosselle, and Sarre et Moselle also are exceptions. In 1913 the coal production of the basin, according to documents communicated to the International Geological Congress, totaled 16,600,000 tons. The present production falls below this, a diminution due to the unsettled conditions of the last few months of war. The quality of the coal produced is mediocre; from the viewpoint of industry it furnishes a type of coke which can be used in furnaces of small dimensions only.

The coal deposits of the Sarre led to the creation of flourishing industries, which have undergone great development during the last four years; Sarrebrück in 1870 possessed only 7,000 inhabitants; today it has 120,000. Metallurgy is the most important of these regional industries; glassmaking and ceramics come next. Pre-war statistics showed a population of 45,000 workmen and 56,000 miners; to these should be added the 16,500 mineworkers of Petite Rosselle, Sarre et Moselle, and La Houve, making a sum total of about 100,000 workmen. The whole country is one vast factory.

An article in Die Woche of March 8, 1919, from the pen of Professor Hermann Oncken of Heidelberg, attacked vigorously the French contention that historical precedents justified annexation of the Sarre Basin to France. From the viewpoint of self-determination of nations, he declared, there could be no question that the French demand was unjust, as the district was wholly German in race and speech. As for historical precedent, the Sarre district had been German from the ninth century; French possession was, so to speak, merely an interruption of German ownership, and proved to be temporary.

No mention was made in this article of the French claim that France needs the coal mines of the Sarre to make good the destruction of her coal mines by the Germans in the north of France.

Feeding Hungry Europe

Extensive Relief Measures

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 20, 1920]

URGENT and pitiful appeals for aid for the inhabitants of Poland, Austria, Armenia, were made late in December and throughout January. The American Red Cross announced on Jan. 4 that, out of a fund of $30,000,000 available for its work in 1920, $15,000,000 had been set aside for European relief, $13,750,000 for use at home, and $1,250,000 for completing its programme in Siberia.

Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, on Jan. 10, in a letter sent to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, appealed for an appropriation of $150,000,000 to aid the starving inhabitants of Poland, Armenia, and Austria, giving a vivid picture of the distressing situation existing in those countries. Norman Davis, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, presented additional details of conditions which, he said, must be remedied to prevent actual starvation and the spread of Bolshevism. He read to the committee excerpts from private reports received from American agents which bore out his statements.

Secretary Glass, appreciating the opposition to extending direct financial aid to the war-torn countries, recommended that the assistance go through the grain corporation, which could use its fund of nearly $1,000,000,000 to extend aid through credits or gifts where necessary. This recommendation seemed to meet with the approval of the committee.

The fund and food would be divided as follows: Armenia, 7,500 tons of flour and other necessities at a cost of $500,000 monthly; Austria, $100,000,000, with a probable reduction to $70,000,000 due to assistance by Great Britain; Poland, 300,000 tons of grain at a cost of $50,000,000; other parts of Europe, $25,000,000.

Norman Davis told the committee that this country must continue to supply food to these three countries until the next harvest. Austria and Poland, he said, could furnish satisfactory security for food furnished them, but in the case of Armenia the aid must be in the nature of charity, as that country is without funds or means of establishing credits. Food is also needed in parts of Italy, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia, he said. Mr. Davis added:

The United States has a surplus of food and is the only nation that can prevent the famine. Great Britain, in a formal note to the United States, has promised to co-operate to the full extent of its ability, which probably will be mainly in supplying ships to transport the supplies, as Great Britain, France, and Italy already have lent Austria $48,000,000.

The condition in Austria is so desperate that she is willing to mortgage her forests, the tobacco monopoly, the water power facilities, and even the collection of customs, to obtain food. The Treasury does not believe that customs should be taken because it would cause great delay to economic rehabilitation.

SUMMARY OF THE SITUATION

Herbert Hoover appeared before the Ways and Means Committee on Jan. 12 and strongly indorsed Secretary Glass's recommendation. The financial problem of feeding Europe is "getting smaller all the time," Mr. Hoover informed the committee, explaining that the need this Winter was centred in ten or twelve large cities in Austria, Poland, and Armenia. Most of Europe, he said, was in shape to feed itself, or get its breadstuffs through private financial channels.

Private charities in the United States are sending five or six million dollars' worth of food abroad monthly and by the end of January 3,000,000 American families with relatives in Central and Eastern Europe would be able to buy "food drafts" from banks in the United States. These drafts are exchangeable abroad for a barrel of flour or other food to supplement that now being rationed by authorities, and will serve as a substitute for cash remittances.

"Remittance of money is the height of folly," Mr. Hoover declared, explaining that with food distribution under Government control one might have plenty of cash but still be unable to obtain additional food. He predicted that from five to eight million dollars a month would be spent in this country for "food drafts."

The Children's Fund, an organization that is feeding 2,500,000 children of Europe, is back of the "food draft" plan, Mr. Hoover said, adding that it also was aided by banks and other private charities, including the Red Cross, the Committee for Relief in the Near East, and the Jewish Joint Distribution. Foreign Governments have agreed to the plan, which also has been approved by the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board.

By aiding Poland with food, and helping ten or twelve European cities escape starvation this Winter, Mr. Hoover said the United States would "build up security for its $10,000,000,000 lent abroad" as well as perform a humanitarian service.

While the $100,000,000 famine fund provided last year is almost exhausted, approximately $88,000,000 will be repaid "within two or three years," Mr. Hoover said. He declared $12,000,000 had been spent for "sheer charity," in feeding under-nourished children.

All Europe is on rations, Mr. Hoover continued, but with the Grain Corporation in charge, no new appropriation was necessary. The corporation's $150,000,000 capital is intact and it has profits of $50,000,000.

The committee took no action up to Jan. 20, but indicated that the $150,000,000 relief would be recommended, and would meet with Congressional approval.

EUROPEAN EXCHANGE

The exchange rates of sterling, francs and marks showed further declines during January. The pound sterling on Jan. 16 fell to $3.68½, which was within ¾ cents of the minimum established in December, 1919; francs, marks and lire also displayed weakness, the quotations on Jan. 16 being as follows: Francs, 11.62 to the dollar (normal, 5.18.13); lire, 13.70; marks, 1.77 (normal, 23.83); rubles, 2.75 cents (normal, 51.44).

Various suggestions were offered to remedy the serious exchange situation. Sir George Paish, an English financier, visited the United States and urged an international bond issue ranging from ten to thirty billion dollars to refund the war debts and restore international credits. This suggestion met so hostile a reception that the British Government issued a statement disclaiming any responsibility for it, and asserting that Great Britain would seek no further financial credits in this country.

MR. HOOVER'S STATEMENT

Herbert Hoover issued a statement on Jan. 7, in which he said:

I disagree emphatically with the statement being circulated by European propagandists, both as to the volume of European financial needs from the United States and as to their suggestions that the great bulk of these needs cannot be met by ordinary commercial credits and that therefore our Treasury needs to be further drawn upon for new loans.

Aside from some secondary measures by our Government, the problem is one of ratification of peace and ordinary business processes, and not one of increasing our burden of taxation. Our taxes are now 600 per cent. over pre-war rates. We simply cannot increase this burden. Rather, the problem is one of early reduction.

By secondary measures I mean that some dozen cities in central and southern Europe need breadstuffs on credit from the Grain Corporation to prevent actual starvation, and that the Allies are asking for temporary delay in paying interest on our Government loans to them. The Allies cannot pay this year, in any event. The actual situation varies with every country in Europe, and generalities are not worth print paper. The European neutral countries have made money from the war, and have asked no favors and given none.

Outside of interest to the Allies, Great Britain states that she wants nothing but commercial credits. These she can always obtain if she puts up her ample collateral assets in South America, China, &c. France also has unpledged foreign assets that would cover most of her important needs.

It would also appear that the 70,000,000 people of prosperous nations who have not suffered in the war should also aid in European relief. The American people are now finding $7,000,000 a month in charity for feeding 3,000,000 children and fighting disease. If we contribute the bread supply on Government credit to these starving cities plus business credits, we will be doing our share of world responsibility.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE

A call was issued Jan. 15 and simultaneously presented to the Governments of Great Britain, France, Holland, Switzerland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the United States—also to the Reparation Commission and the United States Chamber of Commerce—asking for the immediate appointment of an international economic conference. It was signed by leading bankers, financial experts, commercial, and industrial leaders in the countries named.

The memorandum took issue squarely with the scheme attributed to Sir George Paish, of an international credit arrangement in which all the leading Governments should take active parts. Quite the opposite position was assumed by emphasizing the necessity of encouraging to the greatest extent possible "the supply of credit and the development of trade through normal channels."

The proposed conference will be composed of representatives of the leading countries, both belligerent and neutral, of Europe, the Central European countries, Japan, and the chief exporting countries of South America. These representatives, it is further purposed, will bring with them all pertinent information, and it is expected that as a result of the conference recommendations will be made as to what measures may best be taken in the various countries in order to revive and maintain international commerce.

Italy floated a new popular tax loan in January which reached the enormous total of 10,000,000,000 lire.

Belgium offered a $25,000,000 loan in this country on Jan. 15, and it was fully subscribed the first day. It was in the form of one and five year notes, yielding 6 and 7 per cent., respectively.

Present-Day Germany: An Inside View

By OTTO H. LUKEN, A. M.

This survey of conditions in Germany is based on personal observations in that country during September, October, and November, 1919.

ON entering Germany every traveler has to submit to a searching examination in a separate cell, in order to prove that he carries with him no Russian money or Bolshevik literature, or other things dangerous to Germany's tranquillity. A similar search on leaving is to reveal whether contrary to the Government's order the traveler tries to take out of the country more than 1,000 marks.

Trains arrive usually several hours late, unless the distance covered is very short. One hour before the time of departure you may be greeted by an announcement stating that all tickets for that particular train have been sold. If you are fortunate enough to obtain a ticket you may rejoice if it only secures standing space, be that even in the toilet room. If you wish to secure hotel accommodations you will have to make the reservation several days in advance, unless you follow the example of a Norwegian friend of mine, who, upon being told at a leading hotel in Berlin that no room would be vacant for several days, produced ten pounds of Norwegian butter and was at once given a good room.

Almost everything is extremely cheap in Germany, measured in American money. For a shave I paid 40 pfennigs (1 cent), for an eight-day marble clock $1, for a pair of fine shoes, made to measure, $5. An American business man whom I met in Germany spoke of buying a linen factory in Bohemia as if that were an every-day business transaction. Many people in the United States who have relatives in Germany have sent them packages of things which they think cannot be bought in Germany. They do not realize that practically everything can be had in Germany at prices below ours, owing to the low value of the German mark. Even American foodstuffs are sold cheaper in Germany than in the United States, because they were shipped to Europe when the mark was worth more and when prices in America were lower than they are now; furthermore, the German Government sells many American foodstuffs to the population at a loss.

The Fatherland Corporation, managed by Mr. Viereck, has established a "Feed and Clothe Germany" department and issued a circular showing the various combinations of merchandise that may be sent to that country through the company. It would be worse than poor economy to send many of these articles to Germany at this time. For instance, such things as shoes, gloves, collars, &c., which the Viereck corporation proposes to ship, were purchased by the writer in Germany at prices much lower than New York prices. The time may come when the necessities of life will be more expensive in Germany than they are over here, but for the present if a man wants to do a service to his relatives abroad he ought to send money instead of merchandise. The relatives can buy everything in Germany, only they are afraid to pay what seem to them high prices, though these prices are lower than in America.

During the war the people were asked to let the Government have all their gold and silver coin and jewelry. Many thefts reported in the press have shown that very large amounts of gold and silver have been hoarded nevertheless. Large quantities of gold, jewelry, and silverware are still to be seen in many households.

SCARCITY OF HOUSES

Living accommodations all over Germany are so scarce that in many cities families occupying more than a certain number of rooms have to take in lodgers. The rent contracts are under the control of special boards. Building material is wanting for lack of coal. In the Berlin town jail cells are being rented. The number of Germans who have migrated from former German provinces (from Posen alone 60,000) has greatly increased the lack of housing accommodation.

In most cities tips have been abolished in accordance with an agreement between the employers' associations and the waiters' unions. Placards on the walls of restaurants and cafés say that 10 per cent. will be added to the guest's bill and that the waiters must not accept any tip under penalty of instant dismissal. Yet it has become the fashion, nevertheless, to give tips as before in addition to the 10 per cent. increase, in order to secure decent service. In hotels 25 per cent. is added to the bill, but the usual tips are generally still accepted by the employees.

In addition to the small paper currency issued by the nation and the loan banks, down to 1 mark, the individual cities and Chambers of Commerce have issued paper of denominations as low as 10 pfenigs, equal to one-fourth of one cent in American currency. This small currency is accepted only in the cities where it has been issued. For lack of small change, postage stamps are everywhere given in payment. The City of Buxtehude has issued some curious currency. According to an old story there once took place at Buxtehude a race between a hare and a porcupine, and the Buxtehude paper money depicts the moment when the porcupine is winning the race. An old-time German proverb and a picture of the famous Buxtehude dogs that bark with their tails form part of the same currency.

INCREASE OF CORRUPTION

The four and a half years of war have brought about both the physical and moral ruin of the German Nation. Crime, corruption, and gambling are at their height. The streets in Berlin are lined with street vendors and beggars in uniform. A policeman is very seldom to be seen. Every one tries to fill his own pocket and pushes the search of amusement to the extreme. The former proverbial German honesty has disappeared. There is hardly a German who does not admit breaking the laws, by obtaining foodstuffs in some illicit manner, by hiding them contrary to Government order, and so on. Officialdom has become thoroughly corrupt. The theatres and moving pictures show the dirtiest plays, their advertisements always placing the erotic moment in the foreground. Newspapers are sold in the streets on the strength of such headlines as "The Fancy Costume Dance of the Homo-Sexuals," "The Protest Meeting of the Prostitutes," and the like.

The Government recently stated before the National Assembly that within a few weeks thirty-one bands of counterfeiters had been discovered. The Prussian budget for the current year provides for an amount of 160,000,000 marks (25,000,000 more than in 1918) to pay for reimbursement of freight stolen on the State railways, and the German Postal Department has so far paid 80,000,000 marks to the owners of property stolen while in the mails. In Berlin when wanting to call for protection at night it is only necessary to call "Ueberfall" (assault). Many of the men in uniform begging excite the pity of the passers-by by their constant nodding of the head, which, unless simulated, is the result of shell-shock. A court proceeding recently established the fact that these beggars take in 300 to 400 marks in four hours' daily "work." Although their condition is curable by the use of the electric current, the men prefer to make a good living by begging rather than submit to the somewhat painful cure.

When reading the facts brought out during the month of October in the Munich court proceedings dealing with the atrocities committed by the workmen when Munich was a Soviet republic, and by the Government soldiers after the defeat of the Soviet Government, a man who has heretofore doubted the reports of German atrocities during the war cannot do otherwise than change his opinion.

STRONG CLASS FEELING

Education and science are to be made more democratic, yet, although the sons of the noblemen rubbed shoulders in the trenches with the sons of the bourgeoisie, and the members of a feudal students' corps with the sons of the peasants and laborers, the gulf between them is as wide as ever. The monocle of the "cavalier" and the uniform, swords, and scars of the arms-students continue to emphasize their old-time arrogance. The extremely strong feeling against Jews in Germany is astonishing for one who has not been there since the war started.

Dr. Karl Muck, the former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was greeted on his return with enthusiastic ovations by Berlin musical audiences. Dr. Muck tried hard to evade internment in the United States on the ground that he was a Swiss citizen, but upon his arrival in Germany he was fêted as a German patriot and martyr. He is now engaged again as leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. In a newspaper interview he stated that he was an Austrian.

HATRED OF FRANCE

Although in the beginning of the war the Germans hated the English more than any of their other enemies, the tide has turned and it is now the French that have aroused the Germans' most hostile feeling. The writer has met quite a few men in Germany who had been in the trenches and been wounded severely, and yet who stated that they would not hesitate a moment volunteering in case there should be another war with France. The French members of the allied military supervising council in Berlin are hated most thoroughly. The United States and England have already returned all Germans held as prisoners of war. France, on the other hand, refused to give them up until after the German Government had complied with certain promises, which was finally done on Jan. 10. Meanwhile, the Government, through misleading press reports, has made the people believe that it was France's malice which kept the prisoners in France. Unfortunately, the French authorities in the occupied districts have seen fit to employ more rigorous measures with the inhabitants than those used by the British and American authorities.

Americans are not at all disliked in Germany, with the exception of President Wilson, who is universally condemned for not having insisted on the Fourteen Points. It is astonishing to see what an amount of misinformation about the United States is printed in some of the leading German newspapers. Men like Georg von Skal and Henry F. Urban and other writers living among us, who are the American correspondents of German papers, are doing their best to discredit the United States through abusive articles, painting us as the land of the most reactionary Government, and what not.

Germany's economic life is rather unpromising. Only greatly increased production will cover her own needs and procure foreign credits abroad through exportation; but as it now is, many factories are idle and many industrious hands are unemployed. The late harvest and the early frost in the Autumn of 1919 brought new dangers and complicated the problem of nourishing the people.

On April 1, 1920, the Bavarian and Württemberg postal administrations will be taken over by the empire. Philatelists will thus see some species of stamps disappear. Also the railroads of the various States will soon be transferred to the nation, the Constitution requiring that they be taken over not later than April 1, 1921. The task of the National Minister of Transportation will be exceedingly difficult. Before the war the German railroads were held up to the world as an example of State efficiency. Today they are in a most deplorable condition. The deficit of the Prussian railways alone will amount to 700,000,000 marks for the current year. It is planned to electrify the entire system within thirty years. So far only about 200 miles have been electrified.

Another great task will be the amending of several judicial codes made necessary, partly by the changed status of the women and partly by the demand of the Social Democrats that the Judges be chosen by the people. However, this demand will probably lead only to a reform of the jury system, and not to the abolishing of the professional Judges appointed for life.

The parties forming the Government are the Centre, the German Democratic Party, and the Social Democratic Party. The Centre has always been only half democratic. It is formed of Catholics, whose religion greatly influences their parliamentary decisions. The Centre Party's conservative elements, consisting of members of the higher clergy, of the nobility, of the bourgeoisie and of the farming class, however, are clever enough to realize that a Government of the parties of the Right would not be possible without a strong army, the establishment of which would not be tolerated by the Allies. The German Democratic Party owes its existence to the revolution. One of its members, Hugo Preuss, is the author of the German Constitution. The Social Democrats are the majority Socialists, those Socialists who supported the Government during the war.

At the right of the Centre stand the German National People's Party and the German People's Party. The former contains the old Conservatives—those who are mainly responsible for the way the war was carried on. They are strongly anti-Semitic and openly advocate the establishment of another Hohenzollern monarchy. From political meetings they send greetings to the Kaiser at Amerongen, and the Kreuzzeitung recently published a reply of thanks from his "all-highest" Majesty. Also monarchistic, although not quite so strongly as the German Nationals, is the German People's Party, composed mainly of former National Liberals, the representatives of capital.

To the left of the Social Democrats are the Independent Social Democrats, the Communists and the Syndicalists. The Majority Socialists act in accordance with Eduard Bernstein's interpretation of Karl Marx that capital is not to be considered the arch enemy of the working class. They work hand in hand with the other democratic parties and are the mainstay of the present Government. Ebert, the nation's President; Bauer, the Chancellor; Müller, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and Noske, the Secretary of Defense, are some of its most prominent members. The Independent Socialists, with the exception of a small group led by Kautsky, look upon the workmen's councils as the ideal basis of government. Like the Communists they wish to transplant the Russian system, the dictatorship of the proletariat, to Germany.

During the annual meeting of the Independent Socialists on Dec. 1 the membership was stated to have increased from 300,000 to 750,000, and the number of the independent Socialist newspapers to be fifty-five. Although they have only twenty-two seats in the National Assembly, as against the 165 seats of the Majority Socialists, recent events have proved them to be a force to be reckoned with.

The German National People's Party (the conservatives) claim also a large increase in their membership. This should not be surprising, as people who are disgusted with the present state of affairs easily come to the opinion that under a conservative Government conditions would be entirely different. On the other hand, the Independent Socialists' claim of increased membership is probably the result of the Majority Socialists having changed from a purely radical party to a reform party, which, although not guilty of having brought about the war, yet supported the war. Those to the left of the Majority Socialists want to see a complete overthrow of affairs.

Germany needs a strong Government supported by a nation which believes that the masses can be brought into order. However, there does not seem to be a people: there are only individuals who think of themselves alone. There is a minimum of altruism and a maximum of egotism. The only strong man in the Government is the Minister of Defense, Noske. The Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Hermann Müller, a former labor union leader and party journalist, although a very capable and honest man, will hardly be able to bring about the necessary reform in his department. So far no important appointments or changes in the personnel have been made which would indicate that the system of diplomacy of the past is to be discontinued. On the contrary, in this department, as well as in others, the Socialist chiefs have in many respects adopted the manners and customs of their predecessors. Only a month ago one of the most influential councilors of Bethmann Hollweg and one of the most industrious and loyal agents of his system, the Privy Councilor, Dr. Riezler, was appointed Cabinet Chief of the German President.

The National Assembly is now regularly installed in the former Reichstag building. The place is habitable again since the lice which once forced the Assembly to hold its meetings in one of the auditoriums of Berlin University have been starved to death.

INQUIRY INTO THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE WAR

The National Assembly has appointed a committee to inquire into the responsibility for the war. One of its sub-committees has had several meetings and the leading men of the old régime have had to appear before it. Everyone reading the statements and answers of these men before the committee must have asked himself, How was it possible for Germany, with such leaders, to carry on the war for more than four years? The statements of Bethmann Hollweg, Ludendorff, Tirpitz, show that there was an intense hatred between the leaders, which made co-operation very difficult. We Americans have underestimated the good intentions of Count Bernstorff while German Ambassador at Washington. He tried his best to induce the German Government to abstain from starting the ruthless submarine war. Ludendorff, the man who controlled Bethmann Hollweg and Hindenburg and the rest, has not convinced anyone through the statements before the committee of his surpassing greatness. Quite the contrary. He practically called Bernstorff a liar and displayed his hatred of the Ambassador. Bernstorff retained his composure and showed a gentlemanly reserve throughout.

We should expect that the German people, after seeing how their great empire was destroyed through acts of the utmost foolishness and the blindness of Bethmann Hollweg and the other leaders, would show anger and fury; but on the contrary, when Hindenburg was in Berlin to appear before the committee, he was fêted as a demigod. Ever since the battle of Tannenberg he has been the great hero of the Germans. The German Nationals used the occasion for a political demonstration against the Government, against the republic and for the re-establishment of the monarchy. Admiral von Tirpitz, one of the men of the old régime, in his memoirs has laid bare all the deficiencies of that system of government.

THE ARMY

According to the Peace Treaty the German Army is to be reduced to 200,000 men within three months after the exchange of ratifications [which took place Jan. 10] and to 100,000 men after April 1, 1920. In addition to 200,000 men in the interior there was in October a force of 200,000 on the eastern border, Chancellor Bauer declared. In recalling the men from the Baltic States in compliance with the request of the allied governments, the German Government did not act honestly. In August it declared that it had no further means of inducing the mutinous troops to return; yet in September it found new means of coercion against these soldiers. When finally in October their pay was stopped, the officers and men declared deserters, and General von der Goltz recalled—measures which should have been taken months previously—it was too late, as many of those troops had organized themselves as the West Russian Army. In spite of all possible official measures the enlistments for this army were continued all over Germany with little risk of interference. In this connection attention might be called to a recent report in the New York papers of Noske's having personally received the leader of the Russian West Army, Colonel Avalov-Bermond. It seems that the Germans expect the Russian Army to become so Germanized that if necessary it can form the basis of Germany's military power in case of a future conflict of arms with France.

Under the names of civic guards and temporary volunteers the authorities are organizing a kind of militia distinct from the national army. There is, of course, great danger that this militia may simply become a pretext under which the terms of the Peace Treaty may be evaded, inasmuch as the strength of these civic guards is rather large. For instance, the civic guard of the city of Hamburg consists of 34,000 men. Allot to all the other large cities of Germany a corresponding number of militia, and we have quite a sizable army not provided for in the Peace Treaty. It must be said, however, that at present and until there is a stable government in Germany, such a militia is needed, in order to keep order and prevent rioting.

The national army, unfortunately, is not what we ought to expect it to be in a democratic state controlled by socialists. Of nineteen commanders there are fifteen noblemen and four bourgeois. And the former gulf between officers and privates has again appeared. It also has become known that a system of reporting on personal political tendencies has been built up in the military hierarchy. Open show of republican sentiment is being frowned upon by the staff officers. That the army, then, took an active part in the political demonstration of the friends of a monarchy on the occasion of Hindenburg's visit to Berlin, as above mentioned, is not surprising, but very regrettable, the more so as the Secretary of Defense, Noske, is a Socialist. Noske has often been taken to task by fellow Socialists, but he is such a good orator that he always wins his opponents to his side when called upon to defend his actions before socialistic gatherings.

FINANCIAL SITUATION

Before the war the debt of the German Empire amounted to 5,000,000,000 marks. According to a statement of Mr. Erzberger, the Secretary of Finance, Germany's debt on April 1, 1920, will be 212,000,000,000 marks. This figure does not include any war indemnity which the Allies may impose upon Germany. Before the war the total wealth of Germany was estimated at 300,000,000,000 marks. For interest Germany will have to pay 10,000,000,000 marks a year, which is about one-fourth of the estimated national income of Germany before the war. To produce income a national inheritance and estate tax has been introduced. Taxes on capital, income, turn-over, &c., are further to improve Germany's financial straits. Before the war the income taxes took 12 to 15 per cent. of the citizen's income. In the future it will be 10 to 60 per cent.

The intended tax of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on all business turned over tends to benefit those producers that for instance purchase their raw material abroad and sell their finished product direct to the consumer, as the large electrical manufacturing concerns do. The consumer who buys a motor from an electrical engineer, on the other hand, may pay a multiple turn-over tax, as not only the engineer's turn-over, but also the turn-over of the motor manufacturer and of the wire manufacturer and the other manufacturers from whom the motor manufacturer bought the supplies needed are taxed.

In order to render evasion of the taxes on capital and income more difficult the banks have to submit to the Government certain half-yearly reports in regard to the accounts of their clients. Many Germans, in order to evade the tax laws, have already transferred a large part of their capital to a foreign country, by way of remittance or exporting securities or merchandise. In order to check this flight of capital stringent measures have been taken by the Government. The banks are not allowed to remit abroad any but small amounts without the consent of the authorities. A man leaving the country must not take with him more than 1,000 marks and no metallic money.

Capitalists in foreign countries will in the future think twice before investing in German securities, as an affidavit showing that the security is their property will be required before a German bank will cash the coupons. Germans cannot cash their coupons unless their securities are registered with the Government or deposited with a bank. The result has been and will be that German securities are sent abroad, so that the coupons may be cashed by a citizen of another country upon his affidavit of ownership but in reality for the benefit of the German owner; many will prefer to invest their money in mortgages instead of securities, and others will invest in foreign securities abroad.

Like France and some other countries, Germany has issued a lottery loan of 5,000,000,000 marks on a rather attractive plan. The bonds are for 1,000 marks each. Every second bond drawn is drawn with a premium of at least 1,000 marks. Twice a year 2,500 premiums amounting to 25,000,000 marks will be drawn. Ten premiums of 1,000,000 marks each will be drawn yearly, so that at the end of eighty years, when all the bonds will have been retired, the nation will have created 800 millionaires. Think of a socialistic government creating millionaires by law.

In addition to any premium he may receive the owner of a bond will receive 5 per cent. interest from the date of issue till the date of the drawing. He does not receive any compound interest, this being used by the nation for premiums. The bonds have also been provided with certain tax exemptions. As they do not yield a fixed yearly income they are not suitable for an investor who needs the interest every year. For the Government this type of loan is extremely favorable. As is the case with every lottery loan, the payments for interest and amortization are considerably more favorable than in the case of a loan with half-yearly interest coupons. Furthermore, the amortization plan is such as to slip the large annuity payments onto the later generations. The main burden will fall on the decade between 1940 and 1950.

This first small loan after the ending of the war is only a feeler put out by the Government. The loan had to be made attractive, and a concession was made to the passion for gambling now so prevalent. Some months ago a law was passed in Prussia permitting book-makers to carry on their hitherto illegal profession on the payment of a license fee.

LABOR PROBLEMS

Section 165 of the German Constitution provides for the establishment of such employes' committees as will tend to make the employes equal factors in the working contract. They are to agree with the employer on the conditions of work and to co-operate with him in the administration of the employes' welfare work. Their wishes and complaints are to be submitted to the employer through chosen representatives with certain rights. The employes are expected to co-operate further in the general promotion of their trade and they are to have a deciding voice whenever general questions come up concerning their trade.

To provide for the practical working out of these stipulations as laid down in the Constitution, a bill formally creating employes' committees has been placed before the national assembly. According to its provisions the following reasons are not considered good and sufficient ground for the dismissal of an employe by the employer without consent of the employes' council: that the employe refuses to do permanent work of a kind different from that for which he was originally engaged; allegation of political, military, religious or labor union activity on the part of an employe; and any cause not made imperative by the condition in the plant which would seem to impose an unfair hardship upon any employe. But engaging of new employes by the employer does not require the approval of the employes' committee. If in disputed cases the latter and the employer cannot come to an agreement, the decision of the settlement board may be called for. If this board decides that the dismissal is uncalled for and the employer insists on it, the latter has to pay an indemnity to the employe amounting to one-twelfth of the yearly remuneration of the employe for each year such employe has lasted, with a maximum of six-twelfths.

POWERS OF EMPLOYES

One or two delegates of the employes' committees are to have a voice in the decisions of the Boards of Directors of the stock companies. All concerns employing 100 or more office men or 500 or more laborers must show their yearly balance sheets to the employes' council, and must also submit to it quarterly statements regarding conditions, progress and prospects of the business, as well as furnish certain data concerning wages and conditions of labor. It does seem to be a mistake to invest these committees with a voice in the management. As representatives of the employes the committees are practically the opponents of the employer. The more the concern earns the better are the chances of the workmen for an increase in their wages, yet their interest in the welfare of the enterprise is not so profound as that of the employer, who has his money invested in it. If the business fails, the employe can find another position; the employer, on the other hand, loses not only his capital, but also his reputation and standing. For this reason the management itself ought to be left to the employer. Also the inspection of the balance sheet and other data by the employes' council is a rather dangerous thing. Although these delegates are to keep strictly confidential any information thus obtained, they could easily impart knowledge which in the hands of outsiders may prove very dangerous to the prosperity or standing of the concern, or to its ability to compete.

The Constitution means to strengthen German industry by having the employes co-operate. Instead of giving the latter a deciding influence in the management of the individual plant, such provisions ought to be made as would enable them to render service in the promotion of the productivity of the entire line of industry that they are working in. The German State is in urgent need of a solid industrial system. Each individual plant must be made as productive as possible, to yield as high an amount of taxes as possible.

The activity of representatives of labor in the management of the individual plant will hinder rather than promote the productivity of the enterprise. The employe in the individual plant is more interested in high wages than in the capacity of his plant to help in the industrial and financial improvement of the State. In settling questions of policy concerning the entire industry or line of business the representatives of labor ought to be given a voice, to the benefit of both the workmen and the State. Both the National Association of German Industry, which is the leading employers' association of Germany, and the Social Democrats held meetings of protest, but the bill was passed on Jan. 18 by a vote of 213 to 64.

[This is the bill which caused the riots before the Reichstag Building which are recorded elsewhere in these pages.]

Submitting the balance sheet to the employes has been called the end of the labor union idea. This idea is based on an equal wage for all those employed in the same trade. The inspection of the balance sheet by the employes, however, will promote the inclination to base the wage demands on the amount of profits of the individual plant. The tendency will be to increase the wages at the expense of the formation of new capital. The spirit of enterprise will be restricted thereby, to the detriment of the nation.

At the annual meeting in October of the largest German labor union, the German Metal Workers' Society, a representative of the Central Association of the Iron and Metal Workers of Hungary reported about the fight of the Hungarian workingmen against the results of the Soviet Republic. Labor, he stated, had lost everything; the industries had been ruined to such an extent that it would scarcely be possible to re-establish them, and the labor movement had suffered to such a degree that thirty years would be needed to rebuild it. In spite of this warning, the meeting, which was controlled by labor men belonging to the Independent Socialist Party, placed itself on record in favor of the soviet system. It passed resolutions tending to make the society a revolutionary industrial body and resulting in a break with the working kartel between the employers' organizations and the employes' organizations, established in November, 1918, after struggles extending over decades. This kartel agreement, by the way, contains a section by which the employers' organizations bind themselves to discontinue supporting the so-called yellow labor unions, which are company unions such as the Interborough Rapid Transit Brotherhood.

The capacity of labor is still far below that of pre-war days. At the annual meeting in October of the Laurahuetten, one of the largest German coal and iron works, President Hilger mentioned that the mining capacity per man and shift had sunk from 1.4 tons before the war to 0.4 ton, and only very lately it has risen to 0.6 ton. In addition to the lack of desire to work and the shortening of the working day to eight and seven hours, he blames the lack of proper nourishment. He adds that the workmen carry on too much politics, the Laurahuetten alone having twenty-five employes' committees with 199 ordinary and 368 substitute members. The recent annual report of the Harpen Corporation, another large coal mining concern, states that the daily hours of actual work of a miner amount to five only.

The strike in October of the Berlin metal workers gave a good picture of the current aversion to work, and a member of the Work Committee of the Great Berlin Street Railway Company made the remark (also as late as October last) that labor was interested in "decreasing the output of the German factories as much as possible, so as to eliminate capitalism." In view of such recent utterances, is it astonishing to see other countries somewhat loath to grant credits to the German Nation?

Piece work in the large plants was abolished through the revolution, and the drone receives the same wage as the industrious. In some plants piece work has been reintroduced; yet on the whole organized labor is opposed to it. A vote in November of the shipyards' employes showed this result: for the reintroduction of piece work, 29,210 votes; against it, 35,677 votes. The German workman refuses to work as hard as he used to before the war. He would rather not work at all, and tries to live at the Government's expense. The National Labor Department stated at the end of November that the Government was supporting 550,000 unemployed. The total amount of money paid to unemployed for the year 1919 will be 1,000,000,000 marks.

A citizens' organization called the Technical Emergency Aid has been created to provide for the continued maintenance of essential plants by means of emergency work. Essential plants are those whose activity is necessary for daily life, such as gas, water, and electric works, railroads, postal and telegraph service, mining and agriculture. In case of trouble threatening the maintenance of any of these industries, the Emergency Aid is not to carry on any productive work, but is to maintain the service.

Germany's Struggle With Radicalism

Proclamation of Peace Followed by Riots and Bloodshed in Berlin—Grappling With Discontent

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 18, 1920]

THE labor unrest which culminated in riot and bloodshed in front of the Reichstag Building on Jan. 13 had been evident all over Germany long before the close of the year. Twenty-five thousand State employees, comprising the clerical staffs of the Government offices, on Dec. 28 marched through Unter den Linden past the Chancellery in a silent demonstration on behalf of their demand for a substantial increase in wages. A new era of strikes and lockouts had set in earlier than was expected. Crime was on the increase. The unparalleled rise in food prices had been followed by enormous wage demands; one Berlin company reported that the increases called for by its striking employees would aggregate 34,000,000 marks.

A new strike on the railways had reached such a pass by Jan. 12 that the Government suspended the freedom of the press, the right of assembly, and the right to strike. President Ebert urged the strikers to resume work immediately on behalf of the 400,000 returning war prisoners, "whom your action on the threshold of the homeland is shutting out from their wives and families."

THE REICHSTAG RIOT

The Independent Socialists, ever watchful for an opportunity to undermine the Government, seized upon the new strike epidemic to organize a Revolutionary Council of Government, with a Provisional Chief Committee of thirty-three members.

When the Shop Councils bill, a Government measure placing workmen's councils under State control, came up for a second reading in the upper house of the Reichstag on Jan. 13 the Communist organ, Die Freiheit, appealed to fifteen labor unions to protest by stopping work at noon and assembling in front of the Reichstag at 3 o'clock. For three hours straggly lines of men, women, and children marched through the streets to the common centre. As the crowd gradually filled the wide Königsplatz between the Reichstag and Tiergarten, only an occasional fiery orator beneath a red flag sustained interest. As many began to drift homeward others took their places, so that while the number of participants was estimated at 100,000 not more than 50,000 were at one time before the building.

As the mob increased, the radicals in the front ranks tried to force their way into the Reichstag building. With only a handful of troops opposing them, they tore away rifles from the defenders, knocked the soldiers down, kicked their heads and chests, and threw the helpless over the balustrade to the concrete pavement eight feet below.

At first the soldiers refrained from using their arms, but comrades coming to the rescue fired over the heads of the mob. In turn they were attacked. The reserves were then ordered out, and used machine guns. Forty thousand radicals fled. Some ten thousand remained. A second round of machine-gun fire, aided by bombs, finally drove off the last of the rioters, who departed dragging away their wounded. The total casualties were 42 killed and 105 injured.

PLOT OF THE RADICALS

It was afterward learned that there had been a deliberate radical plot to rush the Reichstag and assassinate or imprison all but the Independent Socialist members. The big oak-paneled door which gives access to the west wing of the Reichstag building was smashed during the attempted rush. It was the prompt resistance of the Public Security troops on guard that prevented ingress, which would have resulted in the invasion of the Chamber by the mob. Through this door a large calibre bullet fired from the ranks of the mob found its way and also passed through a second door into the lobby, crowded with members.

The Reichstag had temporarily adjourned amid great confusion, President Fehrenbach being obliged to leave the chair, as he was unable to control the situation. Members of various parties engaged in violent recriminations, and members of the Cabinet left the Chamber. A shot fired from a point directly in front of the Bismarck Monument entered the huge glass door leading to the lobby, which was crowded with agitated Deputies.

Dr. Karl Heine, Prussian Minister of the Interior, speaking in the Assembly the next day, assumed full responsibility for the protective measures adopted and accused the Independents of having incited the masses to disorder. The speech was noisily interrupted by the Independents.

Chancellor Bauer said: "I regard it as my duty to express in the name of the Government my thanks to the 'safety police.' They opened fire only after they had been attacked by criminal elements in the crowd and brutally maltreated and killed with their own arms. Signals were given to storm the Reichstag building by the Independents waving their handkerchiefs. Had the mob succeeded in penetrating the building a second St. Bartholomew's night would have ensued."

The police obtained evidence of a widespread radical conspiracy and later made numerous arrests of persons implicated.

Unfortunately they could not arrest the two principally guilty ones, Frau Zietz and Herr Zeubell, as members of the National Convention enjoy immunity, though as proved by many witnesses they and other independent members directed the attack from the windows and tried to persuade the guards not to shoot, but to open the doors and admit the mob.

The Shop Councils measure, which had been the ostensible occasion of the riots, was passed by the National Assembly on Jan. 18. The vote was 213 to 64.

FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES

Herr Erzberger's costly and tremendous campaign to put over his premium bond loan in December had been partly foiled. Instead of the anticipated 5,000,000,000 marks subscription, the amount offered fell considerably short of 4,000,000,000. A striking feature of the loan was that nearly 80 per cent. of the subscribers took only small amounts of 1,000 marks or under, in spite of alluring posters bearing such headlines as "How to become a millionaire." The actual millionaires for the most part held aloof, being distrustful of Erzberger's financial policy, and finding more profitable use for their capital.

This financial stress divided the country into two distinct classes of rich and poor, the former middle class having been swept away. Thus, where before the war a German middle class family could live comfortably on 1,800 marks a year, now an income of even 3,500 marks provided scarcely a bare existence, since prices of everything had risen from 200 per cent. upward. The distress which this situation forced upon a large proportion of the working people in a similar manner precipitated a strike of all the Berlin restaurant, saloon, and hotel keepers on Dec. 18. Numerous complaints had reached the Government that while families of workmen were deprived of decent food, luxurious meals at profiteering prices, through illicit trade, could be obtained at the resorts of those with purchasing means. The Government having decided to enforce the anti-profiteering law, bearing severe penalties of prison and fine, restaurant and hotel proprietors commenced a two days' strike.

During this retaliatory demonstration many visitors in Berlin went hungry, since not even a cup of coffee could be purchased. Hotel guests enjoyed the unique tribulation of watching the waiters fare sufficiently as usual, while service of meals was denied to patrons.

A Berlin message of Dec. 24 stated that the German Government had chosen a new coat of arms for the republic. It consisted of a black eagle on a gold and yellow background without other ornamentation. The crown and other imperial emblems were discarded.

A GLOOMY CHRISTMAS

The high Christmas festivity for which all Germany was formerly famous was epitomized as a Christmas only for the rich in 1919. While crowds thronged the streets of Berlin, it required a long purse to purchase seasonable articles formerly within the reach of the comparatively poor. Christmas trees were scarce and dear. The smallest candle cost 25 cents, and a box of crackers $2. Disappointment was the lot of the majority of children; a small ordinary doll was priced at $4; there was an almost complete absence of toy engines and railway trains, and the revolutionary father now doubted the appropriateness of presenting his boys with toy soldiers.

The press bade adieu to the departing year with such phrases as: "Twelve months of domestic decay," "The blackest and most disastrous year in German history," "Spirit weariness." In a vein of serious admonition President Ebert issued an appeal to the German people on Dec. 31 as follows:

In the year just ended chaos was averted and the unity of the empire was maintained and consolidated. Under the pressure of a reckless force we were compelled to conclude a peace threatening the honor and welfare of our nation and placing the fruits of our work of past and future years at the mercy of foreigners.

The year which begins must decide whether Germany, despite all difficulties, will maintain herself as a nation and State and develop her economic life on a sound basis or whether, through internal quarrels, she will definitely collapse and bury the hopes, even of her future generations.

With these prospects of our fate before my eyes, I urge all those calling themselves Germans, in view of the common danger, to close their ranks in order that each according to his capacity may help to the utmost in the restoration of the Fatherland.

BITTERNESS OVER THE TREATY

News of the final ratification of the Peace Treaty on Jan. 10 was received in Berlin almost without signs of public interest. Telegrams and articles concerning it in the evening papers were not even given the pride of place. The press comments, however, were generally bitter, though not all for the same reason. Among the most prominent papers the Lokal-Anzeiger accorded it the heading: "Under the Knout of the Enemy." The Tägliche Rundschau thundered: "This Peace Is Worse Than War!" The Tageblatt likened the Peace Treaty to the edifice of force erected by the Pan Germans, which fell to the ground. "History does not end with ratification," prophesied the Tageblatt, "when Valliant threw a bomb into the French Chamber the President cried out: 'The sitting continues!' And so the world's history goes on—the sitting continues." This paper declared that Germany had two duties: "To carry out the treaty to the best of her ability and strive for revision." The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung remarked: "It would be unworthy to look sorrowfully backward and useless to seek scapegoats on whom to cast responsibility for our national misfortune."

On Jan. 11 the Government issued this proclamation to the German inhabitants of the territories being separated from Germany:

The unhappy issue of the war has left us defenseless to the arbitrary will of an opponent who is imposing upon us, in the name of peace, the heaviest of sacrifices, the first of which is the renunciation of German territories in the east, west and north, without regard to the principles of self-determination, by which hundreds of thousands of our German countrymen are being placed under foreign domination.

German Brothers and Sisters: Not only in the hour of farewell, but forever, mourning for our loss will fill our hearts. We vow to you, on behalf of the entire German people, that we will never forget you. You, on your part, will not forget your common German Fatherland—of that we are sure.

Whatever is possible for us to do to preserve to you the mother language, the German character and the inward spiritual union of the homeland will be done. We will unceasingly urge that promises given in the treaty shall be kept. Our sympathy, our care, our ardent love will unfailingly be yours.

Across all frontier barriers German nationality remains one entity. Be strong with us in the belief that the German people will not perish, but on hard-won liberal foundations will rise to the highest political, economic and social culture.

Countrymen: A hard injustice was done you and us by forcible separation. The right of self-determination has been refused the German population. But we do not abandon hope. You, too, one day will be granted this national fundamental right. We will, therefore, despite all pain, call to one another, full of hope and confidence in this hour of parting. We will truly ever stand together with our entire strength for the right of our nationality.

Paul Deschanel as President of France

By WALTER LITTLEFIELD

ON Jan. 17 Paul Deschanel, who since 1912 had been constantly President of the Chamber of Deputies, was elected President of the Third French Republic by the Deputies and Senators united as a National Assembly, or Congress, at Versailles. Of the 926 electors 889 cast their votes with the following result:

M. Deschanel.....	734
Charles Jonnart.....	66
Premier Clemenceau	56
Léon Bourgeois.....	6
Captain Jacques Sadoul.....	1
Scattered	3
Blank and void ballots.....	23

At the caucus of the Assembly held on the previous day the vote had been:

M. Deschanel.....	408
Premier Clemenceau	389
M. Jonnart.....	4
M. Bourgeois.....	3
Marshal Foch.....	1
President Poincaré.....	10

Had the caucus followed precedent there would have been every likelihood of Premier Clemenceau being elected. But it did not follow precedent, nor did he desire to have his long and active career of nonconstructive and constructive statesmanship thus honorably decorated. There had been some doubt abroad as to the latter, but none in France, particularly among his intimates. When the result of the caucus became known M. Clemenceau reminded a group of Ministers, who had asked him to remain as a candidate, that he had already informed them of his reluctance to remain passive, but had done so through the pressure of his friends. He added that he had given them the names of three men, one of whom he would prefer to see President. The three were MM. Deschanel, Dubost, and Barthou. He did not then repeat his preference, but advised his supporters to vote for the re-election of President Poincaré. The latter declined, and the "Father of Victory," alias "The Tiger," then said: "Now my rôle is finished." Thus almost for the first time in the history of French Presidential elections the caucus indicated what was actually to happen on the following day.

France and a very large part of the world would have liked to see M. Clemenceau President—some because he would then have been practically removed from active politics, others because they would like to see how he might defy tradition and confuse law by striving to be a Chief Executive in fact as well as in name, others still because they wished him to receive what should be and what he could make the greatest honor within the gift of France.

Once Le Temps urged Casimir-Périer, when President, to "do something." At the end of a long reply he wrote:

"Among all the powers which appear to be attributed to him there is only one the President of the republic is able to exercise freely and personally; this is to preside at national ceremonies."

Every other act has to be counter-signed by some Minister, and the Ministers are individually and collectively responsible to the Chamber, where an adverse vote may throw one or all out of office. Some French publicists have always declared that the office of President has powers of almost limitless potentialities; it only remains for the right man to discover them. There are others who declare that President Poincaré has gone further toward their discovery than any of his predecessors. They have said that he has done so "by exercising the high functions of his office fearlessly and yet with just moderation and free from the dominating influence of others, thus winning the admiration and loyalty of all classes of citizens of the great and valiant nation of which he is the honored Executive."

The only thing which may possibly qualify this prospect looming before M. Deschanel is the fact that M. Briand, several times Premier, has ready the project of a law to make the potential powers of the President active. Still M. Deschanel may have craved the office without looking beyond its traditional functions. As we have seen, he has sought it before. The traditional functions may, therefore, be the beginning and end of his ambition.

At any rate, he comes to the Elysée a gentleman capable of making the Court there shine as it has never shone under any of his predecessors. His dress, speech, and manners are aristocratic, and he has a charming and beautiful wife, whose salon has long been the most exclusive in Paris. He is an orator, a scholar, and an author of distinction. He is also an Academician. Unfortunately, his labor during the war is buried in the secret archives of the Chamber whose President he was, and his public speeches during that period, his rulings in the legislative body, were so overshadowed by what was vital to the nation as to have passed quite unnoticed. And yet, if they had not been "correct" there would probably have been sufficient sensation about them.

Paul Eugène Louis Deschanel was born in Brussels in 1856, where his father, Emile Deschanel, the Senator and professor at the Collège de France, had been exiled in 1851 by "Napoleon le Petit." That exile ended in 1859, and father and son returned to France. (In France, one may have been born in a foreign land and still be President.) Young Deschanel studied law, and then decided on a political career, preferring to enter the bureaucracy rather than the Legislature—a predilection which has shaped in the main his entire career. From 1876 he served as secretary, first to Deshayes de Marcère and then to the famous "Jules Simon," the real father of The Hague Congress.

In October, 1885, he was elected Deputy for Eure-et-Loire and by his oratory and administrative ability soon began to shape the destinies of the Progressive Republican group. All during the early part of his career, like Clemenceau, he was both an Anglophobe and a Russophobe. His attitude was an uncompromising in regard to the French withdrawal from Egypt in 1882 and the fancied humiliation of the Marchand fiasco at Fashoda in 1899 as it was against the Russian anti-Semitic pogroms and the emptying of French stockings for the benefit of the Grand Dukes.

In 1896 he was elected Vice President of the Chamber and henceforth confined himself more to domestic politics, beginning a prolonged struggle with the Left, with periodical compromises, however, as, for example, when the Left took up the vindication of Dreyfus and the separation of Church and State in the first decade of the present century. He was first elected President of the Chamber in June, 1896, was re-elected and defeated several times until 1912, when he began an interrupted career as presiding officer of that body.

His wife is the daughter of René Brice, Deputy from Ille-et-Vilaine, and the granddaughter of Camille Doucet, for many years the perpetual Secretary of the French Academy. His best-known books are "Orators and Statesmen," "Sketches of Women," "Decentralization," "The Social Question," "Domestic and Foreign Politics," and numerous volumes of speeches.

AMONG THE NATIONS

Survey of Important Events and Developments in Various Nations, Great and Small

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 19, 1920]

THE BALKANS

THE presentation of the Hungarian treaty of peace to the magnate Magyar delegates at Paris early in the new year apparently created no excitement in the Balkans, for both Rumania and Jugoslavia had known, since they had been told by the Supreme Council as early as Oct. 24, 1919, exactly what territory they might expect from the new Magyar Republic. The Bulgarian Sobranje amid internal disorders which, however, had little to do with international affairs, quietly ratified the Treaty of Neuilly on Jan. 12, together with the special treaty in regard to the emigration of nationals between Bulgaria and Greece, which had also been signed by the delegates of these nations at Neuilly on Nov. 27. Meanwhile, Balkan propaganda as well as diplomatic exchanges showed a new lining up of the little nations of the peninsula—a cohesion of Bulgaria and Greece, and of Jugoslavia and Rumania. In the popular press of Bulgaria and Greece, however, the conflict over the disposition of Thrace still raged.

BULGARIA—An anti-dynastic revolt aided by industrial strikes began on Jan. 5 and practically ended on Jan. 11 without loss of life by the uncompromising but rational action of the troops. Reports, however, came from Geneva, Switzerland, that 100 persons had been killed at Sofia; these reports were subsequently denied at the Bulgar capital. According to Bulgar Government organs the demonstrations were organized by the friends of the proscribed enemies of Premier Stambuliwski, who were making every effort to escape punishment for following the ex-Czar Ferdinand into the war on the side of Germany. There was no foundation for Bolshevism, but in the industrial unrest, they thought, there was sufficient for the overthrow of the dynasty, and with the dynasty would go the new Agrarian Government. Indeed, a dispatch from Copenhagen, dated Jan. 7, showed that they had half succeeded, that the Stambuliwski Government had resigned and had been succeeded by a Cabinet under the leadership of Dr. S. Deneff, former Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs. But no confirmation of this came from Sofia.

The official press of Athens having declared that the Musulman population of Xanthie, Eastern Thrace, had welcomed the advent of the Greek army of occupation, the Echo of Bulgaria, published at Sofia, on Dec. 16, published in facsimile a note in Turkish written by the Mayor of Xanthie, Tahir Effendi, saying that the Musulmans went into mourning and draped their houses in black when the Greeks came.

GREECE—The censorship still dominated Greece, and it was impossible to secure through the regular channels any news of the exact situation there, where the friends of ex-King Constantine from their headquarters in Geneva manage to get through their paper, the Echo of Greece. As to the alleged plot against M. Venizelos, although certain officers of the old régime were either arrested or placed under strict surveillance in Athens, the affair practically became a journalistic duel between the Constantine organ and the Journal of the Hellenes, in which the President of the Council himself, to judge from his speeches and interviews, took merely academic interest.

The condition of Greek finances was, for the first time since the war, expounded by M. Negropontis, Minister of Finance, before Parliament on Dec. 27. His statement reduced to tabular form was as follows for 1918-19, in drachmai, the normal value of the drachma being about 20 cents, now worth a little more than half:

Revenue—
From Customs	450,269,284
From loans	798,421,989
Expenditures	1,241,714,338

The loans include 700,000,000 drachmai supplied by the Allies. His estimate for the current year 1919-20 was:

Revenue	1,147,669,394
Expenditures	1,541,330,749

He declared that the growth of the revenue, chiefly from the proceeds of the new income tax, proved that the national economic situation was prosperous. His policy included the flotation of internal loans for national needs and of foreign loans for productive needs, chiefly with the aim of realizing the value of the potential riches of the country.

JUGOSLAVIA—In spite of the unsettled condition of the Adriatic question and the political crisis at Belgrade between the Serbs and Croats, reports of American agents from various parts of the country show a revival of industry and a feverish effort for reconstruction. In Serbia there was a great need of skilled agricultural labor and of teachers to instruct the unskilled, of tools and machinery, but of no more alleged philanthropic missions bringing propaganda and food for the voluntarily idle. In Croatia and Slovenia many savings banks had doubled the amount of their deposits every month since Summer; those of Petrinia and Agram were said to have received large letters of credit from American firms, and mining properties were being rapidly bought up. There was also great activity in the timber industries of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and a syndicate to utilize the water power of the Frebinjica River with the construction of a great central electric power station was formed under the auspices of the Belgrade Government, just in time to prevent the whole enterprise, in the shape of a concession, going to an American company.

RUMANIA—In the preceding number of CURRENT HISTORY only an incomplete list of the new Rumanian Cabinet organized on Dec. 9 could be secured. The completed and corrected list is as follows:

ALEXANDER VAIDA-VOEVOD, Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs.
General FOFOZA AVERESCU, Interior.
General NASCARU, War.
Dr. AUREL VLADA, Finance and Acting Minister of Labor and Industry.
Dr. VICTOR VORTESCU, Transportation.
OCTAVIAN COGA, Religion and Education.
Dr. MICHAEL POPOVICI, Public Works.
JOHN JELIVAN, Justice.
INCULETZ RALIPA, STEFAN CIPOP, and Professor Dr. CANTACUZENE, without portfolios.

M. Vaida-Voevod, who was with M. Bratiano in Paris as the representative of the Transylvania Council, publicly announced that the first duty of the Cabinet would be to see that the treaty of St. Germain was signed. This was done on Dec. 7, two days before the Cabinet had actually been completed. Aside from this duty the Cabinet will represent the parliamentary bloc composed of members of the National Party of Transylvania, Bukovina, and Bessarabia, and of the Peasants, and Nationalist-Democratic groups.

The circumstances which led up to the formation of the Vaida-Voevod Government were as follows: After his return from Paris M. Bratiano had succeeded in blocking all entente between his Government and the Peace Conference, through his favor with the King, to whom he had declared that a firm front would cause the conference to back down. To make this front firmer he inaugurated the "Cabinet of Generals," described in the November number of CURRENT HISTORY, led by his old friend, General Vaitoiano.

To his decisive influence between Bucharest and Paris is due the extraordinary fact that after the Vaitoiano Cabinet announced its resignation in Parliament it was actually instigated by M. Bratiano to send a reply to the ultimatum of the Supreme Council of the Paris Conference, which was full of recriminations against the attitude of the Entente toward Rumania and wound up with the memorable declaration that the Rumanian Government would not sign the treaty with Austria—the treaty of St. Germain.

Paris by what amounted to a coup d'état against Parliament by Bratiano and his military friends was frustrated by representatives of Great Britain, France, and Italy at Bucharest, who advised General Vaitoiano, especially as his reply to the ultimatum had been ex post facto, to reconsider what would be regarded by the world as a most extraordinary proceeding—the spectacle of a Government pretending to negotiate when no longer in office.

On the night of Dec. 2, as the ultimatum reached the hour of expiration and no new Government had been formed, the allied mission prepared to leave Bucharest. At the eleventh hour the King, by directing M. Vaida-Voevod to form a Cabinet, saved the situation and prevented a rupture with the Conference, which the evening papers of the capital had already announced as having taken place.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND

On Dec. 23 M. Hymans, the Belgian Foreign Minister, in a speech in the Parliament at Brussels, explained that the negotiations with The Hague would leave Belgium in a better position with regard to control of the Scheldt, of the Ghent-Terneuzen Canal, and of the traffic from Antwerp to the Meuse and the Rhine hinterland, but that in a military way the security of Belgium would probably remain seriously imperiled by the non possumus of the Dutch. This was confirmed on Jan. 13 by an agreement reached between the Belgian and Dutch negotiators. Two commissions were to be formed, one for the Scheldt, to sit at Brussels, and one for the Ghent-Terneuzen Canal, to sit at Ghent. The military project will be laid before the League of Nations by Belgium.

Another Belgian-Dutch dispute involves a change in the frontier not contemplated by the Peace Conference. In this Holland took the initiative. It concerns the twin towns of Baerle and the quantity of Dutch land owned and cultivated in the vicinity by Belgians and the quantity of Belgian land owned and cultivated in the same vicinity by Dutchmen. Baerle is situated on the railway line from Turnhout to Tilburg, about midway between the two towns. Completely separated from the Province of Antwerp by Dutch territory, it is divided into two districts, Baerle-Hertog, which is Belgian, and Baerle-Nassau, which is Dutch. The situation is further complicated by the fact that the topographical division of the towns is most irregular—the Belgian portion, for municipal purposes, being linked up with the hamlet of Zondereygen, which is completely isolated within the Province of Antwerp. Baerle-Hertog has 1,400 inhabitants, and Baerle-Nassau 2,600, including the hamlets of Casterle and Uliooten, which are a considerable distance from the centre.

The Dutch project is to rectify the frontier line so that the political boundary shall conform to the changes in land ownership which have gradually taken place.

Le Peuple, the first Belgian Labor paper to be published in the French language, celebrated its thirty-fifth anniversary. Its first serial was Emile Zola's "Germinal," the right to publish which was conveyed in a letter from the author dated Nov. 15, 1885, reading:

Take "Germinal" and reproduce it. I ask nothing, because your paper is poor, and because you defend poor people. Good luck to you. EMILE ZOLA.

In 1885 the paper was written by one man, set up and printed by five, and had a circulation of 150. Its capital consisted of a few ten-franc shares. Its circulation on its thirty-fifth anniversary was half a million, and its influence at the November election is judged from the fact that it delivered 645,000 Labor votes, as compared with 620,000 Catholic and 310,000 Liberal, and that Labor gained thirty seats in the Chamber, with four Labor Ministers in the Coalition Government, and, for the first time in the history of Belgium, a Laborite President of the Chamber.

Heavy purchases of railway freight cars have been met abroad principally in France; orders for 375 locomotives have been placed in the United States, 125 in England, and 175 within the country. Some of those ordered in England were filled in December. The great via-duct, 300 fet in length and 60 feet wide, on the Ostend-Brussels line, entirely destroyed by the Germans, has been rebuilt, as well as all the necessary bridges of the Scheldt and Lys, likewise destroyed. The German mark was completely retired and the circulation of francs destored.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE

On Jan. 15 it was authoritatively reported from London that his Majesty's Government, apprehensive of the hold Bolshevik propaganda was taking in India, would lead the newly established League of Nations in overt war on Soviet Russia. The next day it was officially announced and confirmed that the Supreme Council, on the initiative of the rectly inspired it, however, are upon record. As far back as Nov. 8 the Prime Minister, speaking at the Lord Mayor's banquet in London, had expressed the view that peace with Russia was most desirable. The organ of the Pan-Russian Governments, La République Russe, printed in Paris, opened in its issue of Dec. 19 a long article on the subject with the words: "The curtain rises on the decisive act of international politics. Official representatives of Lloyd George and of Lenin are negotiating peace." Advices from the States of Caucasus showed that the Bolshevik creed had penetrated Persia; from Turkestan that it had obtained an influence in Afghanistan and was the instigator of the renewal of the war on the Indian Northwest Frontier.

SCENE OF THE FIGHTING BETWEEN THE BRITISH-INDIAN TROOPS AND THE MAHSUD AND WAZIRIS

British Government had, on the contrary, decided to raise the blockade of Russia and to barter products with the co-operative societies there, while still maintaining the attitude of the Entente toward the Moscow Government.

The exact character of this new policy and its general effect among Governments and peoples and in the press had not become known with any definite details by Jan. 19. The events which preceded it and may have directly or indi-

In the United Kingdom the Labor Party, which had placed itself on record as being opposed to armed intervention in Russia, won several seats at by-elections. The negotiations of the Government with the coal miners and with the railroad men made slow progress. Equally slow was the progress of the Government in instituting reforms in Egypt, India, and Ireland in the face of attempted assassination of British officials and of Nationalist propaganda, the speciousness and distribution of which had never been equaled in history. The elections in the Union of South Africa, handled by the indomitable General Smuts, had indeed been a victory for the empire and against the establishment of a Dutch republic; in Australia the supporters of the Commonwealth had won over the Laborites, and the farmers and the Hughes Government was safe. In Malta Lord Milner, coming over from Cairo, announced home rule for the island.

All these conflicting events probably had a strong influence in pressing the British Government to take the initiative in raising the blockade of Soviet Russia.

THE UNITED KINGDOM—December established a new record for British trade, making 1919 unequaled: The total exports for the year showed an increase of nearly £300,000,000 over 1918, while total imports were £315,000,000 over the preceding year. Numerous contractions of Government expenditures were announced, showing on the average a 50 per cent. reduction over those of 1918 and an estimated reduction of 60 per cent. for 1920. Unionist politicians charged that Labor's victories at the by-elections were due to the fact that the Liberal Party was bent on overthrowing the Coalition, and not to any new strength of Labor. Lord Chancellor Birkenhead proposed the formation of a National Party for the purpose of stimulating organization among the supporters of the Coalition and to prevent a premature return to old party questions at the expense of post-bellum problems of Empire.

On Jan. 4 various mass meetings of railroad men rejected the Government's offer of an advance of wages, which averaged 100 per cent. higher than the pre-war rate. Negotiations were still proceeding on Jan. 19. Preliminary attempts for a permanent arrangement with the coal miners were also proceeding. The output of coal under the arrangement reached last Summer amounted to nearly 6,000,000 tons for the last four weeks in December.

EGYPT—An attack by a student on the life of the Prime Minister, Yussuf Wahba Pasha, took place on Dec. 14, but the news was not made public in London until the 20th.

The Milner Mission gained one victory and suffered one defeat. It won over that part of the Nationalist Party headed by Rouchdi Pasha, Ahmed Mazloun Pasha, and Yeshen Sarawat Pasha for negotiation, while the delegation which visited Paris still remained obdurate. Its defeat was when the mission attempted to open conversations with the Grand Mufti, the head of Egyptian Moslems on Jan. 2, and failed. The Mufti closed the interview by saying:

As religious chief I can only say and affirm that it is impossible to convince the nation of the utility of a thing of which I myself am unconvinced. The entire nation claims its independence, and it would therefore be useless to speak in any other language. I do not forget your power, but if Egyptians bend today before force they will seize the first occasion to revolt. The guarantee of force is not eternal.

A statement signed by Lord Milner had been addressed to the Nationalist delegation on Dec. 29. It read:

The British Mission, struck with the existence of a widespread belief that the object of its coming is to deprive Egypt of rights hitherto possessed by her, states that there is no foundation whatever for that belief.

The British Government sent the mission out, with the approval of the British Parliament, to reconcile Egyptian aspirations with Great Britain's special interests in Egypt and with the maintenance of the legitimate rights of foreign residents. We are convinced that with good-will on both sides this object can be attained. It is the sincere desire of the mission to see the relations between Great Britain and Egypt established on a basis of friendly accord and to put an end to friction, thus enabling Egyptians to devote their whole energies to the development of the country under self-governing institutions.

In pursuance of this task the mission desires to hear all the views of representatives of bodies or individuals having the welfare of the country at heart. All opinions may be freely expressed to the mission. There is no wish to restrict the area of discussion, nor need any man fear that he will compromise his convictions by appearing before it. He will, on the contrary, be no more compromised by expressing his opinions than the mission will be compromised by hearing them. Without a perfectly frank discussion it will be difficult to put an end to misunderstanding and arrive at an agreement.

The next day the Cairo local committee of the delegation replied as follows:

The committee would have liked Lord Milner's statement to have been clearer and more explicit and to have contained an acknowledgment of the complete independence of Egypt, but all it does is to widen the area of discussion, as it does not limit expressions of opinion within the bounds required by acceptance of the Protectorate. This widening of the discussion shows that the English are convinced that the Egyptians categorically refuse the Protectorate, and does not allay the fears of the Egyptians arising from recent British political pronouncements.

Lord Milner's statement, as it stands, is not sufficient to induce the nation to reverse its attitude. Moreover, political methods of argument would not permit deliberations between the mission and the nation as a whole. As far as the Egyptian demands are concerned, these are already known the world over, and can be summarized in the phrase, "Complete independence." To reconcile Egypt's independence with the interests of Great Britain and foreigners in Egypt, the discussion can only be with the delegation, and the discussions must not encroach on the sacred rights of Egypt. Long live Egypt! Long live Independence!

Like Ireland, Egypt is one of the most prosperous appendages of the empire. On Dec. 28 the final statement of accounts for 1918-19 was published in Cairo; it showed an increase of $20,000,000 in revenue and $500,000 in expenditure over the estimates. The totals are in Egyptian pounds, the normal value of the £E being $4.98, as follows:

Revenue	£E 27,661,289
Surplus	£E 4,276,963

Of the surplus, £67,304 representing Government seigniorage of coinage during the year, has been carried to the silver reserve fund to meet a possible loss on the eventual recall of the extra silver issued during the war, which now stands at £1,452,561, the balance of the surplus being passed to the general reserve, which, on April 1, 1919, stood at £10,979,838, as compared with £5,103,549 on April 1, 1914. A note accompanying the statement gave warning that the surplus cannot be taken as the true index of the country's budgetary position, although it certainly demonstrates its increased prosperity.

Some of the Nationalist propaganda published by the Egyptian delegation follows in scheme and format the pamphlets issued by the Allies describing German atrocities in Belgium and occupied France. One publication called "White Book" has, aside from the official correspondence, several pages on heavy paper showing half-tone reproductions of photographs purporting to reveal the victims of British flagellation.

With the Nationalist agitation going on in the cities of Lower Egypt, advices arrived in London on Dec. 22 of the defeat of the British columns in the Sudan, which took place last October, continued through the year, and caused the evacuation of a large area of territory. Two British officers, Majors Stigand and White, and about forty others were killed in various engagements.

The British Government stated that the affair was entirely isolated from the revolts in Lower Egypt.

INDIA.—Just as the Indian Home Rule bill had passed through its third reading in the British House of Commons the all-India Caliphate Conference at Delhi adopted, on Jan. 2, the following resolution:

That the conference enjoins upon Indian Moslems as a religious duty the obligation to abstain from participation in the forthcoming victory celebrations.

That in the event of a settlement with Turkey not being concluded to the satisfaction of Mussulmans, a progressive boycott of British goods be inaugurated by Indian Moslems, and that there shall be a gradual cessation of co-operation with the Government.

That a deputation should as soon as possible proceed to England, and if necessary to the United States, to lay the true sentiments of Mussulmans before responsible British Ministers.

The fighting on the northwest frontier assumed proportions never equaled in the war last Summer between the regular troops of Afghanistan and the British-Indian army. The principal scene of action was the mountainous country west of Mandanna Kach, where heavy forces of the Mahsuds and Waziris had secured strong positions. In the fighting on Dec. 19 the British lost in killed, wounded, and missing about 200, including 13 officers killed or missing. From Dec. 21 until the end of the year the British had a total casualty list of nearly 1,000. Meanwhile, various reports were that some of the Mahsuds had surrendered and that the Waziris were returning home, this effect having been principally brought about through British bombing airplanes.

Native Indian Nationalists, principally Moslems, used as propaganda the evidence presented before the Hunter Commission, which investigated at Bombay the disturbances which began at Punjab last April, and during which the troops fired on the mob, killing several natives.

The Chief Inspector of Mines in India issued his report for 1918. In that year nearly 20,000,000 tons of coal were mined, being 14.55 per cent. over that of 1917; the output of mica was 51,572 hundredweight, as against 35,896 in the previous year; manganese, 415,357 tons, a decrease of 16.43 per cent.; wolfram, 72,189 hundredweight, as compared with 79,312 hundredweight in 1917, a decrease of 8.98 per cent.; gold fell off from 22,991 ounces to 19,916, copper from 20,108 tons to only 3,619, and, finally, the output of gems showed a decrease, being 164,115 karats, as compared with 198,200 karats in 1917. Toward the close of the year the demand for rubies and sapphires at Paris greatly increased.

FRANCE

The two most important events in France, the promulgation of the Treaty of Versailles and the election of Paul Deschanel as President of the republic, are dwelt upon elsewhere.

As is customary, the Cabinet resigned after the Presidential election and M. Millerand was intrusted with forming a new one. All but the post of Minister of Pensions had been filled by Jan. 19, as follows:

Premier and Foreign Minister—ALEXANDRE MILLERAND.
 Minister of Justice—M. L'HOPITEAU.
 Interior—JULES STEEG.
 War—ANDRE LEFEVRE.
 Marine—M. LANDRY.
 Commerce—M. ISAAC.
 Agriculture—HENRI RICARD.
 Finance—FREDERIC FRANCOIS-MARSAL.
 Colonies—ALBERT SARRAUT.
 Public Works—YVES LE TROCQUER.
 Public Instruction—ANDRE HONORAT.
 Labor—PAUL JOURDAIN.
 Hygiene and Social Welfare—M. BRETON.
 Pensions—ANDRE MAGINOT.
 Liberated Regions—JEAN OGIER.

M. Jourdain was Minister of Labor in the Clemenceau Cabinet and M. Le Trocquer was Under Secretary of State for the Liquidation of Stocks. These are the only members of the Clemenceau Ministry retained. M. François-Marsal is manager of the Banque Union Parisienne. Captain André Tardieu refused to retain the portfolio of Minister of Liberated Regions.

Unlike the elections to the Chamber of Deputies held on Nov. 16, the elections to the Senate of two-thirds of the 300 total on Jan. 11 showed a return of old favorites, like President Poincaré, Stephen Pichon, Léon Bourgeois, C. C. A.

Jonnard, Jules Pams, Ribot and Clemenceau. The Senatorial election had an important bearing on the coming trial of the former Premier, Joseph Caillaux, charged with intriguing to bring about a premature and dishonorable peace. The trial by the Senate as a High Court had been set for Jan. 14. That would only have allowed the new Senators three days in which to study the voluminous evidence in the case. So when the case came up on the 14th it was decided to postpone the trial until Feb. 17.

The rising of the Seine and the strike of the chorus of the Paris Opéra covered about the same period—Dec. 30-Jan. 16. The chorus, which in the meantime had been joined by the dancers and the business staff, finally accepted the management's proposal for an increase in wages and one extra performance a week. The Seine before it subsided cut off several of the suburban railway lines, but fell short of the maximum reached in 1910 by eight feet.

On Dec. 31 the indebtedness of France was fixed by M. Klotz, the Minister of Finance, at 203,860,000,000 francs or at the normal rate of exchange a trifle over $40,772,000,000. The finding of this vast sum is the problem facing the new Government and the new Chamber, for on its solution depends the whole future of France. In other words, the Government must extract from the pockets of 39,500,000 persons, constituting the French population, an average of 5,161 francs each. The ordinary French revenue of the year preceding the war showed a total of a trifle over $1,000,000,000. Thus, if the whole revenue of the State as calculated on a pre-war basis were devoted to the reduction of the debt, France (even leaving interest out of account) would not be free from indebtedness in less than forty years. The expenditures of 1913-14, however, were a trifle under $1,000,000,000, or exactly 4,738,603,534 francs, but then the franc was worth more than twice what it is today.

ITALY

What may have inspired Signor Nitti, the Italian Premier, to second the British Prime Minister in advocating before the Supreme Council a raising of the blockade of Soviet Russia, was a wireless message which the Italian Government had received from M. Tchitcherin, the Bolshevik Foreign Minister, on Jan. 1, proposing a resumption of relations between Rome and Moscow, and pointing out that the Soviet Government was able to open the Black Sea route to Italy. But Signor Nitti then abided by the decision of the Italian Chamber made on Dec. 13, which had declined to recognize Soviet Russia by a vote of 289 to 124.

The sixth loan (5 per cent.) floated since Italy entered the war was opened for subscriptions on Dec. 26, and the total on that day surpassed all previous records, being between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000. Great enthusiasm was reported.

In pursuance of the Government's financial program, announced on Nov. 26, Signor Schanzer, Minister of the Treasury, made his financial statement concerning the details on Dec. 16. For the financial year 1918-19 the expenditure had been 32,599,000,000 lire and the revenue 9,498,000,000 lire, or at the normal rate of exchange respectively $6,519,800,000 and $1,899,600,000. The estimates for 1919-20 were: Expenditure, 9,535,000,000 lire; revenue, 7,491,000,000 lire. In the period from Nov. 1, 1918, to Oct. 31, 1919, extraordinary expenditure amounting to 20,811,000,000 lire had been met to the extent of 12,195,000,000 from extraordinary revenue, and as regards the remaining 8,616,000,000 by means of Treasury bonds.

Prince von Bülow, the former German Chancellor, and the special envoy at Rome, who had labored to keep Italy out of the war in the Winter of 1914-15, took up his old residence at the Villa Malta, Rome, on Dec. 20, but on Jan. 5, just five days before the Versailles Treaty was promulgated, he was requested to leave the Eternal City, and departed for Lucerne.

M. Barrère, who for twenty-three years has been the French Ambassador at the Quirinal, made an important diplomatic disclosure at a reception he gave the French colony on Dec. 31, which threw light upon the French and Italian Yellow and Green Books. He said that in 1900 and 1902 he had negotiated defensive treaties with Italy as an offset to the Triple Alliance, which Italy realized she could not be an active partner to in case Germany went to war with both France and Great Britain.

He said that the treaty of 1900 eliminated every cause of conflict in the Mediterranean, and traced the Italo-French spheres of influence in Africa. The treaty of 1902 added the stipulation that in case of aggressive war against either France or Italy, the other would observe the strictest neutrality, which would also be maintained if one or the other were constrained by provocation to declare war for the defense of its honor and security.

The United States Trade Commissioner at Rome, H. C. MacLean, made a report on the new measures adopted by Italy against unemployment, which practically amount to an insurance against hard times of about a quarter pay.

SPAIN

With little abatement the struggle of the Spanish employers' organization against syndicalism represented by the General Federation of Labor with headquarters at Barcelona continued. Lock-out succeeded strike, and strike and assassination succeeded lockout. Toward the end of the year there was a revolt against the mysterious executive council of the Federation by professional members, who discovered that the pecuniary benefits they had expected to derive from the organization were not forthcoming, for the financial affairs since the departure of the German organizers sixteen months ago had been in somewhat of a tangle with large sums mysteriously disappearing.

On Jan. 10 the Radical Republican leader, Alejandro Lerroux, took the Federation, which is said to dominate by assassination, as well as the Employers' Association, which is said to attempt to dominate by lockout, to task, and declared in the Cortes that both organizations were outside the law. He said:

They have the same faults and the same merits. The employers were laborers themselves twenty years ago, or their fathers before them were, and their code was the same as that of the workers. The employers first attacked the Central Government and then decided to make that Government an instrument to suppress, in many cases outside the law, all progressive and liberal ideas. Juries which were afraid to punish the true culprits are responsible for much of the disorder in Barcelona, and as a result crime has followed crime. As a Liberal-Democrat, if I were the Government, I would suppress juries, because when people do not make the right use of liberty they have no right to have it. The final thing that Spain needs to do is to give the impression that there is justice in the land, and that movement must come from the highest places. Spain also needs discipline, which I am sorry is lacking both among the civil and military classes. * * * The Government should not attack everybody indiscriminately, make arrests blindly and close all social centres, but should find the real culprits and punish them, which it can do if it uses all its force.

The Government headed by the new Premier Salazar contemplated two remedies for the constant interruption of business on one hand and the terrorist campaign on the other. On Jan. 13 El Sol of Madrid announced that under the influence of the employers a strong Monarchist Party was being formed by the Liberal and Conservative leaders to bring a stable Government into power which should effectually oppose the Reds and their policy of terror. On the other hand, on Jan. 17, a bill calling for the compulsory syndication of all industries, trades and professions, affecting both employers and employes, was approved by the Senate and sent to the Chamber. The bill is in the nature of a co-operative formula with the Government as the chief directing agency over both employers and employes.

TURKEY

The first sitting of the new Turkish Parliament, held early in the new year, showed that the majority had a Committee of Union and Progress, of Nationalist character. With this backing the Sultan issued a series of statements pointing out that he would never consent to the dismemberment of the empire. Added to this were several events which constantly made the position of the Interallied Commission at Constantinople more difficult, if not hazardous, and the work of the Supreme Council at Paris void of result. The revolt of the Arab tribes against the British Army of Occupation in Upper Mesopotamia, the establishment of a Moslem-Bolshevist administration in Kurdistan by the proscribed Enver Pasha—the first in history—and finally the large concentration of Turkish troops under Mustapha Kemal, the Nationalist leader, on the French front in Syria, the Greek front in Smyrna, and the Italian front in the Adalia region.

On the other hand, Prince Feisal, who represents the Arab Kingdom of Hedjaz abroad, recognized the French mandate over Syria in return for French recognition of an Arab State to include Aleppo, Homs, and Hamah, under the administration of the Prince, with the assistance of French officials. Austria Facing Starvation

Suffering in Vienna

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

ALL reports from Central Europe pointed to the near approach of a catastrophe unless relief of food and coal could be furnished by the Entente Allies. Contributing agencies to the threatened calamity in Austria were noted in disorganization of the railroads, depreciation of the currency to a point where the crown was worth almost nothing as a purchasing power in outside markets, and the hoarding of money obtained by the peasants in enormous prices for their commodities. In view of these conditions the Supreme Council at Paris voted on Dec. 17 a loan of $70,000,000 to Austria; Chancellor Renner had asked for $100,000,000.

On Dec. 28 Herbert Hoover requested

Cardinal, Gibbons to obtain from Pope Benedict an appeal to the American people urging them to do everything possible to alleviate the sufferings of the inhabitants in various countries of Europe, particularly Austria.

The Christmas season in Vienna was a period of cold, darkness, and hunger. Owing to a coal-saving suspension of railway passenger traffic the city was isolated. The foundation of whatever celebration might be indulged in was upon a two-pound loaf per week, with half a pound of flour or some equivalent. With the exception of apples, food-stuffs were simply not to be seen in the windows. As timber was rated at its combustible value, the smallest Christmas tree cost 100 crowns, while candles cost 8 crowns if available. In contrast with the destitution of the very means of life was the abundance of articles of luxury — jewelry, leather, expensive clothing, and ornate editions in book shops. But these were at prices far beyond the reach of any one other than profiteers and foreigners.

A Vienna dispatch of Jan. 6 stated that the Government had increased the price of bread to 3 crowns 96 heller per loaf (normally about 80 cents). It was intimated that the next advance would be to 5 crowns per loaf. Urgent appeals to the American people to render aid to the stricken country came in dispatches of Jan. 9 from Baron Eichhoff, head of the Austrian peace delegation, and from United States Ambassador Wallace.

The following pathetic letter, written in Vienna on Dec. 12 by Mariane Brandt, formerly a prima donna contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, gives a glimpse of the appalling situation in that stricken city:

Dearest, True Friend—Your sweet and consoling letter reached me, and I thank you with full heart for it. But please do not send anything else than your good words. I did not receive what you kindly sent me; they steal all eatables from the cars. Three other friends have already written to me that they had sent something to me also, and nothing arrived. This is a dreadful time; all good seems to have vanished, and only thieves, robbers and murderers are in the world.

Some friends sent money to me through bank. Some others spoke to Mrs. Kreisler about our misery and Mr. Kreisler sent $100, which I can pay back to him as soon as I can get my fortune. It was welcome to me in the moment, but I do not spend more of it than is absolutely necessary to live. We have already learned to be contented with very little.

If you would read an old Austrian cook book you would not believe that it was ever possible to cook in such a prodigal way, with butter, eggs, cream, &c. Last week we got twelve dekagrammes of frozen meat (less than one-fifth of a pound) the person. My butcher gave me more, but it is too dry to eat and the bouillon has a bad taste.

But more than with the food we suffer with the cold. There is no wood or coal to be got, and the temperature of the rooms is 43 to 45 (Fahrenheit). The days are foggy and rainy. There is no light, as you are not permitted to burn more gas or electricity than they give you, and are highly punished if you do. Frozen hands and feet and my stiff leg are the consequences. They want help and credit from America; the Entente will not give it.

Dearest friend, I am so grateful to you and those people who remember me still in America. I have also some pupils in New York who wrote to me, and if all America would be like these we would have help in our misery. It is so humiliating to become such beggars as we are now, when formerly Austria was such a happy, rich country.

I wait for my death quietly. I am old enough and had a rich life, for which I thank God every day.

A Vienna message of Jan. 9 stated that the Government anticipated 12,000,000,000 crowns would be realized from the partial confiscation of private fortunes, and that it was hoped Holland would grant a loan of 30,000,000 florins for the purchase of food.

The complete text of the note putting the ban of the Supreme Council on the separatist activities of several of the Austrian provinces, which was handed to Dr. Karl Renner, the Austrian Chancellor, on Dec. 17, during his visit to Paris, was as follows:

The attention of the allied and associated powers has been directed to a certain agitation that is threatening the cohesion, and even the integrity, of the territory of Austria from several sides. The steps undertaken by the Vorarlberg Landtag to induce the Vienna Government to recognize the right of self-determination of that province coincide with those movements which are calculated, be it in the Salzburg district or in the Tyrol, to include them in the economic sphere of neighboring States, and with the agitation aroused in the former western districts of Hungary in favor of holding a plebiscite, which is not provided for in the treaty according these districts to Austria.

The allied and associated powers are of the opinion that if the separatist forces should succeed in breaking through at any one of these points, such separation would entail the complete dissolution of the Austrian State and could destroy the equilibrium of Central Europe. The allied and associated powers, therefore, do not wish to allow the existence of any doubt as to their intention to maintain and carry out the territorial, or any other, provisions of the Peace Treaty of St. Germain. Impelled by this idea, the Supreme Council today adopted the following resolution, which it is determined to carry out, and which I have the honor to transmit in its name:

"Impelled by the desire to make safe the existence of Austria within the borders laid out for it, and determined to make effective the provisions of the Peace Treaty of St. Germain, the allied and associated powers declare that they will oppose all attempts calculated to injure the integrity of Austrian territory, or that, in conflict with the regulations of Article 28 of the above-mentioned treaty, injure the political or industrial independence of Austria in any way, either directly or indirectly."

CLEMENCEAU.

Execution of Hungarian Communists

New Government's Vigorous Action

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

ADVICES from Hungary stated that Herr Huszar, the Hungarian Premier, estimated the Communist régime had cost the country 18,000,000,000 kronen (normally about $3,600,000,000), and that the Rumanian inroads had taken 36,000,000,000 kronen. These losses, he added, had produced a desperate financial situation confronting the National Assembly.

Executions of Communist terrorists were proceeding apace. Joseph Cserny and thirteen others were put to death on Dec. 19. Another Communist attempt to overthrow the Government was discovered by the military authorities, according to a Budapest message of Dec. 28. Considerable indignation was aroused in Budapest on Jan. 3 by the action of the head of the Allied Military Mission in endeavoring to prevent the execution of nine Communists on the ground that the executions might create unfavorable opinion in Great Britain and France. The Hungarian Government protested against this interference with her internal affairs in re-establishing public safety, hanged the Communists, and promptly began a fresh trial of Haubicht, former Bolshevik military commander at Budapest, charged with two murders and high treason.

On the other hand, a Berne message of Jan. 5 stated that Swiss and British citizens arrived from Budapest declared that the barbarity of the new Hungarian rulers was as ruthless as that of their Bolshevik predecessors. These witnesses asserted that whoever was suspected of the slightest leanings toward socialism was imprisoned, tortured, and finally executed. Public executions had become a daily spectacle in Budapest, for which tickets were sold at several hundred kronen each, and yet tickets were always too few. The National Zeitung of Basle said: "The most fearful atrocities of the wars of religion are being repeated in the Hungarian capital." The number of victims already executed was estimated at 5,000, many of whom were old men, women, and children.

On Jan. 7 Count Apponyi arrived in Paris to receive the Hungarian peace treaty, which had been waiting three months for an accredited Hungarian plenipotentiary. Count Apponyi was accompanied by sixty-four assistants. Before leaving Budapest he had stated that part of his mission was to discover whether Hungary should make a separate peace with the United States. The treaty was handed to him the following Tuesday and he departed with it to Budapest.

The Problem of Turkey

Survey of the Rival Claims of Territory and Power in Turkey. Which Menace Peace in the Near East

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

THE ever-renascent problem of what to do with Turkey still vexes the Peace Conference at Paris and the world at large. The new political situation which arose in Turkey early in October, 1919, through the occupation of Konieh, an important railroad centre virtually domonating Southern Asia Minor, by Mustapha Kemal, and through the fall of the Turkish Cabinet under Damad Ferid Pasha and the substitution of a new Cabinet headed by Ali Riza Pasha, one of whose members, the Minister of War, Djemal Pasha, was a political ally of Mustapha, was generally interpreted in foreign capitals as a symptom of the coming separation of Asia Minor from the central power at Constantinople, and of an increase of power for the party of the Young Turks.

After setting up a Turkish Nationalist Government at Konieh, Mustapha Kemal issued a proclamation promising safety to the lives and property of all persons without distinction of race or religion, and mentioning the Armenians specifically, demanding the application of President Wilson's fourteen principles to Turkey; he also declared that his forces and other supporters of the Turkish Government would fight to the death to resist foreign intervention.

AIMS OF MUSTAPHA

Toward the middle of October the progress of Mustapha Kemal's movement became clearly evident: the important cities of Brussa and Adrianople, among others, had joined the movement, which was growing steadily. In an interview given at this time, the Turkish Nationalist leader again declared that the lives and property of the Armenians would be respected, and made an attack upon the British, who, he declared, having previously acquired Egypt, Arabia, and Mesopotamia (the Persian protectorate was announced later), was now seeking the remnants of Turkey. Mustapha Pasha said:

It is our aim to secure the development of Turkey as she stood at the time of the armistice. We have no expansionist plans. It is our conviction that Turkey can be made rich and prosperous if we get a good Government. Our Government has been weakened through foreign interference and intrigues.

Mustapha Kemal denied that he was working with Enver Pasha, the former War Minister, and declared that the latter's policies had injured Turkey; he further denied that the Nationalists were seeking to preserve Anglo-French investments in Turkey. British money, on the contrary, he asserted, was being sent to destroy Turkey. The tendency shown by Mustapha Kemal at this time was one of conciliation with the Turkish Central Government and toleration of the idea of an independent Armenian Republic.

CONFLICT WITH GOVERNMENT

A month later, however, it became apparent that friction had arisen between Mustapha Kemal and Constantinople: on Nov. 9 the Turkish Government sent a quasi-ultimatum to Mustapha and the Nationalist organization, complaining that the Nationalists were interfering with the liberty of the elections and were replacing Government officials at will in Anatolia, and demanding that the organization adhere to its legitimate purpose of national defense. It declared that if its demands were not granted the Government would resign. To this ultimatum, however, Mustapha Kemal, whose headquarters were in Sivas, paid but little heed, and his independent attitude grew more pronounced with the extension of his power in Anatolia. His forces were estimated at 300,000 men. To the Greeks in the vilayet of Aidin and the Italians at Adalia, as well as to the Christian elements of Asia Minor generally, his presence occasioned much alarm, especially in view of the threatening attitude of lawless bands of Turks and Kurds in Armenia.

CASE OF ARMENIA

Regarding Armenia especially, M. Venizelos, the Greek Premier, said in Paris early in the Fall:

The Turks do not consider themselves beaten. In Asia Minor, as well as in Armenia, they take every opportunity of demonstrating it. Great numbers of former Turkish soldiers, organized into comitadjis (roving bands) invade unoccupied territory and fall upon the unarmed populations. Unless the status of Turkey is soon settled, and Armenia occupied by a mandatory State, there will be no Armenians left within their territorial boundaries.

On Oct. 10 the necessity for a detachment of preferably American troops to guard railways in Armenia, make highways safe, protect relief work against the Kurdish and Tatar bands, and strengthen the morale of the little Armenian army of 10,000 men was emphasized by Colonel William Haskell, head of the Allied High Commission in Armenia. Cabling from Tiflis Colonel Haskell said:

After an inspection just completed, I find that relief measures in Armenia are complicated by the fact that while the Government of Armenia is in sympathy with Denikin and the anti-Bolshevist movement, the districts of Georgia and Azerbaidjan are hostile. The Tatars, assisted by the Turks, have compelled the Armenian population to abandon Igdır and are pressing Kars and Erivan. This warfare has largely increased the number of refugees to be taken care of, and also makes shipments of food supplies from the Kuban district uncertain. Railroad communication from Nakhechivan to Persia has been interrupted, and there is no immediate prospect that traffic will be resumed. I estimate that there are 800,000 destitute Armenians who will require assistance until next year's harvest.

CLAIMS OF GREECE

The defeat of Turkey by the Allies brought with it many conflicting claims to territory in Asia Minor. Apart from the evacuation of Western Thrace by the Bulgarians, in accordance with the terms of the peace treaty (excluding Mussulman districts, which fell to Bulgaria), Greece demanded the right to protect her nationals at Smyrna, and was allowed to send troops to Aidin. Conflicts between these forces and the resisting Turks led to such severe repressions on the part of the Greeks that the Peace Conference found itself obliged to take cognizance of the complaints of the Turkish Government, which alleged that atrocities had been committed. Meanwhile bands composed of Circassians, Yuruks and sundry adventurous Moslems, which disclaimed connection with the movement further east directed by Mustapha Kemal, were formed in the Smyrna hinterland to combat the Greek "invaders." These bands were said to be loyal to the Sultan and to number some 15,000 men.

Greek activities in Anatolia were discussed in detail in a report of the international military commission composed of Generals representing England, France, and Italy, and headed by Admiral Mark Bristol. This report was unanimous after forty sittings. A portion of its contents, cabled to the United States on Jan. 1, presented an indictment of the Greeks in their measures of occupation of this Turkish territory.

REPORT OF COMMISSION

The report said in part:

The conditions of security in the Vilayet of Aidin, and at Smyrna in particular, did not justify the occupation of the Smyrna forts in accordance with Article VII. of the armistice conditions.

The internal conditions in the vilayet did not call for the landing of allied troops at Smyrna. On the contrary, since the Greek landing the situation has been disturbed because of the state of war existing between the Greek troops and the Turkish irregulars.

* * * No resistance to the landing was organized by the Turkish authorities; the shots fired by the Turks were only isolated cases. * * * On the road which they [the Greeks] traversed between the Konak Square and the transport Patris, where they were imprisoned, the first convoy of prisoners, including officers and soldiers as well as the Vall and other officials, were made the objects of acts of brutality by the crowd which accompanied them, and even by some of the Greek soldiers who were escorting them.

All the prisoners were robbed. All were forced to shout, "Zito Venizelos!" and to march with hands raised. With one or two exceptions, the Greek officers showed no effort to restrain their men. During May 15 and 16 Greek troops arbitrarily arrested 2,500 persons, including children under 16 years of age. * * * There were numerous acts of violence and pillage. Numerous women were violated. Some assassinations were committed. While most of these acts were committed by civilian Greeks, the soldiers took part in them, and the military authorities were slow in taking action to put a stop to them. * * *

The Colonel in command of the Greek occupation forces on May 21 received a telegram from Venizelos at Paris ordering the extension of Greek occupation.

A large number of Turks, men, women, and children, who tried to escape from the quarter that was burning (at Aidin) were killed without cause by the Greek soldiers. * * * The Greeks evacuated the city on the night of June 29 after having committed numerous crimes and acts of brutality. * * * The reoccupation of Aidin was ordered by the Greek Commander in Chief in spite of the strict orders to the contrary of the Entente representative. The Greek authorities acted in conformity with the formal orders sent from Paris by Venizelos on July 2. This order did not permit any intervention by the Entente representative in this connection. * * *

Losses resulting from conflict between Greeks and Turks in the Meander Valley are estimated at $33,000,000 by fires at Aidin and $6,000,000 by damage to crops.

The commission further recommended that the Greek troops be replaced by allied troops much fewer in number, and that Greek troops, if allowed to co-operate, should be kept from contact with the Turkish National forces. It further declared its opinion that Turkish National sentiment would never accept this annexation to Greece, and that the Turks would resist military compulsion to force them to do so.

VENIZELOS PROTESTS

The findings of this commission were attacked by M. Venizelos, on the ground that the commission had no Greek members and had examined no Greek witnesses. In Paris on Nov. 15 he asked the Supreme Council to declare the report null and void, and to rule that another investigation be conducted. In this connection he said:

When the Greeks landed at Smyrna they were immediately surrounded by enthusiastic crowds, which followed them, cheering and welcoming them, and advanced from the port to the city proper, without having occupied the strategic points of the city. Turks and Greekophone residents fired from windows upon the troops. The evening previous the Turks had issued proclamations protesting against Greek occupation, and had opened the jails and freed several hundred criminals, who armed themselves at Turkish commissaries, and began robbing and looting, causing the whole trouble.

We have been accused of trying to change the ethnographic face of the region. I can say that out of the 200,000 Greeks expelled by the Turks since 1914 not one in fifteen has returned to the country, owing to the fact that their houses have been burned or are occupied by Turks whom the Greek command is unwilling to expel until homes are provided for them elsewhere.

M. Venizelos expressed surprise that the Supreme Council should revert to incidents of the landing in its expression that the occupation of Smyrna was only temporary. He said:

When we were asked by President Wilson and Premiers Lloyd George and Clemenceau to occupy Smyrna there was no mention of temporary occupation. If it had been a matter of a mandate for policing, a larger nation would have been called upon. We are too small a nation to do any policing of other countries. But it was our understanding that we should occupy a country which has been Greek for 3,000 years pending final settlement of the question, which would give us title to the district.

We seek no mandate; we seek to enter our home. I should like to have the question decided finally once for all, as the occupation is causing Greece much expense which she is unable to bear indefinitely.

CONFLICT INTENSIFIED

The conflict between the Greeks and the Turks in this region, meanwhile, continued. Movements of Greek troops were resisted by Turkish detachments, and bitter fighting occurred. The Greek forces were reported to number 70,000 men, who were being used through December to occupy and defend that part of the territory which they wish to annex to Smyrna. The Turks, who were in large majority within and around this occupied area, continued obstinately to resist all Greek advances. The Vilayet of Aidin had been repeatedly devastated by embittered warfare. It was stated on Jan. 2 that Mustapha Pasha was concentrating his Nationalist forces against the Greeks near Aidin, as well as moving a large accumulation of Turkish and captured Russian arms from Erzerum westward.

The Sultan of Turkey, in his throne speech at the opening of the Chamber of Deputies on Jan. 12, declared Smyrna "inseparable from the Turkish Empire." A week earlier the Constantinople papers published the main outlines of a note of protest that had been addressed to the Peace Conference by the Turkish Government. The note held that interference with Turkish independence would mean endless chaos in the Near East. As an alternative the Sublime Porte offered the reformation of Turkey with the help of a single power and its experts. Popular sympathy with this plan was expressed widely through the Turkish press and through mass meetings.

ITALIAN CLAIMS

Immediately to the south of Smyrna the Italians have occupied a considerable area, with Adalia as their port. They control the railway to Konia and thence to Adalia, which is part of the new region occupied by them. The so-called Nationalist and anti-Greek bands have shown a more friendly disposition toward the Italians, whose aid they have sought to enlist against the Greeks. The disorders that attended the Italian occupation of this district were also formally investigated by a Peace Conference Commission, and the Italians did not escape without blame.

FRENCH CLAIMS IN SYRIA

East of the Greek and Italian districts is the Syrian territory allotted to the French, which borders on the independent Arab State under Emir Feisal, son of King Hussein of the Hedjaz. Here also there have been conflicts, both between the Allies themselves and between the native Arab rulers. Strained feeling between the British, whose troops occupied Syria provisionally, and the French, who suspected the British of wishing to supplant them in this chosen area, was finally appeased; the British moved their soldiers out, and the French forces took their place.

The situation in this whole region toward the end of December was as follows: General Gouraud, Commander in Chief of the French forces, had relieved with his troops the British military posts in the districts of Marsaitab and Urfa, but the administration of these districts remained in the hands of the Turkish authorities. The eastern area of occupation, including Damascus and Aleppo, had been put under the administration of Emir Feisal. All the British forces had been withdrawn from Syria, and the British military administration of that country was at an end.

CONFLICT WITH ARABS

Regarding the original promises made to King Hussein and the Emir Feisal in respect to the independence of Arabia and the annexation of part of Syria, the differences between the Arabian French authorities were provisionally composed. That the Arab National feeling would create difficulties for France, however, was indicated on Jan. 12, when it was reported that serious fighting had occurred between French and Syrian volunteers, with many casualties on both sides, at Alexandretta and other points of demarkation in the French zone in Damascus. The Arabs had organized a National Defense Committee, which was enforcing compulsion of military service, and had issued a manifesto against foreign intervention in any form. Rival political and religious organizations were uniting, and the force of the movement was said to be considerable.

INTERNAL DISPUTES

Regarding internal politics, Emir Feisal and his rival, the Arab Sheik Ibn Saud, had both presented rival claims at Paris and London, but no settlement had been reached. As for Palestine, Emir Feisal had repeatedly declared that it should fit into the framework of the new Arabian Empire, whose nationals far outnumbered the Jews in Palestine, and denied the right of the future Jewish Nation to exercise predominance. It was the Arab intention, he declared, to build up an Arabian Empire, to consist of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine. No distinguishable boundary, he said, separated Palestine from Syria, with which it must be united, as Syria with Arabia.

A special situation, meanwhile, exists in the north, where the people of the Lebanon under their Emir repudiate both the rule of Turkey and that of every foreign power, openly declaring for a protectorate under France.

QUESTION OF MANDATE

The multiple disputes to be appeased, and the inflammability of the national, racial, religious and political tendencies in all these diverse segments of what remains of Turkey have given the statesmen of the allied nations in Paris deep cause for solicitude. Great Britain and France fully a year ago recognized their own inability to undertake control of either the whole or a part of Turkey; Britain had not financial resources, and her disinterestedness was subject to question because of her extensive Asiatic possessions; France had never shown capacity for colonial administration, and was exhausted financially. In view of these mutual incapacities, and the impossibility of delegating either Greece or Italy to undertake the formidable task involved, the two chief allies in Europe asked the United States to assume the mandate over European Turkey and Armenia, and have been waiting ever since for the American decision.

Many prominent Americans, including Henry Morgenthau, former Ambassador to Turkey, have argued in favor of the acceptance of such a mandate, but there have been no indications that the Washington Government favored it; the attitude of a considerable portion of the Senate is unmistakably opposed to entering into adventures which might embroil the United States in the quarrels either of Europe or of Asia. The opinions arrived at by the members of the special investigating committee headed by General Harbord have been already mentioned. The attitude of the Turkish Government itself has been consistently one of maintaining the status quo, with or without American intervention, and an urgent desire to expedite the signing of peace before Turkey falls to pieces. Turkish public sentiment, at last reports, was crystallizing in favor of an American mandate, to be withdrawn when Turkey was able to stand on her own feet. At Paris, meanwhile, the British and French were stated semi-officially to have at last united in favor of allowing the Turk to remain in Europe.

BOLSHEVISM IN EUROPE

Aspects of the New Power That Has Established Itself by Arms in Russia and Threatens War on the World

MANY varying phases of Bolshevism, including an analytical study of its methods, Lenin's official statement of its aims, the story of its worldwide campaign to overturn all other Governments by propaganda, and an account of the military triumphs and peace efforts of the Moscow leaders, will be found in the following fifty pages of this magazine. An important feature of this interesting array is the luminous comparison of the Soviet Constitution with the United States Constitution made by Hon. Burton L. French, member of Congress from Idaho, on page 313 et seq. Another, which touches the theme indirectly, is the historical sketch of the new Republic of Georgia in the Caucasus (page 281), written by Dr. W. D. P. Bliss, who was connected with the American Relief Commission in Asia Minor. The Supreme Council at Paris formally recognized the Georgian Republic about the middle of January, at the same time giving a similar honor to Azerbaidjan, another new republic in the Caucasus, southeast of Georgia and extending to the borders of Persia. So far as these republics have any strength it will be a barrier to the onward march of Russian Bolshevism.

The success of the Soviet Government in overcoming the armies of Denikin in South Russian and of Kolchak farther east in Siberia, in view of the avowed purpose of Lenin and Trotzky to spread revolutionary doctrines in the Caucasus, Persia, Afghanistan, Mesopotamia, and India, produced a profound impression in Great Britain, and it was announced on Jan 16 that there was possibility of formal military operations by the British Government against the Soviet Government of Russia.

Winston Spencer Churchill, Secretary for War; Walter Hume Long, First Lord of the Admiralty; Earl Beatty, commander of the Grand Fleet, and Field Marshal Sir Henry H. Wilson, Chief of the Imperial Staff, left London on the night of Jan. 15 for Paris, having been hurriedly summoned for a consultation with Premier Lloyd George and other British officials then in Paris, on important military and naval matters.

The Bolshevik military successes reported up to Jan. 16 gave the Soviet Government virtual mastery of the whole of European Russia. Odessa was practically in its possession, giving the Reds full control of the southern coast regions. Their victories in the Don country gave them enormous supplies of food, raw material, coal, rolling stock, and oil. The entire Caucasus region was seriously threatened by their occupation of Trans-Caspia. A large Bolshevik element exists in Baku. The Soviet Government, having established itself on the Caspian and Black Seas, could obtain important recruits from the region, placing the new Republics of Georgia and Azerbaidjan at their mercy; this would give them free access to operations in Persia, Mesopotamia, Afghanistan, and India. The Bolsheviks opened fifty propaganda schools at Tashkent, near the Afghanistan frontier, where Oriental languages are being taught to their agents, who will be sent to teach the Soviet doctrines in India, China, and all the Moslem countries.

CHANGE OF ALLIED POLICY

An important reversal of the policy of the Allies toward Russia was decided upon by the Supreme Council in Paris on Jan. 16. The session was attended by the Premiers of Great Britain, France and Italy. The new policy was officially announced in a statement which appears in full on page 199. It was to the effect that the Allies would lift the blockade and would trade with the Russian peasants, though continuing their former attitude toward the Bolshevik Government.

The only official explanation of the move was that it was intended, by reaching the people, to weaken the Soviet Government; but the feeling persisted that it was indicative of early negotiations with Moscow for a cessation of hostilities and an ultimate solution of the Russian problem. It was construed to mean an end of the proposed military operations against the Soviet Government by Great Britain.

The Russian Co-operative Society, with which the Allies are to deal, is composed of a number of co-operative unions and is said to represent 20,000,000 Russians. In June of last year Secretary of War Baker signed contracts with representatives of the society covering the sale of $15,000,000 worth of surplus army clothing and textiles. In greeting the delegation which waited upon him in Washington Mr. Baker spoke of the sincere desire of the people of the United States to be of any possible assistance to the people of Russia, and explained that it was the hope that when Russia had re-established its Government the "ancient bond of friendship between the two nations would be found strengthened."

AMERICAN WITHDRAWAL

On the same day that the announcement was made of a change of policy by the Supreme Council, Secretary of State Lansing made a public statement regarding the decision of the United States to withdraw all American forces from Siberia on Feb. 1, 1920, along with the American experts in charge of the Trans-Siberian and Chinese Eastern Railway. The official announcement also stated that by co-operation of the British and American Governments 10,000 Czechoslovak troops would be embarked at Vladivostok on Feb. 1. The reason impelling the United States Government to this action was that the defeat of the Kolchak forces by the Bolsheviks had rendered it inadvisable for the United States to assume the undertaking which further co-operation would require.

A further reaction from these developments was a change of Great Britain's attitude toward the Sultan of Turkey. The French and Italians had previously desired that, in deference to the wishes of their Moslem subjects, the Sultan be permitted to continue his residence at Constantinople as the head of the Moslem Church. The British, on the other hand, favored excluding the Turks entirely from Europe. The turn of events in January altered the situation, and it was reported on Jan. 16 that the British had receded from their position and had decided that the Caliphate should remain at Constantinople.

It was reported from Soviet headquarters on Jan. 16 that Admiral Kolchak, head of the All-Russian Government in Siberia, had been captured and his anti-Bolshevist armies practically exterminated; the remnants of his Siberian army, numbering 6,000, had laid down their arms. The same report said that General Semenov, who had been designated as Kolchak's successor, had been defeated at Irkutsk, leaving that last centre of anti-Bolshevist activity in the hands of the Reds. At the same time the Soviet Government announced that any future sentences of death would be imposed upon enemies only when approved by the All-Russian Extraordinary Commission.

COMMUNIST METHODS

Walter Duranty, in a cablegram of Jan. 13 from Riga to THE NEW YORK TIMES, in which CURRENT HISTORY MAGAZINE enjoys the right of joint publication, describes how the Communists control Soviet Russia as follows:

The whole machinery of the Government and army is in the hands of the Communist minority, about 5 per cent. of the total, whose aims and aspirations are no less foreign to those of the great mass of the population than was the case with the imperialist policy of the Czarist régime. Everything—literally everything—is run by the Communists.

To each regiment there is attached a commissar, who is really the civil authority appointed by the Extraordinary Commission of Moscow and responsible only thereto. In theory the commissar has no military standing and cannot give military orders, but he has power to dismiss, imprison or execute the regimental commander if he thinks fit to do so. Each battalion in the regiment has an assistant commissar attached to it. Each company has what is called an organizer, who is a sort of subordinate commissar. Naturally all these are Communists. Below the organizers there are the Communist non-coms and the rank and file in the proportion of one to every half dozen men or so. These are really secret police or spies. No one is supposed to know they are Communists and they do their utmost to seem ordinary soldiers. Thus parallel to the military organization of the regiment or other unit there is a network of civilian control and an espionage system reaching right up from the platoon through the regimental, divisional and army staff to the Moscow headquarters of the Extraordinary Commission.

Through this network the Communists hold Russia in a grip of blood. The slightest incautious word is immediately reported, and drastic action follows. One boy of 18 told how somebody had grumbled about the worthlessness of Soviet money as compared with the Czar's rubles in the old days. A week later he disappeared, and it was learned later that he had been condemned to four years in a convict prison. Even though the soldiers gradually come to learn the identity of the majority of the Communist spies—and it is startling to see how very eager they are to denounce them when captured—they live in a continual atmosphere of espionage and terror.

Most feared of all is the "lying tribunal," a body delegated by the Extraordinary Commission to administer "justice" in the army with absolutely unlimited powers. This tribunal will descend suddenly upon a regiment, coming no one knows whence or when. Even the Commissars and Communists tremble when it is present, for they have many enemies, as they are well aware, and who can tell what secret influence, intrigue or corruption may destroy him?

The tribunal's sittings are the merest farce. Death is the penalty in seven cases out of ten, for life in Russia, never very expensive, is cheaper than bread today. This is almost literally true. At least, in the 4th Company of the 2d Bolshevik Regiment a Sergeant was executed by the Flying Tribunal on the denunciation of an Assistant Commissar, to whom he had declined to sell half a pound of sugar. The terms of the denunciation ran: "This man spoke contemptuously of the Soviet currency, and declared he wished God would strike dead the whole pack of Communist spies and traitors." No witnesses were called. The Flying Tribunal doesn't bother about such trifles, and, despite his denials, the soldier was shot on the Commissar's unsupported testimony.

Not the least terrible part of the system is the appalling secrecy with which it works. Officers and men vanish one day from the midst of their comrades. Sometimes it is learned later that they have been shot or punished by order of the local commissar; sometimes they are held in prison until the arrival of the Flying Tribunal. But always the result is the same—death or a long term of imprisonment.

Against this system no revolt is possible. No man knows with whom he may safely speak, far less plot, to throw off the yoke. What is more, the commissars, who are generally workmen devoid of military knowledge, have the power to punish what they consider to be military faults or derelictions. Thus the company commander in the 3d Regiment was sent to the penitentiary for ten years by the Flying Tribunal on the report of an assistant commissar that he deliberately sacrificed Communist lives. What actually happened was that he ordered a platoon to outflank and attack a Lettish machine-gun post. The Sergeant in charge of the platoon was known to be a Communist and he declined to risk his skin. The Captain promptly put him under arrest and led the attack himself, saying, "If I'm shot trying to take the post it will save me from being shot by the Communists. But if I take it they must admit I'm right."

He did take the post with one man slightly wounded, but he had overestimated the generosity of the Flying Tribunal.

Of course a great majority of these officers and non-Communist troops are serving unwillingly. They are ordered into the army and know if they try to evade the draft or escape their families will pay the penalty with their lives. Neither women nor children are spared. One youngster—a Reval Communist this—told the examining officer at headquarters that he found spy work too hateful, that he applied for a different job and was told that if he did not stick to the work or if there was any reason to doubt the genuineness of his activity not only he but his two young sisters in Petrograd would be shot.

Poland's Fight on Bolshevism

Rule in Galicia and Ukraine

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

THE resignation of Jan Ignace Paderewski as Premier of Poland occurred on Dec. 7 under circumstances which were described in the January CURRENT HISTORY. New light was shed on that event by Dr. George Barthel, Acting Consul General of Poland to the United States, in a public statement issued on Jan. 5, which read:

The resignation of Mr. Paderewski came as a result of conditions which required a Coalition Government, in which Mr. Paderewski had a guiding hand. His successor, Leopold Skulski, is his friend, and took office at Mr. Paderewski's suggestion. Mr. Paderewski realized that his work was done and that his capacities did not permit him to undertake further conduct of Polish affairs; that the time had come for Poland to appoint a Parliamentary Cabinet. Mr. Paderewski is exhausted, and he as well as his co-workers knew that his health demanded the rest he is taking in Switzerland.

General Pilsudski, the President, has been Chief of State and the policies he inaugurated are being carried out without change. Mr. Skulski, successor to Mr. Paderewski, was formerly Mayor of Lodz and a famous engineer and parliamentarian. Mr. Patek, the Foreign Minister, was formerly Minister to Bohemia. W. Grabski, Minister of Finance, is the best known agrarian economist in Poland, and Mr. Wojciechowski, Minister of the Interior, is an expert in co-operative societies, of which there are 500 in Poland with 500,000 members.

In an article printed in the Corriere d'Italia on Dec. 29, Cardinal Karkawski, Archbishop of Warsaw, stated that Poland had her entire army marshaled along the Russian frontier. Poland's strength, however, he added, was limited, and could not stand alone against the Bolshevik menace, which showed no sign of becoming less. France and Italy, he declared, understood the desperate nature of the battle that Poland was fighting to protect Western civilization from the Red invasion, but England not so well. Conditions of anarchy and aggression in Russia, he asserted, would last at least twenty-five years.

Meanwhile the fighting Poles continued to stem the Bolshevik tide. Their alliance with the Lettish Army in the attack on Dvinsk, and the occupation of that city by the combined Lettish and Polish troops, was a good augury of the friendly relations established by the new republic with its weaker and still unrecognized sister nation. The capture of Dvinsk by the Poles and Letts straightened out the line of those forces, and gave them direct rail communication between Poland and Riga. The Poles intimated their willingness to accept a Lettish Governor for the captured city. It was announced on Jan. 6 that the combined forces had advanced for strategic reasons slightly beyond the line of the River Dulna. The Poles held the lower quarter of the line, and were repairing the railroad that runs due east along the north bank of the Dvina; the remainder was annexed to the Lettish front.

The Poles undertook a considerable task in Southwest Russia in occupying and policing territory evacuated by General Denikin and not yet invaded by the Reds. The aim of the Polish Government, as set forth in Warsaw on Jan. 9, was to stabilize the situation in that region in an effort to prevent Bolshevism from finding a foothold there. The evacuated regions were reported to be infested with bands of robbers who had been sacking and burning villages, robbing inhabitants, and holding many victims for ransom. The entire line of the Kamenetz - Podolsk - Proskurov - Starokonstantin railroad had been taken over by the Polish military authorities. The Polish High Command had undertaken the work of carrying out the program of occupation for all the territory tributary to this system.

M. Tchitcherin, Bolshevik Minister of Foreign Affairs, on Dec. 26 addressed an offer to the Polish Government to begin immediate peace negotiations. The Poles were asked to name a convenient time and place. Meanwhile, however, from various sources Poland had information that the Red authorities were planning a great offensive against Poland next Spring, which was being organized by Leon Trotzky, Soviet Minister of War, extensive recruitments, including Chinese troops, were being made, and the raw material thus gathered was being trained in the Bolshevik military schools.

In Paris, M. Patek, the new Foreign Minister of Poland, declared on Dec. 28 that he knew for a certainty that the Bolsheviks would open such an offensive in the Spring. He said:

I have come to Paris and am going to London to push a plan for the effective collaboration of Poland and the Allies. The moment will come soon, I hope, when we can discuss a political alliance with France and England. But for the moment it is extremely urgent to make a strong military alliance. All the allied policy with regard to Russia is founded upon this base.

It has been decided at London not to make peace with the Bolsheviks. It has also been decided not to make war on them. But this policy of passivity on the part of the Allies does not prevent the Bolsheviks from adopting a policy of activity. I come to say to the Allies that the Spring holds for us surprises. Now is the time to get ready for them.

Next Spring we know with certainty the Bolshevik armies will march against us. We shall be entirely alone before this offensive, for the news of the situation of the armies of Kolchak and Denikin is not favorable. In Poland no one thinks of shirking the rôle assigned to us by the Allies, by history and by our geographical position. Our policy can be expressed in two words—stand fast. But if we are to resist successfully, the Allies must give us the material means. The fate of Poland, the peace of Europe, and the success of the Russian policy of the Allies hang upon the measures which are taken today.

Black crêpe was hung inside and outside of every Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church in the United States on Dec. 28 by order of the head of this Church, as a demonstration of the grief of the Ukrainians over the decision of the Supreme Council at Paris awarding East Galicia to Poland under a mandate for twenty-five years. Masses for those who fell in the cause of Ukrainian independence were celebrated in all the churches.

Prayers were read for the future freedom of the occupied districts. It was announced that meetings of protest would be held in all parts of the country and Canada, and that funds would be raised to keep up the struggle of the Ukrainian people against "enslavement" by the Poles.

On the same date the third general Carpatho-Russian Congress opened its sessions to obtain support for the claim of Carpatho-Russia to freedom from Poland. The President of the league, in an address of welcome to the 400 delegates, said the congress would protest against the injustice done by the Peace Conference to Eastern Galicia and the northern part of Bukovina, and would ask the American Government and the American people for support. The Carpatho-Russian delegation in Paris, he said, had demanded that Eastern Galicia, with Lemkovschina, should be reunited with Russia, and until that country recovered from its unsettled condition that those provinces should be ruled by an inter-allied commission with an American Governor at its head.

Representing the same national reaction, Julian Batchinsky, diplomatic representative in America of the Ukrainian Republic, on Dec. 8 addressed to Secretary Lansing an appeal and protest against the action of the Supreme Council regarding the disposition of East Galicia.

According to a report to the Warsaw Diet the region occupied by the Poles in White Russia, Lithuania, and Ukraina comprises 189,320 square kilometers and 8,260,000 inhabitants, some of whom are under Bolshevik control. In this territory all Polish nationals were in favor of Poland's rule. The Greek Orthodox Church was to be given a special exarch and a church constitution. There were 1,863 Polish national schools, 566 Ukrainian schools, and eight White-Russian schools, excluding high schools, technical schools, and seminaries. The University of King Stephen Batory in Vilna had been reopened by President Pilsudski. All Roman Catholic Churches confiscated by the former Russian Government had been restored to the people. From this territory some 14,000 volunteers had entered the Polish Army, of whom 3,000 were not Poles. The General Commissariat had received for the administration of these districts a credit of 192,000,000 rubles, of which some 100,000,000 had been expended.

A report to the American Red Cross at Warsaw, made public on Dec. 22, stated that Major F. B. Yowell of Washington and Lieutenant Paul van Heck of Hoboken, N. J., after spending nearly a month behind the Bolshevik lines in Russia, had just brought 1,200 emaciated and hungry refugees back to their native land. This was the largest repatriation train ever brought into Poland by the American Red Cross. The location of Poland between hostile armies, which forced people in large areas to evacuate their homes again and again, was given as the cause of the large number of Polish refugees. The Red Cross estimates the total number thus driven from their homes as at least 1,000,000. More than 2,000,000 civilians have died in Poland since the outbreak of the war.

The Republic of Georgia in the Caucasus

By Dr. W. D. P. BLISS

THE Republic of Georgia, proclaimed May 26, 1918, is a mountain republic. It lies immediately south of and including large portions of the Caucasus range, which has a higher average altitude than the Alps of Switzerland. Though it has only 50,400 square miles, or scarcely more than the State of New York, it is, nevertheless, three times as large as Switzerland, larger than Greece, Bulgaria, Serbia or Poland, and larger than Belgium, Holland, and Denmark combined. Of this area, however, about 40 per cent. is still covered by nearly virgin forests, with scarcely 18 per cent. as yet under cultivation, while its population of 2,883,257 is smaller than that of any of the countries above named, smaller even than that of Denmark or of crowded Belgium or Holland. To the Georgian, however, this only means that under free institutions Georgia has room for broad development and a large future.

But Georgia also inherits a proud past—certainly 2,000, probably 3,000, years of independence. No country in Europe or in Western Asia has that record, unless it be Norway and Sweden in Europe and Persia in Western Asia. Georgia had her own Kings when England, France, Spain, Greece, the Balkan Provinces, and portions of Germany, Austria, and Rumania were Roman provinces. Compared with the Russian Empire, Georgia, as a kingdom, is a thousand years the elder. According to tradition, its ancient capital, Mtskheta, not far from Tiflis, the modern capital, was founded by Mtskhetos, son of Karthlos (from whom Georgians derive the name Karthli, by which they call themselves), who was the son of Thergamos, grandson or great-grandson of Japheth, the son of Noah. We know, at least, that though the territory was conquered by a General of Alexander the Great, Prince Pharna of the royal Karthlian race threw off the Macedonian yoke and made the country independent in 302 B. C. From that time, though often invaded and temporarily occupied by Armenians, Persians, Romans, Greeks, Arabs, Mongols, Tatars, and Turks, Georgia had never been without its own Kings till 1802, when it was annexed to the Russian Empire, closing at least 2,104 years of independence.

The Georgian, too, has the pride of conquest, the Kingdom of Georgia at times having extended its rule far beyond the boundaries of the present republic. Its widest extension was about 1200 A. D., under a Queen, Tamara, perhaps the greatest name in Georgian history, who ruled from the Caspian Sea to Trebizond in Asia Minor.

Another historical element which greatly affects Georgia today is the fact that she accepted Christianity in the fourth century, the first converts, it is said, being made by a nun, St. Nina. The national church has played a large part in Georgia, bringing the nation into touch with the Armenian Church and that of Constantinople. Almost the first step taken toward establishing Georgia's independence in 1918 was an appeal of the Georgian Holy Synod to the Provisional Government of Russia to annul the union, which had been forced upon Georgia, with the Russian Orthodox Church and to allow it to have its own Georgian Catholicos, or Primate, at Tiflis. This appeal was granted.

RACES OF THE REPUBLIC

One unfavorable inheritance from Georgian history, which affects the country today, is the number of separate races within its limits. Though having its own Kings down to 1802, Georgia was repeatedly invaded by different nations, and each invasion left representatives behind it. Perhaps no other country in the world has such a variety of races, languages and religions in so small an area as Georgia. The main races are Georgians, Armenians, Tatars, Persians, Russians and Turks; but there are also Circassians, Lazes, Kurds, Lesghians, Jews, even Germans, and some French. The Georgians themselves, too, have many subdivisions, among which are the Karthlians, or Georgians proper; the Imeritians, Gurians, Svane-tians, Mingretians and other lesser divisions. All these diverse elements live side by side, often in the same towns or villages, yet each has its own language or dialect, and its own religion, customs and traditions.

This diversity is due in part to the independence of the Georgian character. Very rarely was a Georgian King able to unite his whole realm. One King, in the fifteenth century, formally divided his realm among his three sons, who in turn divided their principalities, so that at one time there were twenty-six Princes ruling in Georgia. The descendants of these many lines of Princes all claimed princely titles, so that a Russian joke declares every Georgian a noble.

What has produced the republic and forced the people into a political unit is their persecution by the Russian bureaucratic Government. No other word than persecution can describe the treatment of the Georgians by the Russian Imperial Government.

Georgia submitted to Russia in order to protect herself from the Persian invasions under Aga Mohammed Khan. The reigning King, George XIII., made over his dominions to the Czar Alexander I., in 1799, and Russia proclaimed the annexation of Georgia to the Russian Empire in 1802. Nevertheless, portions of the Georgian Kingdom were not acquired by Russia till much later; Imeritia not till 1810; the Mingretian coast not till 1828.

But Russia violated every condition upon which Georgia surrendered herself. The Georgians were to retain their own Kings; there has been no King in Georgia since Georgia became Russian. They were to have their own national church; their church was wholly subjugated to the Russian Holy Synod and $350,000,000 of Georgian church property confiscated. The Georgians were to serve only in their own national militia; they were conscripted into the Russian Army and made to serve anywhere in the empire. Education in the schools was to be in the Georgian language. Instead the use of the Georgian language in the schools was forbidden. The local administration was to be Georgian and Georgian was to be the official language; Russian was made the official language, and Russian bureaucrats ruled everywhere.

END OF RUSSIAN RULE

Nevertheless, Georgia remained submissive. Not till 1905, when the Russian revolution reached the Caucasus, did Georgia make any serious effort at independence; the uprising, however, was mercilessly put down by the Russian Cossacks; Nicholas II. was said to have given express orders that no mercy be shown. In Guria, inland from Batum, all the villages were burned, the crops destroyed, the inhabitants killed or driven into the mountains; women and girls were collected in groups, the Colonel of a Chersonese Regiment (the 33d) declaring that the Czar wanted loyal subjects for breeding.

THE CAUCASUS REGION, WHERE THE NEW GEORGIAN REPUBLIC IS ATTEMPTING TO ESTABLISH ITS PLACE AMONG THE INDEPENDENT NATIONS OF THE WORLD

Considering this record, it is not to be wondered at that Georgia in the war did not enthusiastically support the Russian cause and only took such part as was forced upon her. In 1914 Georgia suffered from the first Turkish successes, when the Turks, under Enver Bey, came within a three days' march of Tiflis, the capital. But General Winter, on whose severity Russia can always count, checked the Turkish advance, and in 1915 the tables were turned when the Russians entered Turkish territory and occupied Erzerum and Trebizond. Georgia, however, could do little more than watch the varying fortunes of the war, finding little to choose between friend and foe.

But on March 15, 1917, the President of the Duma in Petrograd telegraphed to the Town Council of Tiflis that the Czar had abdicated—the same Nicholas II. who had ordered that no mercy be shown to Georgia. The Georgians, however, took no immediate revolutionary action, but supported the Provisional Government instituted by the Duma. The Mayor of Tiflis, Khatissian, an Armenian, sent a circular letter to twenty-eight cities of the Caucasus, asking the authorities to preserve order till they could receive instructions from Petrograd. The Town Council of Tiflis, with members added to it representing the different nationalities, undertook to preserve order. The representatives of the old Russian bureaucracy were arrested. On March 20 the Grand Duke Nicholas Nicolaievitch, who had been made Viceroy of the Caucasus, left Tiflis and thus ended the old Russian rule.

STEPS TOWARD INDEPENDENCE

The five Caucasian members of the Russian Duma came from Petrograd to organize an administration. Meanwhile Georgian Socialists undertook, instead, to organize Georgian Soviets. No declaration of Georgian independence was made at this time, though steps were taken in this direction. The first step was to make the Georgian Church independent of the Russian Holy Synod. Other measures looked toward the formation of a national army, the nationalization of the schools, the establishment of Georgian law courts, the opening in Tiflis, Jan. 1, 1918, of a university, the language of which was to be Georgian. On Nov. 22, 1917, a further and decisive step was taken, when a Georgian National Assembly elected a National Council.

Formal declaration of independence, however, was still deferred, while all eyes were watching the outcome of the drama enacted at Petrograd, first by the Provisional Government of the Duma, and then in the struggle between the supporters of Kerensky and the Bolshe-

vi. At last the Kerensky Government fell, and the Bolsheviks came into power, making peace with Germany March 3, 1918, in the Brest-Litovsk treaty, which handed over Batum and considerable Georgian territory to Turkey. Then Georgia and the Caucasus generally felt that it was time to act in self-defense.

GENESIS OF THE REPUBLIC

The first measure, however, was not to declare independent Georgia, but an independent federated Republic of the Caucasus, established April 9, 1918, with a temporary government composed of representatives of the Georgians, Armenians, and Tatars in the Caucasus. The Georgian Socialist, Tchkhensheti, was chosen President. This Republic of the Caucasus did not endure.

The Turks, losing ground before the British advance in Syria, believed that they could recoup themselves by gaining territory in the disorganized Caucasus. They therefore undertook an offensive directed principally against Armenia and Georgia, and succeeded in winning Baku, Batum, and extensive territory. Chaos and a reign of terror resulted. Georgia appealed to Germany to restrain her Turkish allies, and finally, encouraged by Germany, withdrew from the federated Caucasian Republic, and May 26, 1918, the Georgian National Council proclaimed the Republic of Georgia, this declaration of independence being ratified by a National Constituent Assembly March 12, 1919. The Tatars and Armenians followed two days later by declaring the Republic of Azerbaidjan and the Republic of Armenia.

Nevertheless, the war with Turkey went on. The Armenians, being more exposed than the Georgians to the Turkish offensive, made the chief resistance, till, defeating the Turks in June, an armistice was signed between Turkey, on the one hand, and the Republics of Georgia, Armenia and Azerbaidjan on the other. Georgia thus found herself independent and at peace.

FIRST YEAR OF REPUBLIC

On the 26th of May, 1919, the Republic of Georgia celebrated the completion of its first year of life, and had every reason for congratulation as to its record and its achievements. To create and establish a new republic under the conditions in which the Government found itself was no easy task. There were enemies without and within.

In the Spring of 1919, bands of Turks were still attacking in the vicinity of Akhaltsikh and Akhalhalak, west and southwest of Tiflis, and had to be suppressed and repulsed with serious fighting. In the northwest, too, suddenly the All-Russia Volunteer Army, under General Denikin, entered Georgian territory in the vicinity of Gagri, on the Black Sea, and had to be dispossessed by the new Georgian Army.

Between the republics of the Caucasus itself, however, while there were serious differences as to boundaries and on other points, agreements were gradually made without fighting, and on April 27 there met in Tiflis the first conference of the republics of the Caucasus, to consider such topics, common to all, as railroads, postal and telegraph service, finances, customs, boundaries, common defense against outside foes, legal and judicial matters and the problem of the very numerous refugees within their borders. There was manifest a marked desire for co-operation, with a general recognition of the mutual interests of the republics, a position amounting almost to federation, a representative from each republic presiding in turn. Conditions in the Caucasus, it is true, were still too chaotic for the permanent solving of these problems; but the republics today at least are not fighting.

INTERNAL PROBLEMS

The machinery of government, local and national, in the Republic of Georgia had to be created almost de novo, but the difficult task seems to have been accomplished with great success. From the first, the republic adopted an ultra-democratic basis. The members of the Constituent Assembly which ratified the act of independence were elected by the direct, equal, universal, secret and proportional voting of both sexes. All races and peoples were represented, there being chosen 109 Social Democrats (Socialists), 9 National Democrats, 8 Social Federalists, and 5 Socialist Revolutionaries, so that the republic may be characterized as one of moderate socialism. The President of the republic is Noah Zhordania.

Georgia is not Bolshevik. There was an effort to establish Soviets, but in April, 1918, the special Transcaucasian Commission issued an order for each nationality to establish town or village councils, and in Georgia this was largely done. It is on this basis that the republic rests. A satisfactory financial system has been worked out. The paper ruble of the Caucasus has, it is true, little exchange value, but it meets the emergency, and a system of taxation has been developed, mainly of direct taxes. It is estimated that the indirect taxes will bring in 61,000,000 rubles, or about four times as much as in 1917, and the direct taxes 90,000,000 rubles, or eight times as much as in 1917.

ALL LAND NATIONALIZED

Agrarian reform has played a large part in working out the new system. All land in the State has been nationalized, being taken from the owners without compensation; but such portions as it was believed they could profitably cultivate have been given back to the original owners in fee simple, while the balance has been divided among peasant proprietors or is used for school or other public purposes. All marks of nobility have been canceled, and the former nobility have largely tendered their lands for school purposes. Thus the country has a very wide distribution of land for all.

All, however, is not harmony. The Georgian is prone to fight. A story is told of the Police Commissioner of Tiflis consulting an English Commissioner as to how to stop fights in the street. The English Commissioner suggested taking away arms from the fighters. The Police Commissioner answered that he had tried that the other night. He had taken arms from two fighters and found that one was the Commissioner of Education and the other Commissioner of Finance. [The titles in this story are altered.]

Industry and agriculture, under the old Russian bureaucracy, were little encouraged, so that there is great need of development for both; but the natural resources and opportunities of Georgia are great. Railroads starting from Batum and Poti, on the Black Sea, and connected, through Baku, with the Russian railway system, pass through Tiflis, southwest to Erzerum, in Asia Minor, and southeast to Tauris, in Persia; so that Georgia becomes the commercial approach to all Central Asia. Georgia is rich in copper, manganese, and "white coal"; there is also gold and argentiferous lead, antimony and tin, with important beds of peat. There are numerous mineral springs. Sulphur is everywhere, while mountain timber is scarcely touched. With peace at home, the Georgian Republic awaits only a world peace to enter upon unquestioned prosperity.

The Lettish Witches' Caldron

By MAJOR GEN. COUNT VON DER GOLTZ

[FORMER COMMANDER OF GERMAN FORCES IN THE BALTIC STATES]

Special interest attaches to this article because it is written by the General who commanded the German forces remaining in the Baltic States of Russia after the armistice, and a part of whose army—the "Iron Brigade"—attacked Riga under Colonel Bermond and was finally driven home ignominiously by the Letts after heavy fighting. The article gives the German viewpoint and explanation of the Baltic situation, both in the printed words and in what may be read between the lines. It has been translated for CURRENT HISTORY from the Berlin magazine Die Woche of Nov. 1, 1919.

WHEN on a dull morning of Dec. 16, 1918, the last German troops left the port of Helsingfors, there resounded in the German soldiers' ears from 25,000 throats an enthusiastic "Hoch Deutschland!" and "Auf Wiedersehen!" The Finns had become attached to their liberators, not only because the latter had freed them, but also because in the course of their eight months' stay in Finland these conscientious, upright German soldiers had won their high esteem as human beings, and also because the German troops, despite the direct danger of contamination by way of the sea, had held themselves aloof from the revolution and from military Soviets, and had thus prevented the German revolution from being carried into Finland. All Finns were united in this affection for Germany, whatever their descent or the political faction to which they belonged.

It was therefore not surprising that when, a month later, I came to occupy my post as Commander in Chief of the military forces of Courland, I held the preconceived opinion that I should be able to win for Germany the favor of all anti-Bolshevist circles in the country. I believed that the common struggle against the common foe, viz., Bolshevism, would unite us with the population, and that gratitude on the part of the liberated people would win Germany new friends. Immediately, therefore, I called on the Lettish Ministers and issued a proclamation to the people. But no response came from the people, and even in German circles there was doubt concerning the success of my activities. I can still see the smile of the Military Chaplain there, an intelligent and patriotic man, as I explained to him that I wanted to stand above all party considerations, especially those affecting relations between the Letts and the German Balts, and expressed the opinion that the friendship of the whole people for Germany should be built up upon such an attitude of impartiality.

Some points of difference soon arose over such questions as policing, conscription, &c.; but all this could have been overcome, if the German General Staff and the Lettish Government could have found some common ground of agreement, and if both sides had sincerely desired to wage war on Bolshevism. But this ground was lacking. From speeches of the Ministers, from proclamations to the people, I soon saw unmistakably that some of the Ministers were themselves more or less Bolshevistic in tendency, and that almost all hated the Balts and the Germans of Germany more than they did the Bolsheviks, and were attacking them in the most insidious and secret ways, making fair promises to their faces and doing the exact opposite behind their backs.

HATRED OF THE LETTS

What was the reason for this hatred against the Balts? They had ruled over the Letts for 600 years, and all the Balts, not merely the one per cent. of Barons among them, felt toward the Letts like conquerors, and despised them because of their low state of culture and their lack of sincerity. This haughty attitude toward the Letts had reached such proportions that the Germanization of this people would have met with disapproval. The Letts were even forbidden to speak German, and undoubtedly this was a great hindrance when they first grew conscious of their unity and wished to become an independent people. Thus from of old the Balts and Letts stood opposed to each other as peoples, the former as conquerors, the latter as conquered. Only in the last generations did the latter migrate to the cities and begin competition with the Balts in skilled professions. They still possessed no culture of their own; their whole culture embodied in the Lettish language was purely Germanic in origin.

On this foundation, then, the hatred of the Letts developed, and especially since the revolution of 1905, suppressed by Russians and Balts at the cost of much bloodshed, the sparks glimmered beneath the ashes. When in 1917 the Russian revolution began again, the Letts became the bodyguard of Lenin and Trotzky in Russia, furnished them their best troops, and protected the leaders of the revolution in Moscow and Petersburg.

And when, after the German revolution, the German troops streamed back to Germany in disorder, Bolshevism flamed up everywhere in Esthonia, Latvia, and Courland, and the whole land went Bolshevik. This continued until our German volunteers brought the Red hordes to a halt just before Libau. The Lettish Ministers, who had begged for the protection of these German volunteers, now grew hostile after the most critical danger from the Bolsheviks had been overcome. Instead of being thankful to the Germans, who under my command had won back Courland as far as Riga, they showed only hatred for Germany, although they were repeatedly assured that Germany pursued no imperialistic aims in this region, and was only interested in preventing East Prussia from becoming Bolshevik.

BALTIC BARONS' HOPES

It is comprehensible in these circumstances that the fulfillment of my original plan to stand above all partisanship became much more difficult. The circles on which I wished to base myself lacked the required political unity, due especially to the fact that the Balts, in view of the increasing hostility of the Lettish attitude, hoped for safety and support for the perpetuation of their Germanism, not only as against Bolshevism, but also as against the Letts. Thus it happened that the war against Bolshevism developed, in Balt psychology, into a war for Germanism. It went without saying, however, that these Germans, in view of the changed conditions, could never return to Germany, that no question of an extension of German boundaries was concerned, and that the German Balts, who had preserved their German culture among Letts and Russians for 600 years, wished only to perpetuate it.

This, however, was necessary not only because of Germanism, but also because of the state of culture in these regions generally. If the Baltic intelligentsia should be annihilated, the country would be destitute of all wisdom and culture. The Letts could not offer a substitute, although they had a few prominent men, such as the subsequent Minister Nedra and others, who, besides possessing culture, had also heart and character. But such men were far too few to be significant. The great mass of the people stands very low in respect to culture and morality. A very large per cent. are Bolshevistic, and the rest are split up into innumerable small factions. The only thing that holds the people together is a blind hatred of the Balts and Germans.

LOW GERMAN MORALE

It must, of course, be admitted that four years of war, with all the inevitable consequences, could not create an attitude of friendliness toward the Germans, and that above all the German revolution had turned the remnants of the Eighth Army—which had remained in Courland—into such a disorderly horde that they had become an actual source of fear to the population. Even the first volunteer units had sunk to the same low condition of morale which the revolution had produced in Germany generally, and I and my officers succeeded only gradually in transforming these soldiers again into conscientious and honorable men, obedient to their commanders. But even after this had been accomplished, the Letts characteristically attacked certain isolated defects publicly, and in unseemly language abused the troops, which, for a volunteer unit formed after the revolution, had become quite efficient.

In these circumstances our relations with the Ullmannis Ministry became tenser and tenser. It was clear to me, nevertheless, that the adoption of violent measures against this Ministry was impossible, as this would only produce new hatred for Germany. I therefore warned the Balts against all violent and purely military action, and hence bore no responsibility for the military outbreak of April 16. I was all the more surprised by it, in that only the day before I had held a council to discuss the way in which we could legally change our relations with the Lettish Ministry. The new Nedra Ministry, however, kept its full independence, both in regard to the German occupation forces and the English demands, and in my opinion was a worthy representative of the Lettish people under the most difficult circumstances.

ATTITUDE OF THE ENGLISH

Even before this Ministry came into power, both English and American commissions arrived, with whom it was my wish to enter into the most favorable relations possible. I succeeded in this with the Americans most completely, but the English, after the first peaceful and harmonious interview, soon espoused the cause of the Letts. The reason for this was very simple. The English representatives were interested in business, and wished to establish a commerce in flax and wood. It was clear that to attain this object they were bound to win the favor of the Letts, and understandable that their relations with the Germans soon became strained.

Ullmannis, on his part, tried to use the English as a counterbalance against the Germans, and soon stood ready to purchase good business at the cost of Lettish independence, and to make of Latvia an English colony under the protecting mantle of a provisional independence. The English ambition to win new colonies in this region became more pronounced when General Gough became the head of the Interallied Commission. England's object was to dominate the Russian Baltic ports, to give independence provisionally to the Lettish people, who were unfit for all Government, and thus cut off the future Russia from the sea.

As it was clear to the English that the Letts would immediately become Bolshevistic after the evacuation of the German troops, they sought in the Baltic Landwehr, in the Northwestern Army of Yudenitch, and in those Lettish troops of Balloed that could be used, a means of setting up a defensive wall against Russian Bolshevism and to constitute a police force to secure inner peace and order. These troops, which were planned to be completely in the English service, were to make the presence of the German troops unnecessary.

The German Border State policy of the year 1918 was undoubtedly a blunder; but so also was the English policy, for it is clear that Russia, already recuperating, and bound to rise again sooner or later, can under no consideration allow the English to occupy the Baltic coast, and that this policy must inevitably lead to a war between Russia and England.

GERMAN INTEREST IN BALTIC

The German interest in this question is as follows: Every form of imperialism, in view of the present weakness of Germany, is out of the question. It would be quite unthinkable, even for the greatest Chauvinists, that extensions of territory could be won for Germany, as against England, in this region. It is therefore ridiculous nonsense to assert that Germany's support of von Bermondts undertaking was occasioned by a desire to annex Russian territory to Germany. But Germany, as well as Russia, is interested in keeping Bolshevism away from its boundaries, and wishes Russia to be healed, in order that Germany may again enter into peaceful trade relations with her. It would be foolish for Germany, through an imperialistic policy in the East, to lose her new friend. The relations now being established between Germany and the future Russia, therefore, are of a purely pacific and economic nature, and if English Imperialism did not cherish boundless ambitions, the English would find no objection to such relations.

The intelligent Lettish element also favors these relations. Not only the upright upper circles, but, above all, the population of the country, who wish peace and order to be restored to the land, and even the jingoistic Lettish factions should content themselves with the promise of a cultural autonomy, inasmuch as a real independence can never be won by this small land, destitute of intellectual elements, of outside aid, lacking coal and industry, and with no considerable revenues, in opposition to the Russian Government, which needs its harbors. The future belongs to the great powers, and it is probable that from the Balkanization of Europe a peaceful amalgamation of all these small States must occur, assuming that the Entente in its imperialism will permit the peaceful development of Europe.

DEVELOPMENT OF MILITARISM

At the present time all the small States are making war on one another. The Entente has lately turned the Letts, Esthonians, and Lithuanians against von Bermondts and his undertaking, with the obvious intention of embarrassing the retreat of the troops still loyal to Germany, so that Germany's peaceful intention to evacuate these regions is threatened with destruction by the warlike purpose of these small peoples. It looks, therefore, as though in Eastern Europe, and perhaps through the whole world, the development of militarism, despite the war-weariness of the peoples, has by no means reached its end, and that the League of Nations was devised only to throw dust in the eyes of the German Michel and the pacifists of all countries, and under this cover to attain the imperialistic objects of the Allies more completely. But this troubles many prominent circles in Germany not at all; on the contrary, they have only one wish, namely, to be "admitted" to this so-called League of Nations, whose object, however, is to effect Germany's destruction.

The war of peoples which I have described, and which by no means appears to have reached its end, can be prevented in the future only when the conquerors of the world war at last perceive that no further danger threatens them from the conquered, and that all civilized nations have the same objects of inner policy and culture, to make an end of the menace of Bolshevism from Russia, in order that the world may not fall a victim to criminality and ignorance. Apparently, however, the fear of conquered Germany is still so great in England and France that these countries are losing sight of their great cultural opportunity, namely, after the victorious ending of the world war to become the leaders of the world in a common war against Bolshevism.

Cruelty on Both Sides in Russia

By WILLIAM J. ARCHER

[COUNCILOR OF THE SIAMESE LEGATION IN LONDON]

THE extreme form of the revolutionary movement called Bolshevism stands condemned, not because of its atrocities, but by virtue of the fact that it is an attempt at class rule, odious to every believer in democracy. Many writers against Bolshevism have committed a grave blunder by resting their case on lurid accounts of atrocities. Proofs of such stories are incontrovertible, and the indignation is legitimate, but closer investigation would have shown that the stinging anathemas hurled at Lenin and Trotzky might with equal justice have been launched against the anti-Bolshevist forces. It is not the Reds alone who torture, for wherever the Russian marches, and whatever party conducts military operations, their movements are stained by deeds that shock Western people.

Human nature is not the same in every clime, and there is some truth in the saying, "Scratch the Russian and you find a Tartar." It seems as natural for the Russian to torture his foe as for the Prussian, and both have Oriental characteristics which find little sympathy in Western civilization.

Admiral Kolchak's soldiers in war are cruel. The Bolsheviki are cruel, and there were credible reports received in Siberia that General Denikin's soldiers were not saints. Two instances will suffice to show the variation in the point of view of the East and the West. Near one camp where I was stationed two Russian officers had their noses slit and their ears cut off, in addition to other nameless mutilations. If we base our attacks on Bolshevism, on atrocities, the case is lost, not because the stories are not true, but because they are not peculiar to the Bolsheviki. Let me recite a few instances of atrocities on the part of the anti-Bolsheviki from a long list in my possession. The facts are reliable, and were obtained by a member of one of our British commissions. After the coup d'état in November last year, by which Admiral Kolchak became supreme ruler, there was a reign of terror established throughout Siberia. Villages were burned and leading Socialists tortured and murdered. One of the most conspicuous cases was that of Fomin, who had played a prominent part in freeing Siberia from Bolshevism. On his dead body there were more than a dozen sword wounds. Eight well-known social workers and literary men were murdered at Omsk, although the Minister of Justice, Starrinkevitch, personally guaranteed their safety.

In Nerchinsk, a punitive force, sent to arrest the caretaker of the Zemstvo building, who was accused of being a Bolshevik, arrested and shot instead the President of the Zemstvo. In Kansk, the town Mayor, Stepanoff, a Moderate Socialist, was hanged, after being arrested by Ataman Krasilnikov, and the record of the brutal and disgusting crimes of Semenov, Kulmikov, and Ivanov-Rinov—Kolchak's Generals—would fill pages, and many of their victims were tortured and mutilated before being shot. I give these instances in support of the view that atrocities are not peculiar to any party in Russia and Siberia.

Soviet Russia's Peace Drive Vol. XI

Moscow Government, Successful in War, Seeks Peace With Baltic States—Armistice With Esthonia

[PERIOD ENDED JAN. 15, 1920]

THE Soviet Government of Russia, triumphant over the anti-Bolshevist armies on all fronts, with the army of Yudenitch scattered and demoralized, with General Denikin retreating further and further in South Russia, with Admiral Kolchak's armies in full flight toward Irkutsk, Kolchak himself virtually self-deposed and his Government threatened by internal revolt, continued violent assaults upon the Esthonian front in December and January, while conducting peace negotiations with Esthonian delegates at Dorpat. Negotiations at this historic conference, the first official discussion of peace which the Bolsheviks had been able to secure with any of their enemies, were repeatedly threatened with failure, owing mainly to the demands of the Bolshevik envoys regarding strategic boundaries.

These difficulties, however, were overcome, and an armistice of one week, automatically renewable from week to week, was finally signed on the last day in December. The negotiations of the Soviet envoy, Litvinov, with the British representatives at Copenhagen, regarding an exchange of prisoners, were interrupted by the British representative's departure to London for consultation and report, and subsequently resumed. They were still continuing when these pages went to press.

Despite the military successes won by the Red Army, conditions in Soviet Russia continued unfavorable in respect to food, fuel and economic questions, and the anxiety of the Bolshevik authorities to extend their peace campaign to all their external enemies, exclusive of Denikin and Kolchak, was made clearly manifest in various directions. Bolshevik propaganda in the East continued unabated, and the agitator, Karl Radek, before his departure from Berlin to Dorpat, boasted that, unless the Entente made peace with Soviet Russia, England's Eastern Empire would be undermined in every country to which Bolshevik propaganda could penetrate.

THE BALTIC SITUATION

After the routing by the Letts of the German-Russian forces of Colonel Avalov-Bermondts and the evacuation of Courland by the German troops formerly under General von der Goltz (see the latter's article, Page 285), the Baltic situation underwent much clarification. Up to Nov. 30, 5,000 military men and 2,000 Russian fugitives who fought under Avalov-Bermondts in the attack on the Lettish capital had crossed the frontier. For the time being they were billeted in the war prisoner camp at Neissen, in Silesia, and subsequently were transferred to Danzig, Nauen, and Grabow, Posen. Some 8,000 of the Russian soldiers expressed a desire to be sent to the northern front to fight the Bolsheviks, and Herr Noske, German Minister of Defense, stated that this desire would probably be granted.

The German forces of the Iron Division, which, under General Bischoff, took part in the attack on Riga, completely disregarded the orders of General Niessel, head of the Interallied Commission, that they should leave the country by fixed routes and by railway only; in direct opposition to these orders the Iron Division marched from Shavli to Memel, at which place, as well as at Heidekrug, billets had been prepared for it, and there remained. As Memel was German territory, the Interallied Commission could not enforce its removal to Central Germany, although its presence in such proximity to the Baltic nations gave the latter much anxiety. According to information received by Mr.

Duranty, German-Balt-Bolshevist propaganda was continuing in the Baltic region devised to upset the Lettish Government and to gain the objects which the Bermondts and von der Goltz adventures had failed in securing, namely, German predominance in the Baltic.

LATVIA AGAINST BOLSHEVISM

The Latvian Ministry, which had shown conservative tendencies since its organization, made strong efforts to combat Bolshevism both on the front and within its borders. It bent its efforts toward finding food and work for the unemployed. Latvia's task at home was rendered more difficult by the destruction and removal of machinery and materials in the invasions to which the country had been subject. It was stated on Dec. 17 from Riga that an English syndicate had arranged to make a loan to Latvia and Lithuania, and also that private American enterprise had placed food supplies and goods to the value of several million dollars at the disposal of the Latvian Union of Co-operative Societies.

Meanwhile the Latvian military defense against the onslaughts of the Red Army showed no slackening, though the campaign was much hampered by lack of food and the extreme cold. The Letts were able nevertheless to reinforce their front, which they held firmly at the end of December, while a second army was maintained in Courland, where the presence of the Iron Division at Memel gave the Letts much ground for anxiety. From defense the first of these two armies soon passed to offense, and on Jan. 5 had succeeded in breaking the Bolshevist front along the Dvina, with the capture of booty and a considerable number of prisoners. Two divisions of Letts, supported by Baltic landwehr, participated in these operations, in which, after heavy fighting, the Dvina was crossed. They then revealed their intention to make Dvinsk their objective and thus clear East Lettland of the Bolsheviki; in this project they were supported by the Polish Army on their right wing.

DVINSK CAPTURED

With almost startling ease the Dvinsk objective was attained, and this important city was occupied by Lettish and Polish troops the same day. Large quantities of stores and materials were taken, including an armored train. Meanwhile the Letts announced openly in the Riga press that the operation begun so successfully was "for the liberation of Letgalen" (East Lettland). The loss of Dvinsk was admitted by Moscow on Jan. 6; the Lettish and Polish Armies were then advancing along the Pskov Railway. Rail communication between Riga and Dvinsk was at once reopened. The Letts again began a heavy attack Jan. 9 in the direction of Regziza, the capital of Letgalen Province, and were continuing it when these pages went to press.

The population of Dvinsk gave the occupying troops an enthusiastic welcome. Conditions in Dvinsk were bad; typhus and other epidemics were prevailing, and people were dying daily in the streets. The necessity of obtaining food supplies for the population gave the Letts much cause for anxiety. The military situation underwent practically no change, but the Lettish military command ascertained that six new Bolshevist regiments had been released from the Esthonian front, after the conclusion of the armistice agreement between Esthonia and the Soviet Government, and had been transferred to the Lettish front, on the trunk line between Pskov and Dvinsk, foreshadowing new fighting for the Letts against heavy odds.

A BALTIC ALLIANCE

An offensive and defensive alliance was concluded at Kovno toward the end of December between Latvia and Lithuania for the purpose of resisting future Bolshevist attacks from the west and east. The terms of this alliance provided that the two armies should have a joint commander and a joint General Staff. Both the Letts and Lithuanians refused definitely to negotiate with the Bolshevist envoys at the Dorpat Conference, though each had sent representatives in the capacity of observers. The Lettish Premier, M. Ulmanis, on Dec. 24, discussed hopefully the possibility of an extension of such a Baltic alliance to Esthonia, Finland, and Poland.

YUDENITCH UNWELCOME

General Yudenitch arrived at Riga on Dec. 20. He was accompanied by General Etievant, the French military representative, through whom Marshal Foch's communications of the wishes of the Allies were given to the Esthonian Government. It was no secret that their visit concerned the possibility of establishing the Yudenitch forces at a point within striking distance of Petrograd, yet not in Esthonia, as the presence of anti-Bolshevist forces there at a time when Esthonia was conducting peace negotiations with the Bolsheviks would prove extremely embarrassing.

The relations of General Yudenitch with the Esthonian Government, in view of the circumstances, soon became strained. The Supreme Council on Dec. 4 sent a note to that Government, asking that it cease disarming the Yudenitch soldiers who had crossed its boundaries, and that it permit the reorganization of the whole army on Esthonian soil. To this note the Esthonians replied on Dec. 13, declaring such a procedure impossible, in view of their negotiations with the Bolsheviks. A week later (Dec. 20) General Yudenitch sent a communication to the Allies asking that he be allowed within seven days to occupy a position on the Latvian front and there reorganize his army. In this note he declared that his relations with the Esthonian Government were such that his position at Narva had become untenable.

M. Ulmanis, the Lettish Premier, on Dec. 22 stated officially that Latvia could not give her consent to the transfer of Yudenitch to Lettish soil, saying:

This would mean that our internal as well as international position would be in danger. First, General Yudenitch would be followed by the Bolsheviks, and we, therefore, would have to face an immediate offensive from the Red Army on our front. Second, much more dangerous, would be the opposition of our people. Frankly, to invite General Yudenitch is to invite trouble. Everything we possess and our whole edifice would be jeopardized. We cannot take such a risk.

ALLIED COMMISSION DEPARTS

The Interallied Commission had virtually completed the task for which it was sent to the Baltic by Dec. 18. The chief object, the evacuation of the Baltic by the German soldiers of the army of von der Goltz, and their return to German territory, had been attained. Regarding the removal of the Iron Brigade from Memel, General Cheney, the American military representative, declared that the Interallied Commission had no power, as Memel, pending the plebiscite, still remained German soil. Assurances, however, he said, had been given by the German Government that these troops would be withdrawn. Subcommissions were to remain some time longer in the Baltic to assess damages of all kinds inflicted by the army of von der Goltz, including the Iron Brigade; these damages were to be included in the reparations which Germany must pay. General Cheney emphasized the bad behavior of the Germans during the evacuation. "They acted in true Hun style," he declared. Both the German forces proper and the German-Russian forces of Colonel Avalov-Bermondts had indulged in widespread looting, and departed laden down with plunder of all kinds. So serious had been these infractions of all agreements that the commission, on its way back to Paris, laid before the German Government in Berlin a full and detailed complaint of looting and various outrages committed by German officers, with the names of the offenders. The German Government promised to restore the stolen property and to punish those responsible.

THE DORPAT CONFERENCE

The historic negotiations at Dorpat between representatives of Esthonia and the Soviet Government, begun on Dec. 6, were carried through December, with numerous delays and interruptions, and finally were concluded successfully on the eve of the new year.

In opening these negotiations the Esthonian Government issued the following explanation and defense:

The Esthonian people having waged war against the Bolsheviks for more than a year, and having driven them out of their country, must now resume their peaceful occupations. Last September, with the consent of the Constituent Assembly, negotiations were opened with the Soviet Government. It is now quite clear that the other Governments of the border States are prepared to begin negotiations.

The Government hopes that the great allied powers, who have aided us so far, will understand our position. Esthonia desires to bring about the cessation of hostilities. Other relations with the Soviet Government will be settled on the same basis as the future relations between the Allies and the Soviet Government.

The President of the Esthonian peace delegation was M. J. Poska, late Minister for Foreign Affairs; the other members were M. Piip, Foreign Minister; General Soots, Chief of the Esthonian General Staff, and Messrs. Seljamaa and Pueman, members of the Constituent Assembly. The President of the Bolshevik delegation was M. Joffe, former Soviet Ambassador to Germany; Herr Krassin, a recent convert to Bolshevism, who formerly represented at Petrograd the German firm of Schuchardt & Schutte, and who had repeatedly voiced strong conviction of the necessity of making peace even at the cost of sacrifices by Soviet Russia; M. Litvinov, in the intervals of his negotiations at Copenhagen, and Karl Radek, the Bolshevik agitator, who was released from virtual internment in Berlin to attend the conference.

A CURIOUS SITUATION

At the very moment when the Soviet envoys were asserting their desire for peace, the Red forces were attacking the Esthonians fiercely on the Narva front. To understand this situation it must be borne in mind that the solution of the questions of boundary and military guarantees was conceived only as provisional, and that Esthonia and Soviet Russia remained potential enemies until the making of a permanent and definitive peace. The necessity, meanwhile, of maintaining the military front explains the importance attached to the fixing of boundaries.

This question of strategical boundaries was one of the thorny points of discussion, and twice almost brought about the disruption of the conference. Esthonia demanded undivided control of the Gulf of Narva, as well as the Gulf of Luga, both extremely valuable for the defense of Petrograd. The Soviet envoys not only rejected these claims, but through M. Kostisev, a former Major General in the Czar's army, proposed shifting the front west from Kunda Bay, about sixty miles west of Narva, to Lake Peipus. These excessive demands were repudiated by M. Krassin. Then the Bolshevik delegation made a series of boundary proposals, first naming the west bank of the Narva and then the east bank. Later they proposed to consider the Narva as the provisional frontier, and to arrange for a plebiscite in disputed territory between the Narva and Luga Rivers after the war. The Esthonians refused to evacuate such territory, and a deadlock was reached again.

A strenuous attempt to conclude an agreement by Christmas failed in a conference lasting late into Christmas morning, because of the refusal of the Bolshevik envoys to concede Esthonia's right to fortify part of the Narva front. This difficulty was eventually solved by removing Esthonia's frontier ten kilometers east of the Narva River, both parties agreeing that the Gulf of Finland should be neutral water. The frontier further south was fixed at ten kilometers east of Lake Peipus, crossing Lake Peipus and Lake Pskov, and running thence southward to the east of Isborsk. The Esthonian military line was left approximately intact.

Soviet Russia renounced all sovereign rights over Esthonia. The text of this clause, most important for Esthonia, haunted by the constant fear of the imperialistic intentions of Denikin, Kolchak, and the Allies, was as follows:

In accordance with the principles proclaimed by the Soviet Russian Government of the right of all peoples to a free determination of their nationality, even to the complete secession from the State to which they belong, Russia recognizes without reservation the independence of the Esthonian State and freely abdicates for all time all the sovereign rights which belonged to Russia with respect to Esthonia's land and people in accordance with former State orders, as well as those rights given under international treaties. Esthonian land and people shall have no obligations whatever with respect to Russia because of the former connections of Esthonia with Russia.

ARMISTICE SIGNED

Thus having found a basis of mutual adjustment, the delegates of the two countries met on Dec. 31 to sign a preliminary armistice. The delegates were seated at a large, round table, with the respective heads of each delegation, M. Poska and M. Joffe, in the centre, and the two delegations facing each other. The formalities took only twenty minutes. The clerical staff, which included many young women, chatted unconcernedly at tables in the corners. M. Joffe, wearing a red insignia on the lapel of his frock coat, offered the only color in the gathering. The armistice itself, as signed, was only for one week, automatically renewable from week to week, with full power on the part of either Government to denounce it within twenty-four hours' notice. A full armistice, or preliminary peace, was subject to Esthonia's Constituent Assembly, which was not scheduled to meet until the end of January. Thus Soviet Russia was virtually put on probation for one month.

Under the armistice, as signed, the Esthonians were not required to eject from their territory soldiers who had fought under General Yudenitch in his abortive campaign against Petrograd until after the peace treaty between Esthonia and Soviet Russia should be ratified. This excited much surprise on the part of the allied representatives. The Bolshevik envoys, however, admitted that they had made great concessions regarding frontiers and military guarantees. M. Joffe himself declared at Dorpat the day following the signing: "I far exceeded the latitude allowed by the Moscow Government, and expect to be called to account for it when I return, but we have shown that we are able to make peace."

According to advices received by the State Department at Washington on Dec. 31, the Governments of Esthonia, Latvia, and Lithuania had asked the Governments of Poland and Finland to join them in a conference at Helsingfors with a view to discussing plans for military defense against the Bolsheviks. Finland had agreed to join this conference; Poland had not decided, but the probabilities were favorable. Esthonia's part in such a conference remained open to doubt, owing to the signing of the armistice with the Soviet Government.

THE DENIKIN DEBACLE

The Reds' military successes against Denikin in the south continued uninterrupted throughout December and January. The Denikin forces were retreating continuously from about Dec. 10; between that date and Dec. 18 they had been compelled to fall back another fifty miles on a wide front. By this time Poltava, Kharkov, and Kiev had been taken by the Bolsheviks, and Odessa was aimed at. The Bolshevik success was explained by the fact that the fighting in other sectors had so slackened that they were able to rush heavy reinforcements south. The Bolsheviks were committing atrocities in Kursk and other occupied towns, and throngs of refugees fled from their advance.

The army of Denikin strove desperately to prevent the Reds from cutting their way through the Donetz coal basin to the Black Sea and the Caucasus. Small, sporadic successes were won, but the Red cavalry drove the Denikin forces back again on a wide front. Cossack units under Mamontov and Chelnokov were defeated by the Soviet troops, and over a thousand Cossacks killed. Much booty was captured. Rostov, on the Don, was partly evacuated, and the civilian population of Odessa began to flee.

On Jan. 1 the Bolsheviks announced the capture of Ekaterinoslav and a point 15 miles to the northeast. The Bolsheviks at this time were advancing toward Taganrog, Denikin's headquarters. The position of Denikin was daily becoming more critical. The Donetz coal basin was lost, less than 100 miles from the coast; the left flank of the Caucasus army was imperiled, and the Red forces were within eighty miles of Krasnovodsk in the Transcaspian territory.

On the west the port of Mariupol, on the Sea of Azov, sixty-three miles west of Taganrog, was captured by the victorious Red troops, and subsequently Taganrog itself; the Denikin forces fled on steamers and by foot along the coast. The Bolsheviks were advancing at all points. Strong defensive preparations were being made at Odessa.

KOLCHAK RULE SHAKEN

After the loss of his capital and the rout of his armies by the Bolsheviks, Admiral Kolchak appointed M. Pepelaiev Premier of the All-Russian Government and charged him to form a new Cabinet. M. Pepelaiev was a Constitutional Democrat (Cadet), a former member of the Fourth Duma, a member of Lvov's Government during the revolution, who resigned on Kerensky's accession to power and became a common soldier. When the Bolshevik coup d'état occurred he at once took an anti-Soviet attitude, and was sent to Ufa, in Siberia, to build up a new Government. The Cabinet formed by him was as follows:

SCENE OF BOLSHEVIST SUCCESSES AGAINST DENIKIN IN SOUTH RUSSIA

Premier and Minister of Home Affairs, M. Pepelaiev.
 Vice Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Tretiakov.
 Finance, M. Bouriskin.
 Trade, M. Okorokov.
 Agriculture, M. Petrov.
 Labor, M. Shoumilovsky.
 Communications, M. Oustrougov.
 War, M. Khanjin.
 Public Instruction, M. Preobrajensky.
 Provisional Head of the Ministry of Justice, M. Morozov.
 State Controller, M. Krasnov.
 Chief Manager of Affairs, M. Guins.

The program published by the new Premier included the emancipation of the system of military administration of the country; a severe struggle against all abuses and injustice, no matter by whom committed; an extension of the competency of the future legislative State and Country Assembly; close relation between the Government and people and co-operation with the Opposition and all the healthy elements of society united.

From Irkutsk other projects of reform in the Kolchak administration were announced. The Siberian people were to have a representative Parliament, a Sobor (Assembly), to consist only of elected members and to possess legislative powers. Elections were begun in the various provinces toward the end of December. Despite these far-reaching projects of reform, the smoldering fires of discontent in Siberia against the Kolchak Government were not quenched, and finally burst forth in a conflagration which threatened the existence of the new Government at Irkutsk and the personal safety of Kolchak himself.

MILITARY SITUATION

The military situation of the Kolchak Government grew steadily worse. At the capture of Novo Nikolaevsk on Dec. 13, 10,000 soldiers and 500 officers fell into the hands of the Bolsheviks, according to official Soviet claims. Booty taken by the Reds included a section of the American Red Cross, the Ufa branch of the State Bank, with 40,000,000 rubles in Siberian Bank notes, and masses of other stores. Evacuation of the City of Tomsk, Western Siberia, made necessary by the Bolshevik advance, began on Dec. 16. A Moscow wireless on Dec. 26 announced the capture of Tomsk and seven other towns in Siberia. Part of Kolchak's army had been destroyed and the Red Army had pushed on from Novo Nikolaevsk to Taiga, on the main line of the Trans-Siberian Railway; the road to Irkutsk, the seat of the new Kolchak Government, was thus laid open. Polish troops caught west of Taiga about Dec. 23 fought desperately to make their way eastward. The American consular officials were safe. Bolshevik gains were won also on the Amur line in Eastern Siberia, and Blagoveschensk was completely cut off.

REVOLT IN IRKUTSK

It was announced on Dec. 25 that Admiral Kolchak, in consequence of ill-health, had relinquished the military command to General Semenov, the Cossack leader, whom he had appointed Commander in Chief of the Irkutsk, Transbaikal, and Amur military districts. Under this appointment all other military leaders were to be subordinate to the new commander.

Kolchak himself, harassed on the military front by the incessant onslaught of the ever-advancing Bolsheviks, had also to face rebellion from within. It was reported on Dec. 27 that 800 Revolutionary Socialist soldiers of the Kolchak Army had formed a "Committee Government" at Irkutsk and had taken possession of the Irkutsk Station on the Trans-Siberian Railway. This coup was accomplished during the absence of the new Premier, M. Pepelaiev, who had gone to consult Kolchak at his headquarters, Taiga, regarding the composition of his new Cabinet. M. Tretiakov, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, was also absent from Irkutsk at the time, as he had gone to meet General Semenov in the Baikal region.

After the capture of Taiga, Kolchak's whereabouts remained uncertain. Irkutsk was virtually in a state of siege. Martial law was declared following the uprising of social revolutionary troops. The pontoon bridge across the Angara River had been cut, and American Red Cross boats were the only means of communication. The revolutionary forces were in virtual control of the railroad from Irkutsk westward to Krasnoyarsk, and a report from the Japanese Military Department on Jan. 9 declared that Irkutsk was wholly occupied by the revolutionary forces, and that Kolchak's army had been completely dispersed.

JAPAN STIRRED

Stirred by the victorious advance of the Red armies, by the crumbling of Kolchak's power, and by the constant Bolshevik attacks upon the Trans-Siberian line, Japan took measures to cope with the menace of the new situation created by the adoption of a new military and political policy. The Japanese Publicity Bureau at Vladivostok on Dec. 18 announced that in future Japan would give all her efforts to guarding the railroad, as opposed to her previous policy of giving help to the Kolchak Government and relegating the guarding of the road to secondary importance. Japan had reached at this date a tentative agreement with the United States based solely upon this policy, which had been consistently followed by the American military officials in Siberia.

The main question was how to resist the repeated Bolshevik raids upon the railway line. In September and October 436 distinct raids on points held by Japanese troops had occurred, and these raids were increasing in frequency and importance. Japan, therefore, considering the situation precarious, faced the necessity of increasing her military forces in Siberia, whatever decision the United States might make regarding co-operation. Above all, the Japanese wished to stem the tide of Bolshevism that was washing across Siberia right to the borders of Korea, across which and the narrow straits separating Japan from the mainland of Asia it could easily penetrate. On Jan. 8 it was announced that Japan, realizing the seriousness of this menace, had stationed her soldiers at Lake Baikal, charged with the duty of resisting all Bolshevik advance beyond that point.

AMERICAN FORCES RECALLED

Transported 4,000 miles from the far western front in Russia, more than 200 wounded American soldiers arrived in Vladivostok about Dec. 23 and were received in the American Red Cross hospital, which had been taken over from the British naval authorities.

The United States Army transport Logan left Vladivostok on Dec. 28 for the United States, bearing 842 soldiers. Only fifty-three drafted American soldiers were left in Siberia; thirty of these were on their way to Vladivostok from the railway zone; others were still in hospitals.

It was announced at Washington on Jan. 12 that President Wilson had decided to recall the American Expeditionary Force in Siberia under Major Gen. William S. Graves, and that Japan had been officially notified of the fact through the American Ambassador at Tokio. Our troops were to be brought home as soon as they had finished assisting the Czechoslovak contingents and the Stevens Siberian Railway Mission to leave the country. All the 72,000 Czechoslovak, Polish, Yugoslav, and Rumanian troops were to be got out of Siberia in the quickest possible time. The Czech republic had asked the United States to take care of the transportation of 32,000 of its 50,000 men, and the remainder of the foreign troops were to be removed by Great Britain, the expense of repatriation to be borne in each case by the home Governments of the soldiers.

There were approximately 9,000 American regulars in Siberia, all the drafted men having been replaced. The units included the 27th Infantry, the 31st Infantry, General Graves's Headquarters Staff, the 53d Telegraph Battalion, and several hospital units. The task of bringing these men home, with the Czechs as well, was intrusted to Major Gen. Frank L. Hines, Director of Army Transportation. The army transport Edellyn, the first of a small fleet assigned for the work, left New York on Jan. 16 for Vladivostok via the Panama Canal; the President Grant and the America were to follow in a few days.

The news that all allied troops were to be on their way home before March 1 caused a sensation in Siberia, both among the repatriated soldiers and among the Russian elements which would thus lose their support. Measures for the protection of Japan against the eastward-moving wave of Bolshevik power were undertaken at once by the Tokio Government, which proposed, with the consent of the United States, to increase its military forces in Siberia.

IN SOVIET RUSSIA

The internal economic weakness in Soviet Russia, which explained the eagerness of the Bolshevik Government to make peace with its enemies, continued and increased. Extreme measures were being taken to meet the fuel famine; wooden houses were being razed for fuel and barges were being demolished. Great scarcity of food prevailed. Little work was to be had, owing to the closing down of numerous factories and industrial firms. Steps were taken to send workmen to different towns in the interior, though the industrial conditions at these places were no more favorable. According to the Pravda the number of employes in Petrograd's factories had been decreased approximately 67 per cent. in two years. According to the same authority the number of schools in the former capital, owing to the fuel scarcity, was to be cut down two-thirds and the curriculum curtailed.

The Red terror continued. The arrest of 900 persons, including some French and English nationals, was reported in Petrograd on Dec. 19. Of those arrested 350 were executed, following trial by a revolutionary tribunal. On Dec. 10 the well-known literary critic Edmund Gosse published a letter in The London Times appealing in behalf of Countess Aleksandra, youngest daughter of Count Tolstoy, who had just been arrested in Moscow and was in imminent danger of execution. Word was received in Berlin on Jan. 6 of the execution of Admiral Sakhimev, who fought brilliantly against the German fleet in 1917.

According to an official note published in the Bolshevik organ, Izvestia, 14,000 persons were shot by the Bolsheviks of Russia in the first three months of 1919 by order of the Extraordinary Committee at Moscow.

Karl Radek, who had been sent on a special mission to Germany before his departure as a peace delegate to Dorpat, insisted on the Soviet desire for peace. In this connection he said:

If we cannot have peace we will fight to a finish. We are suffering from hunger in Russia, but the Entente cannot starve us out. If the war keeps on we will set the Near and Far East on fire. We will stir up such trouble in Turkey, Afghanistan, Turkestan, Kurdistan, Persia, and India that England will not have another quiet moment. It is no secret that I have been negotiating with the Young Turks. And we will form an alliance with the devil himself, if necessary, to fight the Entente until it gives us peace.

Advices received in London on Jan. 8 from the Middle East indicated that these threats were not empty words. Southeastward by way of the Caucasus toward Persia, eastward and southward by way of the northern shore of the Caspian, and in all directions southward from the Siberian Railway Red forces and propagandists were overrunning Southwestern and Central Asia.

Among their objects were control of the Caspian, the seizure of the oil fields, the invasion of Persia from two directions, the occupation of Turkestan and Transcaspia, and anti-British penetration on a great scale toward Afghanistan and India. [See article on page 302.]

A Soviet wireless message received in London on Jan. 1 flashed New Year's greetings to the world. This message, after celebrating 1919 as a year of victory for the Soviet Government, said:

In 1920 we shall attain a victorious end of civil war. Siberia, the Ukraine, the Don region, and the Caucasus desire Soviets. There will also be Soviets at Berlin, Washington, Paris, and London. Soviet authority will be supreme throughout the world.

Patriarch's Letter to Lenin and Trotzky

THE evils of Red rule in Russia were restated by the Patriarch of Moscow and All-Russia, M. Tikhon, in the following encyclical letter, which was made public by the Russian Liberation Committee in London on Nov. 26, 1919:

"They that take up the sword shall perish by the sword." St. Matthew, xxvi., 52.

This prophecy of Christ we address unto you, the present rulers of the destinies of our country, styling yourselves "The People's Commissars." You are holding the State power in your hands and are preparing to celebrate the anniversary of the October revolution, 1917, but the torrents of blood of your brothers, mercilessly killed at your bidding, compel us to speak unto you the bitter word of truth.

In seizing power and inviting the people to place their confidence in you, what did you promise them and how did you fulfill your promise?

"Verily you have given them a stone instead of bread, and a serpent in place of fish." St. Matthew, vii., 9-10.

You promised to a people worn out by sanguinary war to give them peace "without annexations and indemnities."

What conquests could you renounce, you, who have brought Russia to a shameful peace, the humiliating conditions of which even you dared not fully publish? In place of annexations and contributions our great Motherland herself is conquered, humiliated, and dismembered. You have robbed the fighting men of all they lately gallantly fought for. You have taught those who a short while ago were brave and invincible to give up the defense of their country and flee from the battlefield. You have quenched in their hearts the inspiring consciousness that "greater love hath no man than this, to lay down his life for his friend." You have replaced the Motherland by a soulless Internationale, although you yourselves know full well that where the defense of their native country was concerned the proletarians of all lands were its loyal sons and not traitors. Having refused to defend your country from external foes, you are nevertheless continually organizing armies. Against whom are you leading them? You have divided the whole people into enemy camps and have hurled them into fratricide unheard of for its cruelty. You have openly exchanged the love of Christ for hatred, and instead of giving peace have artificially kindled class war. And there seems no end to the war originated by you, for you aspire by the hands of Russian workers and peasants to bring about the triumph of the phantom of world revolution.

It was not that Russia needed the shameful peace with the external enemy, but that you desired to break completely our internal peace. Nobody feels safe; all live in constant fear of perquisition, robbery, arrest, execution; hundreds of defenseless people are seized daily, and lie for months rotting in foul prisons, are executed without investigation or trial, even without the simplified method of trial established by you. Not only are those executed who are found guilty toward you, but also those whom you well know to be innocent, and who were merely taken as "hostages"; these unfortunate people are killed in vengeance for crimes committed not by their relatives or friends, but frequently by your own adherents or by persons sympathizing with your own views. Innocent Bishops, priests, monks, and nuns are shot on a wholesale, vague and indefinite accusation of "counter-revolution." This inhuman existence is made still harder for the orthodox believers by their being bereft of the last consolation before death—the taking of the holy communion—and by the bodies of those slain being refused to their relatives for Christian burial.

Does not all this represent the culmination of aimless cruelty on the part of those who pose as the benefactors of humanity, and have themselves, as they say, suffered much from cruel authorities?

But you are not content with having smeared the hands of the Russian people with the blood of their brethren; by concealing it under different terms, such as contributions, requisitions, nationalizations, you have pushed them toward the most open and shameless robbery.

You have incited them to destroy and seize the land, farms, works, factories, houses, cattle, to loot money, furniture, clothes. At first wealthy people were robbed on the pretense of their being "bourgeoisie," then hard-working and well-to-do peasants, because they were supposed to be "kulaki," thus increasing the number of paupers, although you cannot but know that by ruining multitudes of private citizens you are destroying national wealth and ruining the country. By tempting the ignorant people with the possibility of easily acquired loot, you have befogged their consciences and dulled the consciousness of sin, but whatever names you give to iniquities—murder, aggression, and rapine will always remain sin and crime, crying out to Heaven for vengeance.

You promised liberty.

Great is the gift of liberty—if it is rightfully understood as freedom from evil, which does not oppress others, does not merge into aggression or self-will. But that is the liberty which you did not give: your liberty consists in encouraging the evil passions of the mob, in leaving murders and pillage unpunished. All manifestations either of true civic or of the higher spiritual freedom have been ruthlessly suppressed.

Is that liberty, when no one dares to obtain food for himself, to change one's dwelling, to move from town to town? Is that liberty when families and sometimes all the inhabitants of a house are evicted and their property thrown out in the street, and when all citizens are artificially divided into categories, of which some are destined to famine and plunder? Is that liberty when no one dares to state openly one's opinion out of fear of being accused of counter-revolution? Where are freedom of speech and of the press? Where the freedom of Church preaching? Have not many brave Church preachers already paid the price of their blood—the blood of martyrs? The voice of social and State discussion is suppressed, the press, with the exception of the narrow pro-Bolshevik section, is completely strangled.

Particularly hard and cruel is the suppression of liberty and faith. Not a day passes but the most monstrous calumnies against the Church of God, angry blasphemy and sacrilege appear in your press. You mock the servants of the Church, you force Bishops to dig trenches (Hermogen, Bishop of Tobolsk), and set priests to perform the meanest tasks. You have laid your hands upon the inheritance of the Church, gathered together by generations of the faithful, and have not hesitated to violate their last will and testament.

You have closed monasteries and chapels for no cause or reason whatsoever. You have closed the entrance to the Moscow Kremlin—that sanctuary of the people. You have destroyed the parish-time, that old order of Church community; you are suppressing the brotherhoods and other philanthropic and educational institutions. You disperse church and diocesan meetings, interfere with the internal affairs of the Orthodox Church, you evict sacred images from the schools, and, by forbidding religious teaching, you deprive the children of the spiritual nourishment so indispensable to a Christian upbringing.

"And what shall I more say? For the time would fail me" (Hebrews, xi., 32), to describe all the calamities which have befallen our mother country. I will not speak of the disruption of the once mighty Russia, of the complete disorganization of transport, of the unheard-of disruption of the food supply, of the cold and famine which threaten to bring death to the towns, of the absence of all necessities in the villages. That is patent to all eyes. Yea, we are passing through terrible times, and the memory of your power will remain for a long time uneffaced out of the people's soul, for in it you have darkened the image of God and imprinted that of the beast. The words of the prophet are being realized: "Their feet run into evil, and they make haste to shed innocent blood; their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity, wasting and destruction are in their path." Isaiah, lix., 5-7.

We know that our denunciation will only kindle your wrath and indignation, that you will only seek in them a pretext for accusing us of defiance of your authority, but as the "pillar of your wrath" rises ever higher, the greater will be the evidence of the justice of our denunciations.

It is not our business to judge of earthly powers; any power tolerated by God would receive our blessing if it appeared as "the judgment of God" for the good of the people, and was not a terror to good works, but to the evil. (Romans, xiii., 3.)

But now unto you, who use your power for persecution of your brethren and the extermination of the innocent, we tender our word of persuasion: Celebrate the anniversary of your coming into power by liberating the prisoners, by ceasing bloodshed, aggression, ruin, persecution of the faith; turn from destruction toward the restoration of law and order; give the people the longed-for and merited rest from civil war. But now the blood of the righteous which you have shed shall be required of you (St. Luke, xi., 51), "and you that have taken the sword shall perish by the sword." (St. Matthew, xxvi., 52.)

(Signed)

TIKHON,

Patriarch of Moscow and All-Russia.

A few weeks after the publication of this scathing arraignment the Bolshevik Government at Moscow announced that Patriarch Tikhon had issued a second encyclical reversing his attitude, recognizing the authority of the Soviet, and inviting all believers to obey Soviet laws. It added that a new clerical party had been organized among the officials of the Orthodox Church with a program for (1) close co-operation with the Soviet power; (2) instruction for the masses in all Bolshevik measures, and (3) a campaign against the old traditions of the reactionary clergy.

Appearances indicated that if the Patriarch did issue such a retraction it was not done as a free agent. An earlier report from Taganrog had stated that he had been arrested, together with other ecclesiastics, many of whom had been shot, and when the Moscow wireless announced the new encyclical a fortnight later there was no evidence to show that it had not been signed under compulsion.

The Bolshevik World-Offensive

How the Moscow Reds are Spreading Their Revolutionary Doctrines Through a Worldwide Propaganda

LENIN and his followers in Moscow, confronted by the economic failure of their system in their own factories, have sought to lay the blame on the allied blockade, and have repeatedly declared that the ultimate success of Bolshevism, even in Russia, depended upon the forcing of the same system upon the rest of the world. In this belief they began a year ago to devote large sums to a widely ramifying propaganda for the undermining and overthrow of other Governments, primarily in Asia, but later in all parts of the world. The paid agents of the Moscow Communists have long been at work in Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, France, and even Great Britain and the United States. All these countries have taken steps to get rid of them. Countries as far distant as Argentina and Brazil have been forced into campaigns for the arrest and deportation of these agitators.

The importance attached to this propaganda by the Moscow dictators was indicated in a statement made by the Commissary of Foreign Affairs to Dr. T. H. Fokker, the Dutch Consul General at Kiev. In an interview with an Amsterdam editor in December Dr. Fokker said:

The Commissary for Foreign Affairs (M. Tchitcherin) frankly declared to me that he attached much more importance to the exportation of parcels of propaganda matter than to the importation of foodstuffs—much more. Perhaps it will now be understood why some people are anxious that the blockade of "poor Russia" should be stopped at once. * * * All countries should strictly watch against the spreading of this dangerous propaganda; everywhere the peoples should be carefully informed of the dangers which threaten them through Bolshevism.

With the opening of peace negotiations between Soviet Russia and Esthonia the Bolshevik authorities seized the opportunity to prepare a new campaign. It was revealed in Helsingfors on Dec. 2 that Litvinov, the Bolshevik envoy, took with him to Copenhagen 30,000,000 rubles in Duma notes for the purpose of making Soviet propaganda while ostensibly negotiating with a British envoy.

BOLSHEVIST "SCRAPS OF PAPER"

The Russian Division of the State Department at Washington prepared and made public at the beginning of 1920 a "Memorandum on Certain Aspects of the Bolshevik Movement in Russia," which contains many Bolshevik documents, all showing, as Secretary Lansing pointed out in the preface, that "the purpose of the Bolsheviks is to subvert the existing principles of government and society the world over, including those countries in which democratic institutions are already established." The documents include various utterances of the Moscow leaders indicating that they do not mean to cease their revolutionary offensive even though they may promise to do so in a treaty of peace. After the expulsion of the Bolshevik Ambassador Joffe from Berlin, Tchitcherin boasted of the millions of rubles taken to Berlin for propaganda purposes (official note to German Foreign Office in Izvestia, Dec. 26, 1918). Another illustration of the "scrap-of-paper" attitude of the Bolsheviks toward treaties is contained in a signed article (Izvestia, Jan. 1, 1919) on "Revolutionary Methods," in which Joffe says:

Having accepted this forcibly imposed treaty (Brest-Litovsk), revolutionary Russia, of course, had to accept its second article, which forbade "any agitation against the State and military institutions of Germany." But both the Russian Government as a whole and its accredited representative in Berlin never concealed the fact that they were not observing this article and did not intend to do so.

And this agitation continued even after the Bolsheviks had signed with Germany, Aug. 27, 1918, the so-called supplement-any treaties of Brest-Litovsk, which were not signed like the original treaty under seeming duress, but were actively sought for and gladly entered upon by the Bolsheviks.

William Phillips, Assistant Secretary of State, recently wrote in a letter to the Secretary of the Harvard Liberal Club:

Bad faith is the avowed essence of Bolshevik diplomacy, and its avowed ulterior purpose is to obtain every possible opportunity for the spread of its subversive doctrines. It is only necessary to quote the following extract from a speech made by Zinoviev, President of the Petrograd Soviet, on Feb. 2, 1919, on the subject of the Prince's Island proposal:

"We are willing to sign an unfavorable peace with the Allies. It would only mean that we should put no trust whatever in the bit of paper we should sign. We should use the breathing space so obtained in order to gather our strength in order that the mere continued existence of our Government would keep up the world-wide propaganda which Soviet Russia has been carrying on for more than a year."

ACTIVITIES IN UNITED STATES

The Bolshevik world-offensive was carried into the United States in the latter half of 1919, resulting finally in the arrest and deportation of hundreds of agitators in this country who were attempting to follow the revolutionary instructions received from Moscow. The Red literature, it was learned, was being brought from Russia by couriers.

Shortly before Christmas a Bolshevik conspiracy to overthrow the Latvian Government was discovered by the Lettish authorities at Volmar, near Riga, and 100 persons implicated were arrested; among these was a Russian sailor, on whom were found large sums of money and jewels of great value concealed in the soles of his boots, together with a letter from one of Lenin's closest satellites addressed to the Bolshevik "comrades" of America. This sailor had been a considerable time in Latvia awaiting an opportunity to sail for the United States; indignant letters found upon him complained of the delay. Lying in hiding in an old house, he finally sent a woman messenger to Moscow to demand instructions; the apprehension of this messenger, as she was attempting to pass the lines, led to the arrest of the courier himself.

The letter to American "comrades" found on this courier's person was signed by Buharin, Chief of the Executive Committee Bureau of the Communist International, and by Bersin, alias Winter, a Bolshevik of Lettish origin. More than any argument it showed the essential aims of the Red leaders.

TEXT OF BOLSHEVIST LETTER

The text of this remarkable document is given herewith:

Dear Comrades, permit us to give you a full résumé of our advice and instructions regarding current work in America.

1. We firmly believe that after the expulsion of a number of sections of certain nationalities from the American Socialist Party the time has come to organize in the United States a Communist Party, which will proceed to get officially in touch with the Communist International.

We firmly believe also that this party could be organized from, firstly, the Socialist Propaganda League; secondly, the extremer—and now excluded—elements of the American Socialist Party; thirdly, the extremer elements of the Socialist Labor Party, which, as we are well aware, it is most important to split, as its actions are contrary to our aims, and fourthly, the International Workers of the World, whose principle on non-political action will disappear as it comes to recognize the dictatorship of the proletariat and Soviet rule. The organization of this party should be effected in Moscow.

2. We firmly believe that one of the most important aims at present is the organization of communist small nucleus centres among soldiers and sailors—as a fighting section to carry on energetic propaganda in organizing Soviets of soldiers and sailors, and in preaching fanatical hostility [the Russian word means literally persecution] toward officers and Generals.

3. Such organizations of workmen Soviets as already exist should not be allowed to degenerate into philanthropic or cultural associations. We are much afraid that in America there is just this danger. Therefore we strongly emphasize that until the Soviets have grasped the upper hand they must regard themselves as militant [the word is underlined] units of the fight for national control and proletariat dictatorship. There must not be an inch yielded from this standpoint. [All the last sentence is underlined in the original.]

The organization of strikes and of unemployed and the fomenting of insurrections—that is the task appointed. Secondly, it is necessary to take the utmost precautions against the splitting up of the proletariat among the already existing national political parties. Therefore direct your energies along the lines of developing the movement to establish Soviets of workers of different political views.

The general platform will be as follows:

(a) Down with the Senate and Congress.

(b) Down with capitalists in the factories. Long live the management of the factories by the workers.

(c) Down with speculators. All organizations of food and supply to be in the workers' hands.

Everywhere it is necessary sharply to emphasize the idea of seizing the whole machinery of economic administration by the working class, and to direct toward this object propaganda and agitation—by an outcry against the high cost of living.

It is desirable to spread hostility [again the Russian word persecution] toward Wilson as a two-faced criminal as well as toward his League of Nations.

Regarding intervention, you already know what to do, but we ask you to stress the factor of our economic strangulation—and not only ours, but Hungary's previously—and also to rub in the fact that western democrats are acting as our executioners.

5. It is of supreme importance to pay the closest attention to the American Federation of Labor. This must be smashed in pieces—[last three words are underlined]—by active work in collaboration with the International Workers of the World to bring about strike movements and revolution.

6. It is most necessary to develop propaganda to instill into the minds of the workers the paramount necessity for arming—[this word is underlined]. Revolutionary soldiers who are demobilized should not give up their rifles.

As a more general platform:

(A) An international Socialist republic.

(B) Frighten every one with the bogey of new wars being prepared by the capitalists.

(C) Use the utmost efforts to oppose the organization of White Guards. This should be done in most ruthless and violent manner.

7. Work for the centralization and combination of your endeavors. Don't give them any opportunity to smash you separately. Organize conspirative committees.

With Communistic greetings.

(Signed) Bureau of the Executive Committee of the Communist International.

BUHARIN AND J. BERSIN, ALIAS WINTER.

MARTENS INVOLVED

This document of specific instructions for revolutionary activities in the United States was accompanied by a general letter of advice from the Third Communist International of Moscow—a letter of interest chiefly because it contained a mention of Ludwig A. C. Martens, the Soviet "Ambassador" to the United States, whose connection with subversive propaganda has been charged repeatedly by the Lusk Legislative Committee, which is investigating seditious activities in New York. After devoting some space to advice against factional quarrels the letter concluded as follows:

Much depends upon your work in America. The International Bureau insists upon the union of all groups on the Soviet platform. Party work should proceed conjointly and in close touch with the work of the Soviets. Anarchists, former Mensheviks, Social Revolutionaries, Intelligentsia, &c., willing to work with the Soviets, should be permitted to co-operate. There must be no division or split.

The Embassy and Comrade Martens are not subordinate to any organization. Organizations are advised to work in full contact with the Embassy which is responsible only to the All-Russian Central Committee of Soviets. There can be no question as to control of the Embassy by local organizations.

In addition to this letter we are sending all kinds of information and propaganda literature which should be published at once.

With friendly greetings.

(Signed) A. MENSHPMY,
J. A. BERSIN.

In the course of his testimony before the Lusk Committee, most of whose questions he refused to answer, Martens admitted that he was in regular communication with Moscow through special couriers, whose identity and whereabouts he refused to disclose, and that he had received through this agency from the Soviet Government the sum of $90,000 since March, 1919.

NATURE OF PROPAGANDA

An example of the propaganda literature shipped into the United States by the Communist International of Moscow and disseminated here by Socialist and Communist organizations is found in the following extract from a Lenin-Trotsky manifesto, which was among the papers seized by the Lusk Committee:

It is our task now to sum up the practical revolutionary expense of the working class and to further hasten the complete victory of the Communist revolution. Civilian war is forced upon the laboring classes by their arch enemies. The working class must answer blow for blow. The Communist parties, far from conjuring up civil war artificially, rather strive to shorten its duration as much as possible. It has become an iron necessity to minimize the number of its victims, and above all to secure victory for the proletariat. This makes necessary the disarming of the bourgeoisie at the proper time, the arming of the laborers, and the formation of a Communist army such as the Red Army of Soviet Russia. Conquest of the political power means not merely a change in personnel, but annihilation of the enemies' apparatus of the Government. The revolutionary era compels the proletariat to make use of the means of battle which will concentrate its entire energies, namely, mass action, with its logical resultant, direct conflict with the Government machinery in open combat. All other methods, such as revolutionary use of bourgeois parliamentarism, will be of only secondary significance. Long live the international republic of the proletarian councils.

PROPAGANDA IN ASIA

The most serious results of the Bolshevik propaganda have been apparent in Asia, where the Reds' efforts to stir up revolution have been aimed at India. Their method of operating in the Near and Far East through paid agitators was thus described by a Swedish correspondent of The London Morning Post:

With the help of the untold wealth in gold, silver, and jewels, during centuries hoarded up in holy Russia's thousands of convents, churches, and palaces, they have succeeded in setting the whole world rocking, and have made the Mohammedan world boil with sedition from far-away Afghanistan to Egypt. . . . And if you negotiate, how will you keep them to their engagements, how will you prevent their poisoning the whole intellectual atmosphere of our time?

The religious situation in Russia itself gave the Reds an opening in the East. There are over 20,000,000 Mohammedans in Russia, concentrated, for the most part, on the Volga, in the Ural region, in Turkestan, and the Eastern Caucasus. Lenin took due note of the fact that during the last twenty years a national movement had been developed among these Russian Mohammedans, finding expression in a new literature and in religious and social reforms, including the emancipation of women. This national movement was strongly affected by Russian literature and by Russian political tendencies, and for that reason was more advanced than the corresponding national movement in other Mohammedan countries.

The participation of Turkey in the war against Russia had been a severe test of the loyalty of the kinsmen of the Turks in Russia, and not all the national leaders had proved superior to temptation. German and Turkish influences had made themselves strongly felt in the Russian Mohammedan movement during the war, and more particularly during the revolution.

The establishment of a Tatar Republic with Turkish aid revealed the extent to which the German and Turkish agitators had been operating to open a way from the Black Sea into Central Asia. It was this Russo-Mohammedan movement, backed by Germany and Turkey, that Lenin seized as a lever for provoking a revolution in the Mohammedan East, to be turned into Bolshevik channels and used as a weapon against Great Britain, the ultimate object of attack.

TATAR PROPAGANDA

Taking full advantage of their occupation of the Mohammedan districts of Russia, the Bolsheviks, under the direction of Lenin, began, therefore, a violent agitation. Never had there been such propaganda among the Tatars. Never had there been so many Tatar newspapers on the Volga and in the Urals, where all the Tatar press soon consisted only of subsidized Bolshevik sheets. Agitators traveled about in towns and villages making speeches, founding Mohammedan communist centres, preaching revolt. It was not all plain sailing for the Bolsheviks. Turkestan has simmered constantly with revolt against the despotism of the Red Government, as Dr. Harold Williams has repeatedly noted in his cables, and if there were many Mohammedans mobilized in the Red Army there were also many loyal Mohammedans.

dans from the Caucasus fighting with the green ribbon and emblem of the crescent in the ranks of Denikin's army, and whole units of Siberian Tatars bore arms under Kolchak. But the danger was there, and it has constantly increased, rather than diminished.

The Bolsheviks dream of arousing not merely a part, but the whole of Asia. The appearance of an Afghan mission in Moscow, received with high honors; the intensive propaganda work conducted via Tashkent, in Afghanistan, which, much to the alarm of its neighbors, has become almost an outpost of Bolshevism in the East, are merely isolated symptoms of a vast movement to harass and embarrass Great Britain. The capture of Kazandjik in the Transcaspian region, reported on Dec. 11, produced a serious situation for Great Britain in Asia, and a month later the capture of Samarkand and Krasnovodsk, the gateway to Turkestan, emphasized the threat against India. A wedge had been driven between the forces of Denikin and Kolchak, and Bolshevism was holding out the right hand of fellowship to Pan Turanianism in the name of a common hostility to Western Democracy.

The success of the Bolshevik forces in the trans-Caspian region brought Moscow into closer relations with Afghanistan, whither a special Soviet mission had already proceeded, and emphasized the threat of trouble. To shake the British rule in India by "bolshevizing Islam" is one of Trotzky's avowed objects. Great Britain has thus far refused to be bluffed into lifting the Russian blockade, and it remains to be seen whether Bolshevik propaganda can do what German propaganda failed to do during the world war.

BOLSHEVISM IN PERSIA

Meanwhile, Lenin looked for other openings. How eagerly the Bolshevik Government of Russia seized upon the news of the negotiation of the Anglo-Persian treaty as an excuse for trying to stir up revolution in Persia is shown by the full text of the message from Moscow circulated, via Turkestan, among the Persian masses. This message from the Soviet Foreign Office, which was widely circulated in Persia during the closing months of 1919, read as follows:

To the Workers and Peasants of Persia!

During the entire nineteenth century you were treated like an enslaved people by the Russian and English Governments, while they profited by the fact that the once so mighty Persian people had reached the greatest degree of misery and degradation under the intolerable yoke of its despotic Shah and of its lying and pleasure-seeking rulers. The English robbers and the agents of Czarism, continually lusting after conquests, degraded you to an even greater degree of slavery.

In Russia there ruled the intolerable power of the autocratic Czar, in England there reigned, and still reigns today, the power of a handful of capitalist robbers. Between the two principal competitors, Russia and England, there existed only one difference regarding Persia, and it was merely over the best way to plunder your country and to hold it under the yoke. Then came the day when the Persian masses arose and, in an undaunted manner, attempted to shake off the shackles of the intolerable autocratic power of the Shah and of the feudal blood-suckers and oppressors that had held sway for centuries. The leaders in the battle for the freedom of Persia ended their lives on the scaffold at Teheran and in Tabriz.

But the great Russian revolution broke out. One of the first acts of the Soviet Government of Russia was a declaration to the effect that every nation, be it great or small, be it independent or attached to another State, must be free to dispose of itself and must not be forcibly bound to any other power. So far as Persia was concerned, Comrade Trotzky solemnly assured the Persian people, in his note of Jan. 14, 1918, that all the secret treaties between Russia and England and other countries regarding Persia were abrogated and that the Russian people wanted to return to Persia everything that had been taken away from it by the Czar's Generals. The Persian Government, for its part, declared all such treaties null and void. It seemed as if a new, free life was about to begin for the Persian people.

But it did not turn out that way. In the Spring of 1918 the English gradually occupied all of Persia. The English promised to evacuate Persia as soon as the Turks were definitely expelled from the country, and to compensate the nation for all the requisitions made by the English troops. The English Government's note of March 12, containing these promises, was published in the Persian newspaper Baab on March 14. The English promised, although no one had asked them to do it, to help the Persian people in the rebuilding of its collapsed economic life. Instead of this, they made the Persian population their slaves.

Since the English capitalists, together with those of France and America, have destroyed their world rival, German imperialism, and are now celebrating their victory, the capitalists of England consider it a favorable time to lay their hand upon the whole Persian Empire for good and all. Thus Persia is excluded from the list of free nations. Her people are no longer free, for her own depots get money from England and have become England's paid servants. As a heavy burden will they lay their hand upon the Persian people, but in so doing they will still remain the prey of that still greater wild beast of the world, English capitalism, which wants to suck the last drop of blood from the Persian people.

BOLSHEVISM IN CHINA

As far away as China the Bolshevik tentacles have stretched. Agitation began in the outlying regions, especially in Mongolia and Manchuria, as early as 1918. It was mainly due to this agitation that China again resumed her rule over Outer Mongolia, which she had nominally abdicated in 1913, when she had granted that region autonomy. The so-called tripartite agreement between China, Outer Mongolia and Russia in 1915 had brought no real improvement of China's position toward this former dependency, and in 1918, with the spread of Bolshevism and general disorder, China began to be seriously alarmed for the safety of Peking. In this attitude the dignitaries of Urga insisted upon the need of troops to guard the Siberian frontier. On June 23, 1919, the Outer Mongolian Government invoked the help of Chinese troops to prevent the crisis which was being created by the Buriats and their bandit allies. Since November, 1919, Outer Mongolia has again come under the protection of Chinese sovereignty, and for this restoration of an integral portion of her territory China has, indirectly, the influence of the Bolshevik propaganda to thank.

The Soviet Government has its agitators in China as well as in Siberia, but there have been no convincing indications as yet that China can be persuaded to accept the doctrines of Bolshevism, though, with the defeat and continuing retreat of the Kolchak armies, and the withdrawal of Kolchak from power, the Bolshevik menace draws ever closer.

JAPAN AND THE REDS

Concerning Japan's attitude to the advance of Bolshevism in the Far East, Premier Kei Hara, in an interview given on Dec. 25, made the following important statement:

While Japan hopes to harmonize her military action in Siberia with that of America, and to square it with the general anti-Bolshevist policy, under no circumstances can she permit the Red influence, as long as it remains dangerous, to touch her borders. The Japanese cannot afford to permit this dangerous influence to touch her territory, and we must protect ourselves against it as we would against a great scourge. The collapse of the Kolchak Government indicates that Japan and the Allies are deceived as to the Red weakness. Just what will happen no one knows, nor can the Allies' future policy in European Bolshevist Russia be prophesied, but Japan's own position must be clear: a Moscow Government determined to spread its doctrines over the world and to bring revolution everywhere must not touch on our borders.

The Premier further indicated that Japan, with America's consent, was ready to take military action in the matter. His words made clear his Government's determination not to permit any considerable advance of the Reds beyond the region of Lake Baikal.

Program of the "Third International"

Moscow Manifesto Urging Members in All Democratic Countries to Seize Power by Violent Methods

THE members of the Communist Party and the Communist Labor Party in the United States have openly proclaimed their allegiance to the radical body known as the Third International, which was organized at a convention held in Moscow the first week of March, 1919. The members of the Socialist Party in this country are also voting in a referendum to decide the question whether they shall affiliate with the Moscow body or call for the reorganization of the Socialist parties of the world in a new international. In view of these facts interest attaches to a circular letter sent out from Moscow to all the parties adhering to the Third International, giving the views of the Executive Committee of that organization on the moot question of parliamentary vs. "direct" action, in other words, violence.

As is shown by the text of this manifesto, which reached the United States via German Communist papers and was printed in the New Yorker Volkszeitung, the Moscow leaders have practically no use for parliamentary action, except as a spectacular means of agitation, and they welcome the support of anarchistic agitators and I. W. W. bodies, while branding such prominent Socialist leaders as Karl Kautsky in Germany, Jean Longuet in France, and Morris Hillquit in America as potentially anti-Socialist.

So far as this Bolshevik message applies to America it is a declaration of war on the United States Government and a call to American Communists to use both secret and violent methods to overthrow the present republic and found in its place a dictatorship of labor councils. The passages advising the betrayal of parliamentary responsibilities especially are of timely interest. The message reads as follows:

Dear Comrades:

The present phase of the revolutionary movement has, along with other questions, very sharply placed the question of parliamentarism upon the order of the day's discussion. In France, America, England, and Germany, simultaneously with the aggravation of the class struggle, all revolutionary elements are adhering to the Communist movement by uniting among themselves or by co-ordinating their actions under the slogan of Soviet power. The anarchist-syndicalist groups and the groups that now and then call themselves simply anarchistic are thus also joining the general current. The Executive Committee of the Communist International welcomes this most heartily.

In France the syndicalist group of Comrade Pericat forms the heart of the Communist Party; in America, and also to some extent in England, the fight for the Soviets is led by such organizations as the I. W. W. (Industrial Workers of the World). These groups and tendencies have always actively opposed the parliamentary methods of fighting.

On the other hand, the elements of the Communist Party that are derived from the Socialist parties are, for the most part, inclined to recognize action in Parliament, too. (The Lorient group in France, the members of the A. S. P. in America [possibly meaning the American Socialist Party], of the Independent Labor Party in England, &c.) All these tendencies, which ought to be united as soon as possible in the Communist Party at all cost, need uniform tactics. Consequently, the question must be decided on a broad scale and as a general measure, and the Executive Committee of the Communist International turns to all the affiliated parties with the present circular letter, which is especially dedicated to this question.

The universal unifying program is at the present moment the recognition of the struggle for the dictatorship of the proletariat in the form of the Soviet power. History has so placed the question that it is exactly on this question that the line is drawn between the revolutionary proletariat and the opportunists, between the Communists and the social traitors of every brand. The so-called Centre (Kautsky in Germany, Longuet in France, the I. L. P. and some elements of the B. S. P. in England, Hillquit in America) is, in spite of its protestations, an objectively anti-Socialist tendency, because it cannot, and does not wish to, lead the struggle for the Soviet power of the proletariat.

On the contrary, those groups and parties which formerly rejected any kind of political struggle (for example, some anarchist groups) have, by recognizing the Soviet power, the dictatorship of the proletariat, really abandoned their old standpoint as to political action, because they have recognized the idea of the seizure of power by the working class, the power that is necessary for the suppression of the opposing bourgeoisie. Thus, we repeat, a common program for the struggle for the Soviet dictatorship has been found.

The old divisions in the international labor movement have plainly outlived their time. The war has caused a regrouping. Many of the anarchists or syndicalists who rejected parliamentarism conducted themselves just as despicably and treasonably during the five years of the war as did the old leaders of the Social Democracy, who always have the name of Marx on their lips. The unification of forces is being effected in a new manner: some are for the proletariat revolution, for the Soviets, for the dictatorship, for mass action, even up to armed uprisings—the others are against this plan. This is the principal question of today. This is the main criterion. The new combinations will be formed according to these labels, and are being so formed already.

In what relation does the recognition of the Soviet idea stand to parliamentarism? Right here a sharp dividing line must be drawn between two questions which logically have nothing to do with each other: The question of parliamentarism, as a desired form of the organization of the State and the question of the exploitation of parliamentarism for the development of the revolution. The comrades often confuse these two questions, something which has an extraordinarily injurious effect upon the entire practical struggle. We wish to discuss each of these questions in its order and make all the necessary deductions.

What is the form of the proletarian dictatorship? We reply: The Soviets. This has been demonstrated by an experience that has a worldwide significance. Can the Soviet power be combined with parliamentarism? No, and yet again no. It is absolutely incompatible with the existing parliaments, because the parliamentary machine embodies the concentrated power of the bourgeoisie. The deputies, the Chambers of Deputies, their newspapers, the system of bribery, the secret connections of the parliamentarians with the leaders of the banks, the connection with all the apparatuses of the bourgeois State—all these are fetters for the working class. They must be burst. The governmental machine of the bourgeoisie, consequently also the bourgeois Parliaments, are to be broken, disrupted, destroyed, and upon their ruins is to be organized a new power, the power of the union of the working class, the Workers' Parliaments; i. e., the Soviets.

Only the betrayers of the workers can deceive the workers with the hope of a "peaceful" social revolution along the lines of parliamentary reforms. Such persons are the worst enemies of the working class, and a most pitiless struggle must be waged against them; no compromise with them is permissible. Therefore, our slogan for any bourgeois country you may choose is: "Down with the Parliament! Long live the power of the Soviets!"

Nevertheless, the question may be put this way: "Very well, you deny the power of the present bourgeois Parliaments; then why don't you organize new, more democratic Parliaments on the basis of a real universal suffrage?" During the Socialist revolution the struggle has become so acute that the working class must act quickly and resolutely, without allowing its class enemies to enter into its camp, into its organization of power. Such qualifications are only found in the Soviets of workers, soldiers, sailors and peasants, elected in the factories and shops, in the country and in the barracks. So the question of the form of the proletarian power is put this way. Now the Government is to be overthrown: Kings, Presidents, Parliaments, Chambers of Deputies, National Assemblies, all these institutions are our sworn enemies, that must be destroyed.

Now we take up the second basic question: Can the bourgeois Parliaments be fully utilized for the purpose of developing the revolutionary class struggle? Logically, as we just remarked, this question is by no means related to the first question. In fact: A person surely can be trying to destroy any kind of organization by joining it and by "utilizing" it. This is also perfectly understood by our false enemies when they exploit the official Social Democratic parties, the trade unions, and the like, for their purposes.

Let us take the extreme example: The Russian Communists, the Bolsheviks, voted in the election for the Constituent Assembly. They met in its hall. But they came there to break up this Constituent within twenty-four hours and fully to realize the Soviet power. The party of the Bolsheviks also had its Deputies in the Czar's Imperial Duma. Did the party at that time "recognize" the Duma as an ideal, or at least an endurable, form of government? It would be lunacy to assume that. It sent its representatives there so as to proceed against the apparatus of the Czarist power from that side, too, and to contribute to the destruction of that same Duma. It was not for nothing that the Czarist Government condemned the Bolshevik "parliamentarians" to prison for "high treason." The Bolshevik leaders were also carrying on an illegal work, although they temporarily made use of their "inviolability" in welding together the masses for the drive against Czarism.

But Russia was not the only place where that kind of "parliamentary" activity was carried on. Look at Germany and the activities of Liebknecht. The murdered comrade was the perfect type of a revolutionist. Was there, then, something nonrevolutionary in the fact that he, from the tribune of the accursed Prussian Landtag, called upon the soldiers to rise against the Landtag? On the contrary. Here, too, we see the complete admissibility and usefulness of his exploitation of the situation. If Liebknecht had not been a Deputy he would never have been able to accomplish such an act; his speeches would have had no such echo as they had. The example of the Swedish Communists in Parliament also convinces us of this. In Sweden Comrade Hoglund played, and plays, the same rôle that Liebknecht played in Germany. Making use of his position as a Deputy, he assists in destroying the bourgeois parliamentary system; no one else in Sweden has done as much for the cause of the revolution and the struggle against the war as our friend.

In Bulgaria we see the same thing. The Bulgarian Communists have successfully exploited the tribune of Parliament for revolutionary purposes. At the recent elections they won seats for forty-seven Deputies. Comrades Blagoeff, Kirkoff, Kolaroff, and other leaders of the Bulgarian Communist Party understand how to exploit the parliamentary tribune in the service of the proletarian revolution. Such "parliamentary work" demands peculiar daring and a special revolutionary spirit; the men there are occupying especially dangerous positions; they are laying mines under the enemy while in the enemy's camp; they enter Parliament for the purpose of getting this machine in their hands in order to assist the masses behind the walls of the Parliament in their work of blowing it up.

Are we for the maintenance of the bourgeois "democratic" Parliaments as the form of the administration of the State?

No, not in any case. We are for the Soviets.

But we are for the full utilization of these Parliaments for our Communist work—as long as we are not yet strong enough to overthrow the Parliament.

Yes, we are for this—in consideration of a whole list of conditions. We know very well that in France, America and England no such parliamentarians have yet arisen from the mass of the workers. In those countries we have thus far observed a picture of parliamentary betrayal. But this is no proof of the incorrectness of the tactics that we regard as correct! It is only a matter of there being revolutionary parties there, like the Bolsheviks or the German Spartacists. As soon as there is such a party, everything can become quite different. It is particularly necessary: (1) that the deciding centre of the struggle should lie outside Parliament—strikes, uprisings and other kinds of mass action; (2) that the activities in Parliament be confined with this struggle; (3) that the deputies also perform illegal work; (4) that they act for the Central Committee and subject to its orders; (5) that they do not heed the parliamentary forms in their acts—have no fear of direct clashes with the bourgeois majority, "talk past it," &c.

The matter of taking part in the elections at a given time, during a given electoral campaign, depends upon a whole string of concrete circumstances, which in each country must be particularly considered at each given time. The Russian Bolsheviks were for boycotting the elections for the first Imperial Duma in 1906; and these same persons were for taking part in the elections for the second Imperial Duma, when it had been shown that the bourgeois-agrarian power would still rule in Russia for many a year. In the year 1918, before the election for the German National Assembly, one section of the Spartacists was for taking part in the elections, the other was against it; but the party of the Spartacists remained a unified Communist Party.

In principle we cannot renounce the utilization of parliamentarism. The party of the Russian Bolsheviks declared in a special resolution in the Spring of 1918, at its Congress, when it was already in power, that the Russian Communists, in case the bourgeois democracy in Russia through a peculiar combination of circumstances should once more get the upper hand, might be compelled to return to the utilization of bourgeois parliamentarism. Room for manoeuvring is also to be allowed in this respect.

The comrades' principal efforts are to consist in the work of mobilizing the masses; establishing the party, organizing their own groups in the unions and capturing them, organizing soviets in the course of the struggle, leading the mass struggle, agitation for the revolution among the masses—all this is of first line importance; parliamentary action and participation in electoral campaigns are only helps in this work, no more.

If this is so—and it undoubtedly is so—then it is a matter of course that it doesn't pay to split into factions over this now secondary question. The practice of parliamentary prostitution was so disgusting that even the best comrades have prejudices regarding this question. These ought to be overcome in the course of the revolutionary struggle. Therefore, we urgently appeal to all groups and organizations which are carrying on a real struggle for the Soviets and call upon them to unite firmly, even despite lack of agreement on this question.

All those who are for the Soviets and the proletarian dictatorship wish to unite as soon as possible and form a unified Communist Party.

With Communist greetings,

G. ZINOVIEV,

President, Executive Committee, Communist International.

Lenin's Statement of His Aims

The Policy of the Bolshevik Government at Home and Abroad Expounded by Its Leader

NIKOLAI LENIN, the chief dictator of Soviet Russia, gave an interview in Moscow last Autumn to an American journalist after exacting a written promise that his statements would be published "in more than 100 newspapers of the United States." In his answers to five questions propounded by the interviewer Lenin formulated the existing political program of the Bolshevik Government. The version here presented appeared in the Swedish Bolshevik paper Folkets Dagblad Politiken, and was translated by The London Morning Post in its issue of Nov. 27, 1919. For convenience CURRENT HISTORY places each question immediately before Lenin's answer, which follows in smaller type. The first question and reply are as follows:

1. Modifications, if any, of original Bolshevik program of internal, foreign, and economic policy:

The program of the Soviet Government has never been a program of reforms, but only a revolutionary one. Reforms are merely concessions granted by the governing classes on the condition that their rule shall remain in power. Revolution is a throwing over of the ruling classes. That is why, whereas a program of reforms generally includes a large number of special clauses, our program, which is revolutionary, contains as its principal basis one and only clause: To throw over the yoke of the capitalists and landowners, to break their power and liberate the working masses from their exploiters. We have never for a single moment wavered from this program. The special measures aiming at the realization of this program have, it is true, often been modified or revised. A complete list of such modifications and revisions would fill a whole book. Therefore I will limit myself to the statement that there exists also another general point: Our Governmental policy, which has given occasion for the greatest number of modifications in the sphere of special measures, viz., the breaking of the resistance put up by the exploiters. After the revolution of the 25th of October-7th of November, 1917, we did not suppress a single bourgeois paper, and there was not the slightest question of any sort of terror. We not only set free several Ministers of the Kerensky Cabinet, but even let General Krasnov out of prison, who immediately took up arms against us. Only after the exploiters, that is to say the capitalists, began to organize open resistance against us, we in our turn started systematically to break down this resistance, having recourse even to terror.

This was the answer of the proletariat to the assistance the bourgeoisie accorded to the plot hatched against us in conjunction with the capitalists of Germany, England, Japan, America, and France, and which aimed at the restoration of the power of the exploiters in Russia. Then came the bribing of the Czechoslovaks with English and French capital; later still the support of French and German money given to Yudenitch, Denikin and Co. One of the latest plots, which has called for a similar "modification"—the sharp reign of terror applied lately to the bourgeoisie in Petrograd—was organized by the bourgeoisie in order to hand over Petrograd to the enemy; also the attempt made by a conspiracy of officers to take possession of the fortress of Krasnaya Gorka, and the attempts by English and French capitalists to bribe the personnel of the Swiss Legation and officials of the Soviet Government, &c.

2. The tactical policy of the Soviet Government toward Afghanistan, India, and other Moslem countries outside Russia's frontiers:

The policy of the Soviet Government regarding Afghanistan, India, and other Moslem countries outside Russia is identical with our tactics regarding the numerous Moslem and other non-Russian nationalities living within Russia's borders. So, for instance, we have given the Bashkir masses the possibility to found an autonomous republic of their own within Russia; we favor in every way the free and independent development of all nationalities, and encourage the circulation and spreading of literature published in the spoken languages of these nationalities; on the other hand, we translate into every one of these languages and spread with all means in our possession our Soviet Constitution, which has the misfortune to appeal to more than one thousand million inhabitants of this planet, belonging to the oppressed nationalities deprived of their rights and inhabiting the colonies and vassal States of the Western powers. Our Constitution appeals to these millions a great deal more than the "democratic" Constitutions of Europe and the United States, which support the private ownership of land and capital, and consolidate the power of a handful of "civilized" capitalists to oppress the workers of their own countries, and also hundreds of millions of human beings in their Asiatic, African, and other colonies.

3. The political and economic aims pursued in relation to the United States and Japan:

As regards the United States and Japan, our aims are first of all political; to resist the cynical and criminal attack of these countries on Russia; an attack which has all the distinctive qualities of highway robbery, and the only aim of which is to serve the capitalists of these aforesaid countries. We have repeatedly and solemnly offered these two countries to make peace, but they have not even answered us, and continue to wage war on us by helping Kolchak and Denikin, by plundering the regions of Murmansk and Archangel, by trying to grab East Siberia, where the Russian peasants are showing heroic resistance to the American and Japanese brigands. Our political and economic aims continue to be the same regarding all countries, the United States and Japan included; a brotherly union with the workers in all lands without exception.

4. Peace conditions with Kolchak, Denikin, and Yudenitch:

The conditions on which we are ready to make peace with Denikin, Kolchak, and Yudenitch have been specified by us several times in writing in precise and explicit terms. These conditions have been communicated by us to several people, and specially to Mr. Bullitt, who negotiated with us, and with me personally in Moscow, on behalf of the Government of the United States, and were repeated in our letter to Fr. Nansen, &c. It is not our fault if the Government of the United States and others are afraid to publish these documents in their entirety and prefer to keep them secret from their peoples. I limit myself to repeating our principal conditions: We are ready to repay all debts to France and other countries, on the understanding that the peace will be an effective peace and not merely a peace of words—that is to say, that this peace will be formally and officially signed by all the allied and associated powers—because Denikin, Kolchak, Yudenitch and Co. are only mere puppets in the hands of the Governments of these powers.

5. Message to the American people:

Compared with feudalism, capitalism, in the history of the world, has been a step forward on the way toward "freedom," "equality," "democracy," and "civilization." But, nevertheless, capitalism always was and remains a system of "paid slavery," where thousands of millions of workers and peasants have remained for ages in a servile state under the yoke of a minority of modern slave-owners, landlords, and capitalists. The bourgeois-democracy has merely slightly altered the form of this economic slavery; as compared with feudalism, the bourgeois-democracy has managed to cleverly mask this slavery, but it has not, and is unable to, alter the substance of this slavery.

Capitalism has become the greatest and most powerful peril to the development of humanity. It has fallen into the hands of a clique of multi-millionaires and millionaires, who compel the masses to slaughter each other in order to solve the question which group of robbers—the German or the Franco-English one—shall today gain possession of the imperialistic plunder, own all the colonies, hold the ruling financial interests, and get all the mandatory powers over the oppressed nationalities.

Details of Lenin's propaganda campaign to undermine and overthrow the United States Government and many other existing Governments are given elsewhere in these pages.

The Soviet System and Ours

An Analysis and Deadly Parallel

By BURTON L. FRENCH*

Congressman From Idaho

WHAT is the Soviet system of government, and do we want it? A Government has no right to exist save only as it serves the highest interests of the people who make up the Government and who come into contact with it. Now, if the Soviet system is better than ours, by all means let us adopt it; let us lay aside the experiment in government that we have tried for over 100 years and take over the Soviet system that promises so much.

It is, then, from the standpoint of a comparison of the essential principles of the Soviet system with the essential principles of the representative system such as we know it in America that I want to consider the question.

In January, 1918, the group of Russian people headed by Lenin and Trotzky adopted what might be called a declaration of rights, and on July 10, 1918, the All-Russian Congress of Soviets formally adopted a constitution, and this instrument recites that the bill of rights is part of the organic law. These documents are the basic foundation of the Soviet Government. The form of government is known as Soviet, and the active leaders in its support are Bolsheviks.

Strangely enough, a good many writers seem to assume that the only unique feature of the Soviet Government is group representation. For instance, Oswald G. Villard, in a paper in the official organ of the Academy of Political and Social Science, The Annals, for July, 1919, on the "Need of Social Reorganization in America," said:

There is something attractive in group representation, which is what the Soviet is.

Again he says:

Yet the other day one of our own American officials at Paris solemnly assured the newspaper men that if the Soviet type of government were made really representative, he saw no reason why it should not be as democratic as any Government, if not more so. It was only to the men who were running the present unfair and undemocratic Soviet Government in Russia that our Government objected, he declared.

I desire to discuss group representation under the Soviet Government a little later on, and I think before I get through it will be quite clear that group representation is a mere feature of the Soviet form of government. It is merely the sugar-coating to the pill.

The American official referred to by Mr. Villard says if the Soviet type of government were made "really representative, it would be as democratic as any Government, if not more so." You might as well say that if black were made white it would be white. The fact of the business is there is absolutely no philosophy by which the Soviet form of government can be made representative unless the fundamental principles on which it rests shall be transformed and changed as completely as the changes of elements would be in color to make black white.

STRUCTURE OF THE SYSTEM

From an examination of the Soviet Constitution, it appears that the executive authority is combined with the legislative, and there is no mention of a judiciary. Also it will be seen that Russia for its government is divided into units of various sizes, just as is the United States. We have the country as a whole—States, counties, and other local units, such as districts, precincts, or parishes, or urban units, such as cities, towns, and villages, depending upon the

*The striking analysis of the Russian Soviet system of government here given to CURRENT HISTORY readers was formally presented to the National House of Representatives in a speech delivered by Congressman French on Dec. 9, 1919.

State. Then we have the different bodies chosen to govern in these units. So in Russia.

Russia, considered as a whole, is divided into regions, provinces, counties, and rural and village units. Then we have the governing body for each unit. This governing body is known as a Soviet. There is no magic in the word "Soviet." It merely means a council. It means a legislative or deliberative body. It might as well be called a council, a congress, or a parliament. In Russia there are several different Soviets—the local rural, the rural, the village or urban, the county, the provincial, the regional, and the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. These may correspond to deliberative bodies of our precincts, our counties, our States, and our nation.

Now, so far there is nothing incongruous. But how are the Soviets elected?

SOVIETS—HOW ELECTED

In the first place, instead of the people voting by parties or by groups representing public opinion, they vote, at least theoretically, by trades or crafts. This point I want to discuss later. But for whom do they vote? For members of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets? No. For members of the regional or provincial Soviet? No. For members of the county Soviet? No. For members of the local Soviet? Yes. That is, the people voting by trades elect members of the particular craft to which they belong to the local Soviet. Now, this is all the part the people themselves have in this much heralded government.

The people, then, or, I shall say, those of the people who have the franchise, in theory have the right to vote for the members of the local Soviet. The local Soviet in the cities is called the urban Soviet; in the country it is called the rural local Soviet.

Now, this represents the final responsibility that is placed upon the people. There probably never was devised a clearer way to show the contrast between two objects being compared than to do as Portia did when she said, "Look on this picture and then on this." Having that in mind, I am going to try to examine the Russian Government by placing it alongside of the Government of your own country. Let me then direct your attention to the different units of government as they exist in Russia and the corresponding units of government as they exist in the United States.

COMPARISON OF LEGISLATIVE BODIES

I want you to consider first the legislative bodies that exist in Russia and the subdivisions of government under Russia and the legislative bodies that exist in the United States from our Federal Government through the States on down to the officers elected in our precincts, villages, and towns.

(a) Urban Soviets (in cities of not more than 10,000).

RUSSIA	UNITED STATES
(b) Rural Soviets (but the rural Soviets are not elected by the people).
5. Rural Soviet. Members are chosen by members of—	No corresponding governmental subdivision. (It is less than a county and more than a township.)
(a) Village Soviets (of less than 1,000 people).
(b) Rural local Soviets (the people allowed to vote for village and local Soviet members).
6. Local Soviet.	Precinct, township, or other local organization, Officers elected by the people.
(a) Rural local Soviet. Elected by part of the people.
(b) Urban Soviet. Deputies elected by part of the people.	City, town, and village offices, Elected by the people.

The parallel to which I have called your attention is most striking. Take first the highest legislative body in the United States—the Congress. It is made up of Senators and Representatives elected by the direct vote of the people. For over a hundred years we chose our Senators in indirect manner; that is, the Senators were elected by members of the Legislature who themselves were elected by the people.

RUSSIAN VOTER'S LIMITATIONS

In Russia the highest legislative body is known as the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. Do the people vote for the members of that body? Not at all.

The farmer in Russia votes for his rural local Soviet member, and when he casts that ballot his power as a voter has come to an end. The members of that local Soviet vote to elect members to the rural Soviet; the members of the rural Soviet then vote to elect members to the Provincial Soviet; and the members of the Provincial Soviet vote to elect members to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets.

In other words, as the Senator of the United States in the olden times used to be once removed from the American voter, the members of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets are three times removed from the Russian farmer. The city voter is trusted more than the farmer, for he votes direct for his urban representative, who in turn votes for the member of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets.

In Russia the political organization that is less than the entire nation is what is known as a region. It would correspond in the United States to a group of States such as the New England States or the Pacific Coast States. In the United States we have no political organization that presides over or is responsible to a group of our States. The State itself is the only unit above the county between the county and the Federal Government. However, under the Russian Soviet system the members of the legislative body known as the regional Soviet are chosen not by the people but by the urban and county Soviets, the urban Soviet members being elected in the cities by the direct vote of those of the Russian people who are permitted the ballot, while the county Soviets are twice removed from the farmer, who again cannot be trusted with the responsibility of voting for so much as a county officer in Russia. Each body has charge of and elects its own officers.

The next political unit in Russia is the province. This unit corresponds with the State under our own system. In Russia the Provincial Soviet, a legislative body, is made up of members elected by whom? The people? Not at all. It is made up of members elected, first, by the urban Soviets, who are elected by the people, and by the rural Soviets, who are once removed from the people. In the United States our State legislatures are elected by whom? By the people.

In the translation of the Constitution of Russia that I have, the word "county" is used as the English equivalent of the Russian word, and it corresponds with a small section of country similar to the county in our own Government. In the United States the persons who are intrusted with the supervision of county affairs are the County Commissioners. These officers are elected by the people just as are our Senators and members of the House, and just as are members of the Legislatures. In Russia we find that the members of the county Soviet are not chosen by the people; they are chosen by the urban Soviets and by the rural Soviets.

We pass to the organizations that are less than the county Soviet, and we find rural Soviets made up of members who are elected not by the people but by two groups, first, the village voter, from villages whose population is less than 1,000 people, and by the rural local Soviet. In the cities of more than 10,000 people we find urban Soviets. The members of the urban Soviets, the members of the village Soviets, and the members of the local rural Soviets receive their franchise direct from the people. This is Russia. This is the Soviet system.

OUR CONSTITUTION

The struggle for liberty, the struggle for the right to participate in government, is one that is close to the life thought of English-speaking people. It is close to the life thought of the American people. As we search the traditions that tell of the struggles for parliamentary government in Great Britain we go back to the time when Magna Charta was wrested from King John. We go back to the time when Edward the First, I believe, called together the noblemen of Great Britain in repeated conclaves that could be considered a forerunner of the legislative bodies of today in Great Britain. And then we drafted our own Constitution, written by the lifeblood of the bravest of our land and amid the suffering of all our people. We drafted such a Constitution as would reserve to the people themselves the right to cast their votes for the members of the most numerous branch of their national representative body and made only once removed from the people the Senate, and within the last six years that one barrier that has stood between the people and the Senate of the United States has been broken down, and today the American people vote not only for their precinct and village and city officers as do the Russian people, whose power is exhausted with such vote, but our people vote as well for their county officers, they vote for their State officers, and for the officers that represent them in the great legislative bodies of all the States and of the United States.

There never was a system applied to any large country that was more free, more democratic than is the system applied in the United States, and there never was a system under which the people could hold their representatives to greater responsibility than in the United States. On the other hand, there never was a representative system in any government that is worthy of the name so tyrannical and so calculated to separate the people from their right to participate in government as the system that has been devised by the Soviet rulers of Russia.

EXECUTIVE OFFICERS

Now let us pass on to the executive officers in Russia and the executive officers in the United States. For comparison I have again presented what I have called the deadly parallel. The executive officers of all Russia are what are termed in the Constitution the commissars.

RUSSIA

1. The executive officers of all Russia are chosen by the All-Russian Executive Committee, which is chosen by the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, which is chosen by provincial and urban Soviets, &c.

(In Russia the chief executive is three times removed from the city voter and five times removed from the rural voter).

2. Regional and provincial executive officers are chosen by the respective Soviets, which themselves are not chosen by the people.

UNITED STATES

The President is elected by electors chosen by the direct vote of the people to vote for a particular person.

(In the United States the President is once removed from the people).

Governors are elected by direct vote of the people.

The All-Russian Congress of Soviets is necessarily a very large body and it is an unwieldy body. For the purpose, then, of close executive administration the Constitution provides that there shall be an executive committee appointed of 200 members. This executive committee is chosen by the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. As the congress itself is once removed from the city dweller and three times removed from the country dweller, the committee chosen by the congress is two times and four times, respectively, removed from these groups of Russian people.

This committee then selects another committee of seventeen members, which is called the council of people's commissars, each member of which presides over another committee chosen by the council and which exercises the function of a Cabinet department of the Government. The Chairman of each committee is the chief executive of the particular department to which the business of the committee pertains. The Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Chairman of the Committee on the Army and the Navy become necessarily the most important members of the Russian Government, and the Chairmanship of the Foreign Affairs Committee is the office that is now filled by Lenin. It is by virtue of being Chairman of this commissariat that Mr. Lenin has become what we popularly call the Premier, the head of the Russian Government. The Chairmanship of the Committee on Military Affairs is the office filled by Trotsky.

Mr. Lenin, then, is responsible not to the people, not to the country, not to the State or province. He is responsible to the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, which in turn is responsible to the congress. He is from three to five times removed from the voting power of the people of Russia.

Contrast this, if you please, with the Chief Executive of the United States. The President, it is true, is not elected by a direct vote of the people, but by electors who are chosen with the specific duty of voting for a particular candidate for President. For more than a hundred years we have followed this system and no man has ever failed to vote for the candidate for President for whom he was chosen to cast his ballot. It is practically the same as the people themselves voting direct for President. No choice is given to the elector. He becomes a sort of living ballot typifying the vote of the people. He expresses the voice, the wish of the people. Is it possible that any thoughtful person can contrast this system with the system that obtains in Russia and find that the system in Russia is more democratic?

But how about organizations that are less extensive than all of Russia? As I said, we have no political organization that corresponds to the regional organization that exists in Russia, and I shall say in passing merely that the executive officers of the regional organization in Russia are appointed by the regional Soviet in precisely the same way as the officers of all Russia are appointed by the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. But the title "people's commissar" belongs only to an officer of all Russia and may not be used by an officer of a lesser unit.

We then pass to the Provincial Government, which corresponds to the government of States. In the United States the Chief Executive of every State is chosen by the direct vote of the people. Not so in Russia. The executives of each province are chosen by and are responsible to the provincial Soviet, which, as I have already indicated, is a body that is not elected by the people.

I shall not pursue the matter further with the lesser organizations in Russia, other than to say that, while the people in the United States vote for their executive officers in precinct, in village, and in county, all the executive officers, from the local Soviet through the urban and village Soviets up to the county Soviets, are chosen not by the people but by the Soviets themselves of the region over which they are expected to preside.

REPRESENTATION

From what I have said we need not be surprised in turning to the basis of representation in the legislative bodies of Russia under the Soviet system to find that this basis of representation is such as to place as much of the responsibility as possible in the groups of laborers who are organized by trades and in the hands of soldiers and sailors and as little as possible in the hands of the farmers.

I have prepared again what I have called the deadly parallel and again I want you to "look on this picture and then on this"—the one being the method of apportioning representation to the legislative bodies in Russia and the other the method of apportioning representation to the legislative bodies in the United States:

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION IN THE LEGISLATIVE BODIES OF RUSSIA
(UNDER SOVIET SYSTEM) AND THE UNITED STATES.

The deadly parallel

RUSSIA	UNITED STATES
All-Russian Congress of Soviets.	Senate
Members chosen by—	Two Senators elected from each State.
1. Urban Soviets (cities and towns). (One member elected for every 25,000 voters).	House of Representatives.
2. Provincial Soviets (representing urban and country population). (One member elected for every 125,000 inhabitants).	Representatives chosen from States on basis of population (farmers sharing equally in government with city population).
Regional
Regional Soviet is made up of—	No similar body in United States.
1. One representative for every 5,000 city voters; and
2. One representative for every 25,000 inhabitants of the county.
Provincial	State
Provincial Soviet is made up of—	State Senators apportioned by counties or on basis of population.
1. One representative for every 2,000 voters in the city; and	State representatives apportioned on basis of population.
2. One representative for every 10,000 inhabitants of rural districts.

In Russia the overwhelming majority of people are farmers, and only six of the fifty provinces have any considerable population engaged in nonrural industries. Lenin and Trotzky when they seized control knew that if they were to retain their control and pass it on to others capable of thinking along similar lines it would be necessary for them to work out a system by which the craftsmen and the men in the army and navy would have an unfair and undue share in the representation in the legislative bodies. Accordingly we find the Constitution solemnly declaring that one member to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, if he shall represent city people, shall be elected for every 25,000 voters, and if he represents provincial people—the farmers—one member shall represent 125,000 inhabitants. The Constitution uses the word "voter" as applied to the city dweller, but "inhabitant" as applied to the country. The reason is plain. The farmer must be disfranchised. Remember, now, that both men and women in Russia over 18 years of age under certain conditions may vote. In the city is where we find the large groups of men and women who are working in factories or in mines and mills and who are untached. In and near the city is where we find the soldiers. This is where we find the sailors. In the cities of Russia we will find the very people for whose interest the Soviet Government exists, and it is for that reason that the Constitution is so drafted as to give the city dweller of Russia a greater representation in their All-Russian Congress of Soviets than is given to the farmers.

FURTHER DISCRIMINATIONS

Notice further that the population of the city is figured in with the population of the country for the basis of province representation, thus giving an additional double representation to the city.

Now, when you go to the regional unit in Russia, you find the same principle applied. One representative to the city dweller is given to every 5,000 voters, while the county as a whole is given one representative for every 25,000 inhabitants.

Notice again that the city population is included in making up the county population, and thus has an additional double representation. And when you go to the provincial unit the city dweller is given one representative in the provincial Soviet for every 2,000 voters, while the farmers are given one representative for every 10,000 inhabitants.

Examine the Constitutions of all countries that pretend to be civilized and you will not find a more flagrant abuse in the organic act of apportionment of representation among the people than you will find in the Constitution of the Soviet Government of Russia. Do those who urge that system in the United States propose to disfranchise the farmers of the United States? Is that part of their theory? Or shall we assume, as I have assumed, that those who have carelessly spoken words of approval of the Soviet system are not aware of the plan that they have so lightly indorsed?

I have pointed out that the Soviet Government is organized so as to deliberately eliminate the farmer. And I now come to another instance in point. I have said that the All-Russian Congress of Soviets is chosen by the urban Soviets and the provincial Soviets. But the urban Soviets are elected by city folks alone, while city and country folks unite to elect the provincial Soviets. That gives the city people double representation and cuts down correspondingly the representation of the country.

The same principle applies to the regional Soviet. The members of the regional are elected by the urban and county Soviets. The city voters elect the urban Soviets and then through the urban Soviets have a part in electing the county Soviets. The whole scheme is devised and worked out to take away from the farming communities political power and to vest it in the hands of soldiers and sailors and craft groups.

CLASS AGAINST CLASS

One of the most striking features of the Russian Constitution is that which has to do with representation from the standpoint of political units or groups of people through which may be had an expression of opinion.

In all kinds of orderly government heretofore men have been intrusted with responsibility because they have stood for a policy; their position might be affirmative or it might be negative, but at least their position was comparable.

This is the system that obtains in France, Italy, Great Britain, Switzerland, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, and in the United States. It is the system that it seems commends itself to thoughtful people everywhere. There are variations in the terms through which the system is worked out, but, after all, the one principle is held in view that people should have the opportunity of acting as units of thought. This principle is applied in the county when the issue is whether or not a system of county roads shall be built. It is applied in the State on State issues, and it is applied in the National Government. Accordingly, the people of our great land have learned to think on big subjects as well as upon little subjects. We have learned to think on issues that confront the nation and the world as well as issues that confront the precinct and the county.

In Russia, it is solemnly set forth in the Constitution that the representation accorded to the people shall come from the class to which they belong. That is, a group of carpenters in a city shall elect a carpenter to the Soviet, the blacksmiths shall elect a man who can swing a hammer, the painters shall elect one of their own group, while the farmers shall elect a farmer.

Here is a distinctive feature of the Soviet system, and let us analyze it. What does it mean? It means selfish interest, pure and simple. It means self-interest magnified to the nth power. It means that the carpenter as he considers a candidate for the urban Soviet, shall have in mind not Russia, but a province of Russia, not a county, but a little group of carpenters in the particular community which selects a member to the urban Soviet. It means that the blacksmith will not think of the interests of carpenters or peasants, that he will not think of the interests of all Russia, or the regional or provincial group, but that he will think of the interests selfishly of those who work at the forge. It means that the farmer will shut his eyes to the well-being of everything else in his country and think of nothing but the welfare of the farmer of Russia.

It means in its last analysis selfishness to a degree unheard of, and it means disintegration of national sentiment and of national power. No people can be taught to look in and not out without becoming narrow, selfish, suspicious of others.

OUR REPRESENTATIVE SYSTEM

Now, it is urged in behalf of this system that every trade and craft is thereby given representation, but let us look a little further. I have already shown from the Constitution that the people vote merely for the members of the urban Soviet in the city and the rural local Soviet in the country. These people, it is true, are limited in their choice of representation to a member of the craft to which they belong, but when the local Soviet elects to the county Soviet or when the county and urban Soviets elect to the provincial or regional Soviet or when the regional and urban Soviets elect to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets there is absolutely no limitation in their choice and the members of the county Soviet under the Russian Constitution could all be carpenters or blacksmiths, and so could the members of the provincial, the regional, and the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. What, then, becomes of the Government that recognizes each trade group? Under that system how can there be a more generous distribution of people in legislative bodies from among the trades than there is under our own system in our State, in our nation?

Our system means that every carpenter, that every blacksmith will have in view the broad vision of his country, of his State, of his county, and that every American citizen will be able to assume the responsibility of citizenship that recognizes something broader and larger than the selfish interests that are wrapped around the particular profession or trade or craft with which he happens to be identified.

THE FRANCHISE

In a Government that has been heralded so widely as being the most profound experiment in democracy that has ever been undertaken, we would naturally expect that the franchise would be along lines that would recognize all mankind embraced within the citizenship of the nation as standing upon an equal footing. The United States has for many years adhered to that principle. It was that principle largely for which our fathers died when they established our Government, and yet that principle seems foreign to the way of thinking of Lenin and Trotzky as they shaped the Russian Constitution.

Now, may I draw the deadly parallel of the franchise as it exists in Russia under the Soviet system according to the Constitution and as it exists in the United States:

THE FRANCHISE UNDER THE SOVIET SYSTEM IN RUSSIA AND IN THE UNITED STATES

RUSSIA.

1. The franchise extends to all over 18 years of age who have acquired the means of living through labor that is productive and useful to society and also persons engaged in housekeeping for the former.

2. Soldiers of the army and navy.

3. The former two classes when incapacitated.

Disfranchised and not eligible for office:

1. Persons who employ hired labor in order to obtain from it an increase in profits.

2. Persons who have an income without doing any work, such as interest from capital, receipts from property, &c.

3. Private merchants, trade and commercial brokers.

4. Monks and clergy of all denominations.

5. Employees and agents of the former police, the gendarme corps, and the Czar's secret service; also members of the former reigning dynasty.

6 and 7. Persons unfit on account of mental ailment or criminal record.

UNITED STATES.

The franchise extends to men in all States (and women in many States, and soon in all) who are citizens and over 21 years of age, less those disfranchised on account of illiteracy, mental ailment, or criminal record.

Bear in mind the liberal franchise with which the American Nation meets her citizens and let me ask you to contemplate the franchise that is handed out to the people of Russia. All people of Russia who are 18 years of age or over who have acquired the means of living through labor that is productive and useful to society and persons engaged in housekeeping in behalf of the former are entitled to the franchise. Who else? The soldiers of the army and navy. Who else? Any of the former two classes who have become incapacitated.

THOSE WHO CANNOT VOTE

Now turn to the next sections of the Russian Constitution and see who are disfranchised.

The merchant is disfranchised; ministers of all denominations are disfranchised; and then, while condemning the Czar for tyranny, the Soviet Constitution solemnly declares that those who were in the employ of the Czar or had been members of certain military and police groups and the members of the families of those who had ruled in Russia for many generations shall be denied suffrage.

Persons who have income from capital or from property that is theirs by reason of years of frugality, industry, and thrift are penalized by being denied the right to vote. They are placed in the class with criminals, while the profligate, the tramp who works only enough to obtain the means by which he can hold body and soul together, is able to qualify under the Constitution of Russia and is entitled to a vote. Under this system in the United States the loyal men and women who bought Liberty Bonds in their country's peril would be disfranchised while the slacker would have the right of suffrage.

Persons who employ hired labor in order to obtain from it an increase in profits may not vote or hold office. Under that system the manufacturer who furnishes employment for a thousand men would be denied the ballot, while those in his employ could freely exercise the right of franchise. Under that system the farmer who hires a crew of men to help him harvest his crop is denied the franchise. Under that system the dairyman who hires a boy to milk his cows or to deliver milk is denied the franchise.

The farmer is discriminated against, especially in the fixing of the groups of people who are disfranchised under this last provision to which I have directed attention.

Does the soldier employ labor? No.

Does the sailor employ labor? No.

Does the craftsman employ labor? Not generally.

In the cities those who are interested in industrial lines are very few in comparison with the craftsmen, the soldiers, and the sailors; but how about the country? We know that every successful farmer now and then needs to employ additional labor. He needs to employ it when he puts in his crop; sometimes he employs it when he is caring for the crop; usually he must employ it when the harvest season is on. Now, what does this mean? It means that in all Russia every farmer who has gumption enough to continue his business along such lines as make it necessary that he employ so much as one man to help him in his work when the services of that man are of assistance in increasing the income of the farmer is disfranchised.

No; the whole scheme, with all the other iniquities that I have indicated, is a deliberate plan to eliminate the farmers, the peasants of Russia, from a share in their Government.

But this provision of the Constitution is more deadly still. It crushes out all progress, all ambition. The carpenter who would like to take a contract and employ men to help him in his work must forfeit his right to vote. The blacksmith who is enterprising and puts a second forge and anvil into his shop and employs a helper must forfeit his franchise. The farmer who is frugal and thrifty and industrious, and who employs another man to help him put in his crop or tend it or harvest it, thereby loses his right to vote. In other words, here is a system that chains men down; here is a system that makes men slaves; here is a system that puts a premium on sloth and indolence and stupidity, and chains the hands of him who would arise.

OTHER AMAZING FEATURES

The Constitution of Russia adopts the declaration of rights as part of the organic act to the extent that changes have not been made by the Constitution. Examining them—the Constitution and the declaration of rights—we find other most astonishing doctrines in the Soviet fundamental law. I shall not discuss, but merely mention only a few of them. They do not pertain so much to the structure of government as they do to the economic and social conditions surrounding the people under the Soviet system:

1. Private ownership of land is abolished. (No compensation, open or secret, is paid to the former owner.)

2. Civil marriage alone is legal.

- (a) By act of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets a marriage may be accomplished by the contracting parties declaring the fact orally or by writing to the Department of Registry of Marriage.

- (b) Divorce is granted by petition of both or either party upon proof alone that divorce is desired.

3. The teaching of religious doctrines is forbidden in private schools as well as in schools that are public.

4. No church or religious society has the right to own property. (The Soviet leaders boldly proclaim the home and the church as the enemies of their system, and from the foregoing it would seem that they are trying to destroy them.)

5. Under the general authority granted to the Soviets by the Constitution inheritance of property by law or will has been abolished.

These amazing features of the Constitution and laws enacted under the Constitution speak more eloquently than any words that could be used to amplify them in portraying the hideousness of a system of government that, if permitted to continue, must inevitably crush out the home in large part by the flippancy with which marriage and divorce are regarded, by the refusal of permitting the land to be held in private ownership, and by refusing the parent the right at death to pass on to his wife or to his children the fruits of years of toil. Furthermore, the Constitution has gone as far as it seems it could go in the effort to wipe out religious thought and to make Russia an atheistic nation. No church or religious society may own property, and religious doctrines which could properly be barred from public schools may not be taught in even a private school. That means that the home, shattered and wrecked as it is, shall be the only centre in which religious ideas may be reasonably considered and there can be no general and systematic comparison of religious views, or culture, refinement, and purity of life attained through their general consideration.

A PYRAMID OF TYRANNY

If what I have said in analyzing the Russian Soviet Constitution is amazing; if the disfranchisement of the people by arrangement of representation in the Soviets and by the withholding of suffrage is startling; if the provisions to which I have just referred pertaining to the ownership of land, inheritance, limitations on religious teachings are hideous, there is one feature still that is impossible in connection with a Government of people who would be free.

I refer to the language of the Constitution that specifically provides that in a pyramidal manner the power of each Soviet increases from the small unit to the higher until in the All-Russian Congress of Soviets complete and absolute authority has been conferred. This feature of the system is so amazing that I want you to read the three sections of the Constitution which confer this tyrannous power:

Section 12. The supreme power of the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic belongs to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, and, in periods between the convocation of the congress, to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

Section 50. Besides the above-mentioned questions (broad powers conferred specifically in Section 49), the All-Russian Congress and the All-Russian Central Executive Committee have charge of all other affairs which, according to their decision, require their attention.

Section 62. The Congress of Soviets and their executive committees have the right to control the activity of the local Soviets (i. e., the regional congress controls all Soviets of the respective regions; the provincial, of the respective province, with the exception of the urban Soviets, &c.); and the regional and Provincial Congresses and their executive committees, in addition, have the right to overrule the decisions of the Soviets of their districts, giving notice in important cases to the central Soviet authority.

What I have said in analyzing the Russian Soviet system is upon the assumption that the Constitution is adhered to and that the provisions of the Government, such as they are, are faithfully followed throughout Russia. Disgraceful and tyrannical as the system would be were it carried out according to the letter of the Soviet Constitution, the cold, bare fact is that the Soviet Constitution is not respected by those who are trusted with responsibility under it.

In a system in which the executive authority is so far removed from the people, the executives have not hesitated in their arbitrary rule to exercise this function of government. All over the part of Russia that is dominated by the Soviet Government terrorism prevails, and the terrorism emanates from the central authority of Government as it is represented in Lenin and Trotzky.

THE SYSTEM IN PRACTICE

I have talked with man after man who has come back from Russia and each tells the same story. Not only are elections set aside and not only are the people dominated in this high-handed way, but all who dare to stand in the path of the all-powerful executive committee of the Russian Government are dealt with most ruthlessly. Men and women are murdered by the officers of the Government for no other reason than that they are opposed to the Soviet system. Indeed, more than that, the relatives of men who have had the courage of their convictions have been murdered because, forsooth, they happened to have kinsmen who were brave enough to stand out in their communities against the Russian system. This high-handed system of butchery and death that has prevailed for more than two years has been carried on to such an extent that in large part the educated, the thoughtful, the well-trained men and women of Russia have been exterminated or have been driven from the country. These are not idle tales; these are the reports and statements that come to us from those who have had the opportunity of close observation in Russia, no matter whether they have been Russians themselves or citizens of other countries who have had the opportunity or the dread privilege of spending months in Russia during the régime of Lenin and Trotzky.

More than that, the very system has reflected itself upon the industrial life of Russia. It was ushered in as a system that would be the panacea for labor disturbances, that would mean equality among the people of Russia, but what has been the result? Before the system was adopted, even in spite of two or three years of war in which Russia had been constantly engaged, her factories were operating, her railroads were being administered, her cities filled with populous throngs, and albeit the hardship of war was present, Russia was a live nation, but what is the situation today? Factories have been closed or destroyed until at this time there is only a small percentage of factories and mills of Russia in operation in comparison with those that were running only two years ago at the beginning of the Soviet régime.

The whole history of Russia for the last two years has been that of a saturnalia of financial, of social, of industrial ruin, with all that those words imply. Worse still than that: following Lenin and Trotzky into authority rode the four horsemen of the Apocalypse—War, Famine, Pestilence, and Death—and the population of Petrograd, the capital of Russia, has been reduced in two years from more than 2,000,000 to between 500,000 and 750,000 people today. The population of other fair cities and splendid country settlements has been woefully chastised. Famine, hunger, disease—these are raising havoc in all the parts of Russia that are under the rule of the Soviet; and through the curse of that despotic system—the brute force of Bolshevism that is masking in the name of democracy—untold thousands of that brave people are forfeiting their lives because they stand for law and order and decency in government.

THE ARRAIGNMENT

What, then, is my arraignment of Sovietism according to the Soviet Constitution?

1. The people have no direct vote or voice in government, except the farmers in their local rural Soviets and the city dwellers in their urban Soviets.

2. The rural, county, provincial, regional, and all-Russian Soviets are elected indirectly, and the people have no direct vote in the election.

3. The people have no voice in the election of executive officers of the highest or lowest degree.

4. There is no mention of justice or judicial officers in the Constitution.

5. The people are very largely disfranchised.

6. The farmer of Russia is discriminated against:

(a) Equal representation is denied him.

(b) He may vote for only the members of the local rural Soviet, not for rural, county, provincial, regional, or All-Russian Congress of Soviets.

(c) The farmer who employs any profitable labor is disfranchised.

(d) The city voter has a double voice in electing the regional and all-Russian Soviets.

7. The system raises class against class; the voters vote by trade and craft groups instead of on the basis of thought units.

(a) This means rank selfishness.

(b) It kills national and even provincial and county interest or loyalty.

8. The system strikes a blow at the church and the home.

9. The system is pyramidal and means highly centralized and autocratic power.

A WORD IN CONCLUSION

No; the Soviet system of government cannot be defended. It is against the interests of the very man for whom it is supposed to have been established—the laboring man. He is the man most of all who must suffer under any kind of government or system that is wrong. He is the man who would be out of bread within the shortest time. He is the man whose family would be destitute of clothing in the shortest time. He is the man whose family will suffer most through disease, famine, and pestilence in the shortest time.

As it is against the best interest of the laboring man, so it is against the best interest of all our people, and, as a matter of fact, the overwhelming mass of people of this country and all countries is made up of laboring people.

For what did our boys fight at St. Mihiel, the Argonne, and Belleau Wood? Was it for the Soviet system of government? No; a thousand times no. Rather it was for a system of government where the ideals of free peoples prevail, where there is freedom of religious worship, where there is no stricture upon the conscience of man, where there is liberty of voice and the press, where justice is administered to all alike, and where the people, regardless of race or creed, regardless of religious or political thought, may have the right of an equal share in the responsibilities of government. They fought and they died for America, whose Government in warp and woof was created for the people, is of the people, and is maintained by the people of our splendid land.

What Bolshevism Would Mean in America

Senate Committee's Report

The United States Senate passed a resolution on Feb. 4, 1919, directing a judiciary sub-committee to investigate Bolshevist propaganda in the United States. This committee made a thorough inquiry, calling witnesses from both the friends and the opponents of the Soviet system, and at length formulated an elaborate report, the substance of which appeared in the Congressional Record of Dec. 12, 1919. The salient features of that official report are as follows:

CONFISCATION on a wholesale scale has been used [in Soviet Russia] as a means of undertaking to create and maintain tangible assets that could be used as the economic foundation upon which could be built the industrial and financial superstructure of the Bolshevik State. By constitutional edicts and by a series of decrees issued by the dictatorship all land, forests, and natural resources of Russia have been confiscated by the Government in order that the Bolshevik Government may become the landlord of the entire population and exercise the control incident thereto. Where a man shall live and toil and till the soil is determined by the State, and the right to determine the nature and extent of each man's domicile, and the power to compel the migration of the peasant from the locality of his birth or adoption, even to the extent of separating families as the population of the various communities expands or contracts, is exercised by the Bolshevik Government through the laws which it has decreed for the control of the people.

The alleged purpose of the seizure of land by the Government was that the right to the land might be transferred to the rank and file of the people of Russia, in order that the individual Russian peasant might become the unrestrained and unrestricted architect of his own future economic development, but the methods adopted by the Bolsheviks have merely transferred the landlordship from the large landowners, and in many instances from the peasant group themselves, to the Bolshevik Government, and the present control by that Government is not confined to the land itself, as was the control of the landowners under the old régime, but extends as well to the persons and even the tools, implements, and products of the peasants. The aged and infirm are deprived of all right to utilize and enjoy during their declining years the soil their efforts may have enriched, because their physical strength makes them powerless to perform all of the labor incident to its full cultivation. They, thereupon, become mere pensioners of the State.

This system guarantees to the peasant only the present enjoyment of a given piece of land, and consequently only warrants him in so utilizing the beneficence of the State in according him the right to use the same as to insure the maximum present production to the exclusion of a scientific development that will enure to future advantage. In other words, an uncertain tenure is naturally accompanied by an exploitation rather than by a systematic development of the leasehold interest. Under this system the peasant can never become the owner of the land he tills or of any other land. To aid in the system and to establish a larger control of peasant activities by the Government the principle of confiscation has also been invoked in the case of all live stock and all agricultural implements, and as a consequence these essential instruments of land cultivation, these chattels necessary to the production of both meat and vegetable foodstuffs, have become, without regard to the rights of former owners or the advantage to the individual of future ownership therein, the property of the Bolshevik Government, and the only right thereto that the peasant can in the future acquire is a use upon such terms and conditions as the Government may prescribe.

The financial condition of the dictatorship, however, required the adoption of some constructive policy that would finance it. It was necessary to maintain at least a color of legitimacy, an appearance of honest business methods, in supporting its so-called Red Army and in securing control of the articles necessary to sustain life. Further than that, it was desirable to devise ways and means by which service in the Red Army and employment in nationalized enterprises might appear sufficiently attractive, and at the same time give an appearance of prosperity to the Government itself, in order that hope as well as fear might assist in maintaining the Bolshevik Government. The policy adopted was the printing of unlimited amounts of fiat paper money unsecured by any reserve. This naturally furnished to the Government a cash capital limited only by the capacity of the printing presses of the Government, which, in turn, had been confiscated and nationalized. Already it is estimated that a sum in excess of 30,000,000,000 rubles has been put into circulation. This has created a ridiculously inflated circulating medium of no material value to the public, but of enforced value to the Government.

Every activity of the Bolshevik Government indicates clearly the antipathy of the Bolsheviks toward Christianity and the Christian religion. Its program is a direct challenge to that religion. The Christian Church and Bolshevism cannot both survive the program that is being developed by the Russian dictatorship and which it is undertaking to extend throughout the world. Not only have they confiscated all church property, real and personal, but they have established the right of anti-religious propaganda as a constitutionally recognized institution. Church and school have been divorced even to the extent of suppressing the Sunday school, and the teaching of all religious doctrines in public, either in schools or educational institutions of any kind, is expressly forbidden. Religion can only be taught or studied privately. All church and religious organizations are prohibited from owning property of any kind. All recognition of a Supreme Being in both Governmental and judicial oaths is abolished. The clergy and all servants or employes of church bodies are expressly disfranchised and deprived of all right to hold public positions. The full significance of the attitude of the Bolsheviks toward Christianity is most fully manifested in the fact that, though by Russian custom and decree under the old régime, every newspaper or periodical published on Easter Sunday in the Russian Empire was required to carry the headline, "Christ Is Risen," on Easter Sunday in 1918, all Bolshevik papers substituted for this sacred sentiment the headline and slogan, "One Hundred Years Ago Today Karl Marx Was Born." Thus the issue has been framed between the gospel of Karl Marx and the teachings of Christ. We reiterate, therefore, that Bolshevism and the Christian religion cannot both survive.

Bolshevism accords to the family no such sacred place in society as modern civilization accords to it. Conflicting reports have been passing current during the last few months relative to the nationalization of women by the new Russian Government. Two or three local Soviets have apparently thus degraded the womanhood of their particular districts, but the Central Government has refrained from adopting any such policy in the whole nation. They have, however, promulgated decrees relating to marriage and divorce which practically establishes a state of free love. Their effect has been to furnish a vehicle for the legalization of prostitution by permitting the annulment of the marriage bonds at the whim of the parties, recognizing their collusive purposes as a ground for the severance of the matrimonial state.

The freedom of the press and of speech, though heralded by the advocates of Bolshevism as necessary to the intelligent participation of the people in popular government, has been abrogated in Russia, and by the usual confiscatory method of the accepted formula all of the mechanical devices and materials necessary for the publication of periodicals and all places of meeting and public assemblage have been seized by the Bolshevik Government.

To make the control more complete and effective the publication of all advertisements, whether in regularly published periodicals or on handbills or programs, is made a monopoly of the Government. As a consequence the people of Russia are deprived of all facts, literature, and public expression through the medium of the press or public meetings, except such as is approved by the dictatorship and has been passed by its censorship.

In the attempted establishment of an educational system it is to be expected that much difficulty would arise because of the large percentage of illiteracy that afflicts Russia, and it is not surprising that this system is largely on paper and of little practical value. It is interesting to note, however, that under this system age rather than attainment determines the admissibility of the student to a given school or grade, and that to require the production of evidence of the qualification of a student for such admission is a criminal offense. This again reflects the Bolshevik theory that equalization can be accomplished by dictatorial decrees.

The apparent purpose of the Bolshevik Government is to make the Russian citizen, and especially the women and children, the wards and dependents of that Government. Not satisfied with the degree of dependency incurred by the economic and industrial control assumed by its functionaries, it has destroyed the natural ambition and made impossible of accomplishment the moral obligation of the father to provide, care for, and adequately protect the child of his blood and the mother of that child against the misfortunes of orphanhood and widowhood. To accomplish this it has by decree expressly abolished and prohibited all right of inheritance, either by law or will. Upon death all of the decedent's estate is confiscated by the State, and all heirs who are physically incapable of working become pensioners of the State to the extent that the assets confiscated by the Government make such pensions possible.

Insurance of all kinds has been nationalized, the assets of insurance companies confiscated, and the business of insuring life, property, accident, old age, and unemployment made a State monopoly. In the attempted liquidation of existing companies and associations the liquidating representatives of the Government seem only concerned in securing possession and record of all their assets and fail to recognize the propriety of accurately adjusting their liabilities. As a consequence, those insured and the beneficiaries under existing policies find themselves without the protection for which they have been paying premiums.

The salient features which constitute the program of Bolshevism, as it exists today in Russia and is presented to the rest of the world as a panacea for all ills, may be summarized as follows:

1. The repudiation of democracy and the establishment of a dictatorship.
2. The confiscation of all land and the improvements thereon.
3. The confiscation of all forests and natural resources.
4. The confiscation of all live stock and all agricultural implements.
5. The confiscation of all banks and banking institutions and the establishment of a State monopoly of the banking business.
6. The confiscation of all factories, mills, mines and industrial institutions and the delivery of the control and operation thereof to the employes therein.
7. The confiscation of all churches and all church property, real and personal.
8. The confiscation of all newspapers and periodicals and all mechanical facilities and machinery used in the publication thereof.

9. The seizure and confiscation of all public meeting places and assembly halls.

10. The confiscation of all transportation and communication systems.

11. The confiscation of the entire estate of all decedents.

12. The monopolizing by the State of all advertisements of every nature, whether in newspapers, periodicals, handbills or programs.

13. The repudiation of all debts against the Government and all obligations due the non-Bolshevist elements of the population.

14. The establishment of universal compulsory military service, regardless of religious scruples and conscientious objections.

15. The establishment of universal compulsory labor.

16. The abolition of the Sunday school and all other schools and institutions that teach religion.

17. The absolute separation of churches and schools.

18. The establishment, through marriage and divorce laws, of a method for the legalization of prostitution, when the same is engaged in by consent of the parties.

19. The refusal to recognize the existence of God in its Governmental and judicial proceedings.

20. The conferring of the rights of citizenship on aliens without regard to length of residence or intelligence.

21. The arming of all so-called "tool-men" and the disarming of all persons who had succeeded in acquiring property.

22. The discrimination in favor of residents of cities and against residents of the rural districts through giving residents of cities five times as much voting power as is accorded to residents of rural districts in such elections as are permitted.

23. The disfranchisement of all persons employing any other person in connection with their business.

24. The disfranchisement of all persons receiving rent, interest or dividends.

25. The disfranchisement of all merchants, traders and commercial agents.

26. The disfranchisement of all priests, clergymen or employes of churches and religious bodies.

27. The denial of the existence of any inalienable rights in the individual citizen.

28. The establishment of a judicial system exercising autocratic power, convicting persons and imposing penalties in their absence and without opportunity to be heard, and even adopting the death penalty for numerous crimes and misdemeanors.

29. The inauguration of a reign of fear, terrorism and violence.

This is the program that the revolutionary elements and the so-called "parlor Bolsheviks" would have this country accept as a substitute for the Government of the United States, which recognizes that "all men are created equal," and that "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are the inalienable rights of all its citizens. * * *

With a view of concretely illustrating just what this new social order would accomplish if transplanted into the political, educational, industrial, and religious life of the United States attention is invited to the following unavoidable consequences:

1. The application of force and violence, the shedding of blood and the destruction of life and property, the common incidents of all revolutions, and all this to destroy a democratic form of government, under which the majority can secure just the kind of government that it desires. The advocacy of revolutionary methods is an admission, therefore, that minority rather than majority rule is the goal sought to be attained.

2. To make possible the control of the minority as the dictators of the majority, the disfranchisement of millions of substantial, patriotic citizens who would fall in the so-called bourgeois or capitalistic class. This would deprive of the right to participate in affairs of government—

(a) Millions of farmers, merchants and manufacturers, both large and small, employing persons in the conduct of their business, and all professional and business men utilizing the services of a clerk, bookkeeper or stenographer.

(b) All persons receiving interest on borrowed money or bonds, rent from real estate or personal property, and dividends from stock of any kind.

(c) All traders, merchants and dealers, even though they do not employ another person in the conduct of their business.

(d) All preachers, priests, janitors and employees of all churches and religious bodies.

It is apparent, with the millions of persons falling into these several classes, disfranchised and deprived of all right to participate in the affairs of government, accompanied with the immediate enfranchisement of all aliens who do not fall within these prohibited classes, and the opening of the doors of all prisons and penitentiaries, the domination of the criminal and most undesirable alien elements of the country would be a comparatively easy matter. To simplify the question of this control, however, the substantial rural portion of the population would be further suppressed and restricted, and under the revolutionary formula the voting power of the cities would be five times as great as that of the rural communities, the ratio of representation in cities being one to every 25,000 of the population, while that of the rural districts would be only one to every 125,000 of the population. In the United States the rural population under the 1910 census was considerably in excess of the urban. We must also remember that the application of the formula would include the disarming of all disfranchised classes and the arming to the teeth of these criminal and alien elements.

3. It would result in the confiscation by the Government thus constituted of the land of the United States, including 6,361,502 farms, of which 62.1 per cent., or 3,948,722 farms, are owned in fee by the farmers who cultivate them, and represent the labor and toil of a lifetime. On the farms of the United States there are improvements, machinery and live stock to the value of $40,991,449,090 (census of 1910), all of which would be confiscated with the land. The confiscation program would include the more than 275,000 manufacturing establishments, including the $22,790,980,000 of invested capital, much of which is owned by the small investor, whose livelihood depends upon the success of the respective enterprises. The confiscation would also include 203,432 church edifices. Forests aggregating 555,000,000 acres would be seized by the Government, and an annual product of $1,375,000,000 would come under the control of the dictatorship. Dwellings to the number of 17,805,845, of which 9,093,675 are owned in fee, with 5,984,248 entirely free from debt, would be confiscated and the owners dispossessed at the pleasure of the Government.

4. Although clamoring loudly for a free and unrestricted press, the revolutionary program would require the seizure and confiscation of the 22,896 newspapers and periodicals in the United States, together with all mechanical equipment necessary for their publication, and a control and ownership of the public press by the Government.

5. Complete control of all banking institutions and their assets is an essential part of the revolutionary program, and the 31,492 banks in the United States would be taken over by the Government and the savings of millions, including 11,397,553 depositors drawing interest on accounts in savings banks, and consequently belonging to the so-called bourgeois or capitalistic class, jeopardized.

6. One of the most appalling and far-reaching consequences of an application of Bolshevism in the United States would be found in the confiscation and liquidation of its life insurance companies. There is 20 per cent. more life insurance in force in this country than in all the rest of the world, and nine-tenths of it is mutual insurance. Almost 50,000,000 life insurance policies, representing nearly $30,000,000,000 of insurance, the substantial protection of the women and children of the nation, would be rendered valueless.

7. The atheism that permeates the whole Russian dictatorship is clearly reflected in the activities of their revolutionary confreres in the United States, and in their publications they have denounced our religion and our God as "lies." This gives added significance to the revolutionary attitude toward the Christian Church and the Christian religion. The prohibition of religious schools and the teaching or studying of religion, except in private, would necessitate the abolition of 194,759 Sunday schools in the United States and a great number of seminaries, colleges and universities; 19,935,890 Sunday school scholars would be deprived and prevented from enjoying the institution that has become an important part of their lives and is one of the great moral influences of the nation. Catholic schools, colleges and seminaries to the number of 6,681 would be suppressed. Church property of the value of $1,676,600,582 would be confiscated and 41,926,854 (census of 1916) members of 227,487 church organizations would be subjected to the domination of an atheist dictatorship.

The Retreat of the Serbian Army

By CAPTAIN G. GORDON-SMITH

[ROYAL SERBIAN ARMY]

The retreat of the Serbian Army across Albania was one of the greatest and most tragic episodes of the world war, but at the same time it is the one of which the public knows least. This is due to the fact that from the beginning of October, 1915, till the middle of December, King Peter's army was practically isolated from the rest of the world. Captain Gordon-Smith was the only English-speaking correspondent who accompanied the Serbian Army from the Danube to Durazzo. He has compiled the following account of its fateful Odyssey, partly from material placed at his disposal by the Headquarters Staff and partly from his own observations during the retreat.

IN the whole history of the world war there is no episode which reaches a greater degree of tragedy than the retreat of the Serbian Army through Albania. In the annals of warfare there is no military enterprise to compare to it. Napoleon's passage of the Alps, the only similar military exploit, was voluntarily undertaken by him, after elaborate and painstaking preparations for its successful carrying out. The retreat of the Serbs was imposed on an army exhausted by months of ceaseless combat, with provisions and munitions at their lowest ebb, by an enemy three times their superior in number, provided with an artillery of crushing superiority and a practically unlimited supply of war material and munitions.

It is difficult, even now, to obtain exact data as to the effectives of the Serbian Army when it began its retreat through Northern Albania from the left bank of the Sitniza to the Adriatic. Before the Austro-Germano-Bulgarian attack in October, 1915, the vacancies caused by the heavy losses in the first period of the war, (August, 1914, to October, 1916,) and by the ravages of the epidemic of typhus, had been filled. On account of the immense front to be guarded, every effort was made, in the lull in the fighting which followed the repulse of the second Austrian invasion, to complete the infantry and especially the artillery units, to create new units, and instruct the personnel.

At a cost of sacrifices of every kind, the Serbian Army, on the eve of the Austro-Germano-Bulgarian attack, was made up as follows:

Officers inscribed	10,000
Officers present	8,897
Non-commissioned officers and soldiers inscribed	532,000

Present with the colors.....	411,700
Horses inscribed	75,400
Horses present	71,200
Oxen inscribed	75,400
Oxen present	65,200

These effectives were made up of the three "bans" (or classes) of the National Army, with a corresponding amount of reserve personnel as well as animals and baggage train.

EFFECTIVES REDUCED ONE-HALF

The desperate defense of the northern front, where the enemy disposed of greatly superior forces, especially in heavy artillery, and the bloody struggle against the Bulgarians on the eastern front, had caused the Serbian Army very heavy losses. In the continual combats, night and day, from Sept. 23 up to the last desperate sortie at Kossovo, combats in which the Serbs retreated from one sector to another on the two fronts, the losses in men, killed and wounded, increased continually, so that the original effectives were reduced by half.

The fatigues and the commissariat difficulties in the course of forty days' fighting had exhausted the troops, even before the beginning of the retreat toward the south. It was, therefore, to be expected that there would be a still greater percentage of loss in men, material, and animals, in the difficult conditions of movement and of provisioning the army in a mountainous, sterile country wanting in roads of any kind.

The agricultural wealth of Serbia had allowed of all the units, permanent and temporary, being well supplied with riding horses and pack and draft animals. The continual fatigue of the operations of the army in the mountainous country in the southwestern part of Serbia had, however, greatly exhausted these, especially the draft animals. But in spite of this, at the moment of the retreat from Kossovo, the army still disposed of a large number of animals and convoys. There was, however, little consolation in this, in view of the impossibility of wheeled vehicles traversing the mountains of Montenegro and Albania. But the draft animals could at least be used as pack horses.

At the beginning of the campaign of 1915 the Serbian Army was well provided with arms and ammunition, at least as regarded the medium armament such as the enemy had hitherto had at his disposition. But on the northern front the German troops appeared with heavy artillery of the most formidable description (38 and 35.8 centimeter guns) against which the Serbian artillery was completely insufficient. The largest calibre of the Serbian artillery was rapid-fire 15-centimeter howitzers, (two batteries,) some batteries of 12-centimeter howitzers, and some long guns of the same calibre.

There was an abundant field artillery, due to the fact that all the guns captured from the Austrians had been pressed into service; but there was a great want of mountain guns. In comparison with the penury of munitions during the retreat to the Kolubara in the previous campaign, the quantity of artillery munitions was sufficient. The infantry was also well armed with Serbian and Russian rapid-fire rifles. This artillery was used right up to the last moment when the retreat into Montenegro and Albania began. Desperate efforts were made to save at least a small part of it, but the success was not great.

As regards clothing and camping material, the Serbian Army was but poorly provided. This had disastrous consequences during the retreat. The fact that the troops were forced to sleep in the open during the cold weather, with torn uniforms and broken boots, wore down the strength of even the strongest among them. Those of feeble constitution succumbed.

SHORTAGE OF FOOD

When it was driven from the valleys of the Morava and the Toplitza, the Serbian Army lost its main sources of food supply. The intendant had, however, succeeded in forming a temporary provision base at Kossovo, which was increased to a certain degree from the local resources. Six days before the retreat from the left bank of the Sitnitsa there were 2,000 tons of food for the army. According to the calculations of the Headquarters Staff there was only food for nine days after the real retreat into Albania began. Of forage there was even a smaller quantity, so that the animals were destined to perish.

It must further be remembered that all the vehicles had to be destroyed on account of the impossibility of transporting them over mountains on which there consequences. Hunger was the great enemy, and the question of provisioning the army dominated all others.

The efforts made by the Serbian Government and the General Headquarters to induce the nearest ally—Italy—to establish a provision base on the coast were no roads, and also that, on account of the exhaustion of the pack animals, the quantity of food and forage transported had to be reduced to a minimum.

In addition to this the army was accompanied by thousands of the civil population fleeing before a ruthless enemy. They, too, had to receive a minimum ration. As there was no possibility of procuring food from the poverty-stricken population of Montenegro and Albania, the army, during its retreat, had to suffer starvation with all its terrible did not give satisfactory results. Such treatment of the Serbian Army, which, in the interest of all, had made such terrible sacrifices, remains inexplicable and completely unjustifiable.

The depots of provisions which, relying on this, the Headquarters Staff had promised to the troops, remained a vain promise. This not only caused bitter disappointment to the troops during the retreat, and for a certain time afterward, but it also led to their extreme exhaustion, to sickness and to death. As a result the men lost much of their confidence in their chiefs.

THE SITUATION DESPERATE

After the attempt to pierce the Katchenik toward Uskub and Saloniki in order to establish the liaison with the Allies—an attempt made too late and doomed to fail—the Serbian Army abandoned Kossovo and on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of November retired to the left bank of the Sitnitza.

Thanks to the desperate resistance at Katchenik and at the Kondyl Pass, the Serbian Army managed to gain time. This rendered the retreat possible and caused the failure of the attempt of the Germano-Austro-Bulgarian army to force it to capitulate. But at the same time there was no longer any hope that things would take a turn favorable to the Serbs.

The attack of fresh Bulgarian forces on the extreme rear of the Serbian Army, the rupture of communications between Nish-Uskub-Saloniki, and the rupture of the liaison with the Allies, brought the army into a most critical situation, which lasted more than a month. All the efforts of the Serbian Army had one aim, that of maintaining itself in its positions, coûte que coûte, and this gave time for the help promised from Saloniki to arrive and bring about a change in the situation. Unfortunately, the circumstances which would have brought this about were not within the control of the Serbian Army and its high command. The longer the resistance on the northern front was prolonged, the more difficult became the situation.

At the last moment, when the army was forced to fall back from Kossovo, the General Headquarters saw that the retreat across the mountains of Montenegro and Albania, which, up to this moment, had been regarded as a possible eventuality, had become inevitable. It was necessary to accept the temporary loss of the national territory and to leave nothing undone to conserve the living force of the army. But the execution of the plan met with almost insurmountable difficulties.

In the abandonment of Kossovo the private soldier saw the final loss of Serbia, which he would have to leave at the price of unheard of fatigues and unspeakable sacrifices. Not being able to understand the exigencies of the situation, exhausted by incessant combats and marches, day and night, under the most painful conditions, he only saw the brutal reality of the moment. He saw no help come, and, forced continually to make superhuman efforts, he ended by losing all hope.

In the course of four years of war the Serbian soldier accomplished exploits which have a permanent place in history. But this same Serbian soldier, who had given such wonderful proof of his military worth and valor, felt an intense moral depression at the moment of the retreat from Kossovo. Kossovo spelled for him the most glorious, though at the same time the most tragic, episode in the history of his country.* The abandonment of this historic battlefield, on which the Czar Lazar, five centuries before, had died fighting for Serbia's freedom, was a terrible blow to him. It was on this historic spot that he had hoped to receive the long promised aid and succor from the Allies and at last turn the tide of invasion. In quitting Serbian territory he abandoned his family, with the prospect of losing all contact with his country for a long time and being forced to live on foreign soil; he felt as if he were committing a crime in going, and a certain number, indeed, abandoned the army and returned to their homes.

WILD REGION TRAVERSED

With the exception of a few weak detachments operating in the New Territories, the main body of the army had to retreat through Montenegro and Albania. The mountainous country to be traversed included the whole complex of the Albanian Alps. It is the most savage region of the whole Balkan Peninsula, and for that reason has remained inaccessible to European culture.

The army had, therefore, to force its passage through this region, of which the mean altitude is over 6,000 feet, and which is without any means of communication. There were only a few wretched mountain pathways for men and pack animals, running through deep valleys alternating with steep and abrupt ascents, amid rocks and snow and ice. Here and there there was an attempt at a road, but these always ran into mere sheep paths. The cloud-capped summits of the mountains, walls of vertical rock cut by deep precipices, lay between the army and the sea. The only good route was the road from Andriyeritza to Podgoritza in Montenegro, but in order to reach the former village the whole of the Albanian Alps had to be traversed, across Mount Jlieb. In addition the march had to be made in November, one of the coldest months in the year.

This wretched country is inhabited by men of a rough and inhospitable race, who received the Serbs with sullen hostility. At first they made no active resistance to the passage of the troops, but when they observed the state of exhaustion of the men they began, animated by the desire for loot, to attack the various columns. In a word, the Serbian Army had to carry out its retreat under the worst possible conditions, having constantly before its eyes the possibility of total annihilation.

DISPOSITION OF TROOPS

On Nov. 12 the greater part of the army was assembled to the west of the plain of Kossovo, on the left bank of the Sitnitza. Its extreme right wing was covered by the Char Mountain, (Kodja Balkans,) its extreme left wing by the River Ibar, to the northwest of Mitrovitza. The principal line of defense began in the northern ramification of the Kodja Balkans, passing by the summits of Mounts Neredinka, Ribarska, and Tchetchvitza, and reaching to the Souba.

Some weak detachments of Serbian troops operated, on the other hand, with the French troops in the New Territories and barred the march of the enemy in the direction of Prilep-Monastir and Gestwar-Kitchevo-Monastir.

On Nov. 12 the troops holding the left bank of the Sitnitza began to give way under the pressure of strong bodies of Bulgarian troops. The historic City of Prisrend was their chief objective. The troops of the New Territories which were covering the Ferizovitch-Prisrend front bore the brunt of the Bulgarian attack. On the rest of the front only a few weak detachments of the Austro-Germano-Bulgarian troops succeeded in crossing to the left bank of the Sitnitza.

The fundamental idea for the retreat was to debouch as soon as possible toward the sea and leave between the Serbian troops and the enemy a country difficult to cross, which would allow the Serbian Army to be re-formed and re-organized in Albania, under the protection of a small rearguard force which would close the routes to the pursuing enemy.

This plan demanded that the movement should be carried out as rapidly as possible, on the widest possible front, toward the Scutari-El Basan-Durazzo line. The ulterior action of the Serbian Army was to be determined according to the political and military situation.

PLAN OF THE RETREAT

Taking into consideration the general grouping of the Serbian forces on Nov. 12 and the directions which might be taken, the retreat was conceived in the following fashion:

1. The First, Second, and Third Armies and the troops of the defense of Belgrade, that is to say, the main body of the Serbian Army, were to retreat via Petch-Andriyevitsa-Podgoritsa-Scutari. The retreat of this force to Andriyevitsa was to take place under the direction of the First Army, which, with this object, was to occupy positions at Rojai to cover the routes which led from the Mitrovitsa-Novi Bazar-Sienitsa front via Rojai and Borane to Andriyevitsa.

The routes which the troops were to utilize were the following:

- (a) Second Army, the route Petch-Rougovo-Velika-Andriyevitsa and beyond.
- (b) Third Army, the troops of the defense of Belgrade, and the First Army, the route Petch-Rajai-Borane-Andriyevitsa and beyond.

2. The troops of the New Territories were to take the following route: (a) Gjis-Kovitsa-Vezirov Most. (b) Prisrend-Lioum Koula-Spas-Fleti-Puka toward Scutari and Alessio.

The mission of this latter group was to cover the retreat of the Army of the Timok as long as that army had not begun its movement of retreat, and then to retire in its turn. After crossing the Drin and the Black Drin this group was to halt on the Tvhafasai-Tchafa Moure-Mali-Doise-Orochi-Maya-Masse - Tchafa Koumoule-Floli-Gouri line and cover, with sufficient force, all the routes which, from Djikovitsa-Prisrend and the valley of the Black Drin, lead to Scutari, Alessio, and the valley of the River Matcha. Its base was to be Scutari and Alessio.

During the retreat this force was to protect itself by adopting a rational order of march. This central group had, in a general fashion, its flanks protected; but it had to assure its protection itself, for during its passage through the most savage parts of Northern Albania it was exposed throughout its entire march to attack by the Albanians.

ARMY OF THE TIMOK

3. The Army of the Timok was ordered to retreat via Prisrend-Lioum Koula-Pitchkopeys-Debar.

All the troops still operating in the New Territories (detachment of the Vardar, detachment of Tetovo, detachment of Albania and the detachment of Prisrend) were placed under the orders of the commander of the Army of the Timok. The mission of this group was to establish itself solidly in the Gostwar and Prilep region, and, in liaison with the French troops, assure the liaison with Saloniki as long as possible.

The remainder of the troops of the Army of the Timok were to remain on the Prilep-Brod-Kitchovo-Gostwar line as long as the French troops were on the left bank of the Czerna Reka, near Krivolak, and as long as the enemy did not attack them with such superior forces as to threaten their lines of communication in the direction of Prisrend-Debar. This group had its base at Monastir. In case the Army of the Timok should not be able to hold this line, or in case the French should retire toward Saloniki, the Army of the Timok was to retire in the direction of El Bassan-Tchiafa-Sane-Krstatz-Mali Privalit-Kaptin-Tchiafa Boulchtitz-Tchiafa Sai, with the mission of covering the routes from Stougo and Debar toward El Bassan-Tirana and the valley of the Matcha. In this case this group would make Durazzo its base.

The General Headquarters had asked the commanders of these groups to keep in constant telegraphic communication, but from the first day of the operations this was found to be impossible. The character of the country did not allow of any other means of communication, so that the commanders of these groups were, during the whole movement, left to themselves. All they could do was to conform to the general directions laid down by General Headquarters.

Foreseeing the necessity of a retreat through Montenegro and Albania, the General Headquarters had, as early as Nov. 9, given orders to direct all the convoys and the heavy artillery of all the armies toward Montenegro by the Petch-Rojai-Borane route. If this was found impracticable all the convoys and artillery were either to be destroyed or buried. The horses and oxen drawing the guns and wagons were to be utilized as pack animals.

GENERAL SITUATION

A realization of the general situation of the Serbian Army at this moment will give an exact picture of the conditions under which the retreat began.

In the first place a very great number of troops were sent by the same routes. The character of the country to be traversed and the number of the troops did not allow of any other solution of the problems. But these routes did not lend themselves to the march of organized bodies of troops, and enormous difficulties were experienced, especially for the convoys (oxen and draft animals.)

On the other hand the enemy was already exercising a strong pressure, especially in the direction of Prisrend, while the Albanian population had assumed such a threatening attitude that an attack by it might be expected at any moment. The army was only in possession of rations for several days, and it was on this minimum quantity of food that it would have to subsist until it reached the Adriatic. The transformation of the army service corps for service in the mountains required time. An attempt to pass on the convoys and artillery sent to Petch across Mount Jlieb proved that the idea was impracticable. One division which had succeeded in passing two guns without their limbers by that mountain took two whole days for the task.

Thus, on the one hand, the transformation of the supply convoys and the formation of entire armies in column formation required time, while, on the other, the troops were threatened with starvation and the advance of the enemy called for speedy action. When to these difficulties was added the exhaustion of the men it was not difficult to foresee that the army which had in the past shown such admirable military qualities would arrive on the coast of the Adriatic in a condition which inspired both pity and admiration.

Such were the dispositions of the Headquarters Staff for the retreat of the army through Albania and Montenegro.

CONDITIONS IN PRISREND

During the last days of the retirement on Prisrend I and a French colleague, M. Paul Du Bochet, the correspondent of the Petit Parisien, had been first with the division of Timok and later with the combined division. We reached Prisrend on Thursday, Nov. 23, and found it a cosmopolitan city. Hundreds of French aviators, automobilists, engineers and Red Cross units, Russian, British, Greek, and Rumanian doctors and nurses, and English sailors of the naval gun batteries were everywhere in evidence. The blue and crimson uniforms of the Royal Guard showed that King Peter was also in Prisrend. As the members of the Government, the Crown Prince, the Commander in Chief, and the Headquarters Staff had also arrived, all that was left of the elements of Government in Serbia was assembled within the walls of the ancient Albanian city.

The one question on everybody's lips was, "would it be an unconditional surrender?" in which case we would all find ourselves German prisoners forty-eight hours later; or would the King, the Government, and the army leave Serbian territory and take refuge in Albania? The final councils did not last long. On Nov. 24 the supreme resolution was taken. The King, army, and Government would refuse to treat with the enemy and would leave for Albania.

To this resolution several factors contributed. One of the chief was Serbia's loyalty to her allies. She had undertaken not to sign a separate peace, and she held to her word to the last. She might be defeated, she was not conquered. Another factor was the dynastic one. It was certain that one of the first conditions of peace which Germany, and especially Austria, would have exacted would have been the abdication of King Peter. It was equally certain that M. Pashitch and the other members of the Government would have been arrested and probably exiled for life from Serbia. There was, therefore, nothing to be gained by surrender, and as long as King Peter, his Government and his army escaped the clutches of their enemies, Serbia was unconquered. The Treasury had long been placed in safety abroad, so that there was no want of funds to meet the expenses of the Government and army in exile.

BURNING THE ARCHIVES

When I reached Headquarters the first thing I noticed was a score of soldiers burning the archives, staff maps, &c., a clear proof that the journey to Scutari was resolved on. During lunch I learned the last preparations that had been made. M. Pashitch and the members of the Government were leaving for Scutari with a military escort the following day. The next day the King and the royal household with the Royal Guard would start, and on the third day Field Marshal Putnik and the Headquarters Staff would leave for Scutari. As I and my French colleague of the Petit Parisien were attached to the Headquarters, Colonel Mitrovitch told me he had reserved a pack horse for our baggage. All that was left of bread and biscuits would also, we were told, be distributed the night before the march started.

It was a curious sensation to look around the large mess room, with its hundreds of brilliant uniforms worn by the men who had fought five victorious campaigns, and to think that in forty-eight hours they would be in exile, camping among the snows of the Albanian mountains, with the splendid armies they had commanded shrunk to 150,000 men, deprived of everything that goes to make an army in the field. Grief and bitterness were written on many a face; many would have preferred to be in the fighting line and to have died at the head of their men, rather than have seen this tragic hour.

One thing is certain, no reproach could be made to the Serbian Army; it had done its duty, and more than its duty. It had fought with desperate courage against overwhelming odds, and if the armed strength of Serbia was crushed, her honor at least was intact.

On the day of my arrival I paid a visit to the citadel, perched on the hill on the slopes of which Prisrend is built.

Here are the last traces of the stronghold erected by the Emperor, Stephen Doushan, the Serbian Charlemagne. At my feet flowed the Bistritza, rushing in a torrent down through the town. To the east, at the extremity of a gorge between towering mountains, I could see the snow-covered peaks of the Shar range, which formed a lofty barrier between us and the Bulgarians at Tetovo. To the left appeared the City of Prisrend, a vast agglomeration of Turkish and Albanian houses from which emerged the graceful minarets of its fifty mosques. Among these one could distinguish the belfry of the single Greek Orthodox Church. In an obscure corner was hidden a small Catholic chapel, the priest of which was subventioned by the Austrian Government.

In the afternoon arrived the news that the route from Dibra to Monastir had been cut, as the Bulgarians were at Prilep and advancing on Monastir. This extinguished the last hope of some part of the Serbian Army reaching the town to take train through Greece to Saloniki. It was the "débâcle" all along the line.

Retreat of the Serbian Army

[OCTOBER, 1915]

By E. STRACHAN ROGERS

O well-loved land, where every pleasant farm
Produced from fertile soil an ample yield,
And every cheerful toiler in the field
Sat by his fire at night secure from harm:
Then, when the cry of warfare rent the calm,
How valiantly did each his weapons wield,
Still fighting on as the warm blood congealed,
Amid the din of battle's wild alarm.

At the last stand were they not heroes all,
Preferring exile to a base defeat?
So through the horrors of the long retreat
The Serbian Army stumbled dauntlessly
Across high mountain-bars, till they could fall,
Some living and some dead, beside the sea.

General Pershing's Final Report

Complete Official Story of the American Operations in the World War

[SECOND HALF]

The first half of General Pershing's report to the Secretary of War appeared in the January CURRENT HISTORY. It covered all the military operations of the First Army to the day of the armistice. The remaining portion tells of the operations of the Second Army in France, of American troops in Italy and Russia, of the Third Army in Germany, the return of our forces to the United States, and the achievements of the various army services. It completes the official text of the most important military document on our share in the world war.

UNDER the instructions issued by me on Nov. 5, for operations by the Second Army in the direction of the Briey Iron Basin, the advance was undertaken along the entire front of the army and continued during the last three days of hostilities. In the face of the stiff resistance offered by the enemy, and with the limited number of troops at the disposal of the Second Army, the gains realized reflected great credit on the divisions concerned. On Nov. 6 Marshal Foch requested that six American divisions be held in readiness to assist in an attack which the French were preparing to launch in the direction of Château-Salins. The plan was agreed to, but with the provision that our troops should be employed under the direction of the commanding General of the Second Army.

This combined attack was to be launched on Nov. 14, and was to consist of twenty French divisions under General Mangin and the six American divisions under General Bullard. Of the divisions designated for this operation the 3d, 4th, 29th, and 36th were in army reserve, and were starting their march eastward on the morning of Nov. 11, while the 28th and 35th were being withdrawn from line on the Second Army front.

ACTIVITIES ON OTHER FRONTS

During the first phase of the Meuse-Argonne battle, American divisions were participating in important attacks on other portions of the front. The 2d Army Corps, Major Gen. Read commanding, with the 27th and 30th Divisions on the British front, was assigned the task, in co-operation with the Australian Corps, of breaking the Hindenburg line at Le Cateau, where the St. Quentin Canal passes through a tunnel under a ridge. In this attack, carried out on Sept. 29 and Oct. 1, the 30th Division speedily broke through the main line of defense and captured all its objectives, while the 27th progressed until some of its elements reached Gouy. In this and later actions, from Oct. 6 to 10, our 2d Corps captured over 6,000 prisoners and advanced about twenty-four kilometers.

On Oct. 2-5 our 2d and 36th Divisions assisted the Fourth French Army in its advance between Rheims and the Argonne. The 2d Division completed its advance on this front by the assault of the wooded heights of Mont Blanc, the key point of the German position, which was captured with consummate dash and skill. The division here repulsed violent counterattacks, and then carried our lines into the village of St. Etienne, thus forcing the Germans to fall back before Rheims and yield positions which they had held since September, 1914. On Oct. 10 the 36th Division relieved the 2d, exploiting the latter's success, and in two days advanced, with the French, a distance of twenty-one kilometers, the enemy retiring behind the Aisne River.

In the middle of October, while we were heavily engaged in the Meuse-Argonne, Marshal Foch requested that two American divisions be sent immediately to assist the Sixth French Army in Belgium, where slow progress was being made. The 37th and 91st Divisions, the latter being accompanied by the artillery of the 28th Division, were hurriedly dispatched to the Belgian front. On Oct. 30, in continuation of the Flanders offensive, these divisions entered the line and attacked. By Nov. 3 the 37th Division had completed its mission by rapidly driving the enemy across the Escaut River and had firmly established itself on the east bank, while the 91st Division, in a spirited advance, captured Spitaals Bosschen, reached the Scheldt, and entered Audenarde.

OUR TROOPS IN ITALY

The Italian Government early made request for American troops, but the critical situation on the western front made it necessary to concentrate our efforts there. When the Secretary of War was in Italy during April, 1918, he was urged to send American troops to Italy to show America's interest in the Italian situation and to strengthen the Italian morale. Similarly a request was made by the Italian Prime Minister at the Abbéville conference. It was finally decided to send one regiment to Italy with the necessary hospital and auxiliary service, and the 332d Infantry was selected, reaching the Italian front in July, 1918. These troops participated in action against the Austrians in the Fall of 1918 at the crossing of the Piave River and in the final pursuit of the Austrian Army.

ON THE RUSSIAN FRONT

It was the opinion of the Supreme War Council that allied troops should be sent to co-operate with the Russians, either at Murmansk or Archangel, against the Bolshevik forces, and the British Government, through its Ambassador at Washington, urged American participation in this undertaking. On July 23, 1918, the War Department directed the dispatch of three battalions of infantry and three companies of engineers to join the allied expedition. In compliance with these instructions the 339th Infantry, the 1st Battalion, 310th Engineers, 337th Field Hospital Company, and 337th Ambulance Company were sent through England, whence they sailed on Aug. 26.

The mission of these troops was limited to guarding the ports and as much of the surrounding country as might develop threatening conditions. The allied force operated under British command, through whose orders the small American contingent was spread over a front of about 450 miles. From September, 1918, to May, 1919, a series of minor engagements with the Bolshevik forces occurred, in which eighty-two Americans were killed and seven died of wounds.

In April, 1919, two companies of American railroad troops were added to our contingent. The withdrawal of the American force commenced in the latter part of May, 1919, and on Aug. 25 there was left only a small detachment of graves registration troops.

The Allied Advance Into German Land

In accordance with the terms of the armistice, the Allies were to occupy all German territory west of the Rhine, with bridgeheads of thirty kilometers' radius at Cologne, Coblenz, and Mayence. The zone assigned the American command was the bridgehead of Coblenz and the district of Treves. This territory was to be occupied by an American army, with its reserves held between the Moselle and Meuse rivers and the Luxemburg frontier.

The instructions of Marshal Foch, issued on Nov. 16, contemplated that two French infantry divisions and one French cavalry division would be added to the American forces that occupied the Coblenz bridgehead, and that one American division would be added to the French force occupying the Mayence bridgehead. As this arrangement presented possibilities of misunderstanding due to difference of views regarding the government of occupied territory, it was represented to the Marshal that each nation should be given a well-defined territory of occupation, employing within such territory only the troops of the commander responsible for the particular zone. On Dec. 9 Marshal Foch accepted the principle of preserving the entity of command and troops, but reduced the American bridgehead by adding a portion of the eastern half to the French command at Mayence.

Various reasons made it undesirable to employ either the First or Second Army as the army of occupation. Plans had been made before the armistice to organize a third army, and on Nov. 14 this army, with Major Gen. Joseph T. Dickman as commander, was designated as the army of occupation. The 3d and 4th Army Corps staffs and troops, less artillery, the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 32d, and 42d Divisions and the 66th Field Artillery Brigade were assigned to the Third Army. This force was later increased by the addition of the 7th Corps, Major Gen. William M. Wright commanding, with the 5th, 89th, and 90th Divisions.

IN WAKE OF RETREAT

The advance toward German territory began on Nov. 17 at 5 A. M., six days after signing the armistice. All of the allied forces from the North Sea to the Swiss border moved forward simultaneously in the wake of the retreating German armies. Upon arrival at the frontier a halt was made until Dec. 1, when the leading elements of all allied armies crossed the line into Germany. The Third Army headquarters were established at Coblenz and an advance general headquarters located at Treves. Steps were immediately taken to organize the bridgehead for defenses and dispositions were made to meet a possible renewal of hostilities.

The advance to the Rhine required long, arduous marches, through cold and inclement weather, with no opportunity for troops to rest, refit, and refresh themselves after their participation in the final battle. The army of occupation bore itself splendidly and exhibited a fine state of discipline both during the advance and throughout the period of occupation.

The zone of march of our troops into Germany and the line of communications of the Third Army after reaching the Rhine lay through Luxemburg. After the passage of the Third Army, the occupation of Luxemburg, for the purpose of guarding our line of communications, was intrusted to the 5th and 33d Divisions of the Second Army. The City of Luxemburg, garrisoned by French troops and designated as the headquarters of the allied Commander in Chief, was excluded from our control.

Upon entering the Duchy of Luxemburg in the advance, a policy of noninterference in the affairs of the Grand Duchy was announced. Therefore, when the French commander in the City of Luxemburg was given charge of all troops in the Duchy, in so far as concerned the "administration of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg," my instructions were that our troops would not be subject to his control. Later, at my request, and in order to avoid possible friction, Marshal Foch placed the entire Duchy in the American zone.

Return of Troops to the United States

On the day the armistice was signed the problem of the return of our troops to the United States was taken up with the War Department, and on Nov. 15 a policy recommended of sending home certain auxiliaries so that we could begin to utilize all available shipping without delay. On Dec. 21 the War Department announced by cable that it had been decided to begin immediately the return of our forces, and continue as rapidly as transportation would permit. To carry this out, a schedule for the constant flow of troops to the ports was established, having in mind our international obligations pending the signing of the treaty of peace.

While more intimately related to the functions of the services of supply than to operations, it is logical to introduce here a brief recital of the organizations created for the return of our troops to America. Prior to the armistice but 15,000 men had been returned home. Although the existing organization was built for the efficient and rapid handling of the incoming forces, the embarkation of this small number presented no difficulties. But the armistice suddenly and completely reversed the problem of the services of supply at the ports and the handling of troops. It became necessary immediately to reorganize the machinery of the ports, to construct large embarkation camps, and to create an extensive service for embarking the homeward-bound troops.

THE CAMP AT BREST

Brest, St. Nazaire, and Bordeaux became the principal embarkation ports, Marseilles and Le Havre being added later to utilize Italian and French liners. The construction of the embarkation camps during unseasonable Winter weather was the most trying problem. These, with the billeting facilities available, gave accommodation for 55,000 at Brest, 44,000 at St. Nazaire, and 130,000 at Bordeaux. Unfortunately the largest ships had to be handled at Brest, where the least shelter was available.

To maintain a suitable reservoir of men for Brest and St. Nazaire, an embarkation centre was organized around Le Mans, which eventually accommodated 230,000 men. Here the troops and their records were prepared for the return voyage and immediate demobilization. As the troops arrived at the base ports, the embarkation service was charged with feeding, reclothing, and equipping the hundreds of thousands who passed through, which required the maintenance of a form of hotel service on a scale not hitherto attempted.

On Nov. 16 all combat troops, except thirty divisions and a minimum of corps and army troops, were released for return to the United States. It was early evident that only limited use would be made of the American division, and that the retention of thirty divisions was not necessary. Marshal Foch considered it indispensable to maintain under arms a total, including Italians, of 120 to 140 divisions, and he proposed that we maintain thirty divisions in France until Feb. 1, twenty-five of which should be held in the zone of the armies, and that on March 1 we should have twenty divisions in the zone of the armies and five ready to embark. The plan for March 1 was satisfactory, but the restrictions as to the divisions that should be in France on Feb. 1 could not be accepted, as it would seriously interfere with the flow of troops homeward.

In a communication dated Dec. 24 the Marshal set forth the minimum forces to be furnished by the several allies, requesting the American Army to furnish twenty-two to twenty-five divisions of infantry. In the same note he estimated the force to be maintained after the signing of the preliminaries of peace at about thirty-two divisions, of which the American Army was to furnish six.

TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS

In reply it was pointed out that our problem of repatriation of troops and their demobilization was quite different from that of France or Great Britain. On account of our long line of communications in France and the time consumed by the ocean voyage and travel in the United States, even with the maximum employment of our then available transportation, at least a year must elapse before we could complete our demobilization. Therefore, it was proposed by me that the number of American combat divisions to be maintained in the zone of the armies should be reduced on April 1 to fifteen divisions and on May 1 to ten divisions, and that in the unexpected event that the preliminaries of peace should not be signed by May 1 we would continue to maintain ten divisions in the zone of the armistice until the date of signature.

The allied Commander in Chief later revised his estimate, and on Jan. 24 stated to the Supreme War Council that the German demobilization would permit the reduction of the allied forces to 100 divisions, of which the Americans were requested to furnish fifteen. In reply it was again pointed out that our problem was entirely one of transportation, and that such a promise was unnecessary, inasmuch as it would probably be the Summer of 1919 before we could reduce our forces below the number asked. We were, therefore, able to keep our available ships filled, and by May 19 all combat divisions except five still in the army of occupation were under orders to proceed to ports of embarkation. This provided sufficient troops to utilize all troop transports to include July 15.

The President had informed me that it would be necessary for us to have at least one regiment in occupied Germany, and left the details to be discussed by me with Marshal Foch. My cable of July 1 summarizes the agreement reached:

"By direction of President, I have discussed with Marshal Foch questions of forces to be left on the Rhine. Following agreed upon: The 4th and 5th Divisions will be sent to base ports immediately. The 2d Division will commence moving to base ports on July 15, and the 3d Division on Aug. 15. Date of relief of 1st Division will be decided later. Agreement contemplates that after compliance by Germany with military conditions to be completed within first three months after German ratification of treaty American force will be reduced to one regiment of infantry and certain auxiliaries. Request President be informed of agreement."

As a result of a later conference with Marshal Foch the 3d Division was released on Aug. 3 and the 1st Division on Aug. 15.

Enormous Task of the Supply Services

In February, 1918, the line of communications was reorganized under the name of the service of supply. At that time all staff services and departments, except the Adjutant General's, the Inspector General's, and the Judge Advocate General's Departments, were grouped for supply purposes under one co-ordinating head, the commanding general services of supply, with a general staff paralleling, so far as necessary, the General Staff at General Headquarters.

The principal functions of the services of supply were the procurement, storage, and transportation of supplies. These activities were controlled in a general way by the commanding general services of supply, the maximum degree of independence being permitted to the several services. This great organization was charged with immense projects in connection with roads, docks, railroads, and buildings; the transportation of men, animals, and supplies by sea, rail, and inland waterways; the operation of telegraph and telephone systems; the control and transportation of replacements; the hospitalization necessary for an army of 2,000,000 men; the reclassification of numerous officers and men; the establishment of leave areas and of welfare and entertainment projects; the liquidation of our affairs in France, and the final embarkation of our troops for home.

The growth of the permanent port personnel, the location near the base ports of certain units for training, and other considerations led to the appointment of a territorial commander for the section around each port, who, while acting as the representative of the commanding general services of supply, was given the local authority of a district commander. For similar reasons an intermediate section commander and an advance section commander were appointed. Eventually there were nine base sections, including one in England, one in Italy, and one comprising Rotterdam and Antwerp, also one intermediate and one advance section.

The increasing participation of the American Expeditionary Forces in active operations necessitated the enlargement of the responsibilities and authority of the commanding general services of supply. In August, 1918, he was charged with complete responsibility for all supply matters in the services of supply, and was authorized to correspond by cable directly with the War Department on all matters of supply not involving questions of policy.

In the following discussion of the services of supply the subjects of co-ordination of supply at the front, ocean tonnage, and replacements are included for convenience, though they were largely or entirely under the direct control of general staff sections at my headquarters.

CO-ORDINATION OF SUPPLY

Our successful participation in the war required that all the different services immediately concerned with the supply of combat troops should work together as a well-regulated machine. In other words, there must be no duplication of effort, but each must perform its functions without interference with any other service. The Fourth Section of the General Staff was created to control impartially all these services, and, under broad lines of policy, to determine questions of transportation and supply in France and co-ordinate our supply services with those of the Allies.

This section did not work out technical details, but was charged with having a general knowledge of existing conditions as to supply, its transportation, and of construction affecting our operations or the efficiency of our troops. It frequently happened that several of the supply departments desired the same site for the location of installations, so that all plans for such facilities had to be decided in accordance with the best interests of the whole.

In front of the advance depots railroad lines and shipments to troops had to be carefully controlled, because mobility demanded that combat units should not be burdened with a single day's stores above the authorized standard reserve. Furthermore, accumulations at the front were exposed to the danger of destruction or capture and might indicate our intentions. Each combat division required the equivalent of twenty-five French railway car loads of supplies for its daily consumption to be delivered at a point within reach of motor or horse-drawn transportation. The regular and prompt receipt of supplies by combatant troops is of first importance in its effect upon the morale of both officers and men. The officer whose mind is pre-occupied by the question of food, clothing, or ammunition is not free to devote his energy to training his men or to fighting the enemy. It is necessary that paper work be reduced to an absolute minimum and that the delivery of supplies to organizations be placed on an automatic basis as far as possible.

THE REGULATING STATIONS

The principle of flexibility had to be borne in mind in planning our supply system in order that our forces should be supplied, no matter what their number, or where they might be called upon to enter the line. This high degree of elasticity and adaptability was assured and maintained through the medium of the regulating station. It was the connecting link between the armies and the services in the rear, and regulated the railroad transportation which tied them together. The regulating officer at each station was a member of the Fourth Section of my General Staff, acting under instructions from his chief of section.

Upon the regulating officer fell the responsibility that a steady flow of supply was maintained. He must meet emergency shipments of ammunition or engineering material, sudden transfers of troops by rail, the hastening forward of replacements, or the unexpected evacuation of wounded. All the supply services naturally clamored to have their shipments rushed through. The regulating officer, acting under special or secret instructions, must declare priorities in the supply of things the army needed most. Always informed of the conditions at the front, of the status of supplies, and of military plans and intentions, nothing could be shipped to the regulating station or in front of the advance depots except on his orders. The chiefs of supply services fulfilled their responsibilities when they delivered to the regulating officer the supplies called for by him, and he met his obligation when these supplies were delivered at the proper railheads at the time they were needed. The evacuation of the wounded was effected over the same railroad lines as those carrying supplies to the front; therefore, this control had also to be centralized in the regulating officer.

LOCATION IMPORTANT

The convenient location of the regulating stations was of prime importance. They had to be close enough to all points in their zones to permit trains leaving after dusk or during the night to arrive at their destinations by dawn. They must also be far enough to the rear to be reasonably safe from capture. Only two regulating stations were actually constructed by us in France, Is-sur-Tille and Liffol-le-Grand, as the existing French facilities were sufficient to meet our requirements beyond the reach of those stations.

As far as the regulating officer was concerned, supplies were divided into four main classes. The first class constituted food, forage, and fuel needed and consumed every day; the second, uniforms, shoes, blankets, and horse shoes, which wear out with reasonable regularity; the third, articles of equipment which require replacement at irregular intervals, such as rolling kitchens, rifles, and escort wagons; the fourth class covered articles the flow of which depended upon tactical operations, such as ammunition and construction material. Articles in the first class were placed on an automatic basis, but formal requisition was eliminated as far as possible for all classes.

In order to meet many of the immediate needs of troops coming out of the line and to relieve to some extent the great strain on the railheads during active fighting, a system of army depots was organized. These depots were supplied by bulk shipment from the advance depots through the regulating stations during relatively quiet periods. They were under the control of the chiefs of the supply services of the armies and required practically no construction work, the supplies being stored in open places protected only by dunnage and camouflage tarpaulins.

The accompanying diagram illustrates graphically the supply system which supported our armies in France. The services of supply can be likened to a great reservoir divided into three main parts—the base depots, the intermediate depots, and the advance depots. The management of this reservoir is in charge of the commanding General, services of supply, who administers it with a free hand, controlled only by general policies outlined to him from time to time. Each of the supply and technical services functions independently in its own respective sphere; each has its share of storage space in the base depots, in the intermediate depots, and in the advance depots. Then comes the distribution system, and here the control passes to the chief of the Fourth Section of the General Staff, who exercises his powers through the regulating stations.

PURCHASING AGENCY

The consideration of requirements in food and material led to the adoption of an automatic supply system, but, with the exception of foodstuffs, there was an actual shortage, especially in the early part of the war, of many things, such as equipment pertaining to land transportation and equipment and material for combat. The lack of ocean tonnage to carry construction material and animals at the beginning was serious. Although an increasing amount of shipping became available as the war progressed, at no time was there sufficient for our requirements. The tonnage from the States reached about seven and one-half million tons to Dec. 31, 1918, which was a little less than one-half of the total amount obtained.

The supply situation made it imperative that we utilize European resources as far as possible for the purchase of material and supplies. If our services of supply departments had entered the market of Europe as purchasers without regulation or co-ordination, they would have been thrown into competition with each other, as well as with buyers from the allied armies and the civil populations. Such a system would have created an unnatural elevation of prices, and would have actually obstructed the procurement of supplies. To meet this problem from the standpoint of economical business management, directions were given in August, 1917, for the creation of a General Purchasing Board to co-ordinate and control our purchases both among our own services and among the Allies as well. The supervision and direction of this agency was placed in the hands of an experienced business man, and every supply department in the American Expeditionary Forces was represented on the board. Agents were stationed in Switzerland, Spain, and Holland, besides the allied countries. The character of supplies included practically the entire category of necessities, although the bulk of our purchases consisted of raw materials for construction, ordnance, air equipment, and animals. A total of about 10,000,000 tons was purchased abroad by this agency to Dec. 31, 1918, most of which was obtained in France.

The functions of the purchasing agency were gradually extended until they included a wide field of activities. In addition to the co-ordination of purchases, the supply resources of our allies were reconnoitred and intimate touch was secured with foreign agencies; a statistical bureau was created which classified and analyzed our requirements; quarterly forecasts of supplies were issued; civilian manual labor was procured and organized; a technical board undertook the co-ordination, development, and utilization of the electric power facilities in France; a bureau of reciprocal supplies visé the claims of foreign Governments for raw materials from the United States, and a general printing plant was established. Some of these activities were later transferred to other services as the latter became ready to undertake their control.

The principles upon which the usefulness of this agency depended were extended to our allies, and in the Summer of 1918 the general purchasing agent became a member of the Interallied Board of Supplies. This board undertook, with signal success, to co-ordinate the supply of the allied armies in all those classes of material necessities that were in common use in all the armies. The possibility of immense savings were fully demonstrated, but the principles had not become of general application before the armistice.

OCEAN TONNAGE

Following a study of tonnage requirements an officer was sent to Washington in December, 1917, with a general statement of the shipping situation in France as understood by the allied Maritime Council. In March, 1918, tonnage requirements for transport and maintenance of 900,000 men in France by June 30 were adopted as a basis upon which to calculate supply requisitions and the allocation of tonnage.

In April the allied Maritime Transport Council showed that requirements for 1918 greatly exceeded the available tonnage. Further revisions of the schedule were required by the Abbéville agreement in May, under which American infantry and machine-gun units were to be transported in British shipping, and by the Versailles agreement in June.

In July a serious crisis developed, as the allotment for August made the American Expeditionary Forces by the Shipping Control Committee was only 575,000 deadweight tons, afterward increased to 700,000, whereas 803,000 tons (not including animals) were actually needed. It was strongly urged by me that more shipping be diverted from trades, and that a larger percentage of new shipping be placed in transport service.

Early in 1918 a scheme had been proposed which would provide priority for essential supplies only, based upon monthly available tonnage in sight. Although it was the understanding that calls for shipping should be based upon our actual needs, much irregularity was found in tonnage allotments.

REPLACEMENTS OF PERSONNEL

Under the original organization project there were to be two divisions in each corps of six divisions, which were to be used as reservoirs of replacements. One-half of the artillery and other auxiliaries of these two divisions were to be utilized as corps and army troops. They were to supply the first demands for replacements from their original strength, after which a minimum of 3,000 men per month for each army corps in France was to be forwarded to them from the United States. It was estimated that this would give a sufficient reservoir of personnel to maintain the fighting strength of combat units, provided the sick and wounded were promptly returned to their own units upon recovery.

The 32d and 41st Divisions were the first to be designated as replacement and depot divisions of the 1st Army Corps, but the situation soon became such that the 32d Division had to be employed as a combat division. For the same reason all succeeding divisions had to be trained for combat, until June 27, when the need for replacements made it necessary to designate the 83d as a depot division.

1. By the middle of August we faced a serious shortage of replacements. Divisions had arrived in France below strength, and each division diverted from replacement to combat duty increased the number of divisions to be supplied, and at the same time decreased the supply.

On Aug. 16 the War Department was cabled as follows:

"Attention is especially invited to the very great shortage in arrivals of replacements heretofore requested. Situation with reference to replacements is now very acute. Until sufficient replacements are available in France to keep our proved divisions at full strength replacements should, by all means, be sent in preference to new divisions."

At this time it became necessary to transfer 2,000 men from each of three combat divisions (the 7th, 36th, and 81st) to the First Army in preparation for the St. Mihiel offensive.

By the time the Meuse-Argonne offensive was initiated the replacement situation had become still more acute. The infantry and machine-gun units of the 84th and 86th Divisions, then in the vicinity of Bordeaux, were utilized as replacements, leaving only a cadre of two officers and twenty-five men for each company. To provide immediate replacements during the progress of the battles new replacement organizations were formed in the zone of operations; at first as battalions and later as regional replacement depots.

2. On Oct. 3 a cable was sent the War Department reading as follows:

"Over 50,000 of the replacements requested for the months of July, August, and September have not yet arrived. Due to extreme seriousness of replacement situation it is necessary to utilize personnel of the 84th and 86th Divisions for replacement purposes. Combat divisions are short over 80,000 men. Vitality important that all replacements due, including 55,000 requested for October, be shipped early in October. If necessary, some divisions in United States should be stripped of trained men, and such men shipped as replacements at once."

Altogether seven divisions had to be skeletonized, leaving only one man per company and one officer per regiment to care for the records. As a further measure to meet the situation the authorized strength of divisions was reduced in October by 4,000 men, thus lowering the strength of each infantry company to approximately 174 men. The thirty combat divisions in France at that time needed 103,513 infantry and machine-gun replacements, and only 66,490 were available.

Attention of the War Department was invited on Nov. 2 to the fact that a total of 140,000 replacements would be due by the end of November, and the cable closed by saying:

"To send over entire divisions, which must be broken up on their arrival in France so we may obtain replacements that have not been sent as called for is a wasteful method, and one that makes for inefficiency; but as replacements are not otherwise available, there is no other course open to us. New and only partially trained divisions cannot take the place of older divisions that have had battle experience. The latter must be kept up numerically to the point of efficiency. * * *

REMOUNTS

The shortage of animals was a serious problem throughout the war. In July, 1917, the French agreed to furnish our forces with 7,000 animals a month, and accordingly the War Department was requested to discontinue shipments. On Aug. 24, however, the French advised us that it would be impossible to furnish the number of animals originally stated, and Washington was again asked to supply animals, but none could be sent over until November, and then only a limited number.

Early in 1918, after personal intervention and much delay, the French Government made requisition on the country, and we were able to obtain 50,000 animals. After many difficulties the purchasing board was successful in obtaining permission, in the Summer of 1918, to export animals from Spain, but practically no animals were received until after the armistice.

Every effort was made to reduce animal requirements—by increased motorization of artillery and by requiring mounted officers and men to walk—but in spite of all these efforts the situation as to animals grew steadily worse. The shortage by November exceeded 106,000, or almost one-half of all our needs. To relieve the crisis in this regard, during the Meuse-Argonne battle, Marshal Foch requisitioned 13,000 animals from the French armies and placed them at my disposal.

RECLASSIFICATION

An important development in the Services of Supply was the reclassification system for officers and men. This involved not only the physical reclassification of those partially fit for duty, but also the reclassification of officers according to fitness for special duties. A number of officers were found unsuited to the duties on which employed. An effort was made to reassign these officers to the advantage of themselves and the army. A total of 1,101 officers were reclassified in addition to the disabled, and 270 were sent before efficiency boards for elimination. Nine hundred and sixty-two wounded or otherwise disabled officers were reclassified, their services being utilized to release officers on duty with the Services of Supply who were able to serve with combat units.

CONSTRUCTION

Among the most notable achievements of the American Expeditionary Forces was the large program of construction carried out by our engineer troops in the Services of Supply and elsewhere. The chief projects were port facilities, including docks, railroads, warehouses, hospitals, barracks, and stables. These were planned to provide ultimately for an army of 4,000,000, the construction being carried on coincident with the growth of the American Expeditionary Forces.

The port plans contemplated 160 new berths, including the necessary facilities for discharge of cargo, approximately one-half of which were completed at the time of the armistice. Construction of new standard-gauge railroad track amounted to 1,002 miles, consisting mainly of cut-offs, double tracking at congested points, and yards at ports and depots. Road construction and repair continued until our troops were withdrawn from the several areas, employing at times upward of 10,000 men, and often using 90,000 tons of stone per week.

Storage requirements necessitated large supply depots at the ports and in the intermediate and advance sections. Over 2,000,000 square feet of covered storage was secured from the French, but it was necessary to construct approximately 20,000,000 square feet additional. The base hospital centres at Mars and Mesves, each with 4,000-bed convalescent camps, are typical of the large scale upon which hospital accommodations were provided. The hospital city at Mars, of 700 buildings, covered a ground space of thirty-three acres and included the usual road, water, sewerage, and lighting facilities of a municipality.

Advantages of economy and increased mobility caused the adoption of the system of billeting troops. Billeting areas were chosen near the base ports, along the line of communications, and in the advanced zone, as strategical requirements dictated. The system was not altogether satisfactory, but with the number of troops to be accommodated no other plan was practicable. Demountable barracks were used for shelter to supplement lack of billets, 16,000 barracks of this type being erected, particularly at base ports where large camps were necessary. Stables at remount stations were built for 43,000 animals. Other construction included refrigerating plants, such as the one at Glevres with a capacity of 6,500 tons of meat and 500 tons of ice per day; and mechanical bakeries like that at Is-sur-Tille with a capacity of 800,000 pounds of bread per day. If the buildings constructed were consolidated, with the width of a standard barrack, they would reach from St. Nazaire across France to the Elbe River in Germany, a distance of 730 miles.

In connection with construction work the Engineer Corps engaged in extensive forestry operations produced 200,000,000 feet of lumber, 4,000,000 railroad ties, 300,000 cords of fuel wood, 35,000 pieces of piling, and large quantities of miscellaneous products.

TRANSPORTATION CORPS

The Transportation Corps as a separate organization was new to our army. Its exact relation to the supply departments was conceived to be that of a system acting as a common carrier operating its own ship and rail terminals. The equipment and operation of port terminals stands out as a most remarkable achievement. The amount of tonnage handled at all French ports grew slowly, reaching about 17,000 tons daily at the end of July, 1918. An emergency then developed as a result of the critical military situation, and the capacity of our terminals was so efficiently increased that by Nov. 11 45,000 tons were being handled daily.

The French railroad, both in management and material, had dangerously deteriorated during the war. As our system was superimposed upon that of the French it was necessary to provide them with additional personnel and much material. Experienced American railroad men brought into our organization in various practical capacities the best talent in the country, who, in addition to the management of our own transportation, materially aided the French. The relation of our Transportation Corps to the French railroads and to our own supply departments presented many difficulties, but these were eventually overcome and a high state of efficiency established.

It was early decided as expedient for our purposes to use American rolling stock on the French railroads, and approximately 20,000 cars and 1,500 standard gauge locomotives were brought from the United States and assembled by our railroad troops. We assisted the French by repairing with our own personnel 57,385 French cars and 1,947 French locomotives. The lack of rolling stock for allied use was at all times a serious handicap, so that the number of cars and locomotives built and repaired by us was no small part of our contribution to the allied cause.

QUARTERMASTER CORPS

The Quartermaster Corps was able to provide a larger tonnage of supplies from the United States than any of the great supply departments. The operations of this corps were so large and the activities so numerous that they can best be understood by a study of the report of the commanding General, Services of Supply.

The Quartermaster Corps in France was called upon to meet conditions never before presented, and it was found advisable to give it relief. Transportation problems by sea transport and by rail were handled by separate corps organized for that purpose and already described. Motor transport was also placed under an organization of its own. The usual routine supplies furnished by this department reached enormous proportions. Except for the delay early in 1918 in obtaining clothing and the inferior quality of some that was furnished, and an occasional shortage in forage, no army was ever better provided for. Special services created under the Quartermaster Corps included a remount service, which received, cared for, and supplied animals to troops; a veterinary service, working in conjunction with the remount organization; an effects section and baggage service, and a salvage service for the recovery and preparation for reissue of every possible article of personal equipment. Due to the activities of the salvage service an estimated saving of $85,000,000 was realized, tonnage and raw material were conserved, and what in former wars represented a distinct liability was turned into a valuable asset.

The graves registration service, also under the Quartermaster Corps, was charged with the acquisition and care of cemeteries, the identification and reburial of our dead, and the correspondence with relatives of the deceased. Central cemeteries were organized on the American battlefields, the largest being at Romagne-sous-Montfaucon and at Thiaucourt in the Woevre. All territory over which our troops fought was examined by this service, and, generally speaking, the remains of our dead were assembled in American cemeteries, and the graves marked with a cross or six-pointed star and photograph. A few bodies were buried where they fell or in neighboring French or British cemeteries. Wherever the soldier was buried his identification tag, giving his name and army serial number, was fastened to the marker. A careful record was kept of the location of each grave.

SIGNAL CORPS

The Signal Corps supplied, installed, and operated the general service of telephone and telegraph communications throughout the zone of armies, and from there to the rear areas. At the front it handled radio, press, and intercept stations; provided a radio network in the zone of advance, and also managed the meteorological, pigeon, and general photographic services. Our communication system included a cable across the English telephone and telegraph lines on our own telephone and telegraph lines on our own poles, and the successful operation of a system with 115,500 kilometers of lines.

The quantity and importance of gasoline-engine transportation in this war necessitated the creation of a new service known as the Motor Transport Corps. It was responsible for setting up motor vehicles received from America, their distribution, repair, and maintenance. Within the zone of the Services of Supply, the Motor Transport Corps controlled the use of motor vehicles, and it gave technical supervision to their operation in the zone of the armies. It was responsible for the training and instruction of chauffeurs and other technical personnel. Due to the shortage of shipments from America, a large number of trucks, automobiles, and spare parts had to be purchased in France.

RENTING, REQUISITION

A renting, requisition, and claims service was organized in March, 1918, to procure billeting areas, supervise the quartering of troops with an organization of zone and town Majors, and to have charge of the renting, leasing, and requisitioning of all lands and buildings required by the American Expeditionary Forces. Under the provisions of an act of Congress, approved in April, 1918, the Claims Department was charged with the investigation, assessment, and settlement of all claims "of inhabitants of France or any other European country not an enemy or ally of an enemy" for injuries to persons or damages to property occasioned by our forces. The procedure followed was in accordance with the law and practice of the country in question. The efficient administration of this service had an excellent effect upon the people of the European countries concerned.

The various activities of the Services of Supply which, at its height on Nov. 11, 1918, reached a numerical strength in personnel of 668,312, including 23,772 civilian employees, can best be summed up by quoting the telegram sent by me to Major Gen. James G.

Harbord, the commanding General, Services of Supply, upon my relinquishing personal command of the First Army:

"I want the S. O. S. to know how much the First Army appreciated the prompt response made to every demand for men, equipment, supplies, and transportation necessary to carry out the recent operations. Hearty congratulations. The S. O. S. shares the success with it."

Ordnance and Other Departments

Our entry into the war found us with few of the auxiliaries necessary for its conduct in the modern sense. The task of the Ordnance Department in supplying artillery was especially difficult. In order to meet our requirements as rapidly as possible, we accepted the offer of the French Government to supply us with the artillery equipment of 75's, 155-millimeter howitzers, and 155 G. P. F. guns from their own factories for thirty divisions. The wisdom of this course was fully demonstrated by the fact that, although we soon began the manufacture of these classes of guns at home, there were no guns of American manufacture of the calibres mentioned on our front at the date of the armistice. The only guns of these types produced at home which reached France before the cessation of hostilities were 100 75 millimeter guns. In addition, 24 8-inch howitzers from the United States reached our lines and were in use when the armistice was signed. Eight 14-inch naval guns of American manufacture were set up on railroad mounts, and most of these were successfully employed on the Meuse-Argonne front under the efficient direction of Admiral Plunkett of the navy.

AVIATION

In aviation we were entirely dependent upon our allies, and here again the French Government came to our aid until our own program could be set under way. From time to time we obtained from the French such airplanes for training personnel as they could provide. Without going into a complete discussion of aviation material, it will be sufficient to state that it was with great difficulty that we obtained equipment even for training. As for up-to-date combat airplanes, the development at home was slow, and we had to rely upon the French who provided us with a total of 2,676 pursuit, observation, and bombing machines. The first airplanes received from home arrived in May, and altogether we received 1,379 planes of the De Havilland type. The first American squadron completely equipped by American production, including airplanes, crossed the German lines on Aug. 7, 1918. As to our aviators, many of whom trained with our allies, it can be said that they had no superiors in daring and in fighting ability. During the battles of St. Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne our aviators excelled all others. They have left a record of courageous deeds that will ever remain a brilliant page in the annals of our army.

TANKS

In the matter of tanks, we were compelled to rely upon both the French and the English. Here, however, we were less fortunate for the reason that our allies barely had sufficient tanks to meet their own requirements. While our Tank Corps had limited opportunity, its fine personnel responded gallantly on every possible occasion and showed courage of the highest order. We had one battalion of heavy tanks engaged on the English front. On our own front we had only the light tanks, and the number available to participate in the last great assault of Nov. 1 was reduced to sixteen as a result of the previous hard fighting in the Meuse-Argonne.

CHEMICAL WARFARE

The chemical warfare service represented another entirely new departure in this war. It included many specialists from civil life. With personnel at a high order, it developed rapidly into one of our most efficient auxiliary services. While the early employment of gas was in the form of clouds launched from special projectors, its use later on in the war was virtually by means of gas shells fired by the light artillery. One of the most important duties of the chemical warfare service was to insure the equipment of our troops with a safe and comfortable mask and the instruction of the personnel in the use of this protector. Whether or not gas will be employed in future wars is a matter of conjecture, but the effect is so deadly to the unprepared that we can never afford to neglect the question.

ADMINISTRATION

The general health of our armies under conditions strange and adverse in many ways to our American experience and mode of life was marvelously good. The proportionate number of men incapacitated from other causes than battle casualties and injuries was low. Of all deaths in the American Expeditionary Forces (to Sept. 1, 1919) totaling 81,141, there were killed in action 35,556, died of wounds received in battle, 15,130; other wounds and injuries, 5,669, and died of disease, 24,786. Therefore, but little over two-sevenths the total loss of life in the American Expeditionary Forces was caused by disease.

Our armies suffered from the communicable diseases that usually affect troops. Only two diseases have caused temporarily excessive sick rates, epidemic diarrhoea and influenza, and of these influenza only, due to the fatal complicating pneumonia, caused a serious rise in the death rate. Both prevailed in the armies of our allies and enemies and in the civilian population of Europe.

Venereal disease has been with us always, but the control was successful to a degree never before attained in our armies or in any other army. It has been truly remarkable when the environment in which our men lived is appreciated. The incidence of venereal disease varied between 30 and 60 per 1,000 per annum, averaging under 40. Up to September, 1919, all troops sent home were free from venereal disease. The low percentage was due largely to the fine character of men composing our armies.

Hospitalization represented one of the largest and most difficult of the medical problems in the American Expeditionary Forces. That the needs were always met and that there was always a surplus of several thousand beds, were the results of great effort and the use of all possible expedients to make the utmost of resources available. The maximum number of patients in hospital on any one day was 193,026, on Nov. 12, 1918.

Evacuation of the sick and wounded was another difficult problem, especially during the battle periods. The total number of men evacuated in our armies was 214,467, of whom 11,281 were sent in hospital trains to base ports. The number of sick and wounded sent to the United States up to Nov. 11, 1918, was 14,000. Since the armistice 103,028 patients have been sent to the United States.

The army and the Medical Department was fortunate in obtaining the services of leading physicians, surgeons, and specialists in all branches of medicine from all parts of the United States, who brought the most skillful talent of the world to the relief of our sick and wounded. The Army Nurse Corps deserves more than passing comment. These women, working tirelessly and devotedly, shared the burden of the day to the fullest extent with the men, many of them submitting to all the dangers of the battlefield.

RECORDS, PERSONNEL

New problems confronted the Adjutant General's Department in France. Our great distance from home necessitated records, data, and executive machinery to represent the War Department as well as our forces in France. Unusually close attention was paid to individual records. Never before have accuracy and completeness of reports been so strictly insisted upon. Expenditures had to be adopted whereby the above requirements could be met without increasing the record and correspondence work of combat units. The organization had to be elastic to meet the demands of any force maintained in Europe.

A statistical division was organized to collect data regarding the special qualifications of all officers and to keep an up-to-date record of the location, duties, health, and status of every officer and soldier, nurse, field clerk, and civilian employe, as well as the location and strength of organizations. The central records office at Bourges received reports from the battlefield, evacuation camps, and base hospitals, convalescent leave areas, reclassification camps, and base ports, and prepared for transmission to the War Department reports of individual casualties. Each of the 299,599 casualties was considered as an individual case. A thorough investigation of the men classed as "missing in action" reduced the number from 14,000 to the signing of the armistice to twenty-two on Aug. 31, 1919.

In addition to printing and distributing all orders from general headquarters, the Adjutant General's Department had charge of the delivery and collection of official mail, and finally of all mail. The motor dispatch service operated twenty courier routes, over 2,300 miles of road, for the quick dispatch and delivery of official communications. After July 1, 1918, the military postal express service was organized to handle all mail, official and personal, and operated 169 fixed and mobile post offices and a railway post office service.

While every effort was exerted to maintain a satisfactory mail service, frequent transfers of individuals, especially during the hurried skeletonizing of certain combat divisions, numerous errors in addresses, hasty handling, and readdressing of mail by regimental and company clerks in the zone of operations, and other conditions incident to the continuous movement of troops in battle, made the distribution of mail an exceedingly difficult problem.

INSPECTION, DISCIPLINE

The Inspector General's Department, acting as an independent agency not responsible for the matters under its observation, made inspections and special investigations for the purpose of keeping commanders informed of local conditions. The inspectors worked unceasingly to determine the manner in which orders were being carried out, in an effort to perfect discipline and team play.

The earnest belief of every member of the expeditionary forces in the justice of our cause was productive of a form of self-imposed discipline among our soldiers, which must be regarded as an unusual development of this war, a fact which materially aided us to organize and employ in an incredibly short space of time the extraordinary fighting machine developed in France.

Our troops generally were strongly imbued with an offensive spirit essential to success. The veteran divisions had acquired not only this spirit, but the other elements of fine discipline. In highly trained divisions, commanders of all grades operate according to a definite system calculated to concentrate their efforts where the enemy is weakest. Straggling is practically eliminated; the infantry, skillful in fire action and the employment of cover, gains with a minimum of casualties; the battalion, with all of its accompanying weapons, works smoothly as a team in which the parts automatically assist each other; the artillery gives the infantry close and continuous support; and unforeseen situations are met by prompt and energetic action.

This war has only confirmed the lessons of the past. The less experienced divisions, while aggressive, were lacking in the ready skill of habit. They were capable of powerful blows, but their blows were apt to be awkward—teamwork was often not well understood. Flexible and resourceful divisions cannot be created by a few manoeuvres or by a few months' association of their elements. On the other hand, without the keen intelligence, the endurance, the willingness, and enthusiasm displayed in the training area, as well as on the battlefield, the successful results we obtained so quickly would have been utterly impossible.

MILITARY JUSTICE

The commanders of armies, corps, divisions, separate brigades, and certain territorial districts, were empowered to appoint general courts-martial. Each of these commanders had on his staff an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, whose duty it was to render legal advice and to assist in the prompt trial and just punishment of those guilty of serious infractions of discipline.

Prior to the signing of the armistice serious breaches of discipline were rare, considering the number of troops. This was due to the high sense of duty of the soldiers and their appreciation of the seriousness of the situation. In the period of relaxation following the cessation of hostilities, infractions of discipline were naturally more numerous, but not even then was the number of trials as great in proportion to the strength of the force as is usual in our service.

It was early realized that many of the peace-time methods of punishment were not the best for existing conditions. In the early part of 1918 it was decided that the award of dishonorable discharge of soldiers convicted of an offense involving moral turpitude would not be contemplated except in the most serious cases. To remove these soldiers temporarily from their organizations, division commanders were authorized to form provisional temporary detachments to which such soldiers could be attached. These detachments were retained with their battalions so that offenders would not escape the dangers and hardships to which their comrades were subjected. Wherever their battalion was engaged, whether in front-line trenches or in back areas, these men were required to perform hard labor. Only in emergency were they permitted to engage in combat. Soldiers in these disciplinary battalions were made to understand that if they acquitted themselves well they would be restored to full duty with their organizations.

All officers exercising disciplinary powers were imbued with the purpose of these instructions and carried them into effect. So that nearly all men convicted of military offenses in combat divisions remained with their organizations and continued to perform their duty as soldiers. Many redeemed themselves by rendering vallant service in action and were released from the further operation of their sentences.

To have the necessary deterrent effect upon the whole unit, courts-martial for serious offenses usually imposed sentences considerably heavier than would have been awarded in peace times. Except where the offender earned remission at the front, these sentences stood during hostilities. At the signing of the armistice steps were at once taken to reduce outstanding sentences to the standards of peace time.

PROVOST MARSHAL

On July 20, 1917, a Provost Marshal General was appointed with station in Paris, and later the department was organized as an administrative service with the Provost Marshal General functioning under the first section, General Staff. The department was developed into four main sections—the military police corps which served with divisions, corps, and armies, and in the sections of the service of supply; the prisoner of war escort companies, the criminal investigation department, and the circulation department. It was not until 1918 that the last-mentioned department became well trained and efficient. On Oct. 15, 1918, the strength of the corps was increased to 1 per cent. of the strength of the American Expeditionary Forces, and Provost Marshals for armies, corps, and divisions were provided.

The military police of the American Expeditionary Forces developed into one of the most striking bodies of men in Europe. Wherever the American soldier went, there our military police were on duty. They controlled traffic in the battle zone, in all villages occupied by American troops, and in many cities through which our traffic flowed; they maintained order, so far as the American soldiers were concerned, throughout France and in portions of England, Italy, Belgium, and occupied Germany. Their smart appearance and military bearing and the intelligent manner in which they discharged their duties left an excellent impression of the typical American on all with whom they came in contact.

APPRECIATION

In this brief summary of the achievements of the American Expeditionary Forces it would be impossible to cite in detail the splendid ability, loyalty, and efficiency that characterized the service of both combatant and non-combatant individuals and organizations. The most striking quality of both officers and men was the resourceful energy and common sense employed, under all circumstances, in handling their problems.

The highest praise is due to the commanders of armies, corps, and divisions, and their subordinate leaders, who labored loyally and ably toward the accomplishment of our task, suppressing personal opinions and ambitions in the pursuit of the common aims; and to their staffs, who developed, with battle experience, into splendid teams without superiors in any army.

To my chiefs of staff—Major Gen. James G. Harbord, who was later placed in command of the services of supply, and Major Gen. James W. McAndrew—I am deeply indebted for highly efficient services in a post of great responsibility.

The important work of the staff at general headquarters in organization and administration was characterized by exceptional ability and a fine spirit of co-operation. No chief ever had a more loyal and efficient body of assistants.

The officers and men of the services of supply fully realized the importance of their duties, and the operations of that vast business system were conducted in a manner which won for them the praise of all. They deserve their full share in the victory.

The American civilians in Europe, both in official and private life, were decidedly patriotic and loyal, and invariably lent encouragement and helpfulness to the armies abroad.

The various societies, especially their women, including those of the theatrical profession, and our army nurses, played a most important part in brightening the lives of our troops and in giving aid and comfort to our sick and wounded.

The navy in European waters, under command of Admiral Sims, at all times cordially aided the army. To our sister service we owe the safe arrival of our armies and their supplies. It is most gratifying to record that there has never been such perfect understanding between these two branches of the service.

Our armies were conscious of the support and co-operation of all branches of the Government. Behind them stood the entire American people, whose ardent patriotism and sympathy inspired our troops with a deep sense of obligation, of loyalty, and of devotion to the country's cause never equaled in our history.

Finally the memory of the unflinching fortitude and heroism of the soldiers of the line fills me with greatest admiration. To them I again pay the supreme tribute. Their devotion, their valor, and their sacrifices will live in the hearts of their grateful countrymen.

In closing this report, Mr. Secretary, I desire to record my deep appreciation of the unqualified support accorded me throughout the war by the President and yourself. My task was simplified by your confidence and wise counsel. I am, Mr. Secretary,

Very respectfully,

JOHN J. PERSHING.

General, Commander in Chief, American Expeditionary Forces.

About General Pershing's War Map

By CARSON C. HATHAWAY

THE treasure of the collection of world war relics which is being installed in the National Museum at Washington, D. C., is the official battle map used by General John J. Pershing and his staff during the war with Germany. The room in which the map hung has been reproduced just as it was in Chaumont, France, the headquarters of General Pershing. Platform, matting, chairs, side walls, and the sliding door were brought from France and installed by members of the staff.

The map itself is a huge affair, covered with hundreds of colored pushpins representing the location of the allied and enemy forces at the time of the signing of the armistice on Nov. 11, 1918. When the map was not being examined a sliding door was drawn across its face, so that no information from it could be obtained by spies.

Interesting data appear on the map, which gives at a glance the relative strength of the contending armies. The first table gives the status of United States divisions:

SECRET TREATY OF LONDON

To the Editor of Current History.

In my article in the November CURRENT HISTORY on the genesis of the secret treaty of London I considered that I proved three things. The first was that the Italian Government, in the Spring of 1915, was perfectly willing, under certain conditions, to guarantee to the Central Powers her permanent neutrality. The second was that when it failed to reach agreement with Austria-Hungary it accepted the offers made by the Entente Powers to take up arms against Germany and Austria and executed a secret treaty, one of the clauses of which contains a formal renunciation of Fiume as an Italian city. The third was that this treaty was executed by Italy and the Entente Powers after a protest from Serbia voiced by M. Pashitch, the Serbian Premier, in the sitting of the Skupchina, eleven days before the secret treaty was signed. Nothing in the article in reply to mine by Captain Alessandro Sapelli in the same issue of your magazine has done anything to change my viewpoint.

Captain Sapelli begins by saying that "Captain Gordon-Smith does not employ authentic documents." He declares that the note by Baron Sonnino on April 8, 1915, is a "perverted translation." I have done too much translation in my life not to realize how justified is the Italian proverb "traduttore, traditore," but that generally refers to the reproduction of literary style. In the present instance we have to do with facts, not literary style. I therefore beg to ask the categorical question: Did the document quoted by me correctly represent the conditions on which Italy was willing to guarantee her neutrality to the Central Powers for the duration of the war or did it not? If the version I quote contains any essential error in fact, what is that error?

Captain Sapelli declares that I designated this document as "a German-Italian agreement." This is an evident exaggeration. What I stated was that the "Consulta and the Wilhelmstrasse reached an agreement," and that the terms of this agreement were rehearsed in the note by Baron Sonnino which I quoted.

I never pretended that this note constituted a written agreement between Italy and Germany; if it had, it would have borne the signature of Prince Bülow as well as that of Baron Sonnino. Besides, there could be no formal signed agreement, as Germany had no power to sign any document on behalf of Austria-Hungary. All Prince Bülow did was to act as "the honest broker" between the Ballplatz and the Consulta. I was in Italy at the time these negotiations were being carried on, and it was notorious that the most active part in them was in the hands of Prince Bülow. This is, I think, proved by the dispatch from the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador to his Government quoted by Captain Sapelli, as Baron Macchio simply reports what Baron Sonnino said to Prince Bülow. But all these details are beside the question. The matter at issue is, "Did Baron Sonnino's note of April 8, 1915, state the terms on which Italy was willing to guarantee her permanent neutrality to the Central Powers?" I maintain it did, and nothing adduced by Captain Sapelli has made me change my mind.

My version of the secret treaty is, it appears, open to the same objection as the note of Baron Sonnino. In what way is this version of the treaty "unauthentic"? Captain Sapelli declares "it is based on a Russian translation from the French original in the Russian imperial archives." If the Russian translation is correct, what more authentic source, in Heaven's name, could we ask than the French original in the Russian imperial archives?

But how can Captain Sapelli judge whether or not this version is exact when he declares that "the authentic text of the Treaty of London should be known only to the Government of its signatories." He regards its secrecy, even in the year of grace 1919, as so sacrosanct that he expresses astonishment that "President Wilson in his 'memorandum concerning the question of Italian claims on the Adriatic' presented to the Italian delegation at Paris on April 4, 1919, should have shown a singular knowledge of the details of the treaty. * * * That mystery must be cleared up some day."

If words mean anything this means that Captain Sapelli is of opinion that President Wilson, head of the American delegation to the Peace Conference, had no right to know the contents of the secret treaty. When one sees such theories advanced one asks one's self if one is dreaming. The secret of the Treaty of London is today the secret de Polichinelle. The persistent refusal of the Governments party to it to publish the text is only calculated to create the impression that we do not even yet know the worst, and that it contains some other clauses which, for some reason or other, shun the light of day.

Captain Sapelli again brings forward the old Italian argument that Italy only excluded Fiume from the list of Italian desiderata under pressure from Russia. What her reasons for the exclusion were became a matter of indifference the instant she signed the treaty.

Captain Sapelli, in conclusion, makes the extraordinary assertion that Serbia "dictates arrogantly to Europe today with her self-assumed mandate of Yugoslavia." This statement is in keeping with his assertion that Italy today suffers from the "disloyalty, injustice, and contempt of her allies." Harsh words, mon Capitaine!

D'ANNUNZIO'S CLAIMS

To the Editor of Current History.

In your issue of December, 1919, I see that d'Annunzio says it is useless to argue over the claims which Italy is making on Slovenian soil. My national conscience, however, forces me to make a few observations regarding his perfectly absurd statements.

The Peace Conference assigned the City of Danzig to Poland because Poland needed a seaport; every State needs a seaport for its commerce, just as a human body needs lungs. I cannot understand how the Peace Conference can regard the present arrangement on the Adriatic as part of a just and righteous peace, when it betrays the rights of more than half a million people of pure Yugoslavic blood. Little Yugoslavia at present has no chance for a single good harbor on the Adriatic littoral; the only ones she had were taken from her by force—by Italy. That is what has come of the promise of justice in the Treaty of Versailles.

Now comes the comedian, d'Annunzio, and says: "With Idria in our hands, Gorizia remains protected. If it be taken away from us Gorizia remains exposed to the Yugoslav guns. Italy has no raw materials. If she possessed Idria she would have at least one, mercury, in which the district is rich." If Italy has no raw materials, has she then the right to go and steal the little mercury which Yugoslavia possesses, and which is almost a hundred miles beyond the real Italian border? It is as if I, not having a dollar in my pocket, were to assert the right to go and steal a dollar from my neighbor. D'Annunzio might as justly come to the United States and seize a coal district on the plea that Italy has no coal mines. That is the kind of justice the Italian annexationists have shown in occupying our Yugoslav littoral along the Adriatic.

But I still believe in the two sisters, Justice and Right, and if they do not come along today or tomorrow, they will surely come some day, and then Italy will get what she deserves.

THE AUSTRIAN RED BOOK

To the Editor of Current History.

In the December number of your esteemed periodical I find an article entitled "Origin of the World War" (Pages 455-460), being the official minutes of the Austro-Hungarian Council that decided to force war on Serbia. Since I happen to have upon my desk an original copy of the new Austrian Red Book, upon which your article is based, and since you apparently had at your disposal only second-hand information, I take the liberty of writing to you and of calling attention to some errors in your article.

In the first place, the so-called Austrian Red Book was not "written by a publicist named Dr. Roderich Gooss, with the approval of the present Austrian Government." I do not wish to deny that a Dr. Roderich Gooss had something to do with the publication of the volume, but he surely did not write it, since the book contains, besides a "Vorwort" of ten short lines, nothing but original documents found in the archives of the Ballplatz. Furthermore, it was not published "with the approval" of the present Austrian Government, but rather by that Government; it bears the imprint of the "Republic of Austria, Department for Foreign Affairs," and was printed in the State Printing Office at Vienna. In other words, it is an official publication of the present Government. Moreover, up to now only one-third of the entire work has appeared; Parts II. and III. are to be published later.

You seem, furthermore, to be under the impression that the title of the work is "The Vienna Cabinet and the Origin of the World War." This is incorrect. An exact rendering of the title page of the original volume, which lies before me, reads:

Republic of Austria, Department for Foreign Affairs.

DIPLOMATIC DOCUMENTS ON THE AN-TECEDENTS OF THE WAR OF 1914.

Supplements and Appendices to the Austro-Hungarian Red Book [1914]

PART I.

July 23 to July 28, 1914.

Vienna, 1919.

State Printing Office.

Being a philologist and a professional translator, may I add also a few remarks in criticism of your translation? It is a rather poor piece of work. A few examples from a page chosen at random, Page 457, will suffice. In Column 1, paragraph beginning "This main question," we read: "This main question had now become timely after two months" (my italics). The original reads (Page 30, Rotbuch): "Diese Hauptfrage sei durch zwei momente gerade jetzt aktuell geworden," which in English means: "This principal question has just now become timely because of two factors."

In the next paragraph we read, in the sentence: "Count Tisza certainly ought—," the past tense ran the risk, which is, by virtue of the translator's strange practice of throwing the whole report into indirect discourse, or rather past time, quite unintelligible. It should read: will run the risk.

The sentence at the top of Column 2 (Page 157), beginning, "All those things were details," does violence to the King's English, for the pronoun it ("as to whether it was to come to warlike action") has no antecedent whatever, being an unfortunate school-boy translation of the German impersonal "dass es zum Handeln kommen soll" (Page 31, Rotbuch), i. e., "that action should be taken," and the adverb there ("and there the interest") in the same sentence is also rather vague in meaning.

In the next paragraph the bewildering it ("Therefore, today, it should be decided in principle that it should and will come to action"—correct to: "That action should and will be taken") is repeated.

Finally, I question your statement that the document which you publish is the "most important" one in the Red Book. There are others in the volume that to my mind possess quite as much interest for the historian as the one in question.

I have written to you at such great length not in order to be pestilent, but in the interest of accuracy and truth, and I am convinced that you will not take my letter amiss.

AN APPRECIATION

To the Editor of Current History.

I wish to take a few moments of your time to express to you my appreciation of CURRENT HISTORY. After thirty years of wading through editorial comment and opinion for the events of the day, or, worse still, trying to construct these events from the junk heaps of the digests, it is a genuine pleasure to turn to a magazine like CURRENT HISTORY.

I have taken all American and English periodicals that pretend to cover the current events and found none the equal of your magazine. I approve of the attention you give to the various Cabinet changes in the several nations, both large and small, as the Cabinets give the student an idea of the trend of affairs in foreign lands, just as our own Presidential elections are the keynote to the political movements here. Until the publication of CURRENT HISTORY I could find no account of Cabinet changes in the smaller nations until the British Annual Register was out in the year following. * * * I would also appreciate a short necrological list in your magazine each month.

HAITI DEFENDED

To the Editor of Current History.

I have just read an article on "Haiti and the American Occupation" in the December issue of your esteemed review, and am writing to say that your editorial note at the end of the article contains a great mistake. Major W. W. Buckley of the U. S. M. C. is quoted as saying that "before Admiral Caperton landed marines at Port-au-Prince in July, 1915, it was not safe for white men to go into the interior of Haiti, and even in the coast towns it was well to be in touch with a legation," and as adding "that now white men are seldom attacked even by bandits."

Time and again erroneous statements of that sort have been published about my country; I do not ask for correction when they appear in light magazines whose motto seems to be "More fun than truth." But I think that yours is a serious magazine, written for people who are interested in current history, who want truth more than fiction, and this determines me to write to you that I doubt Major Buckley made the statement quoted above. It is my experience that reporters with preconceived ideas, consciously or not, lend their own notions to the interviewed and make him say what he never meant.

Never, in 112 years of absolute self-government of Haiti by the Haitians, did it happen once that a foreigner, white or colored, male or female, was attacked or molested or robbed, let alone murdered. Not one single case, I repeat; and allow me to say that there are few countries in the whole world, if any, that can show such a record. It seems to me that this should be said to the praise of the Haitian people and placed to its credit.

Highwaymen never existed in Haiti, and foreigners from all lands used to go from end to end of the country, through deserted roads, by day and night, feeling safer than one would in New York, Paris, or London, if in those large cities there were no police. And the wonder is that there was practically no police in Haiti.

The banditry existing now, to which Major Buckley alluded, is political banditry of the Villa type, and is a kind of Bolshevism. It existed before the American occupation, being then dormant, now active. It is true that Haitians were sometimes molested, robbed or murdered by those bandits, but once more I emphatically declare that never a white man had to suffer at their hands, positively never.

Hundreds of travelers—French, English, and American—have written about Haiti; many found fault with the country and took pleasure in blackening the Black Republic; very few wrote with a charitable and understanding heart, but not a single one ever said that it was not safe to go into the interior of Haiti. All agree, on the contrary, that the Haitians are a most hospitable and inoffensive people, and that in disturbed times, during our civil wars, while the lives and property of Haitians were endangered, the lives and property of foreigners were always sacred to all classes of Haitians.

This is the truth, and I hope that you will be kind enough to place it before your readers. I am sure no one will find that I have exaggerated in the least.

Minister Plenipotentiary of Haiti.

Jutland Casualties

SURGEON REAR ADMIRAL SIR ROBERT HILL, Medical Director General, Royal Navy, in his opening address as President of the newly created War Section of the Royal Society of Medicine, on Nov. 12 gave an interesting retrospective view of naval medical conditions, and authoritatively presented for the first time the casualties of the battle of Jutland. In this famous naval battle were engaged six battleships, six battle cruisers, three cruisers, six light cruisers, two flotilla leaders, and seventeen destroyers. The total personnel of the Grand Fleet was about sixty thousand. The total casualties were 6,014 killed and 674 wounded, or about 11.14 per cent., as compared with 9.51 per cent. at the battle of Trafalgar.

The following description of the way in which the wounded were cared for medically during this battle, as written by the medical officers of the Lion, one of the battle cruisers engaged, was read by Sir Robert Hill:

Nearly all the casualties occurred within the first half hour. A few cases found their way to the foremost station, but the great majority remained on the mess deck. During the first lull the medical officers emerged from their stations to make a tour of inspection. The scenes that greeted us beggar description. Most of the wounded had already been dressed temporarily. Tourniquets had been applied in one or two instances. But we were able to remove these later. Hemorrhage on the whole was less than we anticipated * * * The battle was thrice renewed during the evening, but in the lulls all the wounded were carried to the mess deck. * * * At 7:30 A. M. on June 1 we were informed that it would be safe to bring the wounded up from below. The Vice Admiral's and Captain's cabins were cleaned, dried, and thoroughly ventilated. The Captain's bathroom was rigged as an operating theatre, and by 8:45 we began * * * In all fifty-one cases were dealt with, and a general anaesthetic, chloroform and ether in equal parts, was administered to twenty-eight * * * Only urgent operations were attempted. Our work was severely handicapped by having 44 per cent. of casualties among the medical officers and sick berth staff. The Lion had ninety-five killed and fifty-one wounded, representing 11.87 per cent. of complement.

PUNISHING WAR CRIMINALS

Holland Refuses Extradition of ex-Kaiser—Allies Agree to Trial of 890 Others at Leipsic

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 18, 1920]

THE determination of the allied and associated powers to punish those responsible for Germany's inhumane and illegal methods of waging war had been fully formulated as early as April 6, 1919, in the report of the Crimes and Penalties Commission of the Peace Conference. This commission's long and detailed report, submitted after months of painstaking investigation, was the basis of the Allies' extradition demands. A summary of it follows this article.

These demands for the punishment of German war criminals were embodied among the many provisions of the Peace Treaty which were to be fulfilled after the final exchange of ratifications (Jan. 10, 1920). The allied demand on Holland for the extradition of the ex-Kaiser, Holland's note of refusal and the allied counter-reply are treated fully a little later in the present article. Great as was the commotion created by this demand, it was far surpassed when the Allies demanded that Germany should sanction the extradition of 890 war criminals, whose names, with an enumeration of the crimes charged against them, were delivered to Baron Kurt von Lersner, head of the German Peace Delegation in Paris, on Feb. 3. Von Lersner, on examining the list, which made up a large volume, became highly incensed, and returned it to Premier Millerand with a note, which read in part as follows:

I remind your Excellency of my consistently reported declaration that no German functionary would be disposed to be in any way instrumental in the realization of their extradition. I should be instrumental in it if I were to forward to the German Government the note of your Excellency. I therefore send it back forthwith.

Baron von Lersner at once telegraphed his resignation to the German Government. It was accepted, and he left for Germany. The Council of Premiers met to discuss von Lersner's refusal to transmit the list and to determine the procedure to be followed in presenting it to the German Government. An unofficial copy of the list reached Berlin on Feb. 4. The names in what the Germans at once began to call "The Book of Hate," it was learned, had been made up from data supplied by Great Britain, Belgium, France, Italy, Poland, Rumania and Jugoslavia. Japan asked no extraditions, nor did the United States. Great Britain's list contained only 97 names, France's 334, Italy's 29, Belgium's 334, Poland's 51, Rumania's 41 and the Jugoslavs' 4.

The names were divided into classes: Those responsible for the policies of the war, with those responsible for the enforcement of these policies, are on one list, and those accused of cruelty to the prisoners of war and of submarine atrocities are on another list. In the original form as handed to von Lersner, both lists, together with the summary and indictments, filled 100 pages of a book about a foot and a half long and a foot wide.

HIGH OFFICIALS DEMANDED

Von Hindenburg and Ludendorff were covered by an indictment from both France and Belgium, charging them with cruelty of administration in Belgium, and the deportations from both Belgium and North France. England asked for Admiral von Tirpitz because of the ruthless submarine warfare waged at his behest, and also for Admiral von Capelle. She also demanded the extradition of von der Lancken for the shooting of Edith Cavell, a demand joined in by Belgium.

France asked for the following: The German Crown Prince, for cruelty; Prince Eitel Friedrich, for theft and devastation; Prince August of Hohenzollern; Generals von Moltke, von der Marwitz (Commander of the Fourth German Army in the Argonne), von Kluck and Falkenhayn, and Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria.

Rumania asked for Marshal von Mackensen.

Italy asked for 28 Germans, of whom five are Generals. The Italian Government divided its accusations into two lists, one covering atrocities of submarine warfare and the other the mistreatment of prisoners of war. Eleven naval Lieutenants held responsible for ruthless submarine sinkings were listed.

The majority of the accused were army men, though the list also included navy men and civilians. Twelve Admirals, two High Seas Fleet commanders, 30 U-boat Captains, a great number of Army Generals and many active or petty officers were included. The former German Chancellor, von Bethmann Hollweg, was among those listed.

The publication of this list, even in a garbled form, in Berlin, created an unprecedented sensation. All the officials of the Government declared unanimously that the surrender of the 800 men accused was a "physical impossibility," and intimated that no German Government could enforce it and remain in power. An official statement issued on Feb. 5 declared that compliance was impossible.

Meantime the Council of Ambassadors at a meeting held in Paris on Feb. 5 decided to send the list officially to the Berlin Government by courier, with a covering note, in which would be incorporated the a priori principle that the German Government must accept the list of accused Germans, and thus recognize concretely that they offended against the laws of war. That done, the Allies would consider the exigencies of the situation. The proposed note was drafted and cabled to London and Rome for the approval of the British and Italian Premiers. The list and note were finally transmitted on Feb. 7. The same night the official list of the accused was issued by the French Foreign Office without comment.

GERMANY RECEIVES LIST

The allied list of war criminals and the covering letter were handed to Premier Bauer at 9 o'clock in the evening of Feb. 7 by M. Marcilly, the French Chargé d'Affaires. A letter from the French Premier accompanied the note and list, explaining the method of transmission as due to the resignation of Baron von Lersner. Premier Bauer expressed the German Government's official disapproval of von Lersner's action. The covering note stated that not all Germans guilty of infractions of the laws of warfare were included in the list, but that for practical reasons only those were cited to whom the greatest responsibility attached. Amnesty, however, was not extended to any other culprits subsequently convicted and apprehended. Possession of all German documentary evidence and access to the archives were demanded by the allied Governments to facilitate prosecution. In the supplementary note replying to the German communication of Jan. 25, which explained Germany's reasons for declining to carry out the extradition provision, Premier Millerand said he assumed that Germany would not attempt to evade a treaty obligation to which its signature had been affixed.

The list and covering letters were discussed by the German Cabinet on Feb. 8, and on the following day the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the National Assembly met to consider the whole situation, while the Pan-German press raged in frenzy. Chancellor Bauer on Feb. 9 issued the following statement:

The Government will stand or fall with the contention that the extradition of those blacklisted for trial by an Entente court is a physical and moral impossibility. Nevertheless, the Government has no intention of disavowing the obligations accepted by the signing of the Peace Treaty, but still hopes that the Entente will judiciously devise some plan making the punishment of the real culprits possible in a manner that will not outrage all feelings of decency and tend only to create sympathy among the people for even those blacklisted persons who really deserve ruthless prosecution.

To that end Germany's diplomatic representative leaves for Paris tonight, hoping that some understanding may be reached, based upon our note of Jan. 25.

It was reported meanwhile from Basle, Switzerland, that Admiral von Capelle, former Minister of the German Navy, had crossed the frontier on Feb. 7. Baron von der Lancken, Civil Governor of Brussels during the German occupation, responsible for the death of Edith Cavell, had arrived from Munich. Former Crown Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria was staying at Davos. Anxiety was growing in Swiss official circles that many others of those accused might enter Switzerland to evade apprehension. No Swiss law prohibiting the entrance of political fugitives existed.

CROWN PRINCE'S OFFER

While the German Government was still engaged in consideration of the question of extradition, Prince Friedrich Wilhelm, the ex-Crown Prince, added a dramatic feature to the international spectacle by transmitting to President Wilson direct, instead of through the ordinary Governmental channels, a cable note in which he offered himself as a substitute for the 890 German war criminals accused. Dated from Wieringen Island on Feb. 9, this note was received the same day by the American President. The text as given out in Washington was as follows:

To the President of the United States of North America, Mr. Wilson, Washington:

Mr. President: The demand for the delivery of Germans of every walk of life has again confronted my country, sorely tried by four years of war and one year of severe internal struggles, with a crisis that is without a precedent in the history of the world as affecting the life of the people. That a Government can be found in Germany which would carry out the demanded surrender is out of the question: the consequences to Europe of an enforcement of the demand by violence are incalculable, hatred and revenge would be made eternal. As the former successor to the throne of my German Fatherland, I am willing at this fateful hour to stand up for my compatriots. If the allied and associated powers want a victim, let them take me instead of the 900 Germans, who have committed no offense other than that of serving their country during the war.

WILHELM.

Wieringen Island, Feb. 9, 1920.

In an interview published in the Amsterdam Telegraaf, Major von Mülheim, the Adjutant of the former Crown Prince, stated that the latter had acted on the impulse of the moment on hearing of the return of Baron von Lersner from Paris and of the serious situation which had arisen in Berlin in consequence of the allied demands. Dutch newspapers described the Prince's action as a "beautiful gesture."

ACCEPT GERMAN TRIAL

The dilemma in which the German Government was placed by the Entente demand, facing, as it declared, a revolution if it sought to execute the demand for extradition, was resolved by the Entente Premiers themselves, in their reply to the German note of Jan. 25, which had made the counterproposal that the accused Germans should be tried by Germany herself in the National Court at Leipzig. In this reply, made public in London on Feb. 16, it was stated that the Allies had carefully considered the German note of Jan. 25. The note continued:

The Powers observe, in the first place, that Germany declares herself unable to carry out the obligations imposed on her by Articles 228 to 230, which she signed. They reserve to themselves the power to employ in such measure and form as they may judge suitable the rights accorded to them in this event by the treaty.

The Allies' note, however, the German Government's declaration that they are prepared to open before the court at Leipzig penal proceedings without delay—surrounded by the most complete guarantees and not affected by the applications of all judgments, procedure or previous decisions of German civil or military tribunals—before the Supreme Court at Leipzig against all Germans whose extradition the allied and associated Powers have the intention to demand.

The prosecution which the German Government itself proposes immediately to institute in this manner is compatible with Article 228 of the Peace Treaty, and is expressly provided for at the end of its first paragraph.

Faithful to the letter and spirit of the treaty, the Allies will abstain from intervention in any way in the procedure of the prosecution and the verdict in order to leave to the German Government complete and entire responsibility. They reserve to themselves the right to decide by the results as to the good faith of Germany, the recognition by her of the crimes she has committed, and her sincere desire to associate herself with their punishment.

They will see whether the German Government, who have declared themselves unable to arrest the accused named or to deliver them for trial to the Allies, are actually determined to judge them themselves.

At the same time the Allies, in the pursuance of truth and justice, have decided to intrust to a mixed interallied commission the task of collecting, publishing and communicating to Germany details of the charges brought against each of those whose guilt shall have been established by their investigations.

Finally, the Allies would formally emphasize that procedure before a jurisdiction such as is proposed can in no way annul the provisions of Articles 228 to 230 of the treaty.

The Powers reserve to themselves the right to decide whether the proposed procedure by Germany which, according to her, would assure to the accused all guarantees of justice, does not in effect bring about their escape from the just punishment of their crimes. In this event the Allies would exercise their right to its full extent by submitting the cases to their own tribunal.

Germany's reply was still being considered by the Berlin Government when this issue of CURRENT HISTORY went to press.

Holland's Refusal to Surrender the ex-Kaiser

The demand of the Allies that Holland should surrender the person of the ex-Kaiser to be tried for high crimes under Article 227 of the Versailles Treaty arrived at The Hague on Jan. 17, 1920. The text of the note, made public in Paris on the 19th, was as follows:

Paris, Jan. 15.

In notifying, by these presents, the Netherlands Government and Queen of the text of Article 227 of the Treaty of Versailles, a certified copy of which is annexed, which came into force on Jan. 10, the powers have the honor to make known, at the same time, that they have decided to put into execution without delay this article. [Article 227 publicly arraigns William II. of Germany for a supreme offense against international morality and the sanctity of treaties, and declares that the allied and associated powers will address a request to the Netherlands Government for his surrender, in order that he may be placed on trial.]

Consequently, the powers address to the Government of the Netherlands an official demand to deliver into their hands William of Hohenzollern, former Emperor of Germany, in order that he may be judged.

Individuals residing in Germany, against whom the allied and associated powers have brought charges, are to be delivered to them under Article 228 of the Peace Treaty, and the former Emperor, if he had remained in Germany, would have been delivered under the same conditions by the German Government.

The Netherlands Government is conversant with the incontrovertible reasons which imperiously exact that premeditated violations of international treaties, as well as systematic disregard of the most sacred rules and rights of nations, should receive as regards every one, including the highest-placed personalities, special punishment provided by the Peace Congress. The powers briefly recall, among so many crimes, the cynical violation of the neutrality of Belgium and Luxemburg, the barbarous and pitiless system of hostages, deportation en masse, the carrying off of young girls from the City of Lille, who were torn from their families and delivered defenseless to the worst promiscuity, the systematic devastation of entire regions without military utility, the submarine war without restriction, including inhuman abandonment of victims on the high seas, and innumerable acts against noncombatants committed by German authority in violation of the laws of war.

Responsibility, at least moral, for all these acts reaches up to the supreme head who ordered them, or made abusive use of his full powers to infringe, or to allow infringement, upon the most sacred regulations of human conscience.

The powers cannot conceive that the Government of the Netherlands can regard with less reprobation than themselves the immense responsibility of the former Emperor.

Holland would not fulfill her international duty if she refused to associate herself with other nations as far as her means allow in undertaking, or at least not hindering, chastisement of the crimes committed.

In addressing this demand to the Dutch Government, the powers believe it their duty to emphasize its special character. It is their duty to insure the execution of Article 227 without allowing themselves to be stopped by arguments, because it is not a question of a public accusation with juridical character as regards its basis, but an act of high international policy imposed by the universal conscience, in which legal forms have been provided solely to assure to the accused such guarantees as were never before recognized in public law. The powers are convinced that Holland, which has always shown respect for the right, and love of justice, having been one of the first to claim a place in the League of Nations, will not be willing to cover by her moral authority the violation of principles essential to the solidarity of nations, all of which are equally interested in preventing the return of a similar catastrophe.

It is to the highest interest of the Dutch people not to appear to protect the principal author of this catastrophe by allowing him shelter on her territory, and also to facilitate his trial, which is claimed by the voices of millions of victims.

CLEMELECEAU.

This demand stirred the Dutch people deeply, the prevailing opinion being that it should be refused on the ground of the international law of asylum for political refugees, established before the war, and entirely apart from any sympathy for the former German Emperor. This was the attitude adopted by the Government in its reply to the Allies.

HOLLAND'S ANSWER

The reply of the Dutch Government was dispatched from The Hague on Jan. 22. It firmly rejected the Allies' demand. The text follows:

By verbal vote, dated Jan. 15, 1920, given to the envoy of the Queen at Paris, the Powers, referring to Article 227 of the Treaty of Versailles, demand that the Government of Holland give into their hands William of Hohenzollern, former Emperor of Germany, so that he may be tried.

Supporting this demand, they observe that if the former Emperor had remained in Germany the German Government would, under the terms of Article 228 of the Treaty of Peace, have been obliged to deliver him.

In citing as premeditated violations of international treaties, as well as a systematic disregard of the most sacred rules of the rights of man, a number of acts committed during the war by German authority, the Powers place the responsibility, at least morally, upon the former Emperor.

They express the opinion that Holland would not fulfill her international duty if she refused to associate herself with them, within the limit of her ability, to pursue, or at least not to impede, the punishment of crimes committed.

They emphasize the special character of their demands, which contemplate, not a juridical accusation, but an act of high international policy, and they make an appeal to Holland's respect of law and love of justice not to cover with her moral authority violation by Germany of the essential principles of the solidarity of nations.

The Queen has the honor to observe, first, that obligations which for Germany could have resulted from Article 228 of the treaty of peace cannot serve to determine the duty of Holland, which is not a party to the treaty.

The Government of the Queen, moved by imprescriptible reasons, cannot view the question raised by the demand of the Powers, except from the point of view of its own duty. It was absolutely unconnected with the origin of the war and has maintained, and not without difficulty, its neutrality to the end. It finds itself then face to face with facts of the war in a position different from that of the Powers.

It rejects with energy all suspicion of wishing to cover with its sovereign right and its moral authority violations of the essential principles of the solidarity of nations, but it cannot recognize an international duty to associate itself with this act of high international policy of the Powers.

If in the future there should be instituted by the society of nations an international jurisdiction, competent to judge in case of war deeds, qualified as crimes and submitted to its jurisdiction by statute antedating the acts committed, it would be fit for Holland to associate herself with the new régime.

The Government of the Queen cannot admit in the present case any other duty than that imposed upon it by the laws of the kingdom and national tradition.

Now, neither the constituent laws of the kingdom, which are based upon the principles of law universally recognized, nor the age-long tradition which has made this country always a ground of refuge for the vanquished in international conflicts, permit the Government of Holland to defer to the desire of the Powers by withdrawing from the former Emperor the benefit of its laws and this tradition.

Justice and national honor, which it is our sacred duty to respect, oppose this. The Netherlands people, moved by the sentiments to which in history the world has done justice, could not betray the faith of those who have confided themselves to their free institutions.

The Government of the Queen is pleased to believe that the powers will recognize the good grounds of these considerations, which rise above any consideration of personalities and which seem to it so peremptory that they could not reasonably give rise to wrong interpretations.

CONFLICTING OPINIONS

In Holland the attitude of the Government was everywhere commented upon with approval. While a further exchange of notes was anticipated, it was held that in refusing to deliver the ex-Kaiser Holland had maintained the dignity of her sovereign rights, and from this position she could not recede however unfortunately it might affect her relations with the Allies. On the other hand a certain degree of annoyance was expressed that the ex-Kaiser should have entangled Holland in the dispute, and some journals intimated that he ought to return to Germany and face his accusers on the soil whence he had set out to vanquish them.

In Germany the press almost unanimously praised Holland's decision. Public opinion in both Italy and Switzerland upheld Holland's course, though, as illustrating general opinion of the Kaiser personally, a Swiss paper said: "The Grand Royal European Poseur who attempted to dominate the world now becomes a simple military deserter. Let him alone with his ignominy." In England opinion took sides along party lines. One side held that Lloyd George was determined that no legal quibble should stand in the way of justice. Another held that advantage should be taken of any opportunity to draw the curtain upon a "solemn farce."

ALLIES PRESS HOLLAND

The Council of Premiers on Feb. 14 forwarded its reply to Holland's note of refusal to surrender the ex-Kaiser. The note was signed by Premier Lloyd George for the Council. Couched in diplomatic but impressive terms, this communication pointed out to Holland the enormity of the ex-Kaiser's crimes, of which the Dutch note had made no mention, and the menace to the peace of Europe of his presence so near the borders of Germany. The text of the Council's note is given herewith:

The immense sacrifices made in the general interest by the powers during the war entitle them to ask the Netherlands to reconsider its refusal, based on the weighty, but entirely personal, considerations of a State which held aloof from the war and cannot perhaps appreciate quite accurately all the duties and dangers of the present hour.

The obligations of the powers toward other nations, the gravity of the question concerned, as well as the very grave political effects to which relinquishment of the claims of justice against the ex-Emperor would give rise, all constrain them to uphold and renew their demand.

The powers do not ask the Queen's Government to depart from its traditional policy, but to consider that the nature of their request—which does not in their opinion, depend solely, or even mainly, on Dutch municipal law—has not been adequately appreciated.

No question of prestige is at stake, and the Powers pay as much heed to the conscientious sentiments of a State with limited interest as to the mature decision of great powers, but cannot wait for the creation of a world tribunal competent to examine international crimes before bringing to trial the responsible author of the catastrophe of the great war.

It is precisely this contemplated trial which would prepare the way for such a tribunal and demonstrate the unanimity of feeling animating the conscience of the nations of the world. The Powers wish to point out that the League of Nations has not yet reached a state of development sufficient to allow any application to it, or to a tribunal of any kind created by it, meeting with that prompt satisfaction which is surely essential.

[Section is missing.]

It does not appear to consider that it shares with other civilized nations the duty of securing the punishment of crimes against justice and the principles of humanity—crimes for which William of Hohenzollern undeniably bears a heavy responsibility.

The note of Jan. 15 was sent in the name of the Allies, twenty-five in number, who were signatories to the treaty of peace and the collective mandates of a majority of the civilized nations of the world. It is impossible to disregard the collective force of this request, which is the expression not only of the feeling of indignation of the victims, but of the demand for justice made by the conscience of humanity as a whole.

The Netherlands Government surely has not forgotten that the policy and personal actions of the man required for judgment by the powers have cost the lives of approximately 10,000,000 men, murdered in their prime, and have been responsible for the mutilation or shattered health of three times as many, the laying waste and the destruction of millions of square miles of territory in countries formerly industrious, peaceable and happy, and the piling up of war debts running into billions, the victims being men who had defended their freedom, and incidentally that of Holland.

The economic and social existence of all these nations has been thrown into confusion, and they are now jeopardized by famine and want—the terrible results of that war of which William II. was the author.

The Allies cannot conceal their surprise at finding in the Dutch reply no single word of disapproval of the crimes committed by the Emperor, crimes which outrage the most elementary sentiments of humanity and civilization, and of which, in particular, so many Dutch nationals themselves have been the innocent victims on the high seas. To help bring to justice the author of such crimes plainly accords with the aims of the League of Nations.

How can any one fail to be impressed by the reactionary manifestations which have followed the refusal of Holland, and the dangerous encouragement to all those who are opposing the just chastisement of the culprits and their exemplary condemnation, whatever their social position.

Holland, whose history tells of long struggles for liberty, who has suffered so grievously through disregard for justice, could not place herself by such a narrow conception of her duties outside of the comity of nations. A duty, which none can avoid for national reasons, however weighty they may be, is to unite in order to mete out exemplary punishment to responsible authors of the disasters and abominations of the war and endeavor to revive conceptions of solidarity and humanity in the German Nation, which is still unconvinced of the falsity of the tenets of its Government, who professed that might was right and success condoned crime.

It was from this point of view, and not exclusively from a national standpoint, that the Powers requested the Government of the Queen to hand over William of Hohenzollern, and from this point of view they now renew that request. The Powers desire to remind the Government of the Netherlands that if it should persist in its attitude of detachment toward the presence of the imperial family on its territory so close to Germany it would assume direct responsibility both for sheltering from the claims of justice and for that propaganda which is so dangerous to Europe and the whole world.

It is indisputable that the permanent presence of the ex-Emperor, under ineffectual supervision, a few kilometers distance from the German frontier, where he continues the centre of active and increasing intrigues, constitutes for the Powers who have made superhuman sacrifices to destroy this mortal danger a menace which they cannot be called upon to accept. The rights they possess in virtue of the most express principles of the law of nations entitle them and make it their duty to take such measures as are required for their own security.

The Powers cannot conceal the painful impression made upon them by the refusal of the Dutch Government to hand over the ex-Emperor to them without any consideration of the possibility of reconciling the scruples of Holland with some effectual precautionary measures to be taken either on the spot or by holding the ex-Emperor at a distance from the scene of his crimes, making it impossible for him to exert his disastrous influence in Germany in the future.

Although a proposal of this nature would not correspond fully to the request of the Powers, it would at least have afforded proof of those feelings which Holland cannot but possess.

The Powers urge upon the Dutch Government in the most solemn and pressing manner the importance attaching to fresh consideration of the question put before her. They desire that it may be clearly understood how grave the situation might become if the Netherlands Government were not in a position to give those assurances which the safety of Europe so imperatively demands.

This was understood as an intimation that the Allies would consider favorably an offer from Holland to intern the ex-Kaiser and be responsible for his acts. Holland's reply was still awaited when these pages went to press.

PRUSSIAN BILL OF SETTLEMENT WITH THE EX-KAISER

What was termed one of the most amazing documents of the time was revealed on Feb. 4 by the printing of a bill regarding the settlement of claims between William Hohenzollern and the Government of Prussia. The bill was drawn up in due form for presentation in the Prussian National Assembly. It was promptly denounced as "a masterpiece of old Prussian efficiency" on behalf of "the man who ruined Germany."

Under the terms of the bill the ex-Kaiser would receive 100,000,000 marks (normally $25,000,000) from the nation, free from the proposed capital tax. His civil list of about $415,000 a month would also be paid for seventeen months from the day he ran away to Holland. In addition there would be handed over to him 175,000,000 marks' worth of industrial shares, mortgages and other investments. While the ex-Kaiser consented to relinquish all castles and lands belonging to the State, he would retain eight castles, eighty-three villas, and many houses in Berlin, Potsdam, Kiel and elsewhere, together with forests here and there and various other kinds of property sprinkled over Germany. In view, however, of a possible return of the Hohenzollern family to Germany the State generously provided three more residences rent-free on life tenures—the castle and park of Homburg, the Cecilienhof Palace, and the Marmoralais. The clause in the agreement which made this grant read:

It is in keeping with the wish of members of the royal house [not ex-royal, be it noted] that the castles which they prefer in the event of a return to Germany be placed at their disposal for their lifetime. As the fulfillment of this desire is not against any State interests, three castles [mentioning those above referred to] are placed at their service.

By the provisions of this bill the ex-Kaiser would retain the Prussian royal jewels, and the State would possess the comparatively valueless royal insignia. Wilhelm also agreed to hand over the royal opera houses in Berlin, Hanover, Cassel and Wiesbaden, with their debts, while all his faithful retainers would be taken care of by the Prussian Government. Finally, he kept one mausoleum at Potsdam for himself and family.

The ex-Kaiser had expected the refusal of his extradition by Holland. He continued to occupy his time chiefly in inspecting progress of alterations in the mansion and grounds of what he seemed to regard as a permanent residential estate at Doorn. Somewhat mysterious activity in which he had been recently engaged was disclosed as a plan to erect a small hospital at Amerongen as a memorial of his residence there.

Basis of the Extradition Demand

Report of the Crimes and Penalties Commission Which Laid Down the Principles of Indictment

THE report of the Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on the Enforcement of Penalties was presented to the plenary session of the Peace Conference at Paris on April 28, 1919. The main commission was to inquire into and report upon the following points:

- (1) The responsibility of the authors of the war.
- (2) The facts as to breaches of laws and customs of war committed by the forces of the German Empire and its allies on land, on sea and in the air.
- (3) The degree of responsibility for those offenses attaching to particular members of the enemy forces, including members of the general staffs and other individuals, however highly placed.
- (4) The constitution and procedure of a tribunal appropriate for the trial of those offenses.
- (5) Any other matters cognate or ancillary to the above which may arise in the course of the inquiry and which the commission finds it useful and relevant to take into consideration.

The nations represented on this main commission were the United States (Mr. Lansing* and Major Brown Scott), Great Britain (Sir Gordon Hewart or Sir Ernest Pollock and Mr. Massey, Prime Minister of New Zealand), France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Greece, Poland, Rumania and Serbia.

The report of the commission gave in succinct form a summary of the proof of the allied contention that the war was the result of a deliberate plot on the part of the Central Empires. In no case were statements made which were not supported by evidence of an official nature, drawn either from the official "rainbow" papers of the allies or of the enemy States themselves. The report showed signs of conflicting tendencies between the American and Japanese delegates on one side, and the rest of the members of the commission on the other. In fact the Americans signed the report only subject to very important reservations, in which they pronounced against the trial of the ex-Kaiser before an international tribunal on moral charges, holding that moral offenses could be visited only with moral penalties, and disagreed with the rest of their colleagues in including in the scope of their inquiry breaches against the "laws of humanity."

SUMMARY OF REPORT

The first chapter of the report dealt with the responsibility of the authors of the war. The commission, having examined a number of official documents relating to the origin of the world war and to the violations of neutrality and of frontier which accompanied its inception, "has determined that the responsibility for it lies wholly upon the powers which declared war in pursuance of a policy of aggression, the concealment of which gives to the origin of this war the character of a dark conspiracy against the peace of Europe. This responsibility rests, first, upon Germany and Austria; secondly, on Turkey and Bulgaria. The responsibility is made all the graver by reason of the violation of the neutrality of Belgium and Luxemburg, which Prussia had herself guaranteed. It is increased with regard to both France and Serbia by the violation of their frontiers before the declaration of war."

The commission, having examined the question of moral responsibility for the outbreak of the war and for the violations of neutrality which accompanied it, then discussed in its report the violations of the laws and customs of war by land, sea and air. The commission examined great masses of documentary evidence of unimpeachable character and it declared:

In spite of the explicit regulations of established customs and the clear dictates of humanity Germany and her allies have piled outrage upon outrage. * * * It is impossible to imagine a list of cases so diverse and so painful. Violations of the rights of combatants, of the rights of civilians, and of the rights of both are multiplied in this list of the most cruel practices which primitive barbarism, aided by all the resources of modern science, could devise for the execution of a system of terrorism carefully planned and carried out to the end. Not even prisoners or wounded, or women or children have been respected by belligerents who deliberately sought to strike terror into every heart for the purpose of repressing all resistance.

THIRTY-TWO CATEGORIES OF CRIME

The commission drew up a list of thirty-two different categories of crime perpetrated by enemy belligerents and it commented thus upon that list:

It constitutes the most striking list of crimes that has ever been drawn up, to the eternal shame of those who committed them. The facts are established. They are numerous and so vouched for that they admit of no doubt and they cry for justice.

The list is as follows:

- (1) Murders and massacres; systematic terrorism.
- (2) Putting hostages to death.
- (3) Torture of civilians.
- (4) Deliberate starvation of civilians.
- (5) Rape.
- (6) Abduction of girls and women for the purpose of enforced prostitution.
- (7) Deportations of civilians.
- (8) Internment of civilians under inhuman conditions.
- (9) Forced labor of civilians in connection with the military operations of the enemy.
- (10) Usurpation of sovereignty during military occupation.
- (11) Compulsory enlistment of soldiers among the inhabitants of occupied territory.
- (12) Attempts to denationalize the inhabitants of occupied territory.
- (13) Pillage.
- (14) Confiscation of property.
- (15) Exaction of illegitimate or of exorbitant contributions and requisitions.
- (16) Debasement of the currency and issue of spurious currency.
- (17) Imposition of collective penalties.
- (18) Wanton devastation and destruction of property.
- (19) Deliberate bombardment of undefended places.
- (20) Wanton destruction of religious, charitable, educational and historic buildings and monuments.
- (21) Destruction of merchant ships and passenger vessels without warning and without provision for the safety of passengers or crew.

(22) Destruction of fishing boats and of relief ships.

(23) Deliberate bombardment of hospitals.

(24) Attack on and destruction of hospital ships.

(25) Breach of other rules relating to the Red Cross.

(26) Use of deleterious and asphyxiating gases.

(27) Use of explosive or expanding bullets and other inhuman appliances.

(28) Directions to give no quarter.

(29) Ill-treatment of wounded and prisoners of war.

(30) Employment of prisoners of war on unauthorized works.

(31) Misuse of flags of truce.

(32) Poisoning of wells.

The conclusions of the commission on the criminal acts of the enemy were:

(1) The war was carried on by the Central Empires, together with their allies, Turkey and Bulgaria, by barbarous or illegitimate methods in violation of the established laws and customs of war and the elementary laws of humanity.

(2) A commission should be created for the purpose of collecting and classifying systematically all the information already had or to be obtained, in order to prepare as complete a list of facts as possible concerning the violations of the laws and customs of war committed by the forces of the German Empire and its allies on land, on sea, and in the air in the course of the present war.

PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY

The third point submitted to the commission was to define the degree of responsibility for offenses attaching to particular members of the enemy forces. The conclusion of the commission, which was not reached without a great deal of discussion was that—

All persons belonging to enemy countries, without distinction of rank, including chiefs of States, who have been guilty of offenses against the laws and customs of war or the laws of humanity, are liable to criminal prosecution.

The weightiest points of international law were balanced against the arguments of common sense and justice in the course of the discussion which led to the adoption of the above conclusion. It was urged by some members of the commission that the heads of States ought to enjoy immunity by reason of their position. The commission, however, "desires to state expressly that in the hierarchy of persons in authority there is no reason why rank, however exalted, should in any circumstances protect the holder of it from responsibility when that responsibility has been established before a properly constituted tribunal. This extends even to the case of heads of States." The commission rejected the plea of immunity raised on the ground that this privilege is one of practical expedience in municipal law and is not fundamental.

"However," continued the report, "even if, in some countries, a sovereign is exempt from being prosecuted in a national court of his own country, the position from an international point of view is quite different." The extension of the privilege of immunity beyond the national limits would, the report points out, lay down the principle that the grossest outrages against international law and custom and against the laws of humanity could be committed without fear of punishment. The report added:

Such a conclusion would shock the conscience of civilized mankind. In view of the grave charges which may be preferred against—to take one case—the ex-Kaiser, the vindication of the principles of the laws and customs of war and the laws of humanity which have been violated would be incomplete if he were not brought to trial and if other offenders less highly placed were punished.

Moreover, the trial of the offenders might be seriously prejudiced if they attempted and were able to plead the superior orders of a sovereign against whom no steps had been taken or were being taken. There is little doubt that the ex-Kaiser and others in high authority were cognizant of, and could at least have mitigated, the barbarities committed during the course of the war. A word from them would have brought about a different method in the action of their subordinates on land, at sea, and in the air. We desire to say that civil and military authorities cannot be relieved from responsibility by the mere fact that a higher authority might have been convicted of the same offense. It will be for the court to decide whether a plea of superior orders is sufficient to acquit the person charged from responsibility.

THE TRIBUNAL

The report, having thus established the case against the enemy, then proceeded to deal with the constitution and procedure of a tribunal for their trial. It quoted effectively a declaration made by the German delegate to The Hague Conference in 1907, when, speaking of the use of submarine mines, he said:

Military operations are not governed solely by the stipulations of international law. There are other factors. Conscience, good sense, and the sense of duty imposed by the principles of humanity will be the surest guides for the conduct of sailors, and will constitute the most effective guarantee against abuses. The officers of the German Navy, I loudly proclaim it, will always fulfill in the strictest fashion the duties which emanate from the unwritten law of humanity and civilization.

The report then declared that the public conscience insists upon a punishment which will make it clear that it is not permitted cynically to profess a disdain for the most sacred laws and the most formal undertakings "which, in spite of the lip service of von Bieberstein to humanity, is what is charged against the enemy."

In the consideration of the first class of offenses, which includes the violation of Belgian neutrality, legal views would appear to have carried the day, and the report did not recommend any prosecution of the authors of the war and contented itself with the suggestion that the conference should confine its action in this respect to uttering a formal condemnation of those responsible for actions which were described in the report itself.

The commission recognized the right, according to international law, of the belligerents to try individuals who are alleged to be guilty of such crimes as are enumerated in the list of thirty-two categories of offenses set out in the report, if those persons have been taken prisoners or have "otherwise fallen into" their power. Each belligerent can set up an appropriate tribunal before which to bring them to justice, but the commission urged that all such cases should be brought before a single tribunal.

A "HIGH TRIBUNAL"

Quite apart from misdeeds of this nature, however, there remained a number of charges which the report urged should be tried by a high tribunal to be established.

Those charges were:

(a) Against persons belonging to enemy countries who have committed outrages against a number of civilians and soldiers of the several allied nations, such as outrages committed in prison camps where prisoners of war of several nations were congregated, or the crime of forced labor in mines where prisoners of more than one nationality were forced to work.

(b) Against persons of authority belonging to enemy countries whose orders were executed, not only in one area or on one battle front, but whose orders affected the conduct of operations against several of the allied armies.

(c) Against all authorities, civil or military, belonging to enemy countries, however high their position may have been, without distinction of rank, including the heads of States, who ordered or, with knowledge thereof and with power to intervene, abstained from preventing or taking measures to prevent or putting an end to or repressing violations of the laws or customs of war (it being understood that no such abstention should constitute a defense for the actual perpetrators).

(d) Against such other persons belonging to enemy countries as, having regard to the character of the offense or the law of any belligerent country, it may be considered advisable not to proceed before a court other than the high tribunal which it is proposed to set up.

It was suggested in the report that offenses falling under these four classifications should be tried by a high tribunal composed of three representatives appointed by each of the five great powers and of one representative appointed by each of the following Governments: Belgium, Greece, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Serbia and Czechoslovakia.

The law to be applied by this tribunal should be the "principles of the law of nations as they result from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity, and from the dictates of public conscience."

The court would be empowered to sentence any accused person found guilty to such penalty as may be provided for by legislation of any country represented on the tribunal or in accordance with the national legislation of the accused person. The court should determine its own procedure, and should have power to sit in divisions of not less than five members, and to request any national court to assume jurisdiction for the purpose of inquiry, trial, or judgment.

An international prosecutor would be created (if the commission's plan be adopted) by the creation of an International Prosecuting Commission of five members, of whom one each should be nominated by the Governments of the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan, and for the assistance of which any other Government may delegate a representative. National courts would not be enabled to proceed with the prosecution of any individual who had been selected for trial before this tribunal, and no trial or sentence by a national court should bar trial or sentence before this international court.

The conclusions of the report on this point recommended that in the Peace Treaty the enemy be called upon to recognize the jurisdiction of the national and the high tribunals, and that any measures of amnesty which they (the enemy countries) may pass shall not apply to individuals guilty of offenses against the customs of war or the laws of humanity. They also urged that the enemy countries should be called upon in the treaty to agree to surrender any person "wanted" by the Allies for trial, and to furnish the allied Governments with all the information they may require on points dealing with criminal offenses.

They also proposed that the five States represented on the prosecuting commission should jointly approach neutral Governments with a view to obtaining the surrender for trial of persons within their territories who are charged by such States with crimes of war.

End of the Peace Conference

Its Functions Transferred to a Council of Ambassadors and a Council of Premiers

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

THE Peace Conference closed its long and historic sessions in the month under review. Before its last meeting a warm and sincere tribute was paid by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Hugh C. Wallace, the American Ambassador, to the retiring President of the Conference, M. Clemenceau. After discussion of the best method of continuing the interallied diplomatic activities of the dissolving congress, it was decided to divide the work still remaining to be done between a Council of Ambassadors and a Council of Premiers, the former to deal with all routine matters concerning peace and to be empowered to control the execution of the Peace Treaty; the latter to deal with all large issues of international policy and to formulate the principles governing matters of immediate concern.

This change did not occur until Jan. 21. During the last week in January and the first two weeks in February, the machinery of these two new councils was put into running order, and little was accomplished in the way of definite decisions. The most dramatic developments of the month—the raising of the blockade of Soviet Russia with a view to reopening trade (Jan. 16), the demand on Holland for the extradition of the Kaiser for trial, and the presentation of a list of 890 Germans accused of war crimes to the Ebert Government, accompanied by a similar demand for extradition, under specific provisions of the Peace Treaty—were all either decided or carried out by the Supreme Council before its dissolution.

Five important documents affecting the work of the interallied commissions of Silesia and the evacuation of Upper Silesia, Danzig and other German Polish territories were signed by the Allies and Germany on Jan. 9 in Paris. Three other documents affecting German-Polish arrangements were signed at the same time by the representatives of Germany and Poland.

The Supreme Council of the Peace Conference ended its long and arduous labors on Jan. 21. Before the council was finally adjourned, Lloyd George asked that the following statement be entered upon the minutes:

Conscious of the inestimable services which M. Georges Clemenceau, President during more than a year of the Peace Conference, has rendered the cause of peace, and grateful to him, as we are, for the dignity, impartiality and wisdom with which he has conducted our deliberations, we, his colleagues, desire to express to him our unalterable esteem, as well as our hope that in the calm of his retirement he may live long enough to see his incomparable work bear fruit for the glory of France and the renewal of the prosperity of the world.

The American Ambassador, who followed Mr. Lloyd George, expressed similar good wishes. M. Clemenceau, in thanking the council for its expressions of esteem, spoke as follows:

If Great Britain, the United States, Italy and Japan remain united, there is a guarantee of peace which exceeds all those guarantees which can be put on paper. If one day these nations are separated I dare not think of the misfortunes which may result.

We arrived here somewhat disconcerted by the gravity of the problems set and the difficulty of settling them.

When fighting the enemy all necessarily were in agreement, each joyfully giving his life for his country. But it is not necessarily the same when one meets to calculate and realize the fruits of victory and to settle each one's share.

We have, however, tried to accomplish that difficult task, and it may truly be said that I have never presided over your meetings. They were not presided over. We exchanged thoughts, strictly speaking. We never experienced difficulties in our discussions, and the President never had to exercise his powers. We have been friends charged with a great duty—to make peace, to prolong the state of peace, first of all between ourselves, while increasing the chances of peace for humanity.

We have all defended what we believed to be the interest of our countries, but never has the necessity of a common understanding been lost sight of. I further believe that we all are agreed today to say that the special interests of each nationality must be considered and respected. There cannot be a tranquil Europe if the rights of each one is not recognized.

I have been sometimes reproached for making too many concessions. The same reproach has been made against other heads of Governments, but I am calm in the knowledge, as I am sure you all are, of never having been guided in the expression of my opinions or in the conclusions we have reached except by the single idea that the nations which shed so much blood had the right, first of all, to have their national claims satisfied, and then to have those claims reconciled each to the other and embodied in one great peace inspired by common interest.

I shall not lose sight of the peace we are completing and shall continue to follow its progress until my last breath. I shall try by all good wishes, at least, to do all in my power for the solidarity of that peace. For, indeed, if by misfortune the elements of discord should arise among you, how terrible the thought that the best blood of the civilized world, the blood of our soldiers, should be shed in vain for hopes that would not be realized.

I will not believe that such an eventuality is possible. I know the sentiments of my friend, M. Millerand. I know that he, as I, is convinced that an alliance for a lasting understanding must be maintained between all the peoples represented here.

After shaking hands warmly with all present, M. Clemenceau, very much moved, left forever the Foreign Minister's private office where daily for more than a year he had toiled for the greatness of his country and the peace of the world. He left soon afterward for Egypt, despite warnings telegraphed him by certain Egyptian nationalists, incensed by his attitude toward Egyptian independence, that his life would not be safe in that country. Before departure he turned over the Ministry of War to André Lefèvre, the new War Minister, and also transferred his powers as President of the Council of Ministers to M. Millerand, his successor as Premier.

REPARATIONS COMMISSION

Endowed with tremendous responsibilities and large powers, the Reparations Commission, under its new President, M. Jonnart, appointed by Premier Millerand tion, sat three or four times a week to consider questions put before it by the commission, covering a range of subjects almost as wide as the scope of the treaty itself. All questions were examined with the greatest care. The deliberations were divided between questions of interpretation of the treaty and questions of international law. The official proceedings were held in French.

A request by the Reparations Commission for permission to appoint an American as the expert head of the commission's accountancy division was denied by the Treasury Department of the United States on Jan. 24, on the ground that the Peace Treaty had not been ratified by the American Senate.

RUSSIAN-BALTIC PROBLEMS

The announcement by the Supreme Council of its intention to permit a partial raising of the blockade of Soviet Russia and the resumption of trade through the Russian Co-operative Societies, with its effect on the Bolshevik authorities, has been treated of elsewhere in this issue. (See Page 452.) This announcement was issued immediately after the publication of a communiqué by the British War Department, reflecting the views of Winston Churchill, the British Secretary for War, which were known to be opposed to those of the Premier, warning the country of the menace of the spread of Bolshevism to Western Europe.

The Prime Ministers took up the question of Poland on Jan. 15. The Poles during the previous weeks had occupied considerable territory beyond the Polish boundaries belonging properly to Russia. The council notified M. Patek, the Polish Minister at Paris, that it could not support a policy of expansion, and requested him to warn the Polish Government to evacuate all Russian territory and thus avoid giving cause for attack by the on Jan. 22, organized in February a legal committee to aid it with advice in interpretation of the Treaty of Versailles. The countries represented officially were: France, by M. Fromageot; Great Britain, by William Finlay; Italy, by Senator Bensa, and Belgium, by M. Marx. The United States was represented unofficially by Hugh A. Dayne, who was Judge Advocate with General Pershing, and later Counsel to the War Prisoners' Commission in Switzerland; Colonel James A. Logan, Jr., successor of Herbert Hoover, and Albert Rathbone, Assistant Secretary of the United States Treasury. This committee, after its crea-

Bolshevist Government. This M. Patek refused to do, voicing Poland's insistence on the regaining of her historical boundaries, as opposed to those fixed by the Supreme Council. One of the problems which the new councils still have to resolve is the policy to be adopted in case the Red Army pursued the Poles into Poland.

It was in the desire to avert a disaster of this kind that the council gave its sanction to the peace negotiations proposed to the Poles by the Bolshevik Government.

New Crisis in Adriatic Problem

How Compromise Between Italy and Yugoslavia Was Reached by Premiers and Rejected by President Wilson

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 16, 1920]

SHORTLY before the end of 1919 M. Clemenceau, still French Premier, said of the situation in the Adriatic: "Only when this problem is solved can we begin to breathe freely." Negotiations earnestly continued through the following three weeks were finally productive of a compromise agreement, which embodied, as admitted by the Italian Premier on Jan. 15, the complete Italianization of Istria as far as Fiume, Italian renouncement of sovereignty over Fiume, and its establishment as a free city of Italian character, with its port and railway internationalized under the League of Nations. This agreement was taken by the Prince Regent to Belgrade for Yugoslav consideration, with a covering note which made acceptance alternative only with the execution of the Treaty of London, by the terms of which Italy would annex in Istria, Dalmatia and the isles all the territories promised her by the London pact of 1915.

Pending receipt of the Yugoslav reply the Fiume question was emphasized in Paris on Jan. 17 by the passing of an airplane from Fiume which scattered over the city a cloud of small green papers in which Gabriele d'Annunzio sent a greeting "to the Latin brothers of the Italians" at a moment when "the outworn politicians are trying to raise against young France a headstrong old chief (Clemenceau), who does not appreciate and wounds the freshest forces of the new life." The message continued: "If the injustice against Italian Fiume and the Italian towns of Dalmatia is consummated, a combat is inevitable, and blood must be shed."

Meanwhile this compromise agreement, which, it was learned later, had been agreed upon by Premiers Lloyd George and Clemenceau on Jan. 5 and accepted by Premier Nitti on Jan. 7, was sent to President Wilson at Washington for his consideration and approval. On the eve of his departure from Paris at this date, the Italian Premier expressed the utmost optimism regarding settlement. Italy, he said, had shown great moderation in giving up the islands and the whole of Dalmatia except Zara, and in agreeing to the internationalization of the port and railway of Fiume, thus protecting the Yugoslavs' interests in a sea outlet. No Italian Government, he declared, could do more and live, and if the Yugoslavs rejected the Italian proposals they would be taking a serious responsibility.

The Yugoslav reply reached Paris on Jan. 20. The Belgrade Government accepted six of the allied propositions, but by insistence on a seventh, which refused to change the frontier line outlined by President Wilson, brought new uncertainty and tenseness into the situation. The Yugoslav proposals were as follows:

- (1) The Yugoslavs renounce all claim to sovereignty over Fiume, and accept the internationalization of the town, the town to be under the sovereignty of the League of Nations, which will appoint the diplomatic representatives.

- (2) The Yugoslavs also agree that the town of Zara in Dalmatia shall become have to be dropped; in short, the United States would withdraw from all participation in European affairs.

In the semi-official analysis of the note published by the Paris Temps, Mr. Wilson was said to have declared that he could not approve the terms of the compromise agreement of Jan. 20, and that he objected particularly to giving the Jugoslavs the choice between this plan and the execution of the Treaty of London; he also pointed out the considerable divergence between this scheme and that framed in London in December by Premiers Lloyd George and Clemenceau with the collaboration of the American representative. The President's note was received with a storm of criticism in the French, and partly also in the British, press. The reply of the British, French and Italian Premiers had not been sent up to the time when these pages went to press.

It was reported from Trieste on Feb. 5 that armed bands of Slavs were waging guerrilla warfare on the Italians of Intria. Italian carabineer outposts had been attacked, and armed clashes had occurred. The Italian commander in Istria had taken the necessary precautions.

In Fiume Gabriele d'Annunzio still reigned supreme. A Government merchant ship bearing stores and 2,000,000 lire for the Italian army of occupation in Albania had put into Fiume, and d'Annunzio had sequestered both money and supplies. Two torpedo boats bound from Ancona to Pola with munitions and food-stuffs for the Italian naval forces, as well as an Italian destroyer, also bound for Pola, were similarly seized. Guns and bombs had been stolen and sent to Fiume. An Italian officer, General Nigra, stationed in Istria, who had criticised d'Annunzio severely, was kidnapped by a number of d'Annunzio's officers on Jan. 28 and brought to Fiume; several of the kidnappers were arrested by the Government on Feb. 2. In a dramatic scene on Feb. 9 General Nigra was released by d'Annunzio to the flourish of trumpets, following grandiloquent speechmaking and cordial handshakings.

Stringent laws had been passed by d'Annunzio's Government against falsification of the city's money, of which more than 40,000,000 lire had been counterfeited. The publication of all newspapers without the consent of the insurgent leader and his staff had been forbidden. Preparations were going on for the conscription of five classes of Fiume citizens for "defense of the city."

From Flanders Fields

[TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE]

By FRANCIS JAMES MACBEATH, in The New York World

In Flanders Fields we restless lie.
It seemed a little thing to die
If death could make life safe for you,
And give the freedom that we knew
To all who 'neath oppression sigh.

But dreams, like life, may go awry.
The little men fate tosses high
To us and honor seem untrue
In Flanders Fields.

For selfish policies they vie,
Content a world to crucify
If they can but our work undo—
Afraid to see the Crusade through.
Better than that, peace 'neath the sky
In Flanders Fields!

Financing Hungry Europe

Important Letter by Secretary Glass Calls a Halt on Further Government Loans for That Purpose

FINANCIAL and industrial leaders in America, Great Britain, France, Holland, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden and Norway issued a call on Jan. 15, 1920, for an international commercial and financial conference to endeavor to find a remedy for the "chaos in the world." The appeal was addressed to the respective Governments. That to the American Government was also addressed to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. The proposal indicated that delegates from Germany, Austria, Japan, Italy, all the neutrals of Europe and the chief exporting countries of South America would also be invited to send delegates.

The purpose of the conference is to recommend a feasible plan of co-operative assistance. The call was issued simultaneously in Europe and America; it was identical in all respects, except that the European call included one clause that was omitted from the American text—a clause which hinted at a move for the cancellation of war debts between nations, or an invitation to the United States to cancel its $10,000,000,-000 in loans to European Governments.

Secretary of the Treasury Glass on Jan. 29 addressed a letter to the President of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States setting forth the attitude of the Treasury as to extending further Government aid to Europe. He made it clear that the Treasury was opposed to granting further governmental aid beyond the previously announced suggestion with respect to the extension of interest payments on existing loans and to the supplying of relief for certain portions of Europe.

MAIN POINTS OF LETTER

The Secretary's letter disclosed the fact that since the armistice, Nov. 11, 1918, the financial assistance extended to foreign Governments aggregated $4,226,584,688.41. The Secretary added:

The Governments of the world must now get out of banking and trade. Loans of Government to Government not only involve additional taxes or borrowings by the lending Government, with the inflation attendant thereon, but also a continuance by the borrowing Government of control over private activities, which only postpones sound solutions of the problems.

The Treasury is opposed to governmental control over foreign trade and finance and even more opposed to private control. It is convinced that the credits required for the economic restoration and revival of trade must be supplied through private channels; that as a necessary contribution to that end the Governments of the world must assist in the restoration of confidence, stability and freedom of commerce by the adoption of sound fiscal policies, and that the Reparations Commission must adopt promptly a just and constructive policy. * * *

The existing worldwide inflation of currency, credit and prices is a consequence of the fact that for a period of four or five years the peoples of this earth have been consuming and destroying more than they have produced and saved, and against the wealth so destroyed the warring nations have been issuing currency and evidence of indebtedness. The consequence of the world's greatest war is profound and inescapable. It has affected all the nations of the civilized world, those who participated actively in the war and those who did not. The inflation exists in the neutral countries of Europe and in the Orient. It exists where there was no war debt, where the war debt was badly handled, and to some degree where the war debt was well handled.

CALLING HALT ON LOANS

Secretary Glass called attention to the steps taken in this country to remove governmental control and to restore individual initiative and free competition in business. He continued:

Rightly or wrongly, a different policy has been pursued in Europe. European Governments have maintained, since the cessation of hostilities, embargoes upon the export of gold. The rectification of the exchanges now adverse to Europe lies primarily in the hands of European Governments. The normal method of meeting an adverse international balance is to ship gold. The refusal to ship gold prevents the rectification of an adverse exchange. The need of gold embargoes lies in the expended currency and credit structure of Europe. Relief would be found in disarmament, resumption of industrial life and activity, the imposition of adequate taxes and the issue of adequate domestic loans.

The American people should not, in my opinion, be called upon to finance, and would not, in my opinion, respond to a demand that they finance the requirements of Europe in so far as they result from the failure to take these necessary steps for the rehabilitation of credit.

Such things as international bond issues, international guarantees, and international measures for the stabilization of exchange are utterly impracticable so long as there exist inequalities of taxation and domestic financial policies in the various countries involved; and when these inequalities no longer exist such devices will be unnecessary.

It is unthinkable that the people of a country which has been called upon to submit to so drastic a program of taxation as that adopted by the United States, which called for financing from current taxes a full one-third of the war expenditures, including loans to the Allies, should undertake to remedy the inequalities of exchange resulting from a less drastic policy of domestic taxation adopted by the other Governments of the world. The remedy for the situation is to be found not in the manufacture of bank credit in the United States for the movement of exports, a process which has already proceeded too far, but in the movement of goods, of investment securities, and in default of goods or securities then of gold, into this country from Europe; and in order that such securities may be absorbed by investors our people must consume less and save.

ASSUMING EARTH'S BURDENS

The United States could not, if it would, assume the burdens of all the earth. It cannot undertake to finance the requirements of Europe, because it cannot shape the fiscal policies of the Governments of Europe. The Government of the United States cannot tax the American people to meet the deficiencies arising from the failure of the Governments of Europe to balance their budgets, nor can the Government of the United States tax the American people to subsidize the business of our exporters. It cannot do so by direct measures of taxation, nor can it look with composure upon the manufacture of bank credit to finance our exports when the requirements of Europe are for working capital rather than for bank credits.

Lamentable as would be the effects upon our industrial life and upon Europe itself of the continued maintenance of an exchange barrier against the importation into Europe of commodities from the United States, this country cannot continue to extend credits on a sufficient scale to cover our present swollen trade balance against Europe, while paying cash (gold and silver) to the countries of Central and South America and the Far East, with which it has an adverse balance on its own and international account.

The consequence of the maintenance by Europe of this barrier will be to force the United States to do business with those countries with which it is able to do business on a cash basis. * * * If the peoples and Governments of Europe live within their incomes, increase their production as much as possible and limit their imports to actual necessities, foreign credits to cover adverse balances would most probably be supplied by private investors and the demand to resort to such impracticable methods as Government loans and bank credits would cease. * * *

If the Chamber of Commerce of the United States considers it advisable and desirable to designate representatives to attend an unofficial conference, the Treasury does not desire to offer any objection, provided the scope and character and limitations of such a conference as well as the impossibility of United States Government action are clearly understood.

FALL IN EXCHANGE RATES

The first effect of this important announcement was an unprecedented decline in foreign exchange. On Feb. 4 it reached its minimum: Pounds sterling fell in New York to $3.19, a discount of over 30 per cent. on the normal rate; francs were quoted as low as 15.15 to the dollar, and lire 18.82 to the dollar. The security markets were seriously affected, and wide declines occurred in all stocks, as well as in commodities and cotton. The latter was affected by the impression that England would put an embargo on imports to stabilize exchange. This rumor proved unfounded.

A few days after Secretary Glass's announcement a statement was made by R. C. Lindsay, the British Chargé d'Affaires in Washington, in which he declared:

In view of repeated allegations in the press that the British Government desires to borrow large sums in the United States, his Majesty's Government states that, as has been explained more than once in the British Parliament, it is entirely contrary to the policy of the British Treasury to incur a fresh indebtedness in the United States. Since June, 1919, the whole expenditure of the British Government in the United States was financed without fresh borrowing, and the first steps have been taken to reduce outstanding indebtedness. The loan issued in the market on Nov. 1, 1919, by the British Government was issued for the purpose solely of meeting maturing indebtedness.

Some confusion seems to have arisen out of the fact announced in the press both in Great Britain and the United States that the British Government has invited the co-operation of the Governments of other countries, and in particular of the United States, with them in joint action for further measures of relief and reconstruction in the suffering parts of Europe. Any such measures if finally agreed upon must obviously involve no further borrowings by the people of the United Kingdom from the United States, but further advances by the United Kingdom as well as by the United States and such other countries as take part in the joint action contemplated to countries requiring assistance.

The exchange situation improved during February, with substantial recoveries in sterling, lire and francs, but they were still at a considerable discount late in the month, and no approach to normal rates was expected for some time.

The British, French, and other European Governments took steps to arrange for the international conference, and it was announced that delegates from the United States Chamber of Commerce would attend, but not as representatives of the Government. It was expected that the conference would meet in March.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on Jan. 31 reported unanimously a bill authorizing the United States Grain Corporation to expend $50,000,000 for food supplies for the suffering in Europe. This action was taken over the protests of the Republican Steering Committee, which opposed any relief, and after unsuccessful attempts by several Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee to report a bill authorizing $125,000,000, the full amount requested by Secretary Glass. Amendments limiting the amount to $100,000,000 and $75,000,000 were defeated by overwhelming votes. Republican leaders stated on Feb. 16 that their investigations had found public opinion in the United States little favorable to the passage of this bill, and that early action in Congress in its favor was improbable.

The British Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on Feb. 12 that, despite the difficulties of the financial situation of the United Kingdom with regard to foreign exchange, the British Government had informed the United States Government that over and above the £12,500,000 voted this year they were prepared to contribute a further sum for European relief, not exceeding half the sum to be contributed by the United States, and not exceeding £10,000,000 in all.

The Canadian Government had also intimated its desire to make a contribution, and the British Government was confident that other Governments, both allied and neutral, would also co-operate in dealing with what might be truly called the desperate needs of certain parts of Europe.

Official figures given out Jan. 30 show that the national debt of Great Britain on April 1, 1919, totaled $39,405,000,000.

The Senate and the Peace Treaty

New Aspect of the Long Deadlock on Ratification Is Produced by Lord Grey's Open Letter

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 18, 1920]

THE United States Senate had not ratified the treaty of peace with Germany when these pages went to press, but the month had brought about developments which had somewhat altered the situation. Late in January a series of bipartisan conferences was held by seven leading Senators—four Democrats and three Republicans—representing the views of opposing groups respecting the treaty, and some progress was made on minor reservations; no agreement, however, could be reached on Article X., which guarantees the territorial integrity of all members of the League of Nations against foreign aggression. A compromise was reached on a modified preamble, whereby the reservations as adopted would not require specific acceptance by the powers, their silent acquiescence being deemed sufficient.

The Lodge reservation on mandates had been accepted by the Democrats, as had that on domestic questions, with merely phraseological changes; a change had been proposed and was being considered on the Monroe Doctrine, softening the tone of that reservation; a mild substitute for the reservation on the appointment of American representatives to the League had been tentatively adopted; the Lodge reservation on the Reparations Commission had been accepted, as had that on League expenses, with a slight change in wording; a substitute had been agreed on as to disarmament; the Lodge provisions on the treatment of nationals of covenant-breaking States, under Article XVI., and of Americans under certain treaty provisions, had been accepted, and a substitute had been discussed for the fourteenth reservation—that on voting power. On Shantung a slight modification was made, while on the labor reservation no change was indicated.

FAILURE OF CONFERENCES

It was announced on Jan. 30 that the bipartisan conferences had ended in failure. Senator Lodge then made the following announcement:

Speaking for myself alone, I have only this to say, that I was unable to agree to any change in reservations Nos. 2 and 5 dealing with Article X. and the Monroe Doctrine. In my opinion reservation No. 2, which provides that we shall assume no obligation of any kind under Article X. except the one mentioned in the treaty, that we should ourselves respect the boundaries of other nations, cannot possibly permit of change.

The change proposed in reservation No. 5 in regard to the Monroe Doctrine was an absolutely vital one because it was asserted as an official interpretation by the representatives of Great Britain that the Monroe Doctrine under the treaty was to be interpreted by the League. To this I for one could never assent, and in view of the statement made in Paris by the British delegation, to which I have referred, I regard the line which it was proposed to strike out as absolutely necessary.

The United States has always interpreted the Monroe Doctrine alone. It is our policy. No one else has ever attempted to interpret it, and it is something which in my judgment ought never to be permitted even by the most remote implication.

If we should strike out that phrase now after it has been accepted by the Senate it would lead to a direct inference that we left that question open. The right to interpret the Monroe Doctrine pertaining to the United States alone must never be open to question.

TREATY AGAIN CONSIDERED

Notice was given in the Senate Chamber on Jan. 31 that on Tuesday, Feb. 10, Senator Hitchcock would move to bring up the treaty in the Senate for consideration. This move on the part of the Democrats was countered by the Republicans when Senator Lodge served notice that he would ask unanimous consent to bring the treaty again before the Senate for consideration. In accordance with this notice the Senate on Feb. 9, acting on motion of Senator Lodge, suspended the rules and permitted reconsideration of the treaty by a vote of 63 to 9. The nine negative votes were cast by the so-called irreconcilables, who are opposed to the treaty in any form, viz.: Senators Borah, Brandegee, France, Gronna, Knox, McCormick, Norris, Poin-dexter, and Sherman. Senators Johnson of California, La Follette and Fall, Republicans, and Senators Reed and Gore, Democrats, all of whom are irreconcilables, were absent.

VISCOUNT GREY UPHOLDS THE RESERVATIONS

Meanwhile the treaty situation was profoundly affected by a letter written for publication in The London Times of Jan. 31 and republished simultaneously in The New York Times, by Viscount Grey of Fallodon, Special Ambassador of Great Britain to the United States. Lord Grey had spent four months in the United States, returning to England in January. During his stay here he had been unable personally to meet the President, on account of the latter's illness, but it was known that he was in close conference with Senators representing all shades of opinion on the treaty question, and was engaged in sounding the best public sentiment in the country on treaty issues. His letter was regarded as a unique departure from diplomatic procedure. Though in his letter Lord Grey dissociated himself from his official rôle, it was clear, and subsequently virtually acknowledged, that his views had previously been laid before the British Cabinet, and that their publication had had Governmental sanction as representing the guiding lines along which British policy would be formulated when the question came before it.

EFFECT AT WHITE HOUSE

While no specific statement regarding the letter emanated from the White House, the declarations of the secretary to the President indicated that Mr. Wilson was not at all pleased by the action of Viscount Grey, and there was a broad hint that the views of the British Ambassador should first have been communicated to him in writing, instead of being first made public through the press. Lord Grey's mission to this country was to confer with President Wilson on the treaty situation and on the relations of Great Britain and the United States growing out of the world war. While he never had an opportunity to present his credentials to President Wilson, he was received by the Secretary of State. He is now regarded by the State Department as on leave of absence, no notification having been given to this Government that he would not return. After publication of the letter, the impression prevailed at Washington that, owing to the President's displeasure, Lord Grey, if he wished to return, would not be acceptable during the present Administration.

In the Senate the effect of Lord Grey's letter was to stimulate action on the treaty, and it was believed at the middle of February that definite and final disposition of the question would be made before March 1.

Lord Grey's letter was as follows:

Nothing, it seems to me, is more desirable in international politics than a good understanding between the democracy of the United States, on the one hand, and the democracies of Great Britain and the self-governing dominions, and, I hope, we may add Ireland, on the other. Nothing would be more disastrous than a misunderstanding and estrangement.

There are some aspects of the position in the United States with regard to the League of Nations which are not wholly understood in Great Britain. In the hope that as a result of my recent stay in Washington I may be able to make that position better understood, I venture to offer the following observations. They represent only my own personal opinion and nothing more, and they are given simply as those of a private individual.

In Great Britain and the allied countries there is naturally impatience and disappointment at the delay of the United States in ratifying the Peace Treaty and the covenant of the League of Nations. It is perhaps not so generally recognized here [in England] that there is also great impatience and disappointment in the United States. Nowhere is the impasse caused by the deadlock between the President and the Senate more keenly regretted than in the United States, where there is a strong and even urgent desire in the public opinion to see a way out of that impasse found which will be both honorable to the United States and helpful to the world. It would be well to understand the real difficulties with which the people of the United States have been confronted. In the clear light of right understanding what seemed the disagreeable features of the situation will assume a more favorable and intelligent aspect.

"NO CHARGE OF BAD FAITH"

Let us first get rid of one possible misunderstanding. No charge of bad faith or repudiating signatures can be brought against the action of the United States Senate. By the American Constitution it is an independent body, an independent element in the treaty-making power. Its refusal to ratify the treaty cannot expose either itself or the country to a charge of bad faith or repudiation.

Nor is it fair to represent the United States as holding up the treaty solely from motives of party politics and thereby sacrificing the interests of the other nations for this petty consideration.

It is true that there are party politics and personal animosities in the United States. An American who saw much of England between 1880 and 1890 said that the present conditions of politics in the United States reminded him of what he had observed in London when Gladstone first advocated home rule for Ireland.

Nor is it true to say that the United States is moved solely by self-interest to the disregard of higher ideals. In the Party politics and personal animosities arising out of them operate in every democratic country. They are factors varying from time to time in degree, but always more or less active, and they operate upon every public question which is at all controversial. They are, however, not the sole or even the prime cause of the difficulty in the United States about the League of Nations.

United States, as in other countries, there are cross-currents and backwaters in the national life and motives. When the nation was roused by the war these cross-currents and backwaters were swept into the main stream of action and obliterated, as they were in other countries. With the reaction to peace and more normal conditions they are again apparent, as they are in other countries. But an American might fairly reply that, whereas the self-interest of other countries which have conquered in the war is now apparent in the desire to secure special territorial advantages, the self-interest of the United States takes the less aggressive form of desiring to keep itself free from undesirable entanglements, and that it does not lie with other countries to reproach the United States.

It would be well, therefore, for the reasons both of truth and expediency, to concentrate our attention on the real underlying causes of the Senate's insistence upon reservations in ratifying the covenant of the League of Nations.

FORCE OF AMERICAN TRADITION

1. There is in the United States a real conservative feeling for the traditional policy, and one of those traditions consecrated by the advice of Washington is to abstain from foreign and particularly from European entanglements. Even for nations which have been used to European alliances the League of Nations is felt to be something of a new departure.

This is still more true for the United States, which has hitherto held aloof from all outside alliances. For the League of Nations is not merely a plunge into the unknown, but a plunge into something of which historical advice and traditions have hitherto positively disapproved. It does not say that it will not make this new departure. It recognizes that world conditions have changed, but it desires time to consider, to feel its way and to act with caution. Hence this desire for some qualification and reservation.

2. The American Constitution not only makes possible, but under certain conditions renders inevitable, a conflict between Executive and Legislatures. It would be possible, as the covenant of the League of Nations stands, for a President in some future years to commit the United States through the American representative on the Council of the League of Nations to a policy of which the Legislature at that time might disapprove.

The contingency is one which cannot arise in Great Britain, where the Government is daily responsible to the representative authority of the House of Commons and where in case of a conflict between the House of Commons and the Government the latter must either immediately give way or public opinion must decide between them and assert itself by immediate general elections.

This contingency is therefore not present to our minds, and in ratifying the League of Nations we have no need to make any reservations to provide for a contingency which cannot arise in Great Britain.

But in the United States it is otherwise. The contingency is within the region of practical politics. They have reason, and, if they so desire, the right to provide against it. Reservations with this object are therefore an illustration not only of party politics, but of a great constitutional question which constantly arises between the President and the Senate, and it would be no more fair to label this with the name of party politics than it would be to apply that name to some of the great constitutional struggles which arose between the House of Commons and the executive authority in Great Britain in the days before the question had finally been settled in favor of the House of Commons.

CALLS OUR HELP ESSENTIAL

What, then, may we fairly expect from the United States in this great crisis of world policy—for a crisis, indeed, it is? If the participation of the United States was enormously helpful in securing the victory in the critical months of 1918, its help will be even more essential to secure stability in peace. Without the United States the present League of Nations may become little better than a league of the Allies for armed self-defense against a revival of Prussian militarism or against a sinister sequel to Bolshevism in Russia. Bolshevism is despotism, and despotisms have a tendency to become militaristic, as the great French Revolution proved. The great object of the League of Nations is to prevent future wars and to discourage from the beginning the growth of aggressive armaments which would lead to war.

For this purpose it should operate at once and begin here and now, in the first years of peace, to establish a reputation for justice, moderation and strength. Without the United States it will have neither the overwhelming physical nor moral force behind it that it should have, or, if it has the physical force, it will not have the same degree of moral force, for it will be predominately European, and not a world organization, and it will be tainted with all the interracial jealousies of Europe. With the United States in the League of Nations war may be prevented and armaments discouraged, and it will not be in the power of the fretful nations of the world to disturb genuine peace. Without the League of Nations the old order of things will revive, the old consequences will recur, there will again be some great catastrophe of war, in which the United States will again find itself compelled to intervene, for the same reason and at no less or even greater cost than in 1917.

It would be a mistake to suppose that the American people are prepared or wish to withdraw their influence in world affairs. Americans differ among themselves as to whether they could or ought to have entered the war sooner than they did. It is neither necessary nor profitable for foreigners to discuss this point now. What is common to all Americans and to all foreigners who know the facts is the unselfish, wholehearted spirit in which the American Nation acted when it came into the war. The immediate adoption of compulsory military service and, even more, the rationing of food and fuel in those millions and millions of households over such a vast area, not by compulsion but by purely voluntary action in response to an appeal which had no compulsion behind it, is a remarkable and even astonishing example of national spirit and idealism.

That spirit is still there. It is as much a part of the nature and possibilities of the American people as any other characteristic. It is not possible for such a spirit to play such a part as it did in the war and then to relapse and be extinguished altogether. It would be a great mistake to suppose that because the citizens of the United States wish to limit their obligations they therefore propose to themselves to play a small part in the League of Nations. If they enter the League as willing partner with limited obligations, it may well be that American opinion and American action inside the League will be much more fruitful than if they entered as a reluctant partner who felt that her hand had been forced. It is in this spirit, in this hope, and in this expectation that I think we should approach, and are justified in approaching, consideration of American reservations.

FOR "MATERIAL QUALIFICATIONS"

I do not deny that some of them are material qualifications of the League of Nations as drawn up at Paris or that they must be disappointing to those who are with that covenant as it stands and are even proud of it, but those who have had the longest experience of political affairs and especially of treaties know best how often it happens that difficulties which seem most formidable in anticipation and on paper never arise in practice. I think this is likely to be particularly true in the working of the League of Nations. The difficulties and dangers which the Americans foresee in it will probably never arise or be felt by them when they are once in the League. And in the same way the weakening and injury to the League which some of its best friends apprehend from the American reservations would not be felt in practice.

If the outcome of the long controversy in the Senate has been to offer co-operation in the League of Nations it would be the greatest mistake to refuse that co-operation because conditions are attached to it, and when that co-operation is accepted let it not be accepted in a spirit of pessimism.

The most vital considerations are that representatives should be appointed to the Council of the League of Nations by all the nations that are members of the Council, that these representatives should be men who are inspired by the ideals for which we entered the war, and that these representatives should be instructed and supported in that same spirit of equity and freedom by the Governments and public opinion of the countries who are now partners in peace. If that be the spirit in which the Council of the League of Nations deals with the business that comes before it there need be no fear that the representative of the United States on that Council will not take part in realizing the hopes with which the League has been founded.

DOMINIONS' RIGHT TO VOTES

There is one particular reservation which must give rise to some difficulty in Great Britain and self-governing dominions. It is that which has reference to the six British votes in the Assembly of the League of Nations. The self-governing dominions are full members of the League. They will admit, and Great Britain can admit, no qualification whatever of that right. Whatever the self-governing dominions may be in the theory and the letter of the Constitution, they have in effect ceased to be colonies in the old sense of the word. They are free communities, independent as regards all their own affairs, and partners in those which concern the empire at large.

It is a special status, and there can be no derogation from it. To any provision which makes it clear that none of the British votes can be used in a dispute likely to lead to rupture in which any part of the British Empire is involved, no exception can be taken. That is only a reasonable interpretation of the covenant as it now stands. If any part of the British Empire is involved in a dispute with the United States, the United States will be unable to vote and all parts of the British Empire, precisely because they are partners, will be parties to that dispute and equally unable to vote. But as regards this right to vote where they are not parties to the dispute there can be no qualification, and there is very general admission that the votes of the self-governing dominions would in most cases be found on the same side as that of the United States.

It must not be supposed that in the United States there is any tendency to grudge the fact that Canada and the other self-governing dominions of the British Empire have votes, but any person with the smallest understanding of public audiences must realize the feeling created by the statement that the United States with several million more English-speaking citizens than there are in the whole of the British Empire has only one to six votes. I am not concerned to discuss here how this problem of equality of voting may be adjusted in practice. It will not be important. In sentiment and political feeling it is a very powerful factor. We can neither give way about the votes for the self-governing dominions nor can we ignore the real political difficulty in the United States.

It may be sufficient to observe that the reservation of the United States, as far as known at the time of writing, does not in any way challenge the right of the self-governing dominions to exercise their votes, nor does it state that the United States will necessarily reject the decision to which these votes have been cast. It is therefore possible, I think it is even more than probable, that in practice no dispute will ever arise. Our object is to maintain the status of the self-governing dominions, not to secure a greater British than American vote, and we have no objection in principle to increase of the America vote.

Your obedient servant,
GREY OF FALLODON.

The letter was indorsed by the British and French press with practical unanimity. It was regarded as greatly strengthening the position of the Senators who were supporting strong reservations.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S ATTITUDE

President Wilson had expressed himself to Senator Hitchcock regarding reservations in a letter written Jan. 26, five days before the Grey letter was published. In this communication the President had definitely asserted that certain reservations would be acceptable to him. In referring to the proposed modification in the reservation on Article X. he wrote:

To the substance of it I, of course, adhere. I am bound to, like yourself. I am solemnly sworn to obey and maintain the Constitution of the United States. But I think the form of it very unfortunate. Any reservation or resolution stating that "the United States assumes no obligation under such and such an article, unless or except," would, I am sure, chill our relationship with the nations with which we expect to be associated in the great enterprise of maintaining the world's peace.

That association must in any case, my dear Senator, involve very serious and far-reaching implications of honor and duty which I am sure we shall never in fact be desirous of ignoring. It is the more important not to create the impression that we are trying to escape obligations.

But I realize that negative criticism is not all that is called for in so serious a matter. I am happy to be able to add, therefore, that I have once more gone over the reservations proposed by yourself, the copy of which I return herewith, and am glad to say that I can accept them as they stand.

I have never seen the slightest reason to doubt the good faith of our associates in the war, nor ever had the slightest reason to fear that any nation would seek to enlarge our obligations under the covenant of the League of Nations, or seek to commit us to lines of action which under our Constitution only the Congress of the United States can in the last analysis decide.

May I suggest that with regard to the possible withdrawal of the United States it would be wise to give to the President the right to act upon a resolution of Congress in the matter of withdrawal? In other words, it would seem to be permissible and advisable that any resolution giving notice of withdrawal should be a joint rather than a concurrent resolution.

I doubt whether the President can be deprived of his veto power under the Constitution, even with his own consent. The use of a joint resolution would permit the President, who is, of course, charged by the Constitution with the conduct of foreign policy, to merely exercise a voice in saying whether so important a step as withdrawal from the League of Nations should be accomplished by a majority or by a two-thirds vote.

The Constitution itself providing that the legislative body was to be consulted in treaty-making and having prescribed a two-thirds vote in such cases, it seems to me that there should be no unnecessary departure from the method there indicated.

I see no objection to a frank statement that the United States can accept a mandate with regard to any territory under Article XIII., Part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace, only by the direct authority and action of the Congress of the United States.

The chief issue over the ratification of the treaty when its consideration was resumed was on the words "by any other means," inserted in the Lodge reservation. The original reservation provided that the United States assumed no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of nations by the employment "of its military or naval forces, or the economic boycott," unless Congress should first so provide. The new Lodge reservation adds after the word "boycott" the words "or by any other means," which would exclude moral pressure or financial assistance. The Administration Democrats argue that the inclusion of these words would practically prevent the enforcement of any decree of the League of Nations, as it would involve possible long delays awaiting any Congressional action on any steps that might be necessary to prevent war. The Republicans maintain that they are opposed to any action whatsoever involving this country in the affairs of other nations, either by moral, financial or military measures, unless Congress first so provides. It was on this point that the fate of the treaty rested when the present pages went to press.

League of Nations Council in Session

First Business Meeting

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 16, 1920]

THE French Government devoted Jan. 30 to the holding of solemn assemblies in honor of the birth of the League of Nations. Meetings of this kind were held in various college halls at Paris and in the public schools throughout France. Speakers at each meeting explained the need and possibilities of such a society of peoples. At the Sorbonne, in the presence of President Poincaré and his destined successor, Paul Deschanel, leading men in politics, religion, science and sociology spoke eloquently in favor of the League. The main address was delivered by Léon Bourgeois, Chairman of the Executive Council of the League and French member of the commission that drafted the covenant. In tracing the development of the League idea M. Bourgeois said:

President Wilson, by his messages and his personal efforts, offered the means of realizing this idea in a great international convention. Whatever defects there may be in it, the compact of April 28, 1919, has sealed between the free peoples a solemn agreement for the union of all, for the safety and independence of all.

Commenting on the absence of American representatives at the first meeting of the League, M. Bourgeois declared that the member-nations were all waiting and hoping for the entry of the United States in the near future. The immediate task, he pointed out, was to prevent the conquered powers, who had not recognized the rightfulness of victory nor the equity of the sentence imposed in its name, from disturbing the new-gained peace. Not with a spirit of hatred and persecution, but with strict, stern justice, Germany must be made to feel that she is powerless to revolt, must be made to understand that the force of right has become, and will remain, supreme.

In an address delivered by Paul Appell, Honorary Dean of the Society of Science, the assembly was warned that only two ways lay open to humanity—establishment of the new conception of right which finds expression in the League, or self-destruction in war. A new war between great nations, he said, would mean the annihilation of a hundred million men with new weapons that could destroy in a few hours the most powerful cities, blot out life in entire countries, leaving behind only peoples destitute of moral ideals, believing only in force and returning to organized barbarism.

LEAGUE MEETS IN LONDON

The council of the League of Nations assembled in the Picture Gallery of St. James's Palace, London, on Feb. 11, and began its first business session. Members of the press and diplomats of all nations were present as spectators of a great event.

The council table was placed at one end of a long room hung with portraits of Kings and Queens of England. Just above the delegates hung the portrait of Henry VIII., and at the other end of the room was an early portrait of Queen Victoria. Otherwise the gallery was severely plain. On the big hearth blazed a cheerful fire, and the centre was occupied by chairs for the invited guests.

Half an hour before noon the secretaries and diplomats arrived, one by one. After a short but animated discussion as to who should preside, M. Bourgeois took the chair at the red morocco table at the end of the hall, before which the members of the council sat in gilded chairs, with Mr. Balfour, who had shortly before been appointed the British representative on the League Executive Council, and Baron Matsui of Japan on his right, and Sir Eric Drummond, Secretary General, and Signor Ferraris of Italy on his left. Next to Signor Ferraris around the corner of the table sat Paul Hymans of Belgium and Count Quinones de Leon of Spain; facing these at the other end of the table sat Casteo da Cunha of Brazil and Kaki Amanos of Greece.

Mr. Balfour rose and made a brief speech of welcome, in the course of which he voiced regret at the absence of America. After the translation of his words into French, M. Bourgeois, as President of the session, made reply. He outlined the Agenda, which included the hearing of certain representations of Switzerland concerning the conditions of her entry into the League, and the appointment of the Sarre Basin Commission and of the High Commissioner for Danzig. He then asked the council to vote Mr. Balfour into the chair.

The council intrusted to M. Bourgeois the framing of a plan for the permanent court of international justice under Article XIV. of the League covenant, as well as consideration of the proposed list of international jurists to be invited to form a committee to prepare plans for the constitution of the court. It also charged Count Quinones de Leon, Spanish Ambassador to France, with consideration of the duties of the League relating to transit, ports, waterways and railways; Dr. Da Cunha, the Brazilian Ambassador, with the constitution of an international body for dealing with health problems, and Baron Matsui, the Japanese Ambassador, with the framing of the League's guarantee of the Polish Minorities Treaty.

Mr. Balfour announced that the actual deliberations of the council would take place in private, but would be announced at a later meeting. The meeting was then adjourned sine die.

The third meeting of the League occurred on Jan. 13. A resolution admitting Switzerland under certain conditions was passed, and it was announced that the League would call an international conference to study the financial crisis and seek means of mitigating its dangerous consequences. Twelve international jurists were nominated as a commission to consider the establishment of an international court. One of those nominated was Elihu Root. Of his inclusion Mr. Balfour said in a brief speech that Mr. Root, for one reason or another might find himself unable to accept the invitation, but that he desired to put on formal record the fact that Mr. Root would always be welcome in whatever stage of the deliberations he felt he might participate. The Polish Minorities Treaty was placed under the guarantee of the League, and a Sarre Basin Commission was appointed, consisting of M. Rault, member of the French Council of State, Chairman; Alfred von Boch, Landrath of Saarlouis for Saar, Count de Moltke Hvidtfeldt for Denmark, and Major Lambert for Belgium. The appointment of a fifth member was deferred. Each member was to receive 100,000 francs yearly, and the Chairman was to receive an extra 50,000 francs for entertaining.

The fourth meeting of the League was fixed for March 15 at Rome.

NEUTRALS TO JOIN LEAGUE

At a conference held in Copenhagen on Feb. 4 the Scandinavian Premiers and Foreign Ministers decided to accept the invitation to join the League of Nations. The decision was arrived at, it was stated, in the conviction that small countries were unable to maintain an independent attitude on foreign policy outside the League. The Norwegian Cabinet on Feb. 14 decided to ask the consent of Parliament for Norway's participation in the League of Nations. None of the national assemblies of the Scandinavian nations, however, had actually voted acceptance up to the time this issue of CURRENT HISTORY went to press.

The report from a committee appointed by the Second Chamber of the Dutch Parliament to examine the League covenant and to draft a bill providing for Holland's adhesion was published at The Hague on Feb. 3. This report favored Holland's entering the League. The report stated that, though Holland, by joining, would lose part of her ancient liberty, this would be more than counterbalanced by the fact that if she refused to join she might be isolated and excluded from the social life of other countries. A small minority of the committee opposed the entry of Holland, holding that the League was formed by "imperialistic powers," excluded a large part of Europe and Asia, and "contained the germs of future wars."

The application of Switzerland for membership in the League, under guarantees recognizing her peculiar international situation, was granted by the Council at its third session, held in London privately on Feb. 13. For more than a century Switzerland has had her neutrality recognized in Europe on the understanding that she would prevent any other country from invading her borders. Despite this special status, which prevented her from fulfilling all the usual obligations under the League, and the fact that her Constitution made it impossible for her to give her adhesion within the time limit required by the covenant, the League Council passed a resolution of admission which, though it recognized the unique situation referred to, required Switzerland to co-operate in commercial and financial measures against covenant-breaking States, and to defend her own territory under every circumstance. In return she was absolved from taking part in any military action and from the necessity of allowing foreign troops to pass through her borders.

Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and Holland were represented at the conference which opened at The Hague on Feb. 16 to discuss the formation of an international court of justice. The conference aimed, by the examination and comparison of plans already drawn by commissions of experts from other countries, to establish a uniform plan for a permanent tribunal such as was provided for by Article XIV. of the covenant of the League of Nations.

An official memorandum, sent by the South American Republic of Salvador to the United States Government and made public by the Washington State Department on Feb. 7, asked for a new definition of the Monroe Doctrine in the light of Article XXI. of the League covenant. After laudation of the aims of the covenant and of the advantages hitherto accruing to Pan-America from the Monroe Doctrine itself, the memorandum continued:

Since, however, the covenant of the League of Nations does not set forth nor determine the purposes nor fix a definite criterion of international relationship in America, and since, on the other hand, the doctrine will be forthwith transformed—in view of the full sanction of the nations of the world—into a principle of universal public law, juris et de jure, I request that your Excellency will be good enough to give the authentic interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine as it is understood in the present historical movement and in its future application by the Government of the United States, which must realize that my Government is keenly desirous of securing a statement which shall put an end to the divergence of views now prevailing on the subject, which it is recognized by all is not the most propitious in stimulating the ideals of true Pan-Americanism.

It was officially stated at Washington on Feb. 9 that no new interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine was considered necessary, and that the request of Salvador would have to be answered in the negative. Pending the receipt of the answer of the United States, Salvador, and other South American nations as well, had postponed action regarding their adhesion to the League.

Repatriating German War Prisoners

End of Their Long Ordeal

THE fate of the hundreds of thousands of war prisoners who were held by various former belligerents, and whose repatriation was eagerly awaited by their friends, continued to be a serious problem fifteen months after the fighting had ceased. There were still 400,000 German prisoners in France at the time of the final exchange of ratifications on Jan. 10, 1920, 360,000 being in the liberated regions and 30,000 in the interior, of whom 5,300 were officers. The German Government had sent these unfortunates the following Christmas greeting on Dec. 25:

On the day when the folks at home miss most sorely their sons detained as prisoners of war, the National Government, in the name of the entire German people, sends the greetings of the Fatherland to the prisoners of war. The Christmas holiday unites every German family. Therefore it has been in the most intimate circles a day to remember all those who are sorely missed and whose arrival is awaited impatiently and longingly.

This year has been worse than all those that have gone before in repeatedly disappointed hopes for the prisoners, as well as for the Fatherland longing for their return. The numerous and constantly repeated efforts of the National Government to bring about the return of the prisoners before the ratification of the Peace Treaty have, unfortunately, produced only partial successes. In the meantime, the beginning of the final completion of the Peace Treaty has come so near that the day of deliverance will soon dawn for those still being held back.

The National Government declares again at this time that it will not give up its unceasing efforts to have all the German prisoners of war and civilian prisoners still held in Europe and overseas returned to their homes as quickly as possible until the last man is back home again. It asks all the prisoners to have faith in this, and, after all the long sufferings and hardships they have so bravely endured, also to endure in patience the short space of time that still separates them from the day of their homecoming.

Immediately after the exchange of ratifications France set to work to repatriate all German prisoners in accordance with plans previously drawn up. The War Prison Committee met the German delegate in Paris on Jan. 10 and 11, the French Director General of Transport, representatives of the War Ministry and of the Northern and Eastern Railways being present the second day, with all the German experts. It was stated that liberation of the prisoners would begin as soon as Germany supplied the rolling stock. It was agreed that seven trains, with a carrying capacity of 1,000 men, would be sent daily, and that they would bring the prisoners back by way of Cologne, Coblenz, Mayence and Kehl. Inhabitants of the Rhine would be liberated first. Those in the interior would be repatriated via Switzerland. Island prisoners would be taken off by German ships. The period of repatriation was estimated to cover about forty-five days. Austrian prisoners would be concentrated at Lyons before final departure. The 1,000 Turkish and 3,000 Bulgarian prisoners were to be embarked from Marseilles. The first trainload of German prisoners arrived at Aix-la-Chapelle on Jan. 21. Other trains from various cities were leaving daily. German boats were arriving at Havre, Rouen and St. Nazaire to take their quota.

Admiral von Reuter, the commander of the German fleet at Scapa Flow, who gave the order for scuttling the ships in June, was set free by the British authorities on Jan. 28. He arrived at Wilhelmshaven on Jan. 31 and was greeted by thousands assembled along the waterfront, which was brilliantly decorated.

The fate of the 130 British prisoners in Russia was decided by an agreement signed at Copenhagen on Feb. 12 by James O'Grady, representing Great Britain, and Maxim Litvinov, representing the Russian Soviet Government. By this agreement British war prisoners in Russia and Russian war prisoners in England were to be released at once. Great Britain was to furnish the necessary transportation. It was also arranged that the Archangel Government should exchange Bolshevik prisoners for "White" prisoners held by the Bolsheviks.

The International Red Cross on Dec. 25 sent out an appeal in behalf of the prisoners of war in Siberia, declaring that 200,000 prisoners were living without shelter and virtually without clothing and proper food. Typhus was raging among them. It was stated in Geneva at International Red Cross headquarters on Jan. 27 that nearly 375,000 of the 500,000 Austro-Hungarian prisoners in Siberia had perished from typhus and smallpox. The rest had been kept alive only by the efficient work of Japanese, American and English doctors assigned to different towns along the Trans-Siberian Railway. It was stated at Rome on Jan. 1 that the Pope, after the receipt of a special appeal from Gustave Ador, former Swiss President and now President of the Red Cross, had appealed to the Japanese Government on behalf of the prisoners of all nationalities in Siberia.

HONORS TO PRIVATES

Statistics made public by the War Department on Feb. 10 showed that enlisted men received 63 per cent. of the medals awarded for service in the world war. To enlisted men went fifty-seven out of the total of seventy-eight Congressional Medals of Honor awarded, while 3,593 out of the 5,109 Distinguished Service Crosses conferred were given to enlisted men. All of the 641 Distinguished Service Medals awarded for meritorious service and not for acts of valor were conferred on officers. The 30th Division, which, with the 27th Division, broke the Hindenburg line, received twelve Medals of Honor, or 15 per cent. of all that were awarded.

UNIVERSAL TRAINING

It was reported from Washington on Feb. 3 that Republican leaders in the House had decided that universal training should be eliminated from the military bill. They held that the country, in the present state of finances, was opposed to expending $700,000,000 a year for compulsory training, or about $1,125,000,000 to maintain an army with compulsory training in operation. Representative F. W. Mondell, Republican floor leader, headed the opposition to compulsory training, and indications were that it would be defeated in the House. Mr. Mondell stated the case in these words:

The Secretary of War has recommended an army of 570,000 men, to cost nearly $1,000,000,000. Nobody outside of the General Staff and the Administration is considering any such establishment. The committee of the House and Senate is likely to provide for a regular establishment somewhere between 225,000 and 275,000 officers and men, line and staff. At the present cost this would involve appropriations of from $425,000,000 to $475,000,000. This force could not be reduced by any system of military training. The tendency would be to increase it.

A system of universal compulsory military training, such as has been proposed, would cost at least $700,000,000 per year, after the first year. This total is much more than our entire average annual Federal expenditures for all purposes prior to our entry into the European war. At a time when, on the basis of present estimates, we are facing a deficit of nearly $3,000,000,000, such expenditures are, of course, unthinkable.

Rejecting President Wilson's advice, House Democrats in caucus Feb. 9 adopted by a vote of 106 to 17 resolutions opposing the passage by this Congress of legislation for universal compulsory military training. The President's views were presented in a letter he wrote to Secretary Baker, which was read to the caucus by Representative Charles P. Caldwell of New York, a member of the Military Committee. In this letter Mr. Wilson urged that it was inadvisable that any party action be taken at this time on universal training, when the National Convention was so near. He spoke in favor of the principle of universal training. The caucus was apparently determined from the outset to have its way despite the President's counsel.

NEW AIR POLICY

On Jan. 22 Mr. Baker, Secretary of War, put into effect, as far as the army was concerned, the new army-navy policy relating to aircraft, which had been approved by the Joint Army and Navy Board on Aeronautics, as well as by Secretaries Baker and Daniels. Under this policy aircraft to be used in wartime operations are to be designated army aircraft, navy aircraft and marine aircraft. Army aircraft will be provided by the War Department and manned only by army personnel. Navy aircraft will be provided by the Navy Department and manned by navy personnel. Marine aircraft will be provided by the Navy Department and manned by the marine air personnel, which is a branch of the Naval Air Service.

Specific functions have been mapped out for each of these branches of the Air Service. Army aircraft will carry out operations from bases on shore as an arm of the mobile army, or against enemy aircraft in defense of all shore establishments and also alone or in co-operation with other arms of the army, or with the navy, against enemy vessels engaged in attacks on the coast.

The function of navy aircraft will be to conduct operations from mobile floating bases or from naval air stations on shore, as an arm of the fleet, or for overseas scouting, as well as to protect coastal communications or operations against enemy establishments on shore when such operations are conducted in co-operation with other types of naval forces, or alone when their mission is primarily naval. The functions normally assigned to army aircraft will be performed by the marine aircraft when the operations are in connection with an advance base in which operations of the army are not represented.

OUR DEAD ABROAD

More than two-thirds of the nearest relatives of the American soldier dead abroad who have been asked by the War Department to indicate whether they wish to have the bodies brought home from Europe have asked for the return of the bodies to the United States. The Adjutant General of the army has sent out cards to the next of kin of soldiers requesting to know their desires as to the disposal of bodies. There were 74,770 cards sent out, and so far 63,708 answers have been received. The classification of the requests made by the next of kin in these answers is:

	Num-ber.	P.C. of Total.
Requests for return to U. S.....	43,900	68.9
Requests for retention in Europe.....	10,400	30.6
Requests for reburials in other countries than U. S.....	300	0.5

Under a new ruling issued by R. G. Cholmeley-Jones, Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, war risk term insurance, regardless of how long it may have lapsed, may be reinstated any time before July 1, 1920. The only conditions are:

1. Two monthly premiums on the amount of insurance to be reinstated must accompany the application.

2. The applicant must be in as good health as at the date of discharge or at the expiration of the grace period, whichever is the later date, and so state in the application.

The new ruling is the most important liberalization of war risk insurance since the passage of the Sweet bill, and is designed for the special benefit of service men who failed to reinstate their insurance prior to the new law and who have been discharged more than eighteen months. Men who have been discharged less than eighteen months may still reinstate their lapsed term insurance at any time within eighteen months following the month of discharge by complying with the same conditions.

NAVAL AWARDS INQUIRY

Admiral W. S. Sims, President of the Naval War College at Newport and formerly in command of the American naval forces in European waters, startled the country on Jan. 17 by a series of statements regarding the policy and conduct of the Navy Department during the war. He charged that, on leaving Washington for London just prior to the actual declaration of war, he was told by a person in authority at the Navy Department: "Don't let the British pull the wool over your eyes. It is none of our business pulling the chestnuts out of the fire. We would as soon fight the British as the Germans." Coupled with this assertion was the charge that inefficiency and delay in the Navy Department at Washington actually prolonged the war.

Some of the statements of Admiral Sims were made by him in oral testimony before a sub-committee of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, conducting an inquiry into the awards of medals and other decorations to United States naval officers and enlisted men for their services in the war. Other statements were contained in a long memorandum prepared by Admiral Sims and presented to Secretary Daniels, which Admiral Sims read to the sub-committee. This memorial teemed with criticism of the conduct of the war by the naval administration.

REJOINDER BY MR. DANIELS

The testimony of Admiral Sims drew from Secretary of the Navy Daniels on Jan. 18 the following letter to Senator Page of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs:

I observe that Rear Admiral Sims on Saturday read to a sub-committee of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate a copy of a paper recently sent to the department, which he entitled "Certain Naval Lessons of the Great War." The original of this has been referred to the General Board of the Navy for action.

At the proper time and in the proper way any fair-minded investigator will be convinced that the allegations reflecting upon the vigorous, effective and successful prosecution of the war, so far as the Navy Department and the entire navy are concerned, are based upon opinions which are without justification.

It is not my purpose at this time to comment on the letter as a whole, but one passage is of such a nature, having a bearing as it does upon international relations, that I wish to say that never to Rear Admiral Sims did I say: "Don't let the British pull the wool over your eyes. It is none of our business pulling their chestnuts out of the fire. We would as soon fight the British as the Germans."

In the latter part of March, 1917, after relations had been broken off with Germany and the American Navy had begun to arm merchant ships, Rear Admiral Sims was summoned to Washington. He was informed by me that he had been selected to go to London as special and confidential representative of the Navy Department. He was given explicit verbal instructions to visit the American Ambassador at London, to get in touch with the British Admiralty, to investigate the sinkings by submarines and the situation generally and inform the Navy Department fully. Of course, his mission was confidential, as the United States was then a neutral.

At that time Congress had not declared war. Rear Admiral Sims was cautioned to perform no act and to make no public statement that could commit this country to any course pending declaration of the country's policy by the President and the Congress. In this connection I reminded him of the statement in his Guildhall speech in England, when he was a younger man, for which he was reprimanded by President Taft: "If the time ever comes when the British Empire is seriously menaced by an external enemy, it is my opinion that you can count upon every man, every dollar, every drop of blood of your kindred across the sea." I told him he was selected not because of this speech, but in spite of it, believing he would exercise the discretion and diplomacy which the confidential nature of his mission necessitated and that his wide acquaintance with naval leaders abroad would facilitate his obtaining for the department at first hand the information desired by this Government.

It is, I am sure, superfluous to add that I did not use the words which I have quoted above, relating to other Governments, or any words that could convey like meaning.

ADMIRAL KNIGHT'S VIEWS

Rear Admiral Austin M. Knight, on Jan. 23, before the Senate sub-committee investigating decoration awards, suggested legislation that should differentiate between decorations awarded for "valor" and for "meritorious and distinguished service." Admiral Knight suggested that Congress revise the entire medal legislation and create a decoration to be given only for valor in cases where the act of heroism was not remarkable enough to warrant awarding a Medal of Honor. At present, he said, the navy cross was awarded for heroism when the act was not sufficient to earn a Medal of Honor and for distinguished service when the service was not important enough to warrant a Distinguished Service Medal.

"Thus," he added, "when you see a naval officer wearing a navy cross you do not know whether he got it for valor or distinguished service, and in fact the only medal we have that stands only for valor is the Medal of Honor."

The Admiral suggested as a temporary expedient that the Navy Department authorize the wearing of a clasp marked "for valor" on all navy crosses awarded for heroism.

Chairman Hale of the sub-committee said the Admiral's suggestions would be given careful consideration and would be included in the committee's report with a view to framing legislation along the lines suggested.

Discussing Secretary Daniels's order that the board reconsider all awards and submit a new report, Admiral Knight said: "The board will modify its former report as it deems necessary and make changes if they are found desirable. We hope to render a new report within a few weeks."

Admiral Knight took issue with Secretary Daniels's contention that commanding officers of ships sunk or seriously damaged by the enemy should receive the Distinguished Service Medal whenever their conduct was meritorious. "Officers who lose their ships," the Admiral told the sub-committee, "should never be so rewarded unless they take offensive action against the enemy or succeed in saving their ship through unusual ability." He said that in the case of Commander D. W. Bagley, Secretary Daniels's brother-in-law, no decoration was recommended in connection with the sinking of the destroyer Jacob Jones, because Commander Bagley did not engage the enemy. A navy cross was recommended for the officer, he said, for good seamanship displayed in taking off the crew and passengers of the torpedoed British steamer Orama.

DANIELS ON STAND

On Feb. 3 Secretary Daniels, before the Senate Naval sub-committee, made formal answer to criticism by Rear Admiral Sims and others of the policy followed in awarding war decorations. The Secretary's testimony for the most part was confined to a prepared statement, in which he took up, point by point, statements before the sub-committee by Admiral Sims, and dwelt at considerable length on the two major disagreements voiced by the Admiral, namely, the awarding of decorations to officers who lost their ships through submarine attacks or by mines and the relative importance of shore and sea duty.

On the controverted point of importance of sea service as compared to service ashore Mr. Daniels said he had not and would never "approve a disparity between awards given men who served on shore as compared with the men who went to sea." Admiral Sims, he asserted, probably advocated high awards for many officers who served on staff duty ashore and few awards for officers who went to sea, because "most of Admiral Sims's duty in the navy has been on shore."

Turning to the second fundamental difference between his views and those of Admiral Sims, Secretary Daniels read at length from accounts of naval actions during all the wars the United States had been engaged in to support his contention that the policy of decorating brave officers, even though they lost their ships, was established early in American naval history and always had been followed.

Concluding his testimony with a denial of Admiral Sims's charge that "navy morale has been shot to pieces through the method followed in awarding honors," Secretary Daniels declared that there was nothing the matter with the morale of the navy except a shortage of enlisted men in many ratings and insufficient pay for the officers and men left, making a plea for immediate legislation that would increase navy pay to a status "at least comparable with the pay given men holding positions of similar responsibility in civilian life." The Secretary said that if such action were taken the country would "soon learn that there is nothing the matter with the navy."

NAVAL PEACE STRENGTH

Rear Admiral Taylor, chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repairs, told the House Naval Committee on Jan. 31 that approximately 940 warships would be the peace-time strength of the American Navy after July 1, 1920. This will be three times the number in commission when the United States declared war on Germany, but the comparative tonnage will be only about one and one-half times as great.

A number of improvements based on the lessons learned in the war are to be made on the dreadnoughts and other craft. The first-line ships, Admiral Taylor said, are to be equipped with airplane platforms built over the forward turrets and extending over the bows of the vessels, so that aircraft may rise from all of them when at sea. Small land airplanes will be used, and in returning after a flight they will alight on the water, being kept afloat by collapsible air bags until they can be transferred to the platform. Other changes to be made in the dreadnoughts will include improved fire and searchlight controls, details of which were withheld for military reasons. These alterations, together with the repairs necessary to the 940 vessels, will cost about $27,900,000.

HIGHER NAVY PAY

By a vote of 311 to 10 a bill was passed by the House on Jan. 23 increasing the pay of all enlisted men in the navy by approximately one-third. The increase, retroactive to Jan. 1 last, would continue until July 1, 1921. No increase for officers was allowed by the bill, though this may be provided for later. The measure was intended simply to hurry pay relief for enlisted men, who are leaving the navy at an alarming rate. The increase for men was estimated at $10,000,000. The navy is short forty to forty-five thousand men on its normal strength. A majority of the ships are tied up for lack of personnel, particularly all of the Pacific Fleet being held at Mare Island and Bremerton.

Returning the Railroads

Essential Features of the New Law Under Which the Roads Will Operate—New Labor Demands

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

THE imminent return of the railroads to private ownership and management, the date for which had been fixed by Presidential proclamation as March 1, brought the question prominently before Congress and hastened the preparation of the Railroad bill, which is a combination of the Esch and Cummins measures framed respectively in the House and the Senate. (See February CURRENT HISTORY.) The clause prohibiting strikes of railway employees under legal penalty was eliminated from the bill in deference to the determined opposition of the labor element. A guaranteed return to the stockholders of 5½ per cent. annually was tentatively agreed upon.

Final agreement on reorganization legislation was reached by the House and Senate conferees on Feb. 16. Aside from textual changes, the general features of the compromise bill followed the lines agreed upon, with the exception of the labor provision, which was modified so as to provide for a Federal Appeal Board appointed by the President, to consist of nine members equally divided between the employees, the employers and the public. Submission of all disputes of combined labor and employer boards must be made to the Federal Board before a cessation of work occurs. This new provision was presented by Director General Hines and was accepted by the conference. The labor delegates sought to oppose legislation making the calling of strikes unlawful, and put themselves on record as having never indorsed or approved of either the Esch or the Cummins bill, except that part of the Esch bill known as the Anderson amendment.

Railway employees pressed vigorously their demand for a further increase in pay before the roads were returned to their owners. The railway shopmen and maintenance of way employees were especially insistent, and in furtherance of their demands called a strike for Feb. 17. After prolonged conferences Director General Hines declined to yield and referred the entire matter to President Wilson.

LOSS OF FEDERAL CARRIERS

According to official calculations made public Jan. 31, operation of the railroads, Pullman lines, express companies and waterways, unified under Federal control, had cost the nation approximately $700,000,000. Figures of the Railroad Administration revealed a net loss of $594,200,000 from railroad operation alone in the two-year period. Statistics, gathered from official sources as to operating costs of the Pullman lines and waterways and express companies while operated by the Government, showed the addition of $100,000,000 to the transportation loss.

Heavy losses in November and December were charged to the coal strike in a statement by the Railroad Administration. A deficit of $111,500,000 was shown for those two months after the two months' proportion of the annual rental was paid. December revenues were said to be about $12,700,000 above actual operating expenses, while the revenues for November, according to Interstate Commerce Commission figures, exceeded actual operating expenses by approximately $19,000,000. The monthly share of the annual rental has been computed generally at $75,000,000.

The statement showed that of a loss of $349,200,000 for the twelve months of 1919 $228,700,000 came during the first six months, when there was "a prolonged slump in freight business following the signing of the armistice." It added that "if the rate increase which went into effect in June, 1918, had become effective the previous January, the loss for the two years would probably not have exceeded $104,000,000."

RAILROAD PAYMENTS FIXED

E. Marvin Underwood, general counsel of the Railroad Administration, stated in his annual report to Director General Hines on Jan. 27 that compensation contracts between the Railroad Administration and 232 railroads under Government control had been signed Jan. 1. These involved $717,153,182, or 71 per cent. of the total annual rental of $917,000,000 paid by the Government to the companies.

Claims for special compensation in addition to the standard return had been filed by 124 roads, the agreements being $92,318,789. Thirty-five of these had been allowed in part, the total being $7,493,618, while sixty-seven, totaling $45,686,276, had been denied and eight, totaling $553,754, had been withdrawn, leaving still pending fourteen, totaling $9,224,288.

Mr. Underwood said that negotiations with the railroad corporations as to many additional compensation contracts for the standard return were being actively pushed. He said also that in addition to the standard contracts there had been 133 co-operative contracts executed between the Railroad Administration and smaller railroads, mostly short lines.

Describing the work of the claims and property protection section, Mr. Underwood declared gratifying progress had been made in avoiding loss and damage claims presented. He asserted that for all railroads under Federal control the number of unsettled claims on hand had decreased from 806,707 on April 1, 1919, to 465,722 on Nov. 1, 1919. During the same period 2,439,692 claims were presented and 2,780,677 were disposed of.

5½ PER CENT. DIVIDENDS

Under an agreement reached by the House and Senate conferees on the Railroad bill, Feb. 7, a return of 5½ per cent. would be guaranteed to stockholders by the Government for a period of two years. In announcing the agreement Chairman Cummins of the Senate managers said the rewritten section provided that after the two-year period the percentage of return would be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which would be authorized to fix rates so as to yield that return.

With the agreement on this section the conferees completed their work on the bill, and Senator Cummins said their report would probably be ready for Congress by Feb. 16. Leaders hoped to complete final enactment of the bill before the railroads were returned to private control on March 1.

The aggregate value of the properties used in transportation would be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission according to the bill, the determination being by traffic districts. These districts would be used as groups for rate making and in territories where the roads earned an equivalent of the guaranteed return, no increase in rates would be necessary. Similarly the rates would be raised to make up a deficit in districts where the roads failed to earn the 5½ per cent. Figures on the probable aggregate value of the roads are not available yet. The outstanding capitalization and bonded indebtedness of all the roads amount to approximately $19,000,000,000, on which a 5½ per cent. return would be $1,045,000,000.

The guaranteed return to the roads under Government control has been about $900,000,000 annually, based on the three-year period just prior to the time the Government took charge, individual roads receiving varying returns.

Distribution of earnings in excess of the guaranteed return is also provided in the bill. One-half of 1 per cent. would be available for unproductive improvements. Fifty per cent. of the excess over 6 per cent. would go to the roads earning such excess, while the remaining half would be put into a contingent fund administered by the commission and used to purchase equipment for rental to the weaker roads, which could also obtain loans from the fund.

President Wilson, on Feb. 13, conferred at the White House with a committee representing the railroad workers in their plea for increased wages. A strike of the railway shopmen and maintenance of way employes had been called for Feb. 17. The meeting of the President and the committee, consisting of Timothy Shea, Acting President of the Brotherhood of Firemen and Enginemen; B. M. Jewell, President of the Railway Employes' Department of the American Federation of Labor, and E. J. Manion, President of the Order of Railway Telegraphers, took place under the south portico of the White House, the President being in his wheel chair. They chatted for a few moments and then the committee received a typewritten copy of the President's statement. There followed a discussion of the labor situation for about ten minutes.

The President outlined what he believed to be the proper procedure, and asserted that his decision was unalterable. He said, first, that he should endeavor to obtain justice for the men through an adjustment tribunal which would probably be set up in pending legislation. In the event of Congress failing to provide for a tribunal, the President would name a commission of his own to deal with the specific matter in hand.

Further than this, the President promised to appoint at once a committee of experts to consider facts at hand and make recommendations. This committee was to be named whether Congress established a permanent adjustment tribunal or not.

To this proposition the employes did not give their unqualified approval. They sought to brush aside the possibility of the final decision as to wages and working conditions being made by a permanent tribunal to be created by Congress, and asked that the President name a separate tribunal, representative of the corporations, employes and Government, possibly along the lines of the present coal commission of three, whose decisions should be binding. They said, however, that they would submit the President's proposal to the meeting of committees of their organizations, to be held on Feb. 23.

The committee stated that the reduction in living costs which labor had hoped for had not materialized, and that, so far as they could see, Congress had passed little legislation which would serve to aid in the fight against the high level of prices. They affirmed the opinion that Congress had failed to pursue a course which would in any way militate against what they termed the "capitalistic interests." The committee contended that any lasting change for betterment in the general situation could not be attained under present conditions; that fundamental reforms were necessary and higher wages imperative unless there was definite action to end existing evils.

In the main the President supported the Director General of Railroads, Mr. Hines, in his decision that heavy advances in wages at this time were impracticable; but he promised to try to bring about a betterment of conditions.

Following closely upon this conference with the President, plans for the formulation of a definite program to combat high living costs were revealed by union officials on Feb. 15. It was stated that the feeling was strong among the railroad union members that Government action to reduce high prices had not been effectual, and that though the wage demands of the 2,000,000 railroad workers, at the request of the workers, would be held in abeyance, immediate action would be taken to secure relief before the general conference of union committees to meet in Washington on Feb. 23. It was intimated that the new program would consist of recommendations to Congress, which all organized labor would support, and the hope was expressed that by its adoption the more radical union elements which demanded immediate action with regard to wages, before the President's proposal of a wage commission had materialized, could be more effectually held in control.

The railroad executives were asked by Director General Hines on Feb. 16 to send a committee to Washington for conference concerning President Wilson's proposal to create a joint commission to hear the wage demands of the union railroad workers.

Secretary Lansing's Resignation

Other Cabinet Changes

ROBERT LANSING, Secretary of State, retired from office Feb. 13, 1920, under sensational circumstances. The correspondence preceding his resignation revealed the fact that this latest Cabinet change was tantamount to an abrupt dismissal of his chief Cabinet officer by the President, on the ground that he was seeking to usurp the President's authority during the latter's illness. The first letter to Mr. Lansing, written by the President on Feb. 7, inquired whether it was true that during his illness the Secretary of State "had frequently called the heads of the Executive Departments of the Government into conference," intimating that he regarded such proceeding as a violation of the Constitution. The Secretary replied on Feb. 9 acknowledging that he had requested the Cabinet to meet for informal conference. This step, he said, had been taken after several members of the Cabinet had agreed that conferences were necessary on account of the President's illness; the object had been only to hold informal assemblages to confer on the "difficult and vexatious questions that had arisen," and that required attention; he added that if this action had forfeited the confidence of his chief, his resignation would be placed in the hands of the President.

President Wilson replied on Feb. 11 with a severe letter in which he rebuked the Secretary for "assumption of Presidential authority." He reminded the Secretary that "no action could be taken without me by the Cabinet," and that the Cabinet should have awaited his presence before holding any meetings. He referred to the fact that his judgments at Paris had been adopted by the Secretary with "increasing reluctance," and added: "Since my return to Washington I have been struck by the number of matters in which you have apparently tried to forestall my judgment by formulating action, and merely asking my approval when it was impossible to form an independent judgment." He closed by stating that he would accept the resignation. This, he added, will "afford me an opportunity to select some one whose mind would more willingly go along with mine."

Secretary Lansing on Feb. 12 replied tendering his resignation. In this letter he stated that since January, 1919, he had been conscious that the President was no longer disposed to welcome his advice in matters pertaining to foreign relations. He added that he would have resigned then, but did not desire to take a step that might be misinterpreted abroad and at home; he stated that on his return in July, 1919, he would have resigned, but again deferred action on account of the treaty fight in the Senate, and subsequently withheld it on account of the President's illness; he challenged the imputation that he had attempted to usurp the President's authority in calling the Cabinet together during his illness, and reaffirmed his belief that this step was for the best interests of the Administration. He disagreed with the statement that he had "tried to forestall" the President's judgment, stating that he conceived it to be the function of the Secretary of State to advise with the President and express opinions on any matters. "I have been surprised and disappointed at the frequent disapproval of my suggestion," he said, "but I have never failed to follow your decisions, however difficult it made the conduct of foreign affairs."

The President replied on Feb. 13, accepting the resignation, "to take effect at once."

Under Secretary of State Frank L. Polk assumed the duties of the office temporarily. Under the law the President has thirty days in which to fill the vacancy.

The incident produced universal surprise, followed by almost unanimous condemnation of the President's method of procedure. This feeling was expressed as freely by newspapers and publicists of the President's party as by members of the opposing parties. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, who was going out of office on March 1, stated that the meetings of the Cabinet had been suggested by several Secretaries as necessary. Former Secretary Redfield, who had recently resigned, strongly supported Secretary Lansing in his action, and other members of the Cabinet were understood to feel that the rebuke administered to Secretary Lansing should be equally shared by them, as they were all of one mind over the propriety of his action. The resignation created a similar amount of comment in Europe, nearly all of a like tenor.

The facts came out after the resignation that Secretary Lansing had not been in accord with the President in many of his positions at Paris; that he had favored separating the League of Nations covenant from the treaty; that he had not been consulted by the President at Paris except at intervals, and that he had not been invited to important conferences; also that Colonel House was shown preference in receiving the confidence of the President.

Mr. Lansing was the American member and Chairman of the commission appointed by the Peace Conference to determine what disposition should be made of those accused of violating the laws of war and of committing other crimes. Mr. Lansing was opposed to requiring Germany to assent that the ex-Kaiser should be tried for crimes against the laws of war unless evidence should be obtained that he had committed these crimes personally or had personally given directions for committing them. He maintained that to take any other course would be to establish a new principle of international law.

In this position Mr. Lansing was opposed by a majority of the other members of the commission, who asked the Peace Conference to take a more radical course toward the ex-Kaiser and the German officials.

The Peace Conference followed the lead of the majority of the commission, but gave partial assent to Mr. Lansing's minority views in conceding, as it did in the Peace Treaty, that the provision for bringing the Kaiser and other Germans to trial was a departure from international practice.

The Cabinet sessions called by Secretary Lansing during President Wilson's illness, concerning which the latter protested in forcing the resignation of his Secretary of State, were instituted on Oct. 14, about two weeks after the President was stricken following his return from the Western speaking tour on the Peace Treaty issue.

At the time Secretary Lansing called the first meeting there was genuine alarm about the President's condition, and it was deemed by Mr. Lansing and other Cabinet advisers that, in the interest of the Government, the condition of the President should be known to his department heads. Just at that time there was agitation over the probable necessity of calling upon the Vice President to assume the Presidency. Cabinet members had been besieged upon that point, particularly from members of Congress who were uneasy over the situation.

When Secretary Lansing called the Cabinet to meet on Oct. 14 it was understood to have been with the approval of the President. Certainly it was not done without the knowledge of Mr. Tumulty, Secretary to the President, who was in constant touch with Mr. Lansing and who was regarded at least as being in touch with the President through Dr. Grayson.

Members of the Cabinet supposed that the President was kept fully informed regarding the meetings held, as they were attended not only by Mr. Tumulty on numerous occasions but also by Dr. Grayson. Besides the President's illness, when the first meeting was called the coal strike had been ordered, and it was considered incumbent upon the Government to act in the matter. "During the coal strike crisis the Attorney General attended the Cabinet conferences and then conferred directly with the President; the Attorney General stated that he had outlined to the President what the Cabinet had done, and added that the President approved. During the Mexican crisis Secretary Lansing favored definite action, but the President did not approve, and he declined to receive the Secretary of State at any time during his illness.

OTHER CABINET CHANGES

David F. Houston of Missouri was nominated by President Wilson on Jan. 27 to be Secretary of the Treasury, to succeed Carter Glass of Virginia, appointed Senator from that State. At the same time Edwin T. Meredith of Iowa was nominated to succeed Mr. Houston as Secretary of Agriculture. Still another Cabinet change came on Feb. 7 when the President accepted the resignation of Franklin K. Lane, for nearly seven years Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Houston had been Secretary of Agriculture since the beginning of President Wilson's first term. He was born in North Carolina in 1866, was educated at South Carolina College and at Harvard, taught ancient languages at the former college, was Superintendent of Schools at Spartanburg, S. C., was Professor of Political Science at Harvard, and Dean of the Faculty, became President of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas and President of the University of Texas, and was Chancellor of Washington University at St. Louis when appointed to the Cabinet. He was one of the members of the committee that organized the Federal Reserve Banking system. He was also active in the organization of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau. During the controversy in the Cabinet over the Lusitania case he was credited with standing with Secretary Garrison and Secretary Lane in combating the efforts of William Jennings Bryan to prevent the use of drastic measures against Germany.

Mr. Meredith is the youngest man appointed to the Cabinet by President Wilson. He is 43 years of age. He is the editor of Successful Farming, which he founded in 1902, and lives at Des Moines. He ran for Senator on the Democratic ticket in 1914, but was defeated, and was an unsuccessful candidate for Governor in 1916. During the war he was a member of the Treasury Board of Advisors. He telegraphed his acceptance of the President's appointment from Miami, Fla., on Jan. 26, and at once started for Washington. He is considered a specialist in agriculture; Mr. Houston, on the other hand, has won for himself celebrity in the field of economics.

Mr. Lane's letter of resignation stated that, having served the public for twenty-one years, he now felt an imperative call to other duties. His expressions of warm friendship for the President called forth the following reply on Feb. 7:

My dear Mr. Secretary: I need not tell you with what regret I accept your resignation as Secretary of the Interior, for our association has been very delightful. I have admired the spirit in which you devoted yourself to the duties of your department, as I am sure that all attentive observers have, but the reasons you give for your retirement leave me no choice but to acquiesce, and I, of course, accept your suggestion that the resignation take effect on the 1st of March, since that will serve your convenience.

May I not add how sincerely I hope that your future career will be as full of honorable success as your past? My best wishes will follow you throughout all the years that apparently must now separate us, and I beg to subscribe myself,

Cordially and sincerely your friend,

WOODROW WILSON.

Nine resignations from the Cabinet have taken place during the Administrations of President Wilson. They are as follows:

Attorney General McReynolds—Appointed to the Supreme Court.

Secretary of War Garrison—Disagreement with the President.

Secretary of State Bryan—Disagreement with the President.

Secretary of Treasury McAdoo—To increase his income.

Attorney General Gregory—To increase his income.

Secretary of Treasury Glass—Appointed Senator.

Secretary of Interior Lane—To accept a business call.

Secretary of Commerce Redfield—To accept a business call.

Secretary of State Lansing—Disagreement with the President.

President Wilson, however, does not set the record for Cabinet changes. The following number took place in other Administrations: Grant 18, Roosevelt 18, Jackson 14, Madison 12, Washington 10.

CURRENT HISTORY IN BRIEF

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 18, 1920]

WHY WORKERS ARE RESTLESS

DETERMINED to learn at first hand the causes of the present industrial unrest in the United States, Whiting Williams, Director of Personnel of the Hydraulic Pressed Steel Company of Cleveland, Ohio, left his desk and for seven months worked as a laborer in the steel mills, coal mines, and on ore dumps. On Jan. 23 Mr. Williams, in a public address, defined three primary causes of the discontent, saying:

Three things on the worker's mind are: the pre-eminent importance of holding a job; the terrible danger of being forced into joblessness; the unholy alliance between tiredness and temper, between fatigue of body and mind, which gives opportunity for agitators to work upon the feelings and sensibilities of the worker, and the almost complete ignorance of the average worker as to the plans, purposes, ideals, and character of his employer.

The worker is told little or nothing of these things. As a result, he uses his head and makes deductions. He sees prodigal waste of materials about the shop, perhaps, and decides: "This company cares for nothing but big money. What do my small wages matter?" And he proceeds to "soldier" on the job. The longer I worked in the mills the less I did, because of the "underground" instructions, a tap on the shoulder with such behests as, "Lots of time," "Take it easy," "Don't kill yourself," "Twelve hours," &c. The ignorance of the worker regarding the company's principles and purposes, the result of lack of interest by the company in its workers, causes lack of interest on the part of the workers, which costs the company money in inefficient work.

It is a mistake to conclude that all workers are radicals. The latter are a small minority, but they have a lead on the employer group, chiefly because they have been industriously engaged in putting salt on the raw spots among the workers, thus taking advantage of idleness, fatigue, and soreness.

CAUSE OF THE PRESIDENT'S ILLNESS

DR. HUGH H. YOUNG of Johns Hopkins Hospital at Baltimore, one of the physicians in attendance on President Wilson, on Feb. 10 gave the first explanation of the President's illness. He declared that in October last the President's case was diagnosed as cerebral thrombosis (clot in a blood vessel), which caused a slight paralysis of the left arm and leg, "but that at no time was his brain power or the extreme vigor and lucidity of his mental processes in the slightest degree abated." He added that the clot was being absorbed and that the President was obtaining the full use of the parts affected. On Feb. 18 it was announced by the physicians in charge that the President had practically recovered and would be able to assume his full duties without any danger of a recurrence of the attack.

TRIALS OF WAR CRIMINALS IN FRANCE

IN the last week of 1919 a sentence of ten years' imprisonment, fifteen years' exclusion from residence in France, and a fine of $2,000,000 was passed by a court-martial sitting at Amiens on a German officer named Robert Roechling. An officer during the war, Roechling was manager of the great works at Karlshuette, in Germany, and, with his brother Hermann, was one of the great German steel magnates. Hermann Roechling, who did not appear before the court, was sentenced to the same punishment. Together the two brothers during the war carried out the systematic destruction of the great ironworks of Briey, Rehon, La Chiers, Micheville, and Longwy, in the East of France, in order to do away with their competition. Of the material which was destroyed, 8,000,000 tons was removed in the course of two years to Karlshuette, where, however, it was subsequently blown up by Roechling's orders just before the arrival of the French in December, 1918.

Of six French officers tried by court-martial at Mayence for having diverted into Germany material intended for the invaded provinces, five were condemned to prison for periods ranging from five months to two years. The sixth was acquitted. The Germans implicated were sentenced to similar terms of imprisonment, with a fine in addition.

Georges Gaston Quien, who was sentenced by a French court last September to die for the betrayal of Edith Cavell to the Germans, and whose case had been appealed, was sentenced on Jan. 30 to twenty years' imprisonment for communicating with the enemy. The charge of betrayal of Miss Cavell was abandoned at the second trial. Lieutenant Funck, an Austrian, who was employed during the war in a Paris bank, but who acted as a spy and reported to the Germans points at which shells of the enemy's long-range guns fell, was executed on Feb. 2. Another spy, Louis Guaspere, made revelations to the authorities just before the time set for his execution, and received a provisional reprieve.

THE WAR ON OPIUM

IN a letter published in The London Times on Jan. 3, Mrs. Washburn Wright, leader of the crusade against opium and kindred drugs so successfully conducted by her late husband, Dr. Hamilton Wright, calls attention to the urgent necessity of carrying into effect the provisions of the Opium Convention of 1912 and the special protocol drawn up at the third International Opium Conference held at The Hague in June, 1914. There is an article in the Peace Treaty with Germany which makes provision for dealing with the opium problem, and all the signatories have agreed to bring the 1912 convention into force and to pass the necessary legislation "without delay," and in any case within a year of the treaty's ratification, supervision of these international agreements to be placed in the hands of the League of Nations. Mrs. Wright points out, however, that if legislation is to be passed within the period prescribed, it must be begun at once. The United States has already set the example by passing a law in pursuance of the 1912 convention, but this action, says Mrs. Wright, is of very limited value until the rest of the powers pass similar legislation.

The present position, according to Mrs.

Wright, is that immense and increasing quantities of noxious drugs are being smuggled into China, more particularly morphine and heroin. Some of this traffic, she declares, originates in England and some in the United States. Japan is charged with dealing extensively in illicit drugs, and with deriving a large profit from this traffic. The Japanese Government has denied any official responsibility, but Japan herself, it is alleged, is the chief distributing centre for the drugs smuggled into Chinese ports. The Koreans have charged Japan with deliberately distributing drugs in Korea for the purpose of degrading the population and thus weakening their resistance to Japanese penetration.

Mrs. Wright's praise of the Chinese Government for prohibiting opium and burning all existing supplies is seriously qualified by an editorial writer of The London Times, who says:

The Chinese authorities have had dramatic bonfires of opium and opium utensils in order to impress the Western nations, but have winked at the renewal of poppy cultivation on an extensive scale in their own provinces. It is now clear that opium is being widely manufactured and consumed in many provinces. Many provincial Governors are now a law unto themselves. The Governors need money, and are not too nice about how it is obtained. The consequence is that the consumption of home-grown opium has increased enormously in all parts of China, in addition to the traffic in imported drugs. The British and American Governments presented at Peking in April last a remonstrance regarding the renewal of opium cultivation. The Chinese Government replied at the end of October with a categorical denial which is in conflict with the independent evidence now available. Be that as it may, the clear duty of other powers is to do their utmost to prevent the exportation of noxious drugs to China, and we trust that in all countries the requisite legislation will be passed "without delay," as the Peace Treaty prescribes.

FIRST JAPANESE AVIATRIX

MUCH attention and interest has been excited in Japan, says the Japanese Chronicle, by the appearance of the first feminine Japanese aviator, Miss Seiko Hyoto, aged 20 years, who has just entered the Ito Aviation School with the object of pioneering in this new field for the sake of Japanese women. The intention of Miss Hyoto to become an aviatrix was formed ten years ago, when she found an airplane design among her father's papers. Despite the opposition of her family, she went to Tokio to study flying, but money difficulties compelled her return. She subscribed, however, for the transcripts of lectures published by the Japan Aviation School, and studied aviation with all her energies. She finally went to Osaka and tried her fortune again. Moved by her unshakable resolution, her family sent her money and she entered the school in December. The Japanese press has given her much attention.

BOLSHEVISM THROUGH DOSTOIEVSKY

IN the December issue of the Mercure de France is a remarkable article by M. J. Kessel, in which, after studying the chief characteristics of the abnormal heroes of Dostoevsky, the author seeks to establish a psychological and racial bond between this company of half insane epileptics and amoral megalomaniacs and—the Bolsheviks! Se non è vero, the anti-Bolsheviks might say, è ben trovato. To the student of Russian psychology the comparison and equation is far more illuminating than it could be to the casual reader. In opening his study M. Kessel says:

Bolshevism, a barbarous word, literal transcription itself of a Russian barbarism, has been passionately discussed. * * * In Russia it has taken on a special, morbid character. It has suddenly revealed cruelties, aberrations of which the great Russian people, traditionally known for its mildness, seemed incapable. It has instilled terror with its mad and bloody rush of dense human masses behind hollowly flapping flags, with its organized destruction. It has surprised the world above all by its chaotic longevity and by the small resistance that it encountered from the beginning.

This character of collective malady must be clarified by the study of the Russian nature, its deep instincts and its habits of thought. Acid which, thrown on lime, produces an immediate reaction, would have no effect on granite. The acid we know; it is the Bolshevik system, as expounded by its theorists. The foundation on which it acts has hitherto remained practically unknown. In the given case, it is clear that for frenzied illusions to have had the power of the Biblical burning bush and within a few weeks to have shaken a whole people and a whole faith, they must have found an appropriate mentality, something troubled, passionate, bruised, ready to accept everything and pay it back tenfold, that is, the Russian psychosis, as it developed throughout the nineteenth century.

The psychosis of Dostoevsky. Now that Russian Bolshevism makes us think of a dance of madmen, now that all Russia is a free field for adventures and folk obsessed, Dostoevsky the epileptic, the Sadist, the lover of criminals and neurotics, is perhaps more realistic, and certainly more real than the great Tolstoy, the serene psychologist of "Anna Karénina" and "War and Peace."

M. Kessel then takes up, one by one, the best-known characters of Dostoevsky—Baskolnikov, Ivan Karamazov, and his brother Mitka, Svidrigailov, Peter Verkhovensky, and others less well-known, and from all he deduces the psychological elements seen today in the half insane logic of the Bolshevik leaders, and in the frenzied red furies of the Bolshevik multitude, evacuated of the idea of the Russian God, and given free rein to the maddest and cruelest instincts of the Slavic character. Of this insane multitude Dostoevsky said almost prophetically:

Where will it stop, this mad, inexorable gallop? Until now other nations have stepped aside from its path, either in terror or disgust. But the day will come when they will cease to stand aside, and they will build a strong barrier before the mad course of our unchained fury to save themselves, their culture and their civilization.

WAR ZONE PILGRIMAGES

FRANCE is already preparing to receive the enormous throngs of tourists whose influx she expects in 1921, and who will visit her historic battlefields and demolished towns. M. Clavelle, Minister of Public Works, on Dec. 31 introduced in the French Chamber a bill to authorize the Office National de Tourisme to borrow 30,000,000 francs (about $6,000,000 at the pre-war rate of exchange) for the purpose of organizing the broad stretch of country over which the conflict raged, including the erection of camps, hotels and restaurants, and the creation of motor-car services throughout the battle zone. The National Touring Office will farm out to companies or private individuals these camps, hotels, &c., and will be authorized to pay out of its receipts its working expenses and annuities on loans. Out of the residue, 25 per cent. will be allotted to the devastated communes. Hotel and transport tariffs will be fixed by agreement with the Minister of Public Works.

Another scheme—of American origin—is the erection of a chain of hotels in the American-British battle zones, each hotel to have at least two-thirds of its available rooms set aside for American and British tourists. The undertaking has been financed at $10,000,000 by wealthy business men from the United States. The two largest hotels of this chain will be near Château-Thierry and Ypres. Guides to the battlefields will be supplied.

The women relatives of American soldiers who died in France are to be specially provided for under the direction of the Y. W. C. A. of Paris. Rooms have already been engaged by this organization at the Hotel Petrograd in the French capital, and plans have been made for providing the mothers and sisters, who come to visit the graves of their dead, with comfortable quarters, helping them with baggage and passports, and facilitating the finding of the graves they seek. Arrangements have also been made to have these relatives shown special attention when visiting cemeteries. At some of the larger burying places, where hotel accommodations are still lacking, rest houses have been erected. At Romagne, barracks were given by the American Army and furnished by the Y. W. C. A.

THE FRENCH BIRTH RATE

THE problem of the ever-diminishing birth rate of France has become more acute with the great losses due to the war. The question has seemed so vital to the Government that steps have been taken to study the situation and to find a remedy, or remedies, to overcome the danger to the country's future existence. President Poincaré on Jan. 27 issued a decree creating a natality division of the Ministry of Health, this bureau being empowered to deal solely with France's need for more children. M. Brenton, Chief of the Ministry of Health, on the same day presented a report, which read in part as follows:

The lowness of the French birth rate, which becomes worse each year, endangers the existence of the nation. For a long time before the war France lacked men. French soil is one of the most fertile in the world, but is one of the least productive because of lack of labor. Because of the lack of men industry in France is obliged to depend more on immigration than any other European country. The war in depriving France of 2,000,000 young men has increased still more the danger which threatens the nation.

We have often studied this situation, which is unique with France; we have recognized that it is not due to one cause, but to a multiplicity of causes. Therefore, to combat it we must not resort to one remedy, but to many remedies, some of a moral nature, others of a national and economic nature.

We must not intrust this grave question, the gravest of all that confront us, to a temporary commission, irregularly convoked, but to a permanent organization meeting at fixed periods and equipped with sufficient means of inquiry and publicity.

The decree issued by the French President provides that this council shall consist of thirty members, and shall meet monthly. One of its duties will be "to examine all measures which may combat depopulation, increase the birth rate, develop puericulture, and protect and honor large families."

FIRST JEWISH SHIP

THE first Jewish ship in the Mediterranean, owned by Jews, manned by Jews, and flying the Jewish flag, was launched at Jaffa late in January. As the blue-white flag of Zion flew up the mast, two Italian warships in the harbor gave official recognition to the Jewish colors by saluting them. The vessel, a former German craft, was purchased to ply along the Palestine coast, making the ports of Beirut, Tyre, Haifa, Jaffa, Gaza, and several ports in Egypt. It was renamed Hecholutz, the Pioneer. Permission had been gained from the British Government to fly the Jewish colors. The wife of the English commandant at Jaffa raised the flag and launched the boat, expressing the hope that next year the Jewish Zionists might possess a large merchant marine on the Mediterranean. The establishment of such a fleet was being worked out in conjunction with harbor improvements at Haifa by Zionist engineers, who planned, through the $10,000,000 now being raised by the Palestine Restoration Fund campaign, to convert Haifa into the leading harbor and most important city of the entire Near East, whose commercial and maritime prosperity will be carried on through Jewish merchantmen.

STATE SOCIALISM IN QUEENSLAND

THE extensive experiment in State Socialism undertaken by Queensland, one of the largest of the Australian States, has proved, according to a writer in The New York World, to be a complete failure. The State established its own butcheries, liquor saloons and fisheries, operated the railroads, coal and carbide mines, but met in every direction with financial loss. Taxation, which had been $5.79 per capita, jumped the first year (1916) to $8.68, in 1917 to $9.46, in 1918 to $10.54, and in 1919 to $16.20. Meanwhile Queensland has had a greater percentage of strikes than any other Australian State, many of them in the State's own enterprises. Official figures, according to this writer, show that the cost of living in Queensland is higher than in any other State of the Australian Union.

NEW ZEALAND NON-PROHIBITION

THE results of the New Zealand referendum poll on prohibition, taken collaterally with the Parliamentary elections in December, were stated officially on Jan. 9 to be as follows:

For continuance of present liquor laws..	240,998
For State purchase and control.....	32,148
For prohibition	270,178

The votes cast for prohibition were thus 2,968 short of the absolute majority required to carry any of the three points at issue. The present licensing system was therefore continued. The prohibitionists announced that they would continue the fight, and if necessary would ask the new Parliament to amend the electoral law in such wise that a definite majority verdict one way or another could be obtained.

TRAINING DISABLED MEN

IT was stated in the British Parliament on Dec. 23, 1919, that in England, Wales and Scotland there were 20,000 disabled soldiers and sailors on the waiting list for industrial training. About 13,000 were being trained in private workshops and factories; 20,000 had already been trained, and a large additional number of applications were expected and provided for. The spirit of employers was generally good, and a royal proclamation had been of material assistance in helping to find permanent places for the soldiers trained.

LARGEST NAVAL SHIP

CROWDS of spectators lined the bank of the Clyde River at many points on Jan. 10 to witness the launching of the new British battle cruiser Hood, the largest naval vessel of the world. The new dreadnought is 860 feet long, with a displacement of 41,200 tons, and a designed speed of 31 knots. Its main armament consists of eight 15-inch guns. The Hood, according to an Admiralty statement, cost £6,500,000; three others of the same type, which had been partly constructed, were scrapped after the signing of the armistice.

NEW AMBASSADOR TO ROME

ROBERT UNDERWOOD JOHNSON of New York, editor of the Century Magazine from 1909 to 1913, an author and poet, originator of the memorial to Keats and Shelley in Rome, was appointed on Feb. 11 as Ambassador to Rome to succeed Thomas Nelson Page of Virginia, who resigned several months ago.

GALLIPOLI GRAVES DAMAGED

CERTAIN British cemeteries in Gallipoli, where so many British soldiers were sacrificed in vain, have been seriously damaged by vandals, and the British High Commissioner at Constantinople has called the attention of the Ottoman Minister of War to this desecration. The commissioner stated that he had caused disciplinary action to be taken in cases in which Turkish soldiers were the offenders. To prevent further acts of desecration, and to facilitate the work of the Graves Registration Units, the Commander in Chief of the Army of the Black Sea had begun the sending of Serbian guards into the area to protect the graves.

Ireland in Revolt

A Tense Situation

THE serious situation in Ireland was frankly acknowledged, both by the King and by the Premier, in their respective addresses at the opening of Parliament, on Feb. 10, 1920. All the developments during late January and February indicated that the home-rule proposal outlined by Lloyd George, which was printed in full in the February CURRENT HISTORY, was unsatisfactory to all groups of the Irish people, and would require complete revision. The Premier announced that the bill was undergoing changes, and would be introduced during the week of Feb. 16-23.

Declarations made by spokesmen for an English labor delegation, on completion of a ten-day tour of Ireland, were to the effect that the desire for an independent republic was widespread, and frankly expressed, but the Labor Party, while believing that the fullest measure of home rule should be granted, going much further than the proposals in the pending Government bill, indicated that it would oppose complete separation from the empire; it asserted that it would favor a measure according home rule in all domestic and excise questions, but held that foreign relations should be kept under control of the British Government.

Eamonn de Valera, who was elected by the Sinn Fein organizations as the "President of the Irish Republic," made a public statement at New York on Feb. 7 which was regarded as opening the way for an adjustment of the question. He declared that England might grant Ireland her independence, and, under a policy similar to that of the American Government regarding the independence of Cuba, make it impossible for any nation to obtain a military foothold on the politically independent island.

All the traditional enmity, the statement said, would be wiped out by the granting of independence to Ireland, because there would be no longer cause for Irishmen to hate England. It added that "an independent Ireland would see its own independence in jeopardy the moment it saw the independence of Britain seriously threatened," and that "mutual self-interest would make the peoples of these two islands, if both independent, the closest possible allies in a moment of real national danger to either."

The statement charged that England's real motive in preserving the present relation with Ireland is not the preservation of the security of England, but "the perpetuation of her present commercial monopoly" and the "perpetuation of her domination of the seas by control of the great Irish harbors."

This declaration was not indorsed by the extreme wing of the Clan-na-Gael in the United States, and was mildly criticised by the editor of The Gaelic American, the spokesman for the extremists, who affirmed that anything short of complete independence would be unacceptable to the Irish people and would alienate American support.

The situation in Ireland was extremely tense during February, the entire country being practically in a state of sullen insurrection and virtually under martial law. The result of the Sinn Fein victories at the local elections was manifested when the local boards met to organize on Jan. 30. At Dublin, in order to express open defiance of British control, the flag of the Irish Republic was unfurled from the tower of the Municipal Buildings, next door to Dublin Castle, the seat of British authority, and it fluttered the entire day in full view.

Without a single dissentient vote Alderman Tom Kelly was elected Lord Mayor. Kelly had been for nearly two months in Wormwood Scrubs Prison. He was secretly arrested at night and taken to England on a ship of war. By 58 votes to 14 the Corporation refused to send any names forward to the Lord Lieutenant for the office of High Sheriff. Sinn Fein Chairmen were elected at Cork, Waterford, Tipperary, Sligo, Drogheda and Limerick. In Derry a Roman Catholic Mayor was elected for the first time in 300 years. When Alderman O'Doherty took his seat, Nationalists sang "God Save Ireland," and American and green flags were waved. Mayor O'Doherty in his address declared that flags, if they were of an insulting character, would not be permitted to fly from the Derry Guildhall in future. He added that a long and painful chapter in the history of the country had been closed.

In Cork Alderman Thomas McCurtain, who was Captain of the local Sinn Fein Volunteers, was appointed Lord Mayor. The Sinn Fein "Soldiers' Song" was sung in the Council Chamber and a resolution was carried declaring the Corporation's allegiance to Dail Eirann. The Council declined to appoint a Sheriff, as that would necessitate an oath swearing allegiance to the King. Limerick also declined to nominate a Sheriff, and when the Sinn Fein Mayor took his seat the "Soldiers' Song" was sung. At Drogheda the new Mayor himself refused to take the oath.

The British Government was quick to act. At 4 o'clock in the morning of Jan. 31 troops were turned out and raided and arrested every Sinn Fein official in Dublin, Limerick, Thurles and elsewhere who had committed any act or uttered words of sedition and rebellion. The prisoners were gathered in Dublin for transportation to England on British warships. The arrest of all the leaders throughout the country forestalled a crisis that seemed impending from the action of the local boards, and prevented any organized open outbreak prior to the disposition of the new home-rule proposal. Meanwhile the whole island was seething with excitement, and there were numerous clashes between the people and the police, with a number of fatalities, but up to Feb. 18 the firm execution of martial law supported by the presence of an immense body of troops prevented any general uprising.

Norway Acquires Spitzbergen

Most Northerly Coal Field in the World Awarded to Norwegian Government by Supreme Council

THE Spitzbergen Archipelago, 400 miles north of Hammerfest, in the Arctic Ocean, was placed under the sovereignty of Norway by the Peace Conference on Feb. 9, 1920, when an international treaty to that effect was signed in the Clock Hall of the Foreign Ministry at Paris. Hugh C. Wallace, the American Ambassador to France, signed for the United States; H. A. Bernhoft, Danish Minister to France, for Denmark; Alexandre Millerand, the French Premier, for France; Carlo Ferraris, Italian representative in the League of Nations, for Italy; Baron Matsui, Japanese Ambassador to France, for Japan; Baron Wedel Jarisberg, Norwegian Minister to France, for Norway; Jonkheer J. Loudon for the Netherlands and Count Ehrensvaard, Swedish Minister to France, for Sweden. The Earl of Derby, British Ambassador to France, temporarily absent, affixed his signature the next day.

Spitzbergen for hundreds of years has been a country without political organization or connection with any of the world's nations. For a century it had been a favorite landing station for arctic expeditions and whaling fleets. A land of vast glaciers, snow-clad mountains, and rich coal fields, it was a camping place for half a dozen enterprising nationalities that went there to conduct mining operations on their local claims, or to hunt the fur-bearing animals that abounded on the islands, or to carry on manufacturing enterprises. The Germans held a coal district and maintained a scientific station at Ebeltoftshafen; the English had several sections in the coal fields and elsewhere, and Norway, Sweden, and Russia all had coal claims on the west coast, which they were working. Each community was a law unto itself, but for several years there had been urgent attempts to arrange a definite political status for the islands; in fact, a treaty on the subject was in process of negotiation when the great war broke out in 1914. Now at last the Peace Conference has completed the work, apparently to the satisfaction of everybody.

The Norwegians claimed the administrative control of the archipelago by right of discovery, and by right of occupation and development of its coal resources. They allege that Norsemen discovered the archipelago; that it was mentioned in the sagas as early as 1194 under the name of Svalbard, and that Norwegian whalers have kept up the connection ever since then. The Dutch sailors, Jakob van Heemskerck, Jan Corneliszoon Rip and William Barents, were supposed to have discovered the islands in 1596, taking them to be part of Greenland, and naming them New Land. For two centuries the Dutch used the islands as hunting grounds for seal and walrus, changing the name to Spitsbergen, from its sharp-pointed mountains. This name has since been accommodated to German spelling. There is a strong sentiment for reviving the old Norse name Svalbard (cold mountain) for the archipelago. In 1630 England formally annexed the islands, all except a small portion permanently occupied by the Dutch, but she urged no claims on them in 1914, when the international conference met in Christiania to settle the status of Spitzbergen.

The most productive of the coal mines are at Advent Bay, about the middle of the west coast, where there is also a wireless station. These mines were prospected by Norwegians, developed by the American Longyear Company, and afterward sold to Norwegians. Norwegian coal holdings thus came to exceed all others, though next in importance comes those of the Swedes, who are carrying on considerable coal-mining operations a little further south. There are said to be deposits of iron ore in the islands. Five hundred workmen passed the Winter of 1918-19 in Spitzbergen, all Norwegians, except sixty Swedes. Since 1908 the Norwegian Government has subsidized voyages of exploration there, with the results of full and valuable maps, including the only ones that have ever been made of the interior, and extensive literature on the geography, history and mineralogy of Spitzbergen. The Norwegians also maintain the wireless telegraph station and a postal service, the only connection with the outside world. The area is about 28,000 square miles. The Norwegian Government will levy taxes, but only to devote the proceeds to the needs of the islands, which must not be used for military purposes.

Under the Norwegian sovereignty established by the treaty all private interests already existing in Spitzbergen will remain intact, and provision is made for the free entry of any foreign enterprises that desire to take part in developing the resources of the islands. The German mines were taken over by the English during the war, and the German scientific station was destroyed, but it is hoped that the latter will in time be re-established.

Slesvig and the First Plebiscite

Victory for Denmark

ONE of the first of the plebiscites, or popular votes, provided for under the German Peace Treaty was that of the northern zone of Slesvig, the province which Germany had wrested from Denmark in 1864 and annexed as part of Schleswig-Holstein. The vote was held on Feb. 10 and proved to be an overwhelming victory for the Danes. Official returns, published two days later by the International Commission, showed 75,023 votes for the return of the zone to Denmark, as against 25,087 for its retention by Germany. As some 10 per cent. of the voting Germans at once returned to their homes in Germany, whence they had come at the urging of the Berlin Government, the International Commission stated on Feb. 12 that the Danes were about 85 per cent. of the population.

The result was greeted by the Germans with charges of unfairness and with some violence. A German climbed to the roof of the hotel in Flensburg where the Interallied Commission was staying, tore down the English and French flags, pulling the French one to pieces, and hoisting German flags instead. Denmark, on the other hand, rejoiced over the result of the plebiscite. In the Council of State at Copenhagen on Feb. 11 King Christian recalled with emotion how his grandfather fifty-six years ago had voiced the sorrow of the Danes over the dismemberment of their country. He added:

It is my happy, if undeserved, fortune to see this glorious day. Humbly thanking God and in fond remembrance of those, dead and living, who fought to preserve Danish Slesvig, I send the first greeting of welcome to my returning compatriots, whose love of their mother country has only been strengthened by their long and trying period of alienation from her.

BEFORE THE PLEBISCITE

King Christian X. of Denmark had cabled to President Wilson on Jan. 12, 1920, the deep gratitude of the Danish nation for the part played by the United States in bringing about the Treaty of Versailles, containing the provision that Danish Slesvig should have "an opportunity to be united to its Fatherland." The Allied Plebiscite Commission, which had been sitting in Copenhagen since August, 1919, entered Flensburg on Jan. 26 to oversee the voting which constituted this "opportunity." Allied troops were present to enforce fair play. The commission received an enthusiastic welcome from the Danish portion of the population, as did the allied troops of occupation at Handerslev and other cities. At Flensburg the reception was marred by German assaults on persons displaying Danish flags. Stones were thrown and some Danes injured. Many arrests were made, and the German police was replaced by Danish and allied policemen.

The commission issued orders prohibiting public officials and preachers from electioneering, and forbidding aliens to participate in such activities on pain of deportation. This was to prevent the influx of professional agitators from Germany and Denmark. The British troops occupying Flensburg found it necessary to deport the Mayor of that city for his activity in behalf of German interests. The Dannebrog was hoisted all over the province. Feeling ran high, both factions waging a vigorous contest, with the use of every political trick to gain the desired end. Attempts of the rival factions in the country districts to capture each other's meetings resulted in some broken heads, but the Allies kept the situation so well in hand that serious violence was prevented.

Ten days after the signing of the peace protocol German troops had to leave the province. German officials rapidly abandoned the northern zone, where the first vote was to be taken, and where there was no possible doubt that the Danes would win. Still there the Germans strove to secure as large a minority as possible in the hope that every vote would help to save Flensburg, which is in the southern zone, where the second vote was to take place five weeks after the first. The northern zone was to vote as a unit and the southern zone by communes. If the northern zone voted a return to Denmark—a foregone conclusion—the southern zone was to vote five weeks later. The first zone was to vote three weeks after the ten days' notice given the German authorities to leave both zones after the signing of the peace protocol, the day finally set being Tuesday, Feb. 10, 1920.

CONTEST OVER FLENSBURG

When the plebiscite was first ordered the Danes protested against extending the boundary line too far southward. Denmark did not wish a return of that part of the territory taken away in 1864 which is racially German. Some objection was made even against the return of Flensburg, which, however, became the storm centre of the campaign. Fifty-five years of Prussianizing had removed all evidence of Danish life, but the Danes of the district assert that it is essentially Danish, though the German language was forced upon the population. Moreover, the Danes became more and more swayed by the economic importance of Flensburg, which is the chief city and seaport of the province. Economic elements in the situation made it difficult if not impossible to settle the Slesvig question along national lines. It became evident that many Germans preferred going under the rule of Denmark to remaining subject to Germany; they also wished to escape the war-indemnity taxation of Germany. German shipping companies of Flensburg had given up their ships to the Allies, and hoped by becoming Danish to recover them.

Then there is the superior value of the Danish krone over the depreciating German mark. The Danish Government has promised to do all that is possible to protect returning Danes from losses, but this question of valuation has not been settled. Premier Zahle, whose Ministry guided Denmark through the dangers threatened by the world war, explained before his resignation (March 1, 1919) that to redeem the mark at par was an impossibility. Trade and industry are almost paralyzed by the unsettled conditions, and food and fuel are scarce, in spite of the efforts of the Danish Government to relieve the distress in the province.

The commission agreed to fix the boundary line according to "geographical and economic considerations." The flexibility of this phrase gave rise to the hope on the part of the Slesvig Danes that Flensburg would be awarded to Denmark whether the Germans got a majority of the votes or not. Though the Danish Government specified that Flensburg was not to be returned unless the inhabitants clearly indicated a desire for it, there was agitation throughout Denmark and Slesvig to redeem it from Germany. It was argued that Flensburg, though forcibly Germanized, is an old Danish town, a stronghold of Danism, and belongs economically with the agricultural hinterland of North Slesvig. The feeling increased that the boundary should be fixed at the Eider River. This stream was the southern boundary of Denmark fixed by King Canute the Great in an agreement with Kaiser Konrad II. of Germany in 1027, and there it remained until 1864, when Germany seized Slesvig.

HISTORIC DANISH WALL

In the campaign in South Slesvig much use has been made of the sentiment and historical associations that centre about the Dannevirke (Danes' work). This great wall was built in prehistoric times by the Danes as a defense against the Holsteiners and other Germans, who are referred to in the sagas as Huns. Extending from the forks of the Trae River to the Slie Fjord, about eight miles long, the wall is still a striking feature of the landscape, and has always been the symbol of Danish national entity. Around it centre the sacred memories of over a thousand years, with all the imponderable values of national sentiment, love, and pride in heroic ancestry and epic deeds.

Attacks on this wall by the "Huns" drove the neighboring tribes to gather around King Dan, who founded the kingdom which was called after him Danmark (Dan's field or land). Toward the end of the ninth century Queen Thyra caused the construction on the same site of a new wall thirty to forty-eight feet high and thirty feet thick at the top, built of earth, stones and timbers. The steep southern side was protected by palisades, and for every hundred feet there was a bastion tower. Below the palisades was a moat nine fathoms deep and ten wide. In its whole length there was only one place where the moat could be passed and only one passage through the mound. This was called Karlegat or Viglidsdör ("Carls' Gate" or "Warriors' Door"). The wall has since been reinforced and extended by various Danish monarchs.

The land bounded on the north by the Dannevirke, with the Trae River and its marshes at its western end and the Slie Fjord at its eastern end, and on the south by the Eider River was in olden days a dense forest called Mörkved (Mirkwood) or Jernved (Ironwood). But the Eider River was then, as now, the border line between the old Danish province, South Jutland, and the German province Holstein. Even to this day the Germans call part of this territory Dänischwald, the Danish Forest.

The name Slesvig was given to the province from the city of the same name on a vig (small bay) of the Slie Fjord, and means the Slie's Vig (Cf. Old Norse vik—English wick). The German form Schleswig has no meaning. As Slesvig has always been ethnically Danish and Holstein ethnically German, there is no such country as Slesvig-Holstein. Hence the bitter hatred, on the part of the Danish Slesvigers, of the artificial union of the two provinces.

Rumania and "Greater Rumania"

Survey of Regions Claimed by the Bucharest Government— How Much the Peace Conference Has Granted

BY the Rumanian elections of November, 1919, the old Kingdom of Rumania brought under one Liberal (de facto) Government Ministerial and Parliamentary representation both its antebellum territory and the territory of the "Reunion." On Nov. 21 the Grand Parliament of "Greater Rumania" was convoked to sanction the reunion of Bessarabia, Bukowina, Transylvania, the Banat of Temesvár, Oltenia, Maramuresh, Ardjal, Crish and Dobrudja, all countries which the Rumanians of the old kingdom overran after the armistice and wrested from Russia, Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria. In all these regions, except Dobrudja, Rumania had pluralities of irredentist Rumanian population, which, on the coming of the troops from the mother country, revolted against their several masters and threw in their lot with the old kingdom. Thus Rumania seemed to realize her wildest dreams of national unification, which raised her, in population, area, and natural resources, to the rank of a great power.

Of course there was national jubilation on the part of those of Rumanian race, but by this action Rumania came into disagreement with the allied and associated powers, with whom, however, the Rumanians continued in alliance with the conciliatory attitude which they still maintain. The Supreme Council ordered the Rumanians out of Hungary when they were in Budapest levying indemnities for the damage done when the Austrians and Germans overran old Rumania during the war. The Rumanians obeyed this order to the extent of leaving the Hungarian capital and withdrawing their troops beyond the Theiss, but they retained their hold on Transylvania, a few Hungarian counties west of Transylvania and north of the Banat, and the eastern part of the latter.

The Peace Conference refused to sanction their annexation of Torontal, the westernmost of the three counties of the Banat. The Entente powers have since sanctioned the Rumanian possession of Dobrudja, but have not yet acted on the question of her retaining the rest of her "Reunion" territories. The uncertainties arising out of this situation are bitterly complained of by the Rumanians, who attribute to it the slowness of their economic recovery, the suspension of many of their industries, and their inability to put into execution their proposed agrarian and other internal reforms. Bolshevism was repudiated at the November elections.

BANAT OF TEMESVAR

The Banat of Temesvár (pronounced Temeshvár) is a district in the southeast of Hungary, consisting of the three counties on the Danube, Krasso-Szörény, Temes, and Torontal. The latter county is bounded on the west by the Theiss River. Because of the 183,000 unredeemed Serbs in Torontal, the Entente proposes to award this county to Serbia. The Rumanians complain bitterly of this, citing their waived claim to that part of the Timok Valley in Serbia which is mostly Rumanian in population.

The term banat (Hungarian Bánzágy) means generally a frontier province corresponding to the German Mark, and the old English March (cf. the Marches of Wales). This was governed by a ban, the Hungarian equivalent of the German markgraf and the old English Lord Marcher. The other banats which existed in Hungary until swept away by the Turkish wars were those of Slavonia, Bosnia, and Croatia. But when the word Banat is used without qualification it always indicates the Banat of Temesvár, which strangely came by this title after the peace of Passarowitz (1718), though it was never governed by a ban. The area is 11,260 square miles. It is bounded on the south by the Danube, on the west by the Theiss, on the north by the Maros Rivers, and on the east by the Transylvanian Alps. It is mountainous in the east and southeast, while in the north, west, and southwest it is flat and in some places marshy.

The climate is generally healthy, except in the marshy parts. It is well watered and one of the most fertile farming districts of former Hungary, producing great quantities of wheat, oats, rye, barley, maize, flax, hemp, and tobacco. The products of its vineyards are of excellent quality. It is a good game country and the rivers swarm with fish. In the mountains the mineral wealth is great, including coal, iron, copper, tin, lead, and zinc. Even in the Roman period it was famous for its mineral springs, especially the sulphur springs at Mehadia, then known as the Baths of Hercules (Thermae Herculis). In 1900 the Banat had a population of 1,431,329. According to nationality there were 578,789 Rumanians, 362,487 Germans, 351,938 Serbians, and 170,124 Magyars. The chief city is Temesvár, in the north-central part, on the Alte Bega River, which had in 1900 a population of 53,033. Other cities of importance are Versecz (25,199), Lugos (16,126), Nagybeczkerek (26,407), Nagyikinda (24,843), and Panczova (19,044).

HISTORY OF THE BANAT

The Turks conquered the Banat in 1552, and ruled it as a province until 1716, when they were driven out by Prince Eugene of Savoy. After the peace of Passarowitz, two years later, it received the title of Banat, and remained under a military administration until 1751, when Maria Theresa gave it a civil administration. When the Turks were driven out the district was found to be nearly depopulated, having become a desolate wilderness of heath, forest, and marsh. Rumanians poured in great numbers into this region, settling the Hungarian plain almost as far westward, in some places, as the Theiss. Count Claudius Mercy (1666-1734), who was appointed Governor of the Banat in 1720, took numerous measures for its regeneration, draining the marshes near the Theiss and the Danube, and building canals and roads at great cost of labor. German artisans, Serbs, Magyars, and other settlers were attracted to the district, and trade and agriculture were encouraged. Maria Theresa further developed the Count's measures, colonizing the crownland with German peasants and founding many villages, besides encouraging the exploitation of the mineral resources. In 1779 the Banat was again incorporated with Hungary. After the revolution of 1848-49 the Banat and another county (Bacz) were separated from Hungary, and the Banat was made a distinctive Austrian crownland, but was again incorporated with Hungary in 1860. The city of Temesvár became a town in the thirteenth century, but was destroyed by the Tatars in 1242. It fell into the hands of the Turks in 1552, from whom Prince Eugene delivered it in 1716. In 1849 it successfully warded off the attack of Veczy and his Hungarian insurgents. On Aug. 9, 1849, the Austrians under Haynau defeated the Hungarians under Bem and Dembinski, near Temesvár. In the city stands a Gothic column forty feet high, by Max, erected to these defenders of 1849. The city consists of an outer town and an interesting inner town, or "fortress." Among the notable structures are the commander's palace, an immense barracks, the Greek Bishop's palace, a Catholic cathedral built by Maria Theresa, a Greek Catholic cathedral, and an arsenal housed in the castle built by Hunyady in 1442. The population is mainly German Catholic.

Up to the outbreak of the world war the Rumanians of the Banat belonged mainly to the peasant, town proletariat, and other lower classes, and were in a backward condition, culturally and socially. The ruling and business classes and the intellectual classes were Germans and Magyars, who regarded the Rumanians with haughty contempt.

THE DOBRUDJA

The peninsula projection of the Bulgarian uplands, thrusting northward between the Danube River on the west and the Black Sea on the east, known as the Dobrudja, is of little intrinsic value. It consists of a ridge of bare hills and plateaux, and barren, wind-swept downs, whereby the Danube is forced to make its great bend northward from Silistria, until it rounds the Dobrudja hills and breaks a marshy way to the Black Sea. Turco-Tatars roam these uplands with their flocks of sheep and goats, and herds of half-wild swine find pannage there. A few Bulgarian peasants tilled the scattered patches of fertile soil.

The region had no importance until the Russo-Turkish war of 1877. Then Russia took it from the Turks and thrust it upon Rumania, in enforced exchange for the fertile Rumanian province of Bessarabia, between the Dnieper and Pruth Rivers and the Black Sea. The Rumanians resented this robbery, and could see little use to be made of the barren Dobrudja, which was without any Rumanian population. In making the best of this bad bargain, however, Rumania, under the pressure of her expanding commerce after 1878, discovered that Dobrudja's principal harbor, Constanza, afforded a much-needed short-line commercial outlet to the Black Sea. When Bucharest, the Rumanian capital, was connected by railroad with Constanza, the latter became a flourishing seaport, Rumania's chief economic outlet to the world.

The nearness of Constanza to the Bulgarian frontier, however, made Rumania dissatisfied with the situation, which exposed her seaport to capture in case of war. By her intervention in the second Baltic war of 1913, Rumania remedied this strategic defect by forcing Bulgaria to cede to her the Danube fortress of Silistria and a strip of territory extending southeast to the port of Baltchik, on the Black Sea. This cession of nearly 3,000 square miles put the Bulgarian frontier out of easy striking distance to Dobrudja, and made the Rumanian frontier a menace to the Bulgarian port of Varna. This infuriated Bulgaria, who promptly made use of the opportunity for revenge afforded her by the world war. In the Autumn of 1916, when Rumania entered the war on the Entente side, Bulgaria, as the ally of Germany, overran Dobrudja. This Bulgaria held until Rumania struck back after the armistice was signed, and by this coup brought the Dobrudja again under her own sovereignty.

ORIGIN OF THE RUMANIANS

Speaking a language more like the ancient Latin than any other living tongue, looking like Southern Italians, though separated from the nearest Italic population by hundreds of miles of territory peopled by stocks utterly alien, the Rumanians form a racial cultural puzzle. Ethnologists accept as probable the picturesque tradition of the Rumanians, who believe themselves to be descendants of the Roman colonists planted in this part of the lower Danube, known as the ancient Dacia, in the second century A. D. When the irruption of barbarian hordes compelled Rome to abandon Dacia, at the end of the third century, a portion of the Romanized Dacians are supposed to have taken refuge in the Carpathian fastnesses of the present Transylvania, there preserving the Latin language and traditions. Historical certainty of their movements dates from the early Middle Ages, when the modern Rumanians descended from the Transylvanian Mountains into those wide plains north of the Danube which now make up the antebellum Kingdom of Rumania. They moved under pressure from the west by the warlike Magyars (of Finnish stock), who had settled the great plains of Hungary, and a branch of the Magyars, called the Czechlers, had become dominant in Transylvania.

In the lower Danubian plains the Rumanian colonists gradually formed themselves into two States, Wallachia in the south, and Moldavia, including the recent Russian province of Bessarabia, in the north. These Rumanian principalities underwent many devastations from the Turks, who, after their conquest of the Balkan Peninsula in the fifteenth century, compelled Wallachia and Moldavia to accept a status of autonomous vassalage to the Ottoman Empire. As the Turkish power declined in the early nineteenth century, the principalities, being the natural high road from Russia to the Balkans, suffered much from the passing to and fro of the Russian armies invading the Balkans.

But in this period the Rumanians awoke to full racial consciousness, threw off the Turkish suzerainty, and in 1859, notwithstanding Russian opposition, Wallachia and Moldavia united, forming the independent Kingdom of Rumania though real independence of Turkey was not obtainable until the Russo-Turkish war of 1877. Though Rumania rendered valuable assistance to Russia against the Turks, Russia regarded Rumania as a stumbling block to her ambitions in the Balkans and in Constantinople. Russia considered her seizure of Bessarabia as a preliminary step to her intended annexation of all Rumania, when the time should be ripe.

PROSPECTS FOR STABILITY

That tract of country between the Dnieper and Pruth Rivers and the Black Sea, a goodly continuation of the Russian "black earth" belt so famous for its fertility, has for centuries been overwhelmingly Rumanian in population, as have Transylvania, Southern Bukowina, and the eastern plains of Hungary.

The racial solidarity secured by the recent formation of the kingdom of Greater Rumania would seem on the face of it to go a long way toward solution of the Balkan questions by removing the age-long Balkan curse of irredentism. What casts the shadow of doubt on this solution is the characteristic incompetence, politically and economically speaking, of the Rumanian race. The Rumanians have never been noted for ethical energy of character, for business or industrial efficiency, or for political organization and responsibility. They are a temperamental, easy-going, light-hearted, thriftless people, fond of music and of the gayeties of life, and have shown bigoted hostility to the superior thrift of the Armenians, Jews and Greeks, who control the retail business of Rumania; they have imposed ironclad legal handicaps upon these aliens, including a law forbidding their ownership of land. From habit and the natural fertility of their soil they are good farmers and graziers; also, they are good horsemen and good individual fighters. But all the industrial and large business life of their country has been carried on by German, Russian, and other foreign capital.

The oil and other mineral wealth of Rumania and Transylvania are great, as well as that of the Banat—coal, iron, tin, zinc, copper, lead, mercury, sulphur and arsenic. The gold mines of Rumania and Transylvania are the richest in Europe. Rumania is a successful stock-raising country also. Greater Rumania is potentially a great power in the hands of a people who may not know how to use it without danger to neighboring countries. Transylvania and the Banat are removed as a natural bulwark from the Hungarians, a fact that causes dangerous rancor. The loss of Bessarabia causes much bitterness in the Ukraine.

Rumania delivered the Jews from all legal and political disabilities by a decree in June, 1919, and was compelled, after long hesitation, to agree to the treaty protecting minorities, which is printed on Pages 531-4 of this issue of CURRENT HISTORY.

The Balkans and Turkey

Dangerous Rivalry Between Greece and Bulgaria Over Turkish Territory—Sultan Regaining Ground

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

PROCRASTINATION between Paris and Budapest over the signing of the Treaty of Neuilly passed almost unnoticed in the Balkan Chancelleries. Rumania on Feb. 5 had ordered the withdrawal of her troops to the frontier between Hungary and Transylvania as designated in the treaty; the Russian Soviet troops on the frontier of Bessarabia were attempting to arrange a protocol with the Rumanian Government, the pourparlers for which began on Jan. 28, and Jugoslavia was principally concerned with the settlement of the Adriatic question; elsewhere in the Balkans, however, a new policy was rapidly being developed on account of the Entente's delay over the settlement of the Turkish problem. This revealed that Bulgaria and Greece were becoming rivals over the settlement of this problem, just as they were over the destination of Macedonia and Thrace, which is now, particularly in Bulgarian opinion, incorporated in the larger and more intricate problem of Turkey.

Both Government utterances and the press of Bulgaria and Greece showed that each nation was bent on exerting itself to convince the Entente that only by its mastery of Constantinople could the problem of the nationalities, for centuries under Turkish rule in Asia Minor, be solved. The argument of each was developed along different lines: That of Bulgaria was historical, anti-British and pro-French; that of Greece was based on future exigencies and was both pro-British and mildly anti-French.

The material which M. Briand's paper L'Eclair of Paris published on Feb. 11, purporting to show that last September Great Britain, through under officials, had attempted to negotiate a separate treaty with Turkey, was obtained from Sofia. In La Macédoine of Sofia was also revealed an alleged bargain that Britain in November, 1915, had attempted to make with Bulgaria, by which, it was said, Bulgaria would have received for her desertion of Germany all that she could capture from Turkey in Europe and the guarantee that Macedonia would become an independent State with its capital at Saloniki.

In Athens London press articles which attempted to outline the future British policy in Asiatic Turkey were reproduced with favorable comment; those of Paris outlining the projected French policy, with unfavorable comment. Further, the line of argument is shown by the assertion that while Bulgarian dominance in Turkey in Europe would keep the tide of Bolshevism out of Asia, Greek dominance with British support there would keep the Turk from interfering in European affairs while Great Britain could keep him in his place in the Asiatic hinterland.

CONFLICTING ATTITUDES

Typical of the Bulgarian argument is the following from La Macédonie:

If the way for Saloniki is blocked for Austria in the present condition, it is open for her successor—Jugoslavia. The road to Constantinople will still remain open for Russia, and it is not difficult to foresee how will be met the possession of these two Mediterranean points by two large Slavonic States. It is obvious, therefore, that there is danger of new conflicts if the great conquerors do not timely correct their erroneous solutions. The discussion of the Turkish question is a most opportune moment for a correction of this kind. The creation of an independent Macedonia would result not only in putting an end to national antagonism in the Balkans, but would be a beginning for a fortunate liquidation of the Eastern problem. An independent Macedonia, internationally controlled, will bar the appearance of many new conflicts, and thus will save much bloodshed and wealth.

Typical of the Greek point of view is an article by Colonel Prantzès, the Greek military attaché at London, in Le Journal des Hellènes, in which he points out that in the Eastern Mediterranean Constantinople is destined to play the same rôle as that played by Gibraltar in the Western. There are three gates to the Mediterranean, he writes; Gibraltar and the Suez Canal are already in the hands of England; the third, Constantinople, must be equally secured for civilization. This can only be done by Greece under British guidance and aid.

English civilization would soon acquire such a powerful influence over Greeks, Armenians and Kurds that it would not take long to found a State sufficiently strong to play satisfactorily its allotted part, especially as the repopulation of those countries by such prolific races would not be long delayed.

Turkey and Bulgaria, undeniably two of our future enemies, must be placed in such a position that it will be impossible for them to attack us in the rear. Such a result cannot be effected by half measures. It can be obtained only by the application of such means as are dictated to us by the elementary instincts of self-preservation, measures which, thanks to the actual ethnological conditions, are in accordance with the legitimate rights of the peoples concerned.

BERLIN-ATHENS CORRESPONDENCE

A curious phase of anti-Greek propaganda was noticed. The Echo of Bulgaria, issued at Sofia, published the correspondence between Berlin and Athens in 1916-17, including the letters written by the German Kaiser, his sister, Queen Sophia, and his brother-in-law, King Constantine, with the idea of showing that at the time the letters were written the majority of the Greeks were on the side of Germany, and that the Greek army was about to attack the rear of the Entente army in Macedonia. Hence, it was argued, the position of Greece was exactly like that of Bulgaria, only the former by the coup d'état of Venizelos, managed by the French, ultimately lined up with the Entente. The Sofia paper presented the correspondence as a great revelation, saying that the documents had been secured from the Gazette de Lausanne. As a matter of fact, they were originally published in the Greek White Book last Summer, for the purpose of showing the treason of King Constantine and his German wife.

The Sofia press, having seen the dispatches from Vienna telling of revolts against the Bulgarian Government, strikes and attacks on King Boris, and the establishment of communication between the Russian Bolsheviks and those in Bulgaria, declared that all these stories were merely lies calculated to prevent the rehabilitation of Bulgaria in the eyes of the Entente. Sofia mail advices, however, showed that there were serious strikes in Bulgaria. Bourtzev, the Russian revolutionist, who now conducts the Obchtée Délo and the Cause Commune at Paris, passed through Sofia in the middle of January and was interviewed by the Echo of Bulgaria. He was quoted as saying:

Personally I know nothing about these Bulgar Bolsheviks. They are not in evidence. But Bolsheviks are the same everywhere. The strike which they are now maintaining is both a misfortune and a crime for Bulgaria. If it succeeds, Bulgaria will be plunged into a sea of tears and will probably perish. I cordially welcome the words which the President of the Council, M. Stambolisky; flung at the Communists of the Sobranje: "I fear you not, and I will fight you to the end." * * * Before long I hope we shall see an alliance between a new-born Russia and a recovered Bulgaria.

The Sofia papers also reprinted with enthusiasm the articles in the Prague press inviting a rapprochement between Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria—a movement begun by the Narodna Politika. Editorial opinion, while resigned to the ratification of the treaty of peace by the Sobranje, declared that the Entente would soon become convinced of the impossibility of the country's carrying out the economic and military conditions, while, as to the territorial, the interests of the Entente would soon show the necessity for rectification.

SITUATION IN GREECE

The fact that there were diplomatic exchanges between the Bulgarian Premier, Stambolisky, and Venizelos, the Greek Premier, over the suggested surrender of Thrace on the part of the latter for the friendship of the former toward Hellas caused a revival of the charges of Bulgar perfidy in the Greek press, save in the Echo de Grèce, which made political capital out of it for ex-King Constantine, whose cause it still fights from far-off Switzerland. Once in a while the royal press bureau there has managed to get some of its stuff in circulation through press agencies. As, for example, the declaration of ex-Queen Sophia on Feb. 2 that she blamed President Wilson for the misfortunes of herself and of Greece, and, on Feb. 6, when an interview with the former Greek Minister, Elio Panas, obtained by the Giornale d'Italia in Rome, was widely circulated. M. Panas was quoted as saying that civil war in Greece could only be avoided by the prompt restoration of Constantine, and that for this eventuality he had received assurances of the support of the Vatican against Venizelos—assurances which the organ of the Vatican, the Osservatore Romano, vehemently repudiated on the following day.

ANGLO-FRENCH RIVALRY

Aside from the Bulgar and Greek aspirations in regard to the Entente's ultimate settlement of the Turkish problem, this proclaimed disinterested article appeared in the Préopretz of Sofia:

The certain refusal of the United States to assume the mandate over Turkey or any part thereof obliges France and England to seek another solution. Not wishing to show their different conceptions of this question, these two powers are seeking an understanding between themselves before allowing the debate to become public. It was not so very long ago that the English were for maintaining Constantinople under the authority of the Sultan. They now seem to have changed that point of view.

The French, on the other hand, are for maintaining the Turkish Government on the Bosphorus. This rivalry between the English and the French has for its object the domination of the remainder of the Ottoman Empire so formidable in days gone by. In the speeches of statesmen and in the press each side sets forth its policy with elevated motives—the maintenance of peace, the protection of Christians, &c.

But all this does not prevent us from observing that the diplomats who are gathered around the green table pay little heed either to the rights or the prosperity of the peoples concerned, but are principally concerned with the iron, copper, coal, oil, and cotton.

Whatever may be its details, we are in the presence of a rivalry between France and England on the subject of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles which recalls that over Egypt, which terminated in complete domination by England.

For years Great Britain would suffer no change in the political entity of Turkey, although vast territorial changes in her territorial entity were going on. The object was to keep Russia out of the Eastern Mediterranean, where Czardom would have arrived had the Turk been driven out of Europe. First the Russo-British Treaty of 1907 caused England to change her policy; then the overthrow of Czardom ten years later caused her to ratify that change. Now the rise of Soviet Russia has caused her to reconsider both her change of policy and the ratification thereof. With the United States as mandatarly for Turkey she could have remained tranquil. Bolshevism would have been kept out of the Levant and the Turks there would have been restrained from either joining them or creating revolutions on their own account. India would have remained unmenaced, both without and within. And all the parties to the partial partition of Turkey in Asia—Great Britain, France, Italy and Greece—would have felt secure in their several spheres of administration.

DEMANDS OF MOSLEMS

Great Britain, with her millions of Moslem subjects, has a moral obligation bound up in the political exigency to settle the problem which is also more or less bound up with the material interests of France, Italy and Greece. Taking advantage of this moral obligation, the Turkish Government increased its pressure to have the status quo ante-bellum maintained, while from the Moslem heads in India poured into Downing Street petitions, manifestoes, memorials and propaganda of all sorts demanding that the Sultain remain in Constantinople as Caliph of the Faithful, whatever disposition be made of the political capital of the Turkish Empire.

In the middle of January unofficial telegrams received at Stamboul from Western Europe, stating that the scheme to transfer the Turkish Government from Constantinople, which would remain the seat of the Caliphate, was likely to be accepted by the Peace Conference, caused much anxiety in Turkish as well as foreign residential circles. While the former resented the projected solution, the latter did not believe it practical. Both pointed out that no Anatolian city, with the possible exception of Brusa, to which the Turkish Government, fearing an attack by Greece and the allied fleets, prepared to remove in the Spring of 1915, contains buildings suitable for the Government and its official entourage. They also asked why, if the Turkish Government at Constantinople with the straits open could be controlled by a mandatary or mandataries, should it be transferred to Anatolia, where it would be far more difficult to control if it misbehaved and fell into the hands of militant Nationalists like those who were causing all the trouble now.

In arguing that both the political and religious Governments should remain in statu quo the Turkish press declared that in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries Turkey time and again came to the aid of France when near to being overwhelmed by the Hapsburgs, and that in 1857 Turkey opened Egypt to the passage of British troops to crush the great Indian mutiny.

PLEA FOR THE SULTAN

Emir Ali, an Indian Privy Councilor who has held several high offices in the British Government at Bengal, wrote in a memorial on the subject:

Maintenance of the temporal authority of the Sultan is necessary. His temporal and spiritual power cannot be separated. Moslems were assured in the late war that the Caliphate would not be interfered with and that Constantinople, Thrace and the homeland of the Turkish race would remain in their hands; and on this assurance Mohammedan troops bore their full share of the fighting in various regiments. During the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78, when the Russians got to San Stefano, some twelve miles or so from Constantinople, there was great excitement in India. I well remember how high feeling ran among Mohammedans.

Concerning Mecca and Medina, it would be most unwise, in the interests of the empire, to claim or to exercise, directly or indirectly, a protectorate over them. While the administration of these sacred cities might be left to the autonomous government of the Hedjaz, the Sherif Hussein should receive the usual investiture from the Sultan-Caliph.

The authority of the Sultan himself is based upon a formal deed of assignment executed in 1517 by the Caliph Al-Mutawakil Alaa-Allah, who transferred the Caliphate to the Ottoman conqueror, Selim I. The transfer was carried out with all the rites demanded by the law, and the Ottoman Caliph duly received the homage of the Sherif of Mecca, who presented him with the keys of the Kaabah. From that moment to this the Caliphate has remained the rightful heritage of the House of Othman.

Another memorial signed by a number of high-placed Moslems, together with Lord Lamington, Lord Amphil, Earl of Denbigh, General Dickson, Admiral Fremantle and other British notables, was presented to the British Prime Minister on Jan. 16. It was over 1,000 words in length, and appealed for the Turkish people that they "may be granted the blessing of peace and freedom under the sovereignty of their spiritual and temporal head, the Sultan." "The maintenance of the whole of the Turkish Empire in the homeland of the Turkish race, with its capital Constantinople," it was pointed out, was promised as a condition of a just and lasting peace. Reference was also made to the underlying principle of self-determination promised by President Wilson and accepted by the Allies as applicable to enemy countries.

TURKISH ARMY MOBILIZING

Reports coming to the Interallied Mission at Constantinople as well as observations made in the capital itself showed that thousands of able-bodied Turks were leaving the coast towns for the interior of Anatolia, where it was said they were being enrolled in the Nationalist Army of Mustapha Kemal. Reports of agents reaching the mission charged that the Turkish Minister of War, Djemal Pasha, was not only conversant with this movement, but was actually aiding it, and that with the complete mobilization of the Turkish army a simultaneous rising of the Young Turks in Constantinople and an attack upon the Levantine hinterlands held by the British, French, Greeks, and Italians would take place.

About the middle of January General Gouraud, who commanded the French forces in Syria, estimated at between 15,000 and 20,000, mostly Senegalese, asked for reinforcements, and between 25,000 and 30,000 men were sent from Marseilles. Reinforcements were also dispatched by their respective Governments to the British in Palestine, to the Greeks in Smyrna, and to the Italians in the Adalia region. The agreement reached by Emir Feisal and the Peace Conference announced in CURRENT HISTORY last month seemed to have had little effect in stopping the attacks made by Turkish and Arab bands upon the land convoys between the zones occupied by the different Allies. The attack upon General Gouraud's train and the capture of his Chief of Staff by Syrian volunteers early in January were followed a month later by the reported murder of three American relief workers.

DECISION ON CONSTANTINOPLE

It was announced on Feb. 15 that an agreement had been reached by the Supreme Allied Council to permit the Sultan to maintain his Court in Constantinople, but that Turkey must give guarantees, especially relative to the Dardanelles, and must not have an army, according to a statement by Premier Millerand. The Allies will maintain vigorous military and naval control over the Straits of the Dardanelles. The experts assembled in London were to begin at once to formulate the methods of control.

In the first week of February several reports were received from Constantinople by news agencies that 2,000 Armenians had been massacred by the Turks at Marash and Aintab, sixty miles northeast of Aleppo. The French War Office reported an engagement between Turkish National forces and a French detachment in that region, but nothing more.

The Fourth Turkish Parliament met on Jan. 12, but did not have a quorum for several days. Only seventy-two Deputies out of 132 listened to the Sultan's speech from the throne. He complained bitterly that since the armistice the Allies had without right occupied Turkish territory. "The reverses of war," he said, "cannot affect a nation's right to political existence." He then outlined the new reform scheme and particularly emphasized the point of the protection of minorities. The deplorable financial and industrial condition of Turkey and her dire need for assistance from abroad were also expatiated on. Already, on Jan. 8, the Grand Vizier had handed the text of the reform measure to the allied representatives. It is said that they made reports to their respective Governments to the effect that whatever may be expert opinion on the measure per se, the present Government had neither the power nor the inclination to put it into effect.

AMONG THE NATIONS

Survey of Important Events and Developments in Various Nations, Great and Small

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

AUSTRIA

OF all the new Central European countries none is in such a desperate plight economically and financially as Austria. Day by day and week by week heartrending tales of cold, hunger, disease and death have poured into the capitals of Europe. At the end of January Frederic C. Penfield, former American Ambassador to Austria-Hungary, declared that if relief did not come to Austria soon a quarter of the population, and practically all the children, would die before the coming Spring. He described the former light-hearted capital as "Dying Vienna," a capital without a country, without material resources, without food or coal, transportation facilities or money. Reports from Vienna dated Jan. 27 confirmed this description. The food distress remained unrelieved, and public discontent was growing. The announcement that three ounces of meat would be offered for sale at the central market brought a surging mob of 60,000 people, many of whom, in the frantic rush to purchase, fainted or were thrown down and trampled by the crowd.

The fuel distress, aggravated by the exceedingly cold weather, was equally acute. A shudder went through Vienna on Jan. 18 when it was announced that the authorities would suspend the street car service owing to the lack of coal. Theatres, concert halls, and other places of amusement were closed for lack of heating. Electric and gas power was cut off after 3 o'clock in the afternoon, resulting in a lack of employment in the factories. Every source of coal supplies had been cut off by the strike or transport difficulties. Much had been hoped from the Chancellor's visit to Prague, but he returned with nothing definite accomplished in the way of fuel relief from the Czechs, though he brought back promises of negotiations. Meantime the people of Vienna and Austria generally shivered in their homes. Influenza and pneumonia were rife.

One of the most serious problems was the welfare of Austrian children. Representatives of the American Relief Committee for German Children, on examination of Vienna school children shortly prior to Jan. 19, found that 97 per cent. of them were suffering from lack of food. This committee's relief fund had reached an aggregate of $200,000. Food purchased to the value of $100,000 by the Herbert Hoover Relief Committee was distributed in Austria as well as in Germany through the Society of Friends organization directed from Philadelphia.

Meanwhile the Austrian Government continued its undertaking of sending children abroad to countries that pledged themselves to provide for them. Almost 6,000 of these half-starving children left Vienna on Jan. 22 en route for Holland and Italy, making a total of 28,000 Austrian children sent out of the country. Many came from the poorest workingmen's homes. Altogether it was estimated that there were 300,000 underfed children. Of these the Americans were feeding 120,000, the Dutch, Italians, Swiss and Scandinavians had pledged themselves to take a total of 60,000, still leaving two-fifths of the child population uncared for. An extension in American relief plans as announced on Jan. 28 to bring relief to 275,000 children, reduced this remainder. As a result of the refusal of prospective mothers to bring new children into such misery the birth rate, according to official statistics, was decreasing alarmingly.

The Government was further crushed by its enormous debt, including about 50,000,000,000 kronen allotted from the old monarchy's debt, and some 10,000,000,000 kronen incurred since the creation of the republic to last July. The current budget also showed a deficit of from 8,000,000,000 to 10,000,000,000 kronen additional. All State enterprises, including the railways, were showing a deficit in similar proportions. The country was being flooded with paper money, worthless abroad and of little value at home. Mines, banks, and other industries were being taken over by French and Italian capitalists. And Austria's sole recourse was to add to the already crushing national debt by contracting large loans abroad, in which the Government saw its only salvation. It was for this purpose alone that Dr. Renner had gone to Paris to lay Austria's desperate situation before the allied Governments. On their decision the Government and the people were anxiously waiting. An unsubstantiated report that the United States would open a credit of $20,000,000 caused wild jubilation in Vienna.

It was stated in Vienna on Jan. 15 that a general assembly of the Provincial Diet to frame a Constitution for submission to the Central Government would be held soon. The obtaining of the widest possible degree of autonomy was envisaged. Especially antagonistic to the Central Government were the Provinces of Vorarlberg and Tyrol, whose attempts to secede and join, the one Switzerland, the other Germany, had been defeated by the decision of the Paris conference. Tyrol announced that it would never cease working for union with Germany. A Government counterplan of creating a small upper house to include two elected representatives from each province had been coldly received in the provinces.

Under the provisions of the army bill before the National Assembly on Jan. 21 the personnel of the army was limited to 1,500 officers, 2,000 noncommissioned officers and 30,000 men, who were to serve six years in active service and six on the reserve list. Both soldiers and officers were forbidden to marry and obliged to waive all political rights while in service. Trade and agricultural instruction were provided.

Austrian guards and customs employes had been posted along the Swiss frontier to prevent the passing of gems and articles of historic value taken from the museum of Vienna, which was looted some time ago of material worth $5,000,000. It was said that many families had grown rich by the smuggling of contraband between Switzerland and Vorarlberg.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

During January and February the official internal and external policy of Czechoslovakia, as outlined by the Constitution of the new republic and by Dr. E. Benès, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in London on Dec. 4, was applied consistently. The more important points of the Constitution, now published, are as follows:

The President of the republic will not be eligible for office for more than two consecutive terms, and will enjoy legal immunity except in case of high treason.

The Constitution provides for the separation of Church and State.

Parliament will consist of a Senate and a Diet.

The Czech language will be the official language, and will be an obligatory subject in all elementary schools. In all districts containing a national minority which represents at least 20 per cent. of the local population, this minority will be granted the right of using its own language in all official transactions and of having it taught in the schools.

As outlined by Dr. Benès, the external policy of the Czechoslovak State was one of economic conciliation and assistance to its Central European neighbors. In full realization of the economic distress of Austria and Hungary, particularly, and of the inability of the Allies, because of transportation difficulties, to relieve the pressing food and fuel needs of Central Europe, Czechoslovakia had conceived its mission to be peculiarly that of an intermediary agency, and was ready to offer her large supplies of coal, sugar, and manufactured products to meet the emergency. This policy had been approved by both the French and British Governments, and Dr. Benès intimated that a combined loan of $125,000,000 would be made his Government to support the object sought.

By Jan. 10 Dr. Benès was back in Prague, and, with M. Tusar, the Prime Minister, received officially Dr. Karl Renner, the Austrian Chancellor, and his Ministers, who had come to Prague to discuss with the Czechoslovak Government the international situation affecting the two new States. Dr. Renner returned to Vienna, following an interview with President Masaryk on Jan. 12. An official communiqué stated that it had been agreed that the foreign policy of both States would be based on the peace terms of the St. Germain Treaty, and would envisage the following objects:

To assure the democratic and free institutions prevailing within both nations, and the complete independence of both republics externally.

To reject any attempts whatsoever at restoring the former political conditions or at establishing new State alliances.

To bring about an economic co-operation in accordance with the interests of both States for the purpose of re-establishing a national economic status and mutual relationships.

The conferences of the Ministers and State Secretaries with the technical experts in the committees were at once initiated.

Further details of the agreement, subsequently published, were: The unrestricted import and export of goods, subject to a mere declaration; the settlement of mutual indebtedness by a special commission; an increase in the deliveries of coal, and reciprocity in regard to sugar exchange.

Cession of the coal territory of Teschen to Czechoslovakia by the Poles without a plebiscite, in return for which Poland would be rewarded with certain lands east of the Polish boundaries, was announced on Jan. 30 in newspaper reports from Prague.

At a meeting of the Reform Priests' Association, held on Jan. 10, it was resolved by 140 votes to 66 to separate from Rome and to establish a Czech National Church, which would take over the institutions, rights, and possessions of the Roman Catholic Church.

Sensational charges that Czechoslovakia had fallen under Bolshevik influences were contradicted in toto by Donald L. Breed in an article published in New York on Feb. 1. The Government was Socialistic but not radical, said Mr. Breed, and Muna, Lenin's chief propagandist in the country, was publicly ridiculed in the concert halls and cabarets of Prague. Every means was being taken by the Government to increase the industrial product, and the workmen were encouraged to work more than the eight hours prescribed by the National Assembly the year before. Food profiteers were being penalized. The unemployment wage allotted by the Government, vitally necessary in the early days of the new republic's existence, had been practically abolished, and Czechoslovak industry, after a long and painful season of war and Austrian mismanagement, was again in the ascendant.

GERMANY

The critical financial and economic situation in Germany continued to occupy the public mind in January and February, producing an intensified degree of pessimism despite certain mitigating factors. Mainly fear of the immediate future centred on the fall of the mark to the unprecedentedly low value of 1 cent in American money, thus cutting off importations of needed raw materials for German factories from the United States; this drop in exchange also cut off the food imports needed to avert threatened starvation for a large proportion of the German people. There was also the coal shortage problem. Emphasis was laid on the recent grant by Holland of a credit loan of 200,000,000 guilders as the only way in which other countries, especially America, could save Germany from plunging into the well-nigh hopeless condition of Austria and Poland.

On the other hand, the stability of the Ebert Government, its patient though successful policy in defeating all the attacks of the Radicals and Reactionaries, together with the willingness of the German people to work out their national salvation if guided by at least a gleam of promise, gave point to the opinion that Germany might be able to overcome her hour of desperation provided her financial and economic stress were relieved from without.

These elements become pronounced in the trend of events. The fall in exchange caused a serious panic among business men and the public generally. This led to the payment of enormous prices for gold and silver as an "iron reserve" against the day of collapse. At the height of the scramble 500 paper marks were paid for one 20-mark gold piece. In Berlin speculators in the precious metals posted themselves in front of the National Bank building and began to bid against the Government in its efforts to induce citizens to part with hoarded treasure on patriotic grounds. It was estimated that 500,000,000 marks in silver coin still remained in hiding. Curious instances of the wild ideas of exchange were noted in Berlin on Feb. 2. Some of the leading jewelers closed their doors, fearful that foreigners would purchase the few valuables left in the country for next to nothing. Others closed simply because the prices asked staggered American or other foreign buyers, and no business could be done. Similarly, thrifty country folk, unable to realize the depth to which the mark had sunk, made bad bargains with their stock in gold. At a village near Magdeburg a wealthy peasant woman grasped at a horse priced 3,000 marks—in gold—completely failing to understand that she had really paid 150,000 marks at current paper rates for the animal.

Regarding food conditions a competent ally investigator presented facts and figures demonstrating the slow torture of undernourishment from which the German masses suffered. In showing how rations had dwindled he pointed out that during the last twelve months of the war the weekly ration per head was:

Bread—2,000 grams (4 lbs. 6½ oz.)
 Fresh Meat—150 grams (5¼ oz.)
 Butter and Margarine—50 grams (1¾ oz.)
 Potatoes—2,500 grams (5 lbs. 8 oz.)
 Milk—1-10th litre (1-6th pint).

The writer went on to state that, soon after the conclusion of the armistice, the bread ration was raised to 2,300 grams (5 pounds, 1 ounce); the meat ration to 200 grams (7 ounces); the ration of food fats to 100 grams (3½ ounces.) Imports from America also permitted a weekly distribution of 125 grams (4½ ounces) of bacon, 50 grams of lard (1½ ounces), and 125 grams (4½ ounces) of wheat flour per head. Later on the only foods rationed were flour, meat, fat, milk, and sugar. Circumstances, however, had changed for the worse in the last few weeks. A drastic reduction on an already trivial milk ration had taken place. It was now 40 per cent. less than the milk ration of 1918. The meat ration of 1918 had been reduced by half, owing to the number of cattle having much diminished, and to the thin and impoverished condition of the stock. All artificial manures or cattle foods had been denied to the farmer for several seasons. The ration of fats for the whole population is now 30 per cent. less than the ration allowed twelve months ago.

This state of things was attributed to the low value of the mark, which forcibly restricted the purchase of meat, flour, and other necessities abroad, to disintegration of the transport system, shortage of harvests, and labor troubles. The only remedy suggested was that of the German Food Controller. He estimated that to provide 40,000,000 undernourished German people with 50 grams (1½ ounces) of food fats, meat, and flour daily for 300 days would necessitate the purchase abroad of 600,000 tons of food fats, 600,000 tons of meat, and 600,000 tons of flour.

These figures were impressively illuminated from a seafaring point of view, so far as Hamburg was concerned, by Captain Adrien Zeeder of the American liner Manchuria, the first passenger vessel flying the American flag to make the Port of New York from Germany. Captain Zeeder said that shipping was at a low ebb in Hamburg, with many of Germany's merchant marine starving for something to do.

The people in Hamburg were glad the war was over, and bore no animosity toward Americans. They worked ten hours a day at the docks for 24 marks, but could not buy any substantial food because of the cost. Men working in the hold of the Manchuria were so ravenous for real food that they cut slices of frozen meat off quarters with an axe, and ate it without cooking or a pinch of salt. "It took eight full days," he explained, "to discharge 5,500 tons of cargo from the Manchuria, which could have been done in New York in forty-eight hours. This slowness was due to the lack of strength among the German longshoremen and their low spirits."

* * * There was little meat or butter and practically no coal." Captain Zeeder added that the Elbe would have to be dredged before shipping in its harbor could become normal again, because the sand had choked up the channel during the war. The Manchuria had managed to reach Hamburg because strong west winds had driven the water up from the mouth and held it there.

The lack of coal in Hamburg, referred to by Captain Zeeder, was merely an example of a similar condition throughout the country. Robert Schmidt, Minister of National Economy, in speaking of it, said: "The six-hour day means suicide. The word coal is written in sinister letters across the whole situation. Production has fallen by 50 per cent. as compared with that of peace time, and it cannot be distributed owing to the lack of transportation and the very bad condition of engines and rolling stock. So factories are shut down one by one." The acuteness of the situation on Feb. 2 was marked by even wealthy people in Berlin's West End flats sitting down to dinner wrapped in furs. "Lack of coal," said Herr Koch, Home Secretary, "threatens to bring down our whole economic situation."

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND

The complete sovereignty of Belgium over the former Prussian regions of Eupen and Malmédy was proclaimed as dating from Jan. 10, and on Jan. 22 General Baltia, Belgian High Commissioner, made his solemn entry into Malmédy, where at the Hôtel de Ville he read, first in German and then in French, a proclamation to the population setting forth the promises of the Belgian Government to the people. These consisted of religious freedom, standardized labor, and educational systems similar to those of Belgium. Military service, he said, would not be required for four years, and he concluded:

In return for these advantages the Belgian Government requires of you that you be faithful to the King and the Belgian dynasty and that you obey the Constitution and the laws of the Belgian people.

For our part [added General Baltia] we promise you, in exchange for your loyalty and your fidelity, an absolute devotion, which we shall derive from our common Ardennes origin [the General is a Luxemburger by origin], a complete impartiality and toleration. Give us your frank and loyal confidence.

Although Belgium's chief exports had not reached 50 per cent. of what they were in 1913, other products helped to make up the balance in 1919. In 1913 the imports were $900,000,000 and the exports $700,000,000; in 1919 they were, respectively, $860,000,000 and $360,000,000. The Antwerp trade since last September increased at an average of 20,000 tons a month until December when the increase was 73,356 tons. The total figure for the year was 5,300,876 tons. The total export figures were:

	Tons.
France	25,230,125
Holland	10,313,550
Great Britain	9,186,000
Germany	3,304,000
Italy	6,893,000

There were strikes among savings bank employes, postmen and school teachers, but these were all settled; in some cases the strikers, having made their demonstration, returned to work to show "their spirit of patriotism and self-denial"; in others the trouble was ended by arbitration, or by the Administration's refusing point-blank to discuss arbitration, in the case of the bank employes.

On Jan. 25 a group of bankers decided to subscribe 50 per cent. of the national loan of $500,000,000, and the Government decided to take over all municipal loans, and in future to assist in financing the various communities surrendering them.

On Jan. 31 the Dutch press printed the text of the treaty between Belgium and Holland. The principal provisions read:

Holland and Belgium are to have joint control of navigation on the Scheldt River. The question of the movement of Belgian warships from Antwerp and other problems likely to result in the event of war are left to the future decision of the League of Nations.

Both countries agree to the principle that the mouth of the Scheldt shall be free and open water. Two new large canals are to be constructed at the earliest moment to give Belgium an equal outlet to the sea (one from Antwerp to Holland connecting with the North Sea, and the other from the Rhine to the Meuse to the Scheldt at Antwerp, connecting Antwerp with the German Rhine, the latter to be constructed within seven years).

An additional number of existing canals are to be deepened to accommodate larger ships. In general, each country is to pay the expense of construction and maintenance within its own borders, and customs, quarantine and pilotage regulations are to be made as uniform as possible.

With reference to the German Rhine canal Holland agrees that no new conditions shall be imposed other than those already in effect on traffic to Germany.

BRITISH EMPIRE

The intentions of the British Government in regard to Soviet Russia remained as much of an enigma as ever, but the speeches of the Prime Minister were generally interpreted to mean that he was seeking a modus vivendi for trade, if it could be obtained by anything short of a formal recognition of the Soviet Government. Following the tentative re-establishment of peace between the latter and Esthonia, other States formerly in the Russian Empire were making a rapprochement toward the same end—Latvia, Lithuania and Ukraina—and Poland was advised by the Entente to make peace if the status of its territory could be guaranteed thereby.

The situation brought out vehement denunciations in the Russian anti-Bolshevik press printed abroad, which declared that as Bolshevism was not a State or Government, but merely a propaganda, no peace could be made with it without acknowledging its dominance; that it was absurd to suppose trade could be had with the Russian co-operative societies, since no such societies now existed, and those which were called co-operative were under Soviet Commissioners.

THE UNITED KINGDOM—A chance word dropped by Lord Birkenhead, the Lord Chancellor, caused the news to be cabled to this country that he had advised the resurrection of the National Party in order to preserve the coalition from deflection and to fight labor. In a letter addressed to Lord Ampthill, dated Jan. 21, he repudiated this. On the other hand, the Labor Party, hearing that the middle class workers were organizing (that is, those who belonged neither to the capitalist class nor to the proletariat), invited their leaders to a conference—an invitation which was rejected. The press throughout the kingdom gave considerable support to the idea of a middle-class organization, as it would be by nature conservative and hold the balance of power between the capitalists and the hand workers, and thus tend to prevent industrial and commercial ruptures and disturbances which caused a falling off in production.

On Jan. 27 George Barnes, Minister without portfolio, resigned, thereby making the final withdrawal of labor from the Coalition Government. The by-elections, which, because of the recent Laborite victories, brought about, it was charged, by the Unionists through the Liberals insisting on having candidates where Coalition Unionists could easily have been elected, reached the height of interest on Jan. 21, when former Premier Asquith accepted the invitation to stand for Paisley on the principles of the old Liberal Party. The result of the election, which was held Feb. 14, was not announced until Feb. 25—too late for record in this issue of CURRENT HISTORY. Paisley since 1832 has had an unbroken Liberal representation. In the last general election, however, the Liberal candidate, Sir John McCallum, won by only 106 votes over the Laborite. He declined to throw in his lot with the coalition and declared he would stand as a free Liberal. Then he was pushed aside to make room for Mr. Asquith's candidature.

It was Mr. Asquith's second by-election. The first was in the Spring of 1914, when he offered himself for re-election for East Fife on taking over the duties of Secretary of State for War, while still Prime Minister, during the Curragh crisis. He was then returned unopposed. Paisley was only the second seat for which he has stood, as he sat without a break for East Fife from 1886 to the last election. At Bromley and Ashton Coalition Unionists won in by-elections by diminished pluralities. At Spen Valley a Laborite won.

On Jan. 15 the National Union of Railwaymen accepted the Government's offer on the wage question, which covered the following points:

The Government have adhered to the principle of standard rates based on an average, and also to that of a sliding scale according to the cost of living.

The increase of war wage contained in the proposals for adults in the conciliation grades is to be extended to grades not hitherto included, and an increase of 2s. 6d. is made to boys and girls under 18 years of age.

Cases of individual hardship will be gone into.

The Government expressed readiness to make retrospective payment on the terms originally promised, but pointed out that the delay which would ensue was the reason for their offer of a fixed sum.

The men to whom was left the decision as to the form of retrospective pay accepted the fixed sum.

The Government are ready to extend the principle in their proposals to Ireland, with modifications for narrow gauge and road railways.

The movement, advocated by some Liberals and all Laborites, for the nationalization of the coal mines of the kingdom came to a head on Feb. 11 in the House of Commons, when a motion in favor of nationalization was defeated by a vote of 329 to 64.

EGYPT—On Jan. 19, Arian Yusuf Saad, who was found guilty of attempting the assassination of the Egyptian Premier last December, was sentenced to ten years' hard labor. On the same day the Milner Mission, after a fortnight's investigation at Alexandria, departed for Cairo. As a result of the visit a fusion was expected to take place between the mixed and the Consular Courts in regard to commercial and civil matters as well as in regard to jurisdiction in criminal matters and matters of personal status heretofore exercised by the Consular Courts, while the religious courts would be left untouched. For such a reform which will meet the native complaints the consent of the capitulatory powers will be necessary, but no opposition was expected on the part of foreign communities.

The schools were closed in Cairo on account of refractory pupils and three trains were derailed, including the Luxor-Cairo Express, but without loss of life. Aside from these cases and some isolated assaults on soldiers the Nationalist revolt confined itself to propaganda.

The Egyptian Government approved the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry into the scheme of irrigation throughout the Nile basin, evolved by the Egyptian Public Works Department, and into the rival scheme projected by the designer of the Assouan dam, Sir William Willcocks. The former includes the construction of a huge reservoir some twenty-five miles south of Khartum and of a dam at Senaar, about 150 miles from that point, in order to form a reserve for the flooding of the area between the Blue and White Niles, known as the Gezirth. Sir William would utilize a large depression in the Bahr El Ghazal region, which, he says, is a giant natural reservoir and could be used to supply Egypt "to the day of doom" and the Sudan "for many generations."

INDIA—In spite of the dispersal of the Mahsuds on the northwest frontier after an engagement with the British Derejat column on Jan. 10, in which the latter lost 380 and the enemy 330 in casualties of all sorts, isolated skirmishing continued, but without any approach to these losses.

According to advices from Bombay the news of Bolshevik domination of Turkestan profoundly moved India. The Bombay correspondent of The London Times wrote:

A survey of the military situation carries the conviction that India is immensely strong if the commands are given to young Generals versed in modern war. The public will not stint the Government for money if the nature of the Bolshevik menace is brought home to the people, but a much more vigorous campaign is necessary if the few Indian Nationalists who are coquetting with Bolshevism are to be effectively countered.

A more drastic policy also is required to remedy social injustice and lighten the cost of living, for India is now groaning under rampant profiteering. Any relaxation of the food control would be immediately followed by an unprincipled cornering of supplies, producing an atmosphere of justifiable discontent, favorable to the spread of the Bolshevik creed. The natural conservatism of the Indian temperament is a deadly enemy of Bolshevik ideas, but it would be overborne by the burden of the cost of living, which demands immediate redress.

Up to Jan. 20 there were no disorders in the great cotton mill strike involving 200,000 workers in the Bombay Presidency, but on that day, the eighteenth of the strike, rioters began to hold up vehicles and assault pedestrians, and the troops thereupon fired into one crowd, killing one and wounding several. The mill owners were prepared to grant the ten-hour day and a 50 per cent. advance in wages demanded, stipulating, however, that the workers should not strike again without a warning period in which differences might be adjusted without a strike. This the strikers declined to agree to.

IRELAND—Aside from the continuation of violence and outrage organized by the Sinn Fein and counter-raids by the constabulary two interesting events took place in Ireland. On Jan. 30, when the new Municipal Council met in Dublin, with 42 Sinn Fein members out of 80, the flag of the "Irish Republic" was hoisted on the City Hall. On Feb. 12, at the Royal Albert Hall, London, a Sinn Fein demonstration, under the protection of the police, was held demanding self-determination for Ireland. Prominent on the platform was Mrs. Despard, sister of Lord French, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whom the Sinn Fein attempted to assassinate on Dec. 19.

On Jan. 24 Dublin Castle issued a report showing that between May 1, 1916, and Dec. 31, 1919, 1,529 outrages were attributed to the Sinn Fein movement—134 in Ulster, 429 in Leinster, including Dublin; 205 in Connaught and 761 in Munster. The character of the outrages was designated as follows:

Murders of military, police and officials	18
Murders of civilians	2
Firing at police	50
Firing at military	13
Firing at civilians	14
Assaults on police	46
Assaults on civilians	17

MAP SHOWING RAILWAY THROUGH PORTUGUESE EAST AFRICA, WHICH WILL GIVE BRITISH NYASALAND AN OUTLET TO THE INDIAN OCEAN. THE ROAD WILL OPERATE UNDER A BRITISH GUARANTEE

NYASALAND AND NIGERIA—The first instance of a British official guarantee being given in respect to a railway traversing foreign territory in order to reach the coast and provide an ocean gateway for an inland British possession came about with the completion of the arrangements for the Beira-Zambezi Railway, which, starting from Nyasaland, is to cross Portuguese East Africa and reach the coast at the Lorenzo Marquez town of Beira.

In 1912 Northern and Southern Nigeria were amalgamated, thus forming the largest of the British Crown colonies and protectorates. It is one-third the size of British India, and has a population of 16,000,000 or 17,000,000. The first report on Nigeria was issued in the form of a White Paper on Jan. 26. The author is Sir F. D. Lugard.

The report says that while "cordially recognizing mission activity in pagan areas, the Government has desired to discourage propaganda in Moslem districts."

Discussing the question of slavery and free labor, Sir F. D. Lugard says that the sudden abolition of the institution of domestic slavery would have produced social chaos, and the wholesale assertion of their freedom if they choose; that the discouraged. Generally speaking, there are no slaves in the Moslem States who are not well aware that they can assert their freedom if they choose; that the native courts deal liberally and impartially with all cases, and that the masters not only acquiesce, but increasingly recognize the advantages of free labor, while all persons under 18 years of age are free born.

FRANCE

Jean Longuet, grandson of Karl Marx, and leader of the Socialist Party in France, who visited the United States last Autumn, qualified the defeat of the Socialists at the last general election by the following statement, issued Jan. 15:

I pray for a similar defeat for us at every election. It is true that instead of the 101 Socialists elected to the Chamber of Deputies at the election before the last we have now sixty-eight. But it is also true that instead of only 1,125,000 Socialist votes—the number that elected the 101 Socialist Deputies—at the last election we received 1,700,000 votes. * * * We not only increased in quantity of votes but in quality. The one and a quarter million votes that elected the 101 Socialist Deputies just before the war had a considerable number of merely protesting elements among them, so-called radicals, who cannot be considered Socialists at all. At the last election, however, thanks to the fire tests of war and our support of the cause of Soviet Russia, these people were purged out of our vote, and what remained was pure metal. We have now, therefore, a clear mandate for our representatives—Socialism.

To the list of Ministers of the Millerand Cabinet, announced Jan. 19, should be added the names of nine Under Secretaries of State as follows:

Presidence du Conseil—M. Reibel.
Finance—M. E. Brousse.
Provisions—M. R. Thoumyre.
Ports and Merchant Marine—M. Paul Bignon.
Hydraulic Power—M. Borrel.
Post and Telegraphs—M. L. Deschamps.
Agriculture—M. Queuille.
Air Department—M. P. E. Flandin.
Professional Tuition—M. Coupat.

On Jan. 22 M. Millerand outlined his program to the Chamber and suffered a moral defeat. The latter was not on account of his program, but because of the presence of M. Steeg as Minister of the Interior in the new Government, exception to whom was taken by Léon Daudet, who charged that Steeg had been associated with M. Malvy, the exiled statesman, in defeatist propaganda. The vote of confidence in the most significant division of the day was as follows:

Of the 595 members present only 275 voted for the Government and 297 refused to vote at all, while 23 were more positive in their opposition. Those who abstained included 180 members of the Entente Républicaine, 70 Socialists, and 47 members drawn from other parts of the Chamber. All the members of the old Clemenceau Government, as well as former Premiers Barthou, Briand, and Viviani, voted for the Government.

In answer to the Daudet attack on M. Steeg, M. Millerand said:

I am in complete political accord with the last Cabinet, the head of which did not hesitate to strike hard against the leaders of "defeatism." We are not men of one party. We invite the co-operation of all in the service of France. We shall be bound to no person. We are a Government of concord, and we mean to pursue a bold and sweeping social policy.

A resolution proposed by M. Daudet condemning the choice of M. Steeg as Minister of the Interior was rejected by 383 against 14, and an Order of the Day declaring that the Chamber approved the statement of M. Millerand explaining the Steeg appointment was adopted by 272 votes against 23. Subsequently the firm standing of the Millerand Government was confirmed. The Steeg question came up again on Jan. 30, when the vote for the Government was 510 to 70, and on Feb. 6, its foreign policy was sustained by a vote of 518 to 68.

The French custom that the General who is destined to command the armies in time of war should in peace be placed at the head of the General Staff was followed when the new Minister of War, on Jan. 25, reorganized the Supreme Council of War, with himself, M. André Lefevre, as President; Marshal Pétain as Vice President; General Buat, Chief of the General Staff, and Marshals Foch and Joffre, together with nine Divisional Generals.

On Feb. 12 Raoul Peret was elected President of the Chamber by 372 of the 425 votes cast, thus succeeding Paul Deschanel, elected President of the Republic on Jan. 17.

On Feb. 1, M. Maginot, Minister of Pensions, announced that 660,000 war pensions had been liquidated, but that nearly five times as many still remained to be settled, 1,975,000 being pensions for those disabled, 700,000 for widows and 550,000 for dependents. No pensions due civilian victims of the war had been settled.

On Jan. 27 M. Poincaré, then President, issued a decree creating a Supreme Council of Natalivity under M. Breton, Minister of Health and Social Welfare. On this subject M. Breton reported as follows to the Cabinet:

The lowness of the French birth rate, which becomes worse each year, endangers the existence of the nation. For a long time before the war France lacked men. French soil is one of the most fertile in the world, but is one of the least productive because of lack of labor. Because of the lack of men industry in France is obliged to depend more on immigration than any other European country. The war in depriving France of 2,000,000 young men has increased still more the danger which threatens the nation.

We have often studied this situation, which is unique with France; we have recognized that it is not due to one cause, but to a multiplicity of causes. Therefore, to combat it we must not resort to one remedy, but to many remedies, some of a moral nature, others of a national and economic nature.

We must not intrust this grave question, the gravest of all that confront us, to a temporary commission, irregularly convoked, but to a permanent organization meeting at fixed periods and equipped with sufficient means of inquiry and publicity.

A council will give its advice upon questions proposed by the Ministry or upon those which belong upon its calendar. It will prepare projects of law decrees and circulars which, it believes, should be presented to the Minister. It can call in authorities for consultation.

ITALY

The alternative of having President Wilson and Yugoslavia accept the Adriatic decision of the Premiers of Great Britain, France and Italy—reached on Jan. 20—or the application of the Treaty of London of April 26, 1915, was believed by Italian authority to refer only in so far as the Adriatic question was concerned, since other parts of the treaty had already been liquidated or were in the course of settlement. For example, it was not believed possible that the question of the concessions in Africa would be reopened if the decision of Jan. 20 were to be rejected at Washington and Belgrade. The African concessions to Italy include an expansion of Libya, Eritrea and Italian Somaliland, as explained in detail, with maps, on pages 482-4.

By Jan. 20 a railway strike, the most extensive in the history of the Peninsula, reached its greatest expansion. It had begun on Jan. 15. Not a wheel turned on Jan. 20. On that and the following days hundreds of strikers were arrested and the principal cities were placed under military law. The causes of the walk-out were very complicated, including a demand on the part of the strikers for higher wages, fewer hours of work, and, most important of all, Government recognition of the unions. The Government offered bonuses and reduced time of labor, but declined to recognize the unions.

The strike was not popular, and former soldiers volunteered in large numbers to break it. On Feb. 4 the strike ended by a complete victory for the Government. On the same day it was announced that the Sixth National Loan (5 per cent., opened Dec. 26) had reached over $2,500,000. On the same day also there was the greatest uproar among Deputies that the Chamber had witnessed in recent years. Socialists and Catholics flew at each other until Signor Orlando, President of the Chamber, suspended the sitting. The clash was precipitated by a Socialist Deputy, Signor Pandebliano, who accused the Government officials of hoarding oil.

On Jan. 24 the American Academy of Fine Arts at Rome, closed since Italy entered the war, resumed its normal work.

On Feb. 6 former Deputy Mondello received credentials as Minister Plenipotentiary and started for the United States on a special mission.

SPAIN

On Jan 24 the Spanish Government took energetic action against the strikes and the coercive measures practiced by the General Federation of Labor and against the lockouts resorted to by employers, all of which had produced a condition of anarchy in Barcelona and, to a smaller degree, in other cities. The dissolution of the federation was ordered, the employers were commanded to terminate the lockouts, and the threat was made that labor would be requisitioned by the authorities for public works and for transport of necessaries. Although independent of the movement of the federation, which is not a political organization, a sign of the times was noted in the municipal elections on Feb. 7, which, in a large majority of places, elected Socialist candidates. The Government's action of Jan. 24 broke up certain guilds of the federation, particularly those in public service and of the professional class; it enabled numbers of small employers and workmen to shake off the Employers' Congress on one hand and the federation of syndicates on the other.

Turkey's Coercion by Germany

THE proceedings of the secret Parliamentary committee investigating the acts of the Turkish wartime Ministers were published toward the end of January in Constantinople, revealing new details of Turkey's severance of diplomatic relations with the United States.

According to this evidence, the American Ambassador on April 4, 1917, informed the Turkish Finance Minister that the State Department at Washington saw no cause for a break, as relations were friendly. The Ambassador said that no cause for a break existed, unless Germany compelled Turkey to forward secret reports bearing on the United States. Germany at first preferred that Turkey should not break with America, according to the Ambassador, but later suddenly changed her attitude.

On April 7 the Austrian Ambassador informed the Sublime Porte that Austria was breaking relations with the United States, and insisted upon immediate action by Turkey. Most of the members of the Cabinet were afraid of burning all their bridges on the hope of German victory. The Germans made the pretext that military intelligence leaked through the American Embassy, but the real reason for urging the break was said to be the desire to diminish Turkey's opportunities for a future separate peace.

Turkey, through the Turkish Ambassador at Berlin, notified Herr Zimmermann, the German Foreign Secretary, that Turkey was unable to break relations with the United States, citing only military reasons. The German Minister was not satisfied, and replied that America would not declare war if Turkey broke of relations. Germany insisted, and Turkey complied, eventually, after delaying the matter for a time by demanding that Bulgaria act first.

The secret reports show that the Cabinet successfully resisted the German demand for the seizure of all American institutions after the departure of the American Ambassador.

Hungary and the Treaty of Neuilly

Peace Terms Imposed by the Allies Cause Consternation and Protest—Elections Foreshadow a New Monarchy

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

THE new Hungarian Government under Premier Huszar began its career, facing many problems by no means easy of solution, among others that of ratifying the Peace Treaty between the allied Governments and the Magyar Republic, which Count Apponyi, head of the Hungarian peace delegation, brought back to Budapest from Neuilly soon after the middle of January. The main features of the treaty are as follows:

Hungary recognizes the full independence of the State of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes and the Czechoslovak State; the frontiers between Hungary and the State of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes and Rumania will be determined by a commission composed of seven members, five of whom will be appointed by the principal allied and associated powers, one by the interested State and one for Hungary.

Hungary renounces in favor of Italy, the State of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, Rumania and the Czechoslovak State all rights and claims on the territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy recognized as being an integral part of these States.

Rumania accepts the dispositions that the principal allied and associated powers judge necessary for the protection in Rumania of the interests of the inhabitants who differ from the majority of the population by race, language or religion. She agrees also to clauses framed for the protection of the freedom of transit and an equitable régime for the trade of other nations.

The Czechoslovak State undertakes not to erect any military works on the part of its territory situated on the right bank of the Danube to the south of Bratislava.

Hungary renounces all rights and claims to Fiume and the adjacent territory belonging to the former Hungarian Kingdom and comprised within the boundaries which will be ultimately fixed, and she undertakes to recognize the stipulations which will be made on this subject.

Hungary renounces in favor of Austria all her rights in territories of the old Hungarian Kingdom situated beyond the boundaries fixed today.

The military clauses are identical with those contained in the treaty of Saint Germain, except on two points. The total number of the Hungarian military forces is fixed at 35,000 men. No heavy guns are permitted—that is to say, guns of a larger calibre than 105 millimeters.

As to reparations, the provisions are the same as those in the treaty of Saint Germain, except that Hungary is to give the allied powers an option on the annual delivery of railway coal for the period of five years, the amount to be fixed by the Reparations Commission, and the coal to go to the State of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes.

Regarding the proportion and character of the financial obligations of Hungary which will be borne by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Rumania and Czechoslovakia, by virtue of territory placed under their sovereignty, these will be decided upon in conformity with the financial clauses of the present treaty, which are identical with those of the Treaty of Saint Germain, except for two additions.

The provisions by which Hungary must undertake to support the allied armies of occupation in her territory are not to apply to military operations subsequent to Nov. 3, 1918, without the consent of the principal allied and associated powers. In this case the Reparations Commission will fix the share of the expense to be borne by Hungary.

On the other hand, it is laid down that the Hungarian Government must guarantee to pay in addition to the Hungarian public debt, part of the Austrian debt representing her contribution to the general debt of Austria-Hungary.

The economic clauses are identical with those of the Treaty of Saint Germain, except as to some points of detail concerning economic relations between Austria and Hungary.

EFFECT IN HUNGARY

Publication of these terms caused an uproar in Hungary. A statement issued by Count Apponyi on his arrival in Vienna, implying that the treaty in the form dictated would never be signed, read in part as follows:

Concerning internal physical conditions of Hungary, we have been pillaged of everything. In the first place, we had the hardships of war; secondly, we had two Communist administrations when all our money was spent abroad for propaganda; and, thirdly, the Rumanians robbed us of manufacturing machinery, even printing plants and railroad equipment, so that we now have but twenty-seven locomotives.

Our agricultural interests, which the Central European powers ruined by taking away our live stock, are in a condition of general devastation beyond the River Theiss.

I tried to make Premier Lloyd George and others see that it was in the general interest of humanity to assist us and that cutting us up was an economic crime. Under the terms of this treaty we should have no wood, lumber, coal.

The Hungarian press declared: "The treaty condemns us to ruin." "It is an injustice that cries to Heaven." "It is annihilating." "It is bound to fall to the ground of its own weight." In a speech delivered on Jan. 19 Premier Huszar said:

Hungary's coffin is being built at Neuilly. We are impotent, but never for a moment will we renounce our claims. We will wait until we are strong again, and then convert our enemies by diplomacy—not by arms—confident in our historic powers of resistance and endurance.

The military terms of the treaty were denounced as impossible by Hungary's military representative at Neuilly, who asserted in a memorandum to the Entente plenipotentiaries that the army of 35,000 men allowed by the treaty was insufficient to maintain order in the interior in view of the conditions obtaining, or to protect the frontiers against the Bolsheviks and insure the execution of the obligations which the treaty demanded. Count Apponyi, who was engaged in writing Hungary's answer, said in Budapest on Jan. 27:

There are sixty absurdities in the proposed treaty. One of these takes away all our wood and iron ore, while another demands that we give wood and ore to the Austrians. As for the economic conditions, we know that we can never fulfill them.

Daily demonstrations occurred in Budapest at the end of January against this "peace without honor"; parades were organized, in which the Cross of St. Stephen was borne amid the singing of the national anthem, and patriotic plays were given at the theatres.

ALLIES EXTEND THE TIME

A request for an extension of time to consider the treaty terms, on the ground that most of the delegates were members of the Hungarian Assembly, which would not meet until Feb. 7, was granted on Jan. 31, the limit being extended first to Feb. 12, then to Feb. 20. Count Apponyi and his colleagues on the peace delegation left Budapest for Paris on Feb. 10, in company with General Bandholtz, the United States Military representative; on his departure Count Apponyi expressed regret that America had no voice in the peace negotiations, and declared that only a plebiscite could justly determine the national boundaries of Hungary. He stated that he would make the request for such a plebiscite his principal plea. Hungary, he said in Vienna, would never recognize the rights of conquerors to annex forcibly Hungarian territory. It was his intention to show that forceful annexation was the aim of the powers. He complained bitterly of the methods of "secret diplomacy" followed in Paris, by which he had been prevented from visiting his relatives or seeing newspaper correspondents, implying that the Council of Powers was afraid to face the light of publicity in its predetermined intention to seize Hungarian land.

The second extension of time was granted by the Allies when the Hungarian delegates at Paris presented a 500-page letter contending that the treaty as it stood contained such fundamental and grave errors that "it should be totally rejected." The delegation was allowed eight more days in which to prepare details of a treaty such as it had outlined in this long letter. The conquered were, in fact, proposing terms to the conquerors. The willingness of the Allies to hear their plea was understood to be due, in part at least, to the acknowledged wrong done to Hungary by the Rumanian Army, which had looted the country and was still occupying one-third of it in defiance of seventeen separate Peace Conference ultimatums.

Brig. Gen. H. H. Bandholtz, an American who had been six months in Budapest as a member of the Interallied Commission of Control, stated in Paris on Feb. 12 that the Rumanian Army was still on the Theiss River, where it had no right to be, since the boundary fixed by the Peace Conference was fifty miles further east. He said that wherever they had been in Hungary the Rumanians had taken away almost everything movable under the guise of requisitions. He was largely instrumental in carrying out the Peace Conference order that account be kept of everything the Rumanians took away. In Budapest he left an indexed record of all that went across the Theiss River bridges. One item was 35,000 freight cars. This record was kept by the Peace Conference for the purpose of charging against Rumania's share of the war indemnities all the goods she took out of Hungary.

HUNGARY AS IT WILL BE UNDER THE TREATY OF NEUILLY

Rumania asserts that what she took was only in repayment for what was taken from her, but, as General Bandholtz points out, Rumania has put Hungary in a position where she cannot produce or pay her indemnity. Rumania has made Hungary a liability for the rest of Europe rather than an asset.

SENTIMENT FOR A MONARCHY

Returns of the elections to the Hungarian National Assembly, held in the week beginning Jan. 25, showed a sweeping defeat for the Socialist elements, the Nationalists and Peasant Party electing a great majority of the members. Approximately 95 per cent. of the votes were cast for a monarchical form of government. The Premier, on Jan. 29, declared that Hungary would undoubtedly be a monarchy, and that the new King would be chosen immediately after the National Assembly convened. It would, however, he stated, be premature to mention the names of those considered for the throne. The Royalist Party was divided into two factions, one favoring a native Hungarian, the other a member of a foreign dynasty, as the new ruler. Archduke Joseph declared in Budapest on Jan. 30 that it would be a dangerous experiment to establish a monarchy in Hungary while the rest of the world was in such a state of revolutionary unrest. A formal announcement that the allied Governments would not permit the restoration of the Hapsburg dynasty in Hungary, was issued by the Council of Ambassadors in Paris on Feb. 2.

Further trials of former terrorists under the Bela Kun régime were announced in Budapest to begin on Feb. 2. Sensational reports that the new Hungarian Government had executed as many as 5,000 persons charged with terrorism were emphatically denied by Count Apponyi on Jan. 31. In this connection he said:

I have implicit confidence in the Judges, who are moving so slowly that there have been only twenty-seven executions for murder so far, which is a small number when it is remembered that the Communists killed several thousand persons. Nobody is being arrested for opinions, but for acts.

Hungary is in a state of self-defense against the Red terror, just as America, which is deporting Bolsheviki. With semi-Bolshevist Governments at Vienna and Prague, and also agents coming in from Russia, all preparing to subvert the peace of Europe, we are bound to be careful.

Poland and Bolshevik Peace

Isolation of the New State Leads to Consideration of Peace Negotiations With Soviet Russia

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

WITH the defeat of the army of General Yudenitch on the Petrograd front, the rout of the Siberian forces of Admiral Kolchak and the driving back of General Denikin in the South, the Moscow Government turned its attention to those Baltic States which were still in arms against it. Latvia and Lithuania, both small and relatively weak States, still held firm against the Bolsheviki, but the larger State of Esthonia, lured by offers of recognition of its autonomy, accepted the Soviet peace overtures, and finally concluded an armistice, which developed into peace. By this defection of Esthonia, Poland, the most powerful of the border States, was left practically isolated; its population was suffering from typhus and other epidemics due to hunger, cold, lack of food, clothing and vital necessities, and in this crisis its army was left to stem the Bolshevik tide practically alone.

Indications came from various quarters that the allied nations, as well as the United States, realized fully the seriousness of the situation which Poland faced under the threat of an announced Bolshevik drive in the Spring, the danger from which seemed so extreme to the new Polish Foreign Minister, M. Patek, that immediately after assuming office he left Warsaw to lay an appeal for assistance before the allied representatives in Paris and London.

It was declared by General Tasker H. Bliss on Jan. 15, before the House Ways and Means Committee, that Poland was "the only bulwark against Bolshevism." Secretary Baker supplemented this with a statement that definite plans for furnishing Poland with war materials and food to aid in checking the westward spread of Bolshevism were being considered by the United States and by the allied Governments. He said our Government favored such action; to furnish food and supplies to Poland would be to protect civilization. Both Mr. Baker and General Bliss joined in urging the immediate grant of the $150,000,000 recommended by Mr. Hoover for the relief of Poland and other parts of Europe. The official attitude of the American Government toward the granting of such aid to Poland was set forth in an authorized statement by Secretary Baker, published on Jan. 21, in which he emphasized the understanding that such assistance would be conditioned wholly on the defensive and nonimperialistic attitude of the Polish Government.

The Polish military situation toward the end of December was as follows: Poland's army, under the supreme command of General Pilsudski, head of the Polish Government, was holding a long front, extending from Marienburg in the province of Livonia, along the Dvina, across Poland, and through Ukrainian territory to the Rumanian frontier. Poland was negotiating with the Ukrainian Government to establish a military alliance with that republic. The co-operation of the Letts, who had shown brilliant military capacity in evicting the Russo-German forces of Colonel Avalov-Bermond, and in driving the Bolsheviks out of Letgalen (Eastern Latvia), was also being sought. American help for the Polish Army in the way of clothing reached Poland on Feb. 1, when 100 carloads of war materials, including a large supply of underwear, socks and sweaters supplied by the American Red Cross, and army uniforms for 300,000 men, arrived. It was said that American uniforms were being worn by most of the Polish Army at the front, of which some 70,000 men were estimated to be naturalized Americans.

Toward the beginning of February, after an attempted concentration by the Bolsheviks of large numbers of Soviet troops north of the Dvina River had been prevented by attacks of Polish units, both the Polish and the Bolshevik armies were compelled to abandon military operations, owing, it was said, to unfavorable weather conditions.

It was learned in London on Feb. 2 that the Polish Government, subject to approval by the Allies, was considering an offer of peace made to Poland by Lenin, Trotzky and Foreign Minister Tchitcherin. This offer had been made by Moscow wireless in the last week of January, and embodied overtures toward a friendly settlement of all disputes and outstanding difficulties between Soviet Russia and Poland. M. Sapieha, the Polish Minister to London, stated that the decision as to this offer would be referred to the Polish Diet after it heard the result of M. Patek's discussions in London and Paris.

It was asserted in the offer that the Soviet Government, from the first, had recognized the independence and sovereignty of the Polish Republic, and that this action would be confirmed at the February meeting of the Supreme Executive Committee of the Soviet. Further, it was declared there was no territorial, economic, or other question which could not be solved peacefully by negotiations, concessions, and mutual agreement, such as were being arranged with Esthonia.

Poland's formal reply to the Soviet Government was sent on Feb. 6 by M. Patek. It was as follows:

The Polish Government acknowledges the receipt of the wireless declaration of the Government of the Russian Soviet Republic, dated Jan. 29, 1920. That declaration will be considered, and the answer will be communicated to the Russian Soviet Government.

In the meantime the Polish Foreign Office had obtained the consent of the allied and associated powers to such negotiations. The Polish Minister to the United States, Prince Casimir Lubomirski, had announced in Washington on Feb. 3 that the Polish Diet would sign a peace treaty with the Moscow authorities if they would guarantee that Bolshevik propaganda would not be carried on in Poland and other European countries.

POLAND WEDDED TO THE SEA

The modest seaside village of Putzig on the Baltic coast was the scene of a unique ceremony on Feb. 11, when a detachment of Polish cavalry, with General Haller at its head, rode fetlock deep into the sea as part of a historic ceremony symbolizing the fact that Poland's writ once more runs to the water's edge, and that its ancient kingdom is regained.

Early in the morning Polish troops, completing the occupation of the "corridor," which separates West Prussia from the free city of Danzig, reached Putzig, where shortly afterward arrived General Haller, who commanded the Polish legion which won its spurs in France, and a number of members of the Polish Parliament from Warsaw. From the wide countryside tens of thousands of people assembled to welcome the warriors whose deeds helped to bring them freedom.

At every half mile along the scores of miles of approaching avenues garlands were stretched across the roads from tree to tree, and in every village the school children threw floral greetings beneath the horses' hoofs. At Putzig was formed a long cavalcade which moved toward the Strand. Varicolored and picturesque were the human elements in the scene. Three companies of marine infantry in British khaki, with naval caps, kept the lines. Behind were aligned several squadrons of cavalry with their pennons and infantry in French horizon blue and steel helmets. Here and there were Catholic priests in gorgeous vestments, and Polish societies, each carrying a multicolored banner.

Filling the great space of greensward behind were tens of thousands, all in the decorous black of Polish Sabbath and high holiday wear.

In this strange drama one figure, that of General Haller on horseback, detached itself, and then rode down to the beach into the sea, where there closed around him a group of staff officers. The General paused a moment, looked with a gaze that seemed to pierce the mist over the face of the waters, then turned toward the assembled multitude, and in a few ringing sentences told how after 138 years Poland had once again returned to the sea.

Then the horses splashed their way back to dry land. The riders dismounted, and closed around the flag-staff. Officers made a way for a dozen color bearers, each holding aloft the standard of a Polish regiment. The Polish marine flag was dedicated by a Catholic Bishop and was hoisted. Simultaneously great guns roared out a salute, whose thunder must have been carried to the Prussian side.

Once more General Haller stepped forward, drew from his finger a golden ring and threw it far out into the water, saying as he did so:

"As Venice so symbolized its marriage with the Adriatic, so we Poles symbolize our marriage with our dear Baltic Sea."

Russia a Problem for the Allies

Soviet Government, Triumphant on All Fronts, Rejects Trade With Entente Nations Unless Based on an Armistice

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

IN the first six weeks of 1920 the Moscow Government consolidated its successes on all former anti-Bolshevist fronts except East Lettland. The Yudenitch army, utterly demoralized, disintegrated by wholesale desertions to the Soviet Army, was eliminated as a military factor; the Kolchak army, driven headlong toward the east, was forced to abandon Siberia to the Bolshevik forces; Kolchak himself was captured by the Reds and put to death in Irkutsk; Vladivostok was seized by a group of revolutionists, and a Soviet republic was set up in Kamchatka and Sakhalin. The Bolshevik campaign in Turkestan and Transcaspia was carried on energetically, and Krasnovodsk was captured; the Bolsheviks won new successes in the Caspian, Don and Black Sea regions, and Denikin's forces were crowded back into a small area between Odessa, which the Red Army entered on Feb. 8, and a point on the railway line southwest of Tsaritsin.

After a month's armistice* with Esthonia, renewable from week to week, peace was finally signed with the Esthonian Government on Jan. 29, and peace overtures were made to Poland; these offers, with the sanction of the allied Governments, were seriously considered by the Polish Government, the difficulties of whose position, in face of famine, cold, epidemics, and the threat of an overwhelming Bolshevik invasion in the Spring, were fully recognized by the Entente Powers.

The most surprising development of the month under review was the announcement of the Allies that they intended to raise the blockade of Soviet Russia and to resume trade through the Russian Co-operative Societies, whose representatives in Paris and London had declared direct trading without recognition of the Soviet Government to be feasible. Like other attempted solutions of the Russian problem, including the famous Prinkipo Conference, this project died before it was born; Lenin and Trotzky promptly made it apparent that any trade with the Russian people without recognition of the Soviet Government would be combated. The Co-operative representatives in Paris soon admitted that they had not been able to obtain the expected sanction of the Moscow authorities to a trade arrangement, and the latter declared officially that they would sink all allied vessels attempting to initiate trade without the prior conclusion of an armistice.

The disbanded troops of General Yudenitch in Esthonia were reported in the middle of January to be in a sorry plight, ragged, hungry, ravaged by epidemic, the object of Esthonian hostility, demoralized by Bolshevik propaganda, leading to constant desertions to the Reds. General Rodzianko, who commanded them under Yudenitch, left for England to lay their case before the British Government. General Yudenitch himself, as the result of a private feud with Colonel Balakhovitch, was arrested as a reactionary, but subsequently, following an allied protest to Esthonia, was released.

NEW BALTIC CONFERENCE

A new Baltic conference, composed of representatives of Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania and Poland, was opened at Helsingfors on Jan. 15. The two main objects of discussion were the danger of a Czarist Russia and the possibility of a joint union of the Baltic States to resist the advance of Bolshevism. This conference from the start met with great difficulties; first, because of the hostility which had arisen between Poland and Lithuania over alleged Polish encroachments on Lithuanian territory, especially in Vilna and Grodno, and, secondly, because of the unwillingness of Esthonia to bind herself not to conclude peace with the Bolshevik authorities. It was stated on Jan. 20 that the only result of the conference was the appointment of a commission to work out a scheme of defensive alliance. The Lithuanians withdrew soon after the conference began, declaring that they would not sit in council with the Poles. The Poles asserted their intention of waging war on Soviet Russia, while Esthonia's delegates upheld their country's right to make peace with the Lenin Government after the expiration of the Dorpat armistice. It was surmised that Esthonia's sole motive in taking part in the Helsingfors conference was the gaining of a stronger position in the Dorpat negotiations; it was subsequently stated that the Bolshevik envoys at Dorpat, alive to the possibilities of such a defensive alliance as that discussed at Helsingfors, had accepted certain important features of Esthonia's peace terms which they had previously rejected.

ESTHONIA'S PEACE TREATY

A separate peace between Esthonia and the Bolshevik Government was concluded at Dorpat on Jan. 29. The treaty provided, inter alia, that no concession made to Esthonia should be made a precedent when other border States came to negotiate; Esthonia, on her part, stipulated that any rights or privileges given to such other States should automatically also accrue to herself. Diplomatic and commercial relations were to be resumed forthwith. A commercial treaty was to be entered into on the basis of the most-favored-nation clauses. Esthonia was prohibited from exacting taxes or duties on goods arriving in her ports for Soviet Russia or tolls in transit. The right to use the Narova River waterfalls was given to the Soviet Republic, which in turn lent Esthonia 16,000,000 rubles in gold and gave her concessions for the construction of a railway from Reval to Moscow, materials for building the line, and 300 locomotives. Both the Esthonian and Bolshevik delegates at Dorpat showed great jubilation over the making of peace, and celebrated the event with banquets and speeches.

The Letts meanwhile, though disconcerted by the announcement of the abortive scheme to trade with Russia, definitely refused to make peace with the Soviets and proceeded with their nationalist program of clearing Latvia, especially Lettgalia (East Lettland), of Bolshevik forces. In a statement issued by the Lettish Legation in London on Feb. 9 it was definitely announced that this object, after hard and continuous fighting, had been attained. All suggestions of peace with the Soviets were deferred by the Letts until a new conference of Baltic States could be called in April.

LITHUANIA'S STATUS

The Lithuanians were reported on Jan. 21 to be so resentful toward Poland for occupying Lithuanian territory that at the Helsingfors Conference they proposed an alliance of Esthonia, Latvia, and Lithuania against the Poles. It was when this proposal was rejected that they withdrew from the discussions. It was stated that this smallest of the Baltic States was contemplating an armistice with the Bolshevik Government. Meanwhile her national claims for recognition as a republic were rejected by the United States. In Washington, on Feb. 9, Secretary of State Lansing made public the text of two official communications in which the United States, replying to requests of the Lithuanian Government, had refused to grant provisional recognition to Lithuania. The first letter was dated Oct. 15; the second, dated Jan. 7, declined, on the ground of nonrecognition, to attribute a diplomatic status to Lithuanian agents in Washington. The same policy had been adopted in regard to Ukraina, Esthonia, and other would-be independent republics set up on former Russian territory.

Alarming internal conditions were reported from Esthonia and the other Baltic States on Jan. 17; over 12,000 were stricken with typhus in Esthonia alone, and it was estimated toward the end of January that there were 1,000,000 cases of this disease throughout the Russian border States. Large numbers of the sick in Esthonia were former members of the Yudenitch Army.

The conference held between Litvinov, the Bolshevik delegate, and Mr. O'Grady, the British representative, in Copenhagen, remained, after protracted negotiations, in a virtual state of deadlock, the British representative declaring the Soviet demands regarding prisoners to be impossible; Great Britain refused to yield to the Bolshevik demand that the exchange of prisoners be extended to other countries where Russian prisoners were interned. Arrangements to send warm clothing and food to the British prisoners in Soviet Russia, however, were concluded. The negotiations were complicated on Jan. 22, when Litvinov appealed to his Government to transfer the discussions to another country, in view of the fact that virtually every hotel in Copenhagen after hard and continuous fighting, had hagan had refused to receive him. An agreement was finally reached, however, on Feb. 12, by which all prisoners on both sides were to be released at once. Great Britain agreed to furnish transportation.

REDS WIN IN SOUTH

Soon after the beginning of January a swift and startling change took place in the military situation in South Russia. The steady advance of the Bolsheviks in the Donetz Basin had made it necessary for General Denikin to remove the general headquarters and the allied missions from Taganrog, on the Sea of Azov, and the political centre from Rostov, on the Don. The retreat of the Denikin armies was partly forced by the skillful use of cavalry under the Bolshevik leader, Budenni, and partly was the result of rebellion in Denikin's rear. Rostov fell on Jan. 9; 10,000 prisoners and vast stores of booty were taken. General Denikin and his staff left for Novorossisk the night before. On Jan. 7, the Russian Christmas Day, Denikin had come to Rostov and attended services at the cathedral; even then the sound of gunfire could be distinctly heard to the north of the town. The volunteer army was holding the line from Nikopol to Melitopol, north of the Crimea. These positions also fell shortly prior to Jan. 15. Despite

BLACK LINE SHOWS EXTENT OF REGION CONTROLLED BY SOVIET RUSSIA SINCE ITS MILITARY SUCCESSES AGAINST KOLCHAK AND DENIKIN

Denikin's desperate attempts, the Soviet advance could not be stayed; place after place was captured, and soon Denikin had taken refuge in Yalta, in the Crimea. The Moscow Government, on Feb. 8, declared that Bolshevist troops had entered Odessa, which had been partly evacuated, many of the sick and refugees being taken on board British warships. A large part of the Denikin garrison had surrendered. A portion of Denikin's army was retreating southward; another portion, headed north, was being protected by the long-distance fire of British warships.

On the eastern flank the Bolshevist success was also pronounced, the Denikin forces being driven southwest from Tsaritsyn. In the Transcaspien region, despite British bombardments from the sea, the City of Krasnovodsk, on the Caspian, said to be the key to Persia and India, was taken by the Bolsheviks.

DEBACLE IN SIBERIA

As a result of the rout of the Kolchak armies along the Trans-Siberian Railway all resistance to the Red Army ceased before the end of January. Despite bombardment by armored trains of General Semenov, successor of Kolchak as Supreme Commander, Irkutsk, the last refuge of the former Kolchak Government, remained in the hands of insurgents, whose Bolshevist sympathies were later to be evidenced in the case of Kolchak. The allied missions were assured of their safety by the arrival of a Japanese battalion which occupied the Irkutsk Station shortly prior to Jan. 2. When the missions left Irkutsk on Jan. 5 virtually all the Kolchak Government troops had joined the insurgents. The Moscow Government issued a statement that Kolchak had been taken prisoner, and, in common with all other captured anti-Bolshevist Generals, would be court-martialed and shot.

EXECUTION OF KOLCHAK

It was later learned by the Entente Governments that the person of Admiral Kolchak had been surrendered to the Bolsheviks by General Janin, the Czechoslovak commander in Siberia. This news produced a stir in Paris and London. Premier Millerand on Jan. 28 telegraphed to General Janin demanding an explanation and ordering him to take steps to secure Kolchak's liberation. Reports from Harbin declared that Czech reports on the situation at Irkutsk, telegraphed to General Janin at Verkhnie-Udinsk, where Kolchak was staying, had induced him to consent to the latter's surrender. The Czechs asserted that it was a choice between surrendering one man and a conflict in which they themselves were likely to be completely annihilated. The request made by the Japanese to turn Kolchak over to them for protection was refused, and a similar request made of the insurgents at Irkutsk, to whom he was first delivered, was also rejected. A profound sensation was caused throughout the Far East by the news that Kolchak had been given up, and one Russian officer challenged General Janin to a duel.

After a silence of two weeks concerning the fate of Admiral Kolchak the British Government received official confirmation of the rumors of his execution. The Admiral, with one of his Ministers, M. Pepelaiyev, had been shot at Irkutsk at 5 o'clock in the morning of Feb. 7. The revolutionary committee at Irkutsk had decided at 2 A. M. that both officials should be executed. The meagre information on the subject indicated that the Reds had hastened the shooting of their prisoners in the belief that forcible efforts were to be made for their rescue.

REVOLTS SPREAD TO PACIFIC

The spirit of revolt against the former Kolchak régime grew ever more pronounced, and was combined with the parallel development of Bolshevism. On Jan. 10 a bloodless revolution broke out at Petropavlovsk in Kamchatka Peninsula, where the military, in league with the population, arrested all officers and civil officials, and set up a Soviet. Revolution broke out anew in Eastern Siberia at the end of January; the report sent to Washington by General Graves, the American commander, stated that the revolutionaries had entered Vladivostok; no attempt had been made to attack the allied troops, who were patroling the streets to maintain order. The insurgents were not identified by General Graves as Bolsheviki, and the revolution, it was stated, would not interfere with the departure of American troops from Vladivostok, which had begun in January. The country outside the city, however, was in the hands of the Bolsheviki, whose power was growing daily; from a point west of Irkutsk, where the Czech forces were hemmed in on both sides by Reds and forced to do battle at great odds, to the far-off peninsula of Kamchatka and the island of Sakhalin, the capture of whose capital, Alexandrovsk, by Siberian Bolsheviki, threatening Japan, was reported on Feb. 9, the ever-increasing menace of the spread of Bolshevism could not be denied.

THREAT TO JAPAN

With the fall of the capital of the island of Sakhalin, ceded in part to Japan after the Russo-Japanese war, the Bolshevik threat to Japan became clearly crystallized. On Jan. 25 the Japanese Premier, after receiving from the American Government on Jan. 16 its decision to withdraw its armed forces from Siberia, stated in answer to interpellations in the Japanese Diet that the position of Japan in the Far East was very different from that of the United States, and that immediate withdrawal of the Japanese forces was impossible. A statement issued by the Japanese Publicity Bureau of Vladivostok, summarizing Japanese press comment, said:

Single-handed opposition to the Bolsheviki in Siberia is an exceedingly heavy burden on Japan, both in a military sense and financially. However, it is unthinkable that Japan would withdraw her forces from Siberia and thus abandon to the Reds country contiguous to her own territory. * * * With the important railway centres guarded, Japan can follow the trend of events and of popular feeling and can form a definite policy accordingly.

In this guarding of railway communications, General Graves, the American commander, was co-operating with the Japanese. From the railway sectors a part of the American forces in process of withdrawal had been moved toward Vladivostok, but assurances were given Japan that no further withdrawals would be made until Japan was able to replace those removed. The first American contingent sailed on Jan. 17 for Manila. It was stated in Tokio on Jan. 20 that the Advisory Diplomatic Council had decided also to withdraw its forces as soon as practicable, in approval of the Cabinet decision not to stem the Bolshevik tide in Siberia alone.

ALLIED TRADE WITH RUSSIA

The great problem left unsolved was the policy to be adopted by the allied nations in dealing with the people of Russia without recognizing the Bolshevik régime. The official announcement of the scheme of reopening trade with Russia through the Co-operative Societies, as published on Jan. 16, was followed by a period of doubt, especially in Scandinavia and the Baltic States; but the various statements implying that the Co-operatives' representatives in Russia had gained Moscow's consent to such trade were soon contradicted by the Soviet Government's threat to sink all ships attempting to bring cargoes without the preliminary conclusion of an armistice with the Bolshevik Government, and by the action of Lenin and Trotzky in seizing absolute control of the Co-operatives' organization in Russia. The Co-operative officials in Paris on Jan. 24 admitted that their hopes of gaining the Soviet Government's sanction of the project had not materialized. By Feb. 6 the situation had developed to the point where it was a choice between peace with the Soviets and no trade relations with Russia. Despite this unfavorable outlook, Premier Millerand on that date, before the Chamber of Deputies, maintained anew that trade with Russia did not mean the making of peace; this view was confirmed by an important statement made by Lloyd George before the House of Commons on Feb. 10.

STATEMENT OF BRITISH PREMIER

In a long and interesting explanation of the Government's policy the British Premier said that he agreed with the view that Europe could not be restored without putting Russia, with all her strength and resources, "into circulation." He continued:

Until assured that the Bolsheviks have dropped the methods of barbarism in favor of civilized government, no civilized community in the world is prepared to make peace with them. Further, there is no established Government possessing the right to speak for the whole of European Russia. We failed to restore Russia to sanity by force. I believe we can save her by trade.

Commerce has a sobering influence. There is nothing to fear from a Bolshevik invasion of surrounding countries or the Middle East, because the Bolsheviks cannot organize a powerful army. I believe that trading will bring to an end the ferocity, rapine and cruelties of Bolshevism more surely than any other method, and Europe badly needs what Russia is able to supply but cannot supply with contending armies moving across the borders.

The dangers are not all in Russia; they are here at home. I speak with knowledge, with apprehension and responsibility, and I warn the House that in the face of things which may happen we must use every legitimate weapon. We must fight anarchy with abundance.

This statement was received in the allied countries, as well as in the United States, with the keenest interest, but with considerable mystification as to how the reopening of trade could be accomplished without recognition of the Bolshevik régime. The existence of a certain current of feeling in favor of a resumption of United States trade with Russia was evidenced by a meeting at New York on Feb. 2 of more than a hundred representatives of American business firms, who had organized the American Commercial Association to Promote Trade with Russia. The Executive Committee of this new organization was directed to start mandamus proceedings in the Federal courts if Secretary of State Lansing continued to refuse permission for a resumption of commerce with the Soviet Government. It had been previously stated by L. C. A. K. Martens, the so-called Soviet Ambassador to the United States, that a large number of American business firms had accepted Soviet trade offers through his embassy. At the meeting of the new association a strong feeling that Great Britain was preparing to gain commercial advantage in Russia before the United States lifted the trade embargo was repeatedly expressed.

Bolshevist Horrors in Odessa

By the Rev. R. COURTIER-FORSTER

[FORMER BRITISH CHAPLAIN AT ODESSA AND THE BLACK SEA PORTS]

In a series of articles published in The London Times, Dec. 8-10, 1919, the Rev. R. Courtier-Forster gave a vivid picture of the atrocities committed by the Bolsheviki at Odessa during his stay in that city, crimes paralleled only in the persecution of Nero's time. The essential portions of these articles, here presented, paint an appalling picture of human degeneracy, and take on a fresh interest in view of the fact that Odessa has again fallen into the hands of the Reds.

DO English people really imagine that the published accounts of the appalling atrocities and brutal tyranny of the Bolshevist rule in Russia are an exaggeration? Before God I wish I could believe they are not true to the actual facts. Could I but find them untrue, I would speak for the Bolshevists from end to end of England. Unhappily, I have spent nearly a year in Soviet Russia, and was in the hapless country over seven years before that.

While I was still British chaplain of Odessa the city was deluged with blood. When the Bolshevist elements, grafting on to their main support the 4,000 criminals released from the city jails, attempted to seize the town, people of education, regardless of social position, offered what armed resistance was in their power. Workmen, shop assistants, soldiers, professional men, and a handful of officers fought for liberty through the streets of the great port for three days and nights against the bloody despotism of the Bolshevists. Trams were overturned to make barricades, trenches dug in the streets, machine guns placed in the upper windows of houses to mow the thoroughfares with fire. The place became an inferno. The Bolsheviki were victorious. On capturing the Odessa Railway Station, which had been defended by a few officers and a number of anti-Bolshevist soldiers, the Bolshevists bayoneted to death the nineteen wounded and helpless men laid on the waiting room floor to await Red Cross succor.

Scores of other men who fell wounded in the streets also became victims to the triumphant Bolshevist criminals. The majority of these wretched sufferers completely disappeared. Inquiries at the hospitals and prisons revealed the fact that they were not there, and no trace of them was to be found. A fortnight later there was a terrible storm on the Black Sea, and the bodies of the missing men were washed up on the rocks of Odessa breakwater and along the shore; they had been taken out to sea in small boats, stones tied to their feet, and then dropped over alive into deep water. Hundreds of others were captured and taken on board the Almaz and the Sinope, the largest cruisers of the Black Sea Fleet. Here they became victims of unthinkable tortures.

VICTIMS ROASTED ALIVE

On the Sinope General Chormichoff and some other personal friends of my own were fastened one by one with iron chains to planks of wood and pushed slowly, inch by inch, into the ship's furnaces and roasted alive. Others were tied to winches, the winches turned until the men were torn in two alive. Others were taken to the boilers and scalded with boiling steam; they were then moved to another part of the ship and ventilating fans set revolving that currents of cold air might blow on the scalds and increase the agony of the torture. The full names of seventeen of the Sinope victims were given me in writing by members of their families or their personal friends. These were lost later when my rooms were raided, my papers seized, and I myself arrested and thrown into prison.

The house in the Catherine Square, in which I was first in captivity, afterward became the Bolsheviks' House of Torture in which hundreds of victims were done to death. The shrieks of the people being tortured to death or having splinters of wood driven under the quick of their nails were so agonizing that personal friends of my own living more than a hundred yards away in the Voroutsoffsky Pereoluk were obliged to fasten their double windows to prevent the cries of anguish penetrating into the house. The horror of the surviving citizens was so great that the Bolsheviks kept motor lorries thundering up and down the street to drown the screams of agony wrung from their dying victims.

This House of Torture remains as much as possible in the condition in which the Bolsheviks left it, and is now shown to those who care to inspect its gruesome and blood-bespattered rooms.

There are people who maintain that, with theatres open and electric trams running, anarchy does not exist, and that life in Soviet Russia is both secure and pleasant. I did not find it so. There is a halting place for the electric cars at the corner of Kanatnaya and Grecheskaya. Returning from the town at 11:30 one morning I encountered a frightened group at this point. Inquiry revealed the fact that the Reds had just murdered two unprotected and defenceless women waiting for the tram, to go into the city shopping. Their crime was that both clothes and manners showed them to be "Bourjouie." Also in the Kanatnaya one morning a working woman was shot for the sport of the thing while running across the road to purchase a bottle of milk for her children. Her body was lying by the curb as I came by, the bottle smashed, and milk and blood streaming down the gutter. The house door stood open, her two little children crying with grief and terror at the entrance.

TREATMENT OF WOMEN

Week by week the newspapers published articles for and against the nationalization of women. In South Russia the proposal did not become a legal measure, but in Odessa bands of Bolsheviks seized women and girls and carried them off to the Port, the timber yards and the Alexandrovsky Park for their own purposes. Women used in this way were found in the mornings either dead or mad or in a dying condition. Those found still alive were shot. One of the most awful of my own personal experiences of the New Civilization was hearing at night from my bedroom windows the frantic shrieks of women being raped to death in the park opposite—screams of shrill terror and despair repeated at intervals until they became nothing but hoarse cries of agony like the death calls of a dying animal. This happened not once, or twice, but many times. Never to the day of my death shall I forget the horror of those dreadful shrieks of tortured women, and one's own utter powerlessness to aid the victims or punish the Bolshevik devils in their bestial orgies.

To be decently clothed and washed was a crime in the eyes of the Bolshevik proletariat. Both men and women were stopped in the streets of Odessa, robbed of their boots, stripped of their clothes and sent home naked through the frost and snow. So many hundreds of people were treated in this manner under the Soviet rule, that the satirical paper of South Russia, the Scourge, brought out a full-page cartoon representing one of the chief streets of the city with a naked man and woman departing hand in hand up the road while a group of unkempt Bolsheviks with men's trousers and women's underclothes fluttering on their arms were seen running in the opposite direction. Beneath was the satirical observation, "In Odessa the World Finds Paradise Anew." For this reflection on the glorious New Civilization of the Soviets, the windows of the Scourge offices were smashed and the paper fined.

By this time the devastating corruption of the Holy Revolution had so spread that I saw open acts of indecency being committed in broad daylight in the parks and public gardens. These are but a few experiences from the mass of events crowded into my life in Soviet Russia.

That any professing Christian of any denomination in the whole globe should feel or express sympathy with the Bolsheviks of Russia, can only be due either to lack of accurate information or to deliberate deception by clever propaganda. The paucity of first-hand information as to what is really happening in Soviet Russia has enabled the Bolsheviks to conceal the ghastly persecution of the Christians which is being carried out with the utmost ferocity.

DESTROYING CHRISTIANITY

It is repeatedly said "Bolshevism is solely concerned with economics. It has nothing to do with religion." This is absolutely untrue. The horrors of heathen Rome and the episodes of the Coliseum have been brilliantly imitated and excelled by the Reds in Russia.

The first objective of Bolshevism is the complete elimination of every form of Christianity from the world and the substitution of a worldwide atheism. Of course this will be denied, as everything else which is inconvenient is denied. The fact remains. The ideals of Christianity are diametrically opposed to the brutal practices of Bolshevism, therefore Christianity is recognized as its most dangerous foe, and is treated accordingly.

It was the martyrdom of the two Metropolitans and the assassination of so many Bishops and the killing of various Christian ministers of religion, regardless of denomination or school of thought, that proved the undoing of the Scourge [newspaper]. Russian Orthodox clergy, Protestant Lutheran pastors, Roman Catholic priests were tortured and done to death with the same light-hearted indiscriminate in the name of toleration and freedom. Then it was that the Scourge, seeing the last remnants of liberty ground under the heel of a tyranny more brutal in its methods than a mediaeval torture chamber, published another full-page cartoon representing Moses descending from the burning mount, bringing in his arms the tables of the Ten Commandments to humanity, and being stoned to death by a mob of workmen's and soldiers' deputies.

Marriages were tumultuously interrupted by bands of propagandists, determined to compel the people to abandon Christian marriage and accept the new civil contract which has been introduced.

My own man servant was obliged to drive into the country to be married at a wayside church, where the wedding party might pass unobserved.

The Bolsheviks have attempted to bring about the abolition of Sunday as the weekly day of rest on account of its age-long association with the Resurrection of Christ. The virulence of the Red hatred of everything Christian seeks to substitute Monday for the old hallowed day. In the Spring of 1918 the attempt was temporarily crowned with success. The last Sunday in April was peremptorily ordered to be erased from the calendar as a rest day. Works, factories, and shops were commanded to carry on their business as on other days of the week. The streets of Odessa were thronged with crowds of truculent, jubilating Reds making a great parade of work. The following Wednesday, May 1, was substituted for the condemned Sunday, and duly observed as the festival of the Holy Revolution. On this day all workshops, houses of business, and factories were strictly forbidden to work; even bread was not allowed to be baked. I had the greatest difficulty in obtaining anything to eat.

PERSECUTIONS INCREASE

The brutal persecution of the Church increased. After the torture and martyrdom of many priests and several Bishops, a demonstration of protest was made by the Christians of Odessa. The Archbishop of Kherson and the Bishop of Nikolaiev took part in the procession. I marched with the other demonstrators. Two hundred Christian soldiers in uniform presented themselves at the cathedral and requested permission to carry the banners. Forty thousand of the faithful assembled. An unsuccessful attempt was made by the Reds to wreck the solemn march.

As the procession moved down one of the main thoroughfares I inquired of a group of sullen Bolshevik sailors from the Black Sea Fleet why they no longer uncovered their heads as the Archbishop's procession passed. The answer was given with morose rage, "We would kill all the clergy in the procession, but we do not wish to even soil our hands with the blood of such vermin as Christ's priests."

In many places the persecution of the Church is carried out with terrible fury. Outrages and affronts were offered to the Christians on every hand. At the women's hotel at Odessa University the Ikon was torn down from the wall of the common room amid a wild scene of ribald jesting and jeers, and the ubiquitous Red Flag was triumphantly hung over the place reserved for the sacred picture. In one part of my Chaplaincy alone, sixty priests were driven from their parishes as a result of the anti-Christian propaganda.

BLOOD-SOAKED TYRANTS

The persecution developed with unexampled ferocity. In the monastery near Kotlass, all the monks and the Prior were shot. In Perm Archbishop Andronik was buried alive. This ghastly fate caused such horror among the cowed and terror-stricken peasants that the heroic Vassili, Archbishop of Tchernigov, greatly daring, made the journey to Moscow to make representations respecting the tragedy of Archbishop Andronik. It was a splendid venture gloriously made, but the Archbishop could look for no mercy from the blood-soaked tyrants who have made "Freedom of Mind" a byword for the most despotic tyranny the world has ever seen. The history of the journey will live in the annals of the Russian Church forever. Archbishop Vassili shared the martyrdom of his brother. With his two companions he was hacked to pieces.

The long list of Christians martyred at the hand of the Bolsheviki has grown to a volume of names. The saintly Archbishop Feofan found death only through an agony of refined torture. He was reduced to a dying condition and then dipped through a hole bored in the frozen river and drowned in the Kama. Fifty priests were also tortured with every fiendish cruelty, and then done to death.

When the town of Yuriev (Dorpat) was taken an orgy of Christian-slashing took place. They who look for mercy, or pity, or justice from the Bolsheviki look in vain. The unhappy and venerable Bishop Platon was seized at midnight in his house, and, clad only in his night apparel, dragged with insults from his bed. Barefoot, the Bishop and 17 companions were driven with unspeakable brutality to the cellars of the house and hacked to pieces with axes for the cause of glorious "freedom of mind" and the enlightenment of a benighted world, too obtuse to appreciate the benefits of the New Civilization conferred upon it by the Bolshevist proletariat.

ORGY OF SLAUGHTER

After the ghastly massacres at Dorpat and Walk I was shown photographs of the martyred ministers of religion lying in the snow; Russian Orthodox clergy, Protestant Lutheran pastors, Roman Catholic priests, all done to death with the utmost impartiality in the outraged name of "liberty." Never has the world seen a more ghastly and cynical travesty of the great term. The martyrs for Christ had their eyes torn from their heads; their noses were slashed off with knives and their cheeks gouged out with bayonets.

When the history of the Bolshevist persecution to eradicate Christianity from Russia comes to be written, the Christian world will stand aghast at the crimes committed in the attempt to stamp out the love of Christ from the heart of the Russian nation. Lenin and Trotzky may well chuckle from within the recesses of the polluted Christian churches, as of the Kremlin, as they make peace overtures to a duped world.

What the War Did for Canada

By WILLIAM BANKS

NATIONAL confidence and national consciousness are Canada's greatest gains from the war. They are reflected in the activities and thoughts of the people since August, 1914. They are the basis of the undertakings embarked upon and the stock-taking that has followed the brief period of uncertainty at the end of active hostilities. Anxiety as to what was to be done with the elaborate industrial organization that was built for war purposes only has long ago given way to wonder that there should have been any doubt.

Confidence was rooted deep when, within two months after the declaration of war, Canada's first expeditionary force of 33,000 men sailed for England, complete in every detail down to the ammunition for the artillery units. That was considered to be no mean accomplishment in a country whose regular forces numbered only 3,000 men, and whose voluntary militia organization had lightly trained not more than 60,000 men that year. National consciousness was of slower growth. It came with revelations that, in striving for material development and advantage, Canada had not paid enough attention to the Canadianizing of many foreign-speaking immigrants and to the social conditions of large masses of the people generally. It had its ramifications in regard to the relations between Britain and Canada, and between Canada and other nations outside of the British Empire.

PRIME MINISTER'S WORDS

Both national confidence and consciousness were voiced by the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, in his insistence upon Canada having distinct representation at the Peace Conference, having a part in the shaping of the Peace Treaty, and having her own representatives sign it. He elaborated his views later in the Canadian Parliament when in reply to some questions and criticisms by the Hon. W. S. Fielding, a noted Liberal leader, he said:

His suggestion was that the Government of the United Kingdom can impose their will upon us without respect to our desire. If such is the opinion of the honorable member he is thinking in the terms of one hundred years ago.

On another occasion, explaining in Parliament his attitude at the Peace Conference, he used these words:

On behalf of my country I stood firmly upon this solid ground, that in this, the greatest of all wars in which the world's liberty, the world's justice, in short the world's future destiny was at stake, Canada had led the democracies of both the American continents. Her resolve had given inspiration, her sacrifices had been conspicuous, her effort was unabated to the end. The same indomitable spirit which made her capable of that effort and sacrifice made her equally incapable of accepting at the Peace Conference, in the League of Nations, or elsewhere, a status inferior to that accorded to nations less advanced in their development, less amply endowed in wealth, resources and population, no more complete in their sovereignty, and so far less conspicuous in their sacrifice.

RE-ESTABLISHING BUSINESS

At this time, however, questions of trade and commerce have first place in the thought of the majority. It cannot be fairly charged that the Government has been slow to give aid and seek opportunity in this respect. Within a few days of the signing of the armistice a Canadian trade commission under Lloyd Harris, a business man of wide experience and great driving power, was located in spacious offices in London, with a big fund at its disposal and practical carte blanche as to its operations. While one of its members was always on hand in London with a capable staff, others were in France and Belgium and other European countries, gathering information with which to guide the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian farmer in the disposal of still more of their goods and produce.

The fruits of the commission's activity of twelve months are still being reaped. Credits to France, Belgium, Rumania, and Greece, aggregating $100,000,000, were granted by the Canadian Government. To date these have been taken advantage of to the extent of somewhat less than $40,000,000, and business to the latter amount has been placed in Canada. It is not so satisfactory, one may admit, as cash transactions, nor is it everywhere regarded with the assurance that the large business formerly done with Britain on a credit basis is. But the trade commission and the Government believe the securities to be ample and the future opportunities for expansion of trade in Europe greatly enhanced by the arrangements.

The war has witnessed Canada's passing from a debtor to a creditor nation in a trade sense. In the five-year period, 1910 to 1914, the excess of imports over exports aggregated $1,000,424,000. In the succeeding five years the excess of exports totaled $1,371,284,000. The favorable balance was due chiefly to exports to Britain. This is a bald way of saying that the war made Canada an exporting country. The question her people ask is whether she can retain that position in peace times. They think she can. The figures and facts available give support to their belief. The new industries born of the war stress and the readjustment period are finding themselves. Canada's exports for the calendar year 1919 were valued at $1,294,920,372 and the imports at $941,000,700. Of the exports official figures show that only $37,745,750 were sold on credits, a big change from the war years, when sales to Britain were being largely financed in that way.

There is one drawback that has its effect on the exchange situation, namely, the imports from the United States. These totaled $740,580,225 last year, against an export of $454,686,294. The United States indeed is responsible for nearly 80 per cent. of Canada's imports. From Sir Harry Drayton, Minister of Finance, down to the humblest ward politician the people are being urged to help out the exchange situation by purchasing less from the big Republic and bending their efforts to exporting more.

TWO BILLIONS OF DEBT

There is this also to be considered: The debt of Canada before the war stood at the moderate figure of $336,000,000. The latest careful estimate is that it will total over $2,000,000,000 by the end of March, when the fiscal year closes. A consolation is that some $1,700,000,000 of this is in domestic loans, involving the payment of a little over $100,000,000 a year in interest to the Canadian people. Revenues will fall far short of meeting the expenditures, however, the totals for the nine months ending with December giving the financiers some food for more thought. The country's income for that period was $253,964,722. The expenditures for ordinary services and the ordinary capital outlays were $269,931,089, while war costs amounted to $239,709,184, making a grand total of $509,640,273. The war outlay was, in fact, heavier for the nine months of 1919 than in the corresponding period of 1918. The cost of bringing the armies home, of the generous gratuities for the men, and of restoring them to civil life, vied with that of actual war conditions. The peak has been passed in this item, however, and by the end of the fiscal year the direct war outlay will have ceased to be an important charge, though for decades to come the pension bill and the interest on the war debt will be a reminder to Canada of its share in the great conflict.

To those in authority and to the politicians may be left the arguments over the steps to be taken to increase the revenues of the country. They are battling over them now. Sir George Foster, the acting Prime Minister, put one view of the present situation bluntly enough in a recent nonpolitical address to the Canadian Club of Montreal. It was of no use to "damn the Government" or "damn the capitalists," he said, in regard to the prevailing unrest and the high cost of living. There were no short cuts to reconstruction. Neither strikes, nor acts of Parliament, nor the overthrow of the present economic system could effect it. The only remedy was to work harder and produce more.

Apart from the new industries that are based on private capital and enterprise, the most outstanding illustration of Canada's confidence in her future and in the quality of her people was the acquisition in wartime of the system now known as the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian Northern was the first to be taken in, and negotiations are now nearing completion for the acquiring of the stock and control of the Grand Trunk Railway, Parliament having authorized the Government to take such action. Added to the original Government-owned line, built as part of the Canadian confederation compact and serving the maritime provinces, the system will have a mileage of 22,375, including 1,881 miles of the Grand Trunk Railway in the United States. An investment of more than $1,300,000,000 is represented in this mileage, which serves every province in the country and practically all the great ports.

The reasons for the embarkation by Canada on such a gigantic system of public ownership are complicated and have aroused bitter controversies. The fact now is that the ratification of the Grand Trunk agreement, which it is hoped will be announced at the coming session of Parliament, will give the Canadian National Railways the biggest mileage in the country. Upon its efficient use and management Canadians hope for as great an expansion in development and trade as has attended the unceasing efforts of its only rival, the privately owned and always profitable Canadian Pacific Railway.

GOVERNMENT STEAMSHIP LINE

It was clear that a railway system of magnitude owned by the people could not hope to compete with a wide-awake private road whose ships insured continuous carriage for overseas consignments, unless it could also offer similar advantages. There has come into being, therefore, a fleet of Government-owned steamers that is being rapidly enlarged, and is expected by the end of the present year to aggregate 300,000 deadweight tons. Under the somewhat cumbersome name of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine twenty-five steel ships are already in service. They ply to Britain, Australia, and New Zealand, the West Indies, South America, and Cuba. A Mediterranean service is now being arranged, and one to South Africa is under consideration. Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, Minister of Marine, is authority for the statement that so far there has been a handsome profit on the operation of these ships, and that the Government is now considering the addition of several 15,000-ton passenger ships to its fleet. To the freighters already in commission or on the stocks a number of others will be added, contracts having been let for sixty in all, including the finished ships. The total cost to the country of these will be about $70,000,000.

All these ships were built, or are being built, in Canada, at ten different shipyards. If the Government does decide on the building of the passenger vessels mentioned, they also will be constructed in Canadian shipyards, which, since the days when wooden ships were the only kind known, have never experienced a boom equal to that of the war period and since.

It is the hope of those directly concerned, as well as of all who wish for continued Canadian prosperity, that shipbuilding will become a stable industry of the country. It was the building of submarines, armed trawlers and drifters, lighters and other vessels for the British, French, Italian and Russian Governments that pointed the way. War was a great price to pay for the revival of the shipbuilding industry; peace may place it on a permanently sound basis.

A corollary of the development in shipbuilding is the completion in Sydney, Nova Scotia, of a private plant for the manufacture of steel ship plates. These have never been made in Canada, and the output of the plant is expected to be sufficient to meet the demands of the country for a long time to come. What this means is shown in the fact that a shipbuilding plant in Toronto lately had to close down in large part for some days because it could not get from Pittsburgh the desired supply of plates when required. It was war demand that led to the establishment of the steel plate plant, which will now meet the requirements of peace.

Instances of that kind might be multiplied. Amherstburg, in Ontario, is the home of a $4,000,000 plant for the manufacture of soda ash, the first of its kind in Canada. This establishment was begun during the war and with the idea of catering to war contracts. Industry in normal lines now claims its attention and output. At Ojibway another new concern, a steel corporation, has already expended $2,000,000 on its ore dock and furnace foundations. Its enterprise is planned on a huge scale, the acreage it has bought being counted upon to afford decent housing for 20,000 people in addition to space for its mills.

British officialdom, which in the earlier stages of the war doubted the ability of Canada to make supplies of any kind, was certain that airplanes could not be made in the country; but more than 2,500 airplanes for training purposes were produced in the Dominion. In its latest months of usefulness the national plant under the supervision of the Imperial Munitions Board was turning out bombing planes for the United States Navy. One concern engaged in airplane making during the war has succeeded in turning its establishment into a manufactory for gramophones, the tremendous Canadian demand for which has been largely met by United States makers.

STEEL AND PAPER MILLS

In Toronto a national plant for forgings, part of the imperial and Canadian governments' organization for making war munitions, contains some of the most modern of electrical devices. After the armistice was signed it seemed likely to become a dead loss, but it has been purchased by a British tin plate corporation, which is spending $5,000,000 in enlarging the plant, and expects to turn out enough black and galvanized sheets to supply the whole of Canada. One of the indirect influences in attracting the Britishers to the location was the immense harbor improvement plans under way at Toronto, persistently carried on, though on a reduced scale, during the war, and now resumed with vigor. Toronto itself is investing large sums in the project, and is reaping returns in the shape of new-made land with water front sites for new industries already beginning to arrive. To be the Chicago of Canada is Toronto's ambition.

A Montreal firm which during the war concentrated its efforts on machinery for the making of munitions is now producing machinery for use in paper mills. This is another new venture for Canada. There has been a steady advancement also in the making of all classes of paper in the country. For the first time papers of the highest grades are being successfully produced and are finding a good home market in competition with the importations upon which the country depended in the pre-war days. In regard to newsprint, mills of Canada find it almost impossible to keep up with the demand from the United States. With this development there has been an awakening to the importance of conserving the timber resources, an effect which all the academic preaching of former years had failed to produce. It is based on the hope of making the newsprint industry a lasting one.

IMPETUS TO AGRICULTURE

Throughout the war there was a remarkable development in every branch of agriculture. Indeed, in spite of the expansion of manufactures then and since, the products of the wheat, live stock, and dairy farms still lead in Canada's exports. It is here and in the wealth of its forests and mineral areas that many people think Canada's future as a trading country lies. Sir George Paish, fresh from his self-imposed mission of trying to arouse the United States to the needs of Europe, has visited the Dominion to suggest to its people that their duty is to raise and ship to the old lands foodstuffs in far greater quantities than they have yet done, and all the raw materials they can handle. The war has been responsible for a closer study of agricultural conditions, and for a back-to-the-land movement with sane and sensible methods as its foundation. Not the least helpful of these is the Government's land settlement plans for returned soldiers, including those who served in the imperial forces.

It would not be surprising to find that this attention to agriculture and conditions of rural life will be considered in years to come as making the inauguration of one of the greatest economic and social reforms that Canada has known. It is not dependent upon the Federal Government alone. All the provincial Governments are displaying a practical interest that is finding its way into action, particularly on matters relative to the education and future of the children in the rural sections. Some of the provinces are on the eve of changes in this respect that are long overdue, and that have been forced by the developments of the last few years.

Good roads, too, in the rural districts especially, are at last beginning to receive the attention their importance deserves. To aid in the spread of the good roads gospel the Federal Government voted $20,000,000 in the midst of war-cost demands, to be divided among the provinces as supplementary to the millions the latter will themselves spend on these links with the main arteries of transportation.

THE FRANCHISE FOR WOMEN

The extension of the franchise to women on the same terms as to men, with the right to election to the House of Commons, is a Canadian wartime reform the effect of which may be left to a future decision. It is certain, however, that in many of the more progressive sections of the country it has been a splendid encouragement to women engaged in social reform work. A number of the provinces had women's franchise on their statute books before the Federal Government adopted it, and a few of them have women members in their Legislatures. As in some other countries, the ardent battlers for woman's suffrage have waged a long campaign. The efforts of themselves and their sisters in the war work and its many offshoots earned them the right to vote.

It is difficult to say in what branch of work the women excelled, and foolish to dogmatize as to the extent the experiences they gained will mold the ideals of the generations to come. ¹ ² ³ ⁴ ⁵ ⁶ ⁷ ⁸ ⁹ ¹⁰ ¹¹ ¹² ¹³ ¹⁴ ¹⁵ ¹⁶ ¹⁷ ¹⁸ ¹⁹ ²⁰ ²¹ ²² ²³ ²⁴ ²⁵ ²⁶ ²⁷ ²⁸ ²⁹ ³⁰ ³¹ ³² ³³ ³⁴ ³⁵ ³⁶ ³⁷ ³⁸ ³⁹ ⁴⁰ ⁴¹ ⁴² ⁴³ ⁴⁴ ⁴⁵ ⁴⁶ ⁴⁷ ⁴⁸ ⁴⁹ ⁵⁰ ⁵¹ ⁵² ⁵³ ⁵⁴ ⁵⁵ ⁵⁶ ⁵⁷ ⁵⁸ ⁵⁹ ⁶⁰ ⁶¹ ⁶² ⁶³ ⁶⁴ ⁶⁵ ⁶⁶ ⁶⁷ ⁶⁸ ⁶⁹ ⁷⁰ ⁷¹ ⁷² ⁷³ ⁷⁴ ⁷⁵ ⁷⁶ ⁷⁷ ⁷⁸ ⁷⁹ ⁸⁰ ⁸¹ ⁸² ⁸³ ⁸⁴ ⁸⁵ ⁸⁶ ⁸⁷ ⁸⁸ ⁸⁹ ⁹⁰ ⁹¹ ⁹² ⁹³ ⁹⁴ ⁹⁵ ⁹⁶ ⁹⁷ ⁹⁸ ⁹⁹ ¹⁰⁰ ¹⁰¹ ¹⁰² ¹⁰³ ¹⁰⁴ ¹⁰⁵ ¹⁰⁶ ¹⁰⁷ ¹⁰⁸ ¹⁰⁹ ¹¹⁰ ¹¹¹ ¹¹² ¹¹³ ¹¹⁴ ¹¹⁵ ¹¹⁶ ¹¹⁷ ¹¹⁸ ¹¹⁹ ¹²⁰ ¹²¹ ¹²² ¹²³ ¹²⁴ ¹²⁵ ¹²⁶ ¹²⁷ ¹²⁸ ¹²⁹ ¹³⁰ ¹³¹ ¹³² ¹³³ ¹³⁴ ¹³⁵ ¹³⁶ ¹³⁷ ¹³⁸ ¹³⁹ ¹⁴⁰ ¹⁴¹ ¹⁴² ¹⁴³ ¹⁴⁴ ¹⁴⁵ ¹⁴⁶ ¹⁴⁷ ¹⁴⁸ ¹⁴⁹ ¹⁵⁰ ¹⁵¹ ¹⁵² ¹⁵³ ¹⁵⁴ ¹⁵⁵ ¹⁵⁶ ¹⁵⁷ ¹⁵⁸ ¹⁵⁹ ¹⁶⁰ ¹⁶¹ ¹⁶² ¹⁶³ ¹⁶⁴ ¹⁶⁵ ¹⁶⁶ ¹⁶⁷ ¹⁶⁸ ¹⁶⁹ ¹⁷⁰ ¹⁷¹ ¹⁷² ¹⁷³ ¹⁷⁴ ¹⁷⁵ ¹⁷⁶ ¹⁷⁷ ¹⁷⁸ ¹⁷⁹ ¹⁸⁰ ¹⁸¹ ¹⁸² ¹⁸³ ¹⁸⁴ ¹⁸⁵ ¹⁸⁶ ¹⁸⁷ ¹⁸⁸ ¹⁸⁹ ¹⁹⁰ ¹⁹¹ ¹⁹² ¹⁹³ ¹⁹⁴ ¹⁹⁵ ¹⁹⁶ ¹⁹⁷ ¹⁹⁸ ¹⁹⁹ ²⁰⁰ ²⁰¹ ²⁰² ²⁰³ ²⁰⁴ ²⁰⁵ ²⁰⁶ ²⁰⁷ ²⁰⁸ ²⁰⁹ ²¹⁰ ²¹¹ ²¹² ²¹³ ²¹⁴ ²¹⁵ ²¹⁶ ²¹⁷ ²¹⁸ ²¹⁹ ²²⁰ ²²¹ ²²² ²²³ ²²⁴ ²²⁵ ²²⁶ ²²⁷ ²²⁸ ²²⁹ ²³⁰ ²³¹ ²³² ²³³ ²³⁴ ²³⁵ ²³⁶ ²³⁷ ²³⁸ ²³⁹ ²⁴⁰ ²⁴¹ ²⁴² ²⁴³ ²⁴⁴ ²⁴⁵ ²⁴⁶ ²⁴⁷ ²⁴⁸ ²⁴⁹ ²⁵⁰ ²⁵¹ ²⁵² ²⁵³ ²⁵⁴ ²⁵⁵ ²⁵⁶ ²⁵⁷ ²⁵⁸ ²⁵⁹ ²⁶⁰ ²⁶¹ ²⁶² ²⁶³ ²⁶⁴ ²⁶⁵ ²⁶⁶ ²⁶⁷ ²⁶⁸ ²⁶⁹ ²⁷⁰ ²⁷¹ ²⁷² ²⁷³ ²⁷⁴ ²⁷⁵ ²⁷⁶ ²⁷⁷ ²⁷⁸ ²⁷⁹ ²⁸⁰ ²⁸¹ ²⁸² ²⁸³ ²⁸⁴ ²⁸⁵ ²⁸⁶ ²⁸⁷ ²⁸⁸ ²⁸⁹ ²⁹⁰ ²⁹¹ ²⁹² ²⁹³ ²⁹⁴ ²⁹⁵ ²⁹⁶ ²⁹⁷ ²⁹⁸ ²⁹⁹ ³⁰⁰ ³⁰¹ ³⁰² ³⁰³ ³⁰⁴ ³⁰⁵ ³⁰⁶ ³⁰⁷ ³⁰⁸ ³⁰⁹ ³¹⁰ ³¹¹ ³¹² ³¹³ ³¹⁴ ³¹⁵ ³¹⁶ ³¹⁷ ³¹⁸ ³¹⁹ ³²⁰ ³²¹ ³²² ³²³ ³²⁴ ³²⁵ ³²⁶ ³²⁷ ³²⁸ ³²⁹ ³³⁰ ³³¹ ³³² ³³³ ³³⁴ ³³⁵ ³³⁶ ³³⁷ ³³⁸ ³³⁹ ³⁴⁰ ³⁴¹ ³⁴² ³⁴³ ³⁴⁴ ³⁴⁵ ³⁴⁶ ³⁴⁷ ³⁴⁸ ³⁴⁹ ³⁵⁰ ³⁵¹ ³⁵² ³⁵³ ³⁵⁴ ³⁵⁵ ³⁵⁶ ³⁵⁷ ³⁵⁸ ³⁵⁹ ³⁶⁰ ³⁶¹ ³⁶² ³⁶³ ³⁶⁴ ³⁶⁵ ³⁶⁶ ³⁶⁷ ³⁶⁸ ³⁶⁹ ³⁷⁰ ³⁷¹ ³⁷² ³⁷³ ³⁷⁴ ³⁷⁵ ³⁷⁶ ³⁷⁷ ³⁷⁸ ³⁷⁹ ³⁸⁰ ³⁸¹ ³⁸² ³⁸³ ³⁸⁴ ³⁸⁵ ³⁸⁶ ³⁸⁷ ³⁸⁸ ³⁸⁹ ³⁹⁰ ³⁹¹ ³⁹² ³⁹³ ³⁹⁴ ³⁹⁵ ³⁹⁶ ³⁹⁷ ³⁹⁸ ³⁹⁹ ⁴⁰⁰ ⁴⁰¹ ⁴⁰² ⁴⁰³ ⁴⁰⁴ ⁴⁰⁵ ⁴⁰⁶ ⁴⁰⁷ ⁴⁰⁸ ⁴⁰⁹ ⁴¹⁰ ⁴¹¹ ⁴¹² ⁴¹³ ⁴¹⁴ ⁴¹⁵ ⁴¹⁶ ⁴¹⁷ ⁴¹⁸ ⁴¹⁹ ⁴²⁰ ⁴²¹ ⁴²² ⁴²³ ⁴²⁴ ⁴²⁵ ⁴²⁶ ⁴²⁷ ⁴²⁸ ⁴²⁹ ⁴³⁰ ⁴³¹ ⁴³² ⁴³³ ⁴³⁴ ⁴³⁵ ⁴³⁶ ⁴³⁷ ⁴³⁸ ⁴³⁹ ⁴⁴⁰ ⁴⁴¹ ⁴⁴² ⁴⁴³ ⁴⁴⁴ ⁴⁴⁵ ⁴⁴⁶ ⁴⁴⁷ ⁴⁴⁸ ⁴⁴⁹ ⁴⁵⁰ ⁴⁵¹ ⁴⁵² ⁴⁵³ ⁴⁵⁴ ⁴⁵⁵ ⁴⁵⁶ ⁴⁵⁷ ⁴⁵⁸ ⁴⁵⁹ ⁴⁶⁰ ⁴⁶¹ ⁴⁶² ⁴⁶³ ⁴⁶⁴ ⁴⁶⁵ ⁴⁶⁶ ⁴⁶⁷ ⁴⁶⁸ ⁴⁶⁹ ⁴⁷⁰ ⁴⁷¹ ⁴⁷² ⁴⁷³ ⁴⁷⁴ ⁴⁷⁵ ⁴⁷⁶ ⁴⁷⁷ ⁴⁷⁸ ⁴⁷⁹ ⁴⁸⁰ ⁴⁸¹ ⁴⁸² ⁴⁸³ ⁴⁸⁴ ⁴⁸⁵ ⁴⁸⁶ ⁴⁸⁷ ⁴⁸⁸ ⁴⁸⁹ ⁴⁹⁰ ⁴⁹¹ ⁴⁹² ⁴⁹³ ⁴⁹⁴ ⁴⁹⁵ ⁴⁹⁶ ⁴⁹⁷ ⁴⁹⁸ ⁴⁹⁹ ⁵⁰⁰ ⁵⁰¹ ⁵⁰² ⁵⁰³ ⁵⁰⁴ ⁵⁰⁵ ⁵⁰⁶ ⁵⁰⁷ ⁵⁰⁸ ⁵⁰⁹ ⁵¹⁰ ⁵¹¹ ⁵¹² ⁵¹³ ⁵¹⁴ ⁵¹⁵ ⁵¹⁶ ⁵¹⁷ ⁵¹⁸ ⁵¹⁹ ⁵²⁰ ⁵²¹ ⁵²² ⁵²³ ⁵²⁴ ⁵²⁵ ⁵²⁶ ⁵²⁷ ⁵²⁸ ⁵²⁹ ⁵³⁰ ⁵³¹ ⁵³² ⁵³³ ⁵³⁴ ⁵³⁵ ⁵³⁶ ⁵³⁷ ⁵³⁸ ⁵³⁹ ⁵⁴⁰ ⁵⁴¹ ⁵⁴² ⁵⁴³ ⁵⁴⁴ ⁵⁴⁵ ⁵⁴⁶ ⁵⁴⁷ ⁵⁴⁸ ⁵⁴⁹ ⁵⁵⁰ ⁵⁵¹ ⁵⁵² ⁵⁵³ ⁵⁵⁴ ⁵⁵⁵ ⁵⁵⁶ ⁵⁵⁷ ⁵⁵⁸ ⁵⁵⁹ ⁵⁶⁰ ⁵⁶¹ ⁵⁶² ⁵⁶³ ⁵⁶⁴ ⁵⁶⁵ ⁵⁶⁶ ⁵⁶⁷ ⁵⁶⁸ ⁵⁶⁹ ⁵⁷⁰ ⁵⁷¹ ⁵⁷² ⁵⁷³ ⁵⁷⁴ ⁵⁷⁵ ⁵⁷⁶ ⁵⁷⁷ ⁵⁷⁸ ⁵⁷⁹ ⁵⁸⁰ ⁵⁸¹ ⁵⁸² ⁵⁸³ ⁵⁸⁴ ⁵⁸⁵ ⁵⁸⁶ ⁵⁸⁷ ⁵⁸⁸ ⁵⁸⁹ ⁵⁹⁰ ⁵⁹¹ ⁵⁹² ⁵⁹³ ⁵⁹⁴ ⁵⁹⁵ ⁵⁹⁶ ⁵⁹⁷ ⁵⁹⁸ ⁵⁹⁹ ⁶⁰⁰ ⁶⁰¹ ⁶⁰² ⁶⁰³ ⁶⁰⁴ ⁶⁰⁵ ⁶⁰⁶ ⁶⁰⁷ ⁶⁰⁸ ⁶⁰⁹ ⁶¹⁰ ⁶¹¹ ⁶¹² ⁶¹³ ⁶¹⁴ ⁶¹⁵ ⁶¹⁶ ⁶¹⁷ ⁶¹⁸ ⁶¹⁹ ⁶²⁰ ⁶²¹ ⁶²² ⁶²³ ⁶²⁴ ⁶²⁵ ⁶²⁶ ⁶²⁷ ⁶²⁸ ⁶²⁹ ⁶³⁰ ⁶³¹ ⁶³² ⁶³³ ⁶³⁴ ⁶³⁵ ⁶³⁶ ⁶³⁷ ⁶³⁸ ⁶³⁹ ⁶⁴⁰ ⁶⁴¹ ⁶⁴² ⁶⁴³ ⁶⁴⁴ ⁶⁴⁵ ⁶⁴⁶ ⁶⁴⁷ ⁶⁴⁸ ⁶⁴⁹ ⁶⁵⁰ ⁶⁵¹ ⁶⁵² ⁶⁵³ ⁶⁵⁴ ⁶⁵⁵ ⁶⁵⁶ ⁶⁵⁷ ⁶⁵⁸ ⁶⁵⁹ ⁶⁶⁰ ⁶⁶¹ ⁶⁶² ⁶⁶³ ⁶⁶⁴ ⁶⁶⁵ ⁶⁶⁶ ⁶⁶⁷ ⁶⁶⁸ ⁶⁶⁹ ⁶⁷⁰ ⁶⁷¹ ⁶⁷² ⁶⁷³ ⁶⁷⁴ ⁶⁷⁵ ⁶⁷⁶ ⁶⁷⁷ ⁶⁷⁸ ⁶⁷⁹ ⁶⁸⁰ ⁶⁸¹ ⁶⁸² ⁶⁸³ ⁶⁸⁴ ⁶⁸⁵ ⁶⁸⁶ ⁶⁸⁷ ⁶⁸⁸ ⁶⁸⁹ ⁶⁹⁰ ⁶⁹¹ ⁶⁹² ⁶⁹³ ⁶⁹⁴ ⁶⁹⁵ ⁶⁹⁶ ⁶⁹⁷ ⁶⁹⁸ ⁶⁹⁹ ⁷⁰⁰ ⁷⁰¹ ⁷⁰² ⁷⁰³ ⁷⁰⁴ ⁷⁰⁵ ⁷⁰⁶ ⁷⁰⁷ ⁷⁰⁸ ⁷⁰⁹ ⁷¹⁰ ⁷¹¹ ⁷¹² ⁷¹³ ⁷¹⁴ ⁷¹⁵ ⁷¹⁶ ⁷¹⁷ ⁷¹⁸ ⁷¹⁹ ⁷²⁰ ⁷²¹ ⁷²² ⁷²³ ⁷²⁴ ⁷²⁵ ⁷²⁶ ⁷²⁷ ⁷²⁸ ⁷²⁹ ⁷³⁰ ⁷³¹ ⁷³² ⁷³³ ⁷³⁴ ⁷³⁵ ⁷³⁶ ⁷³⁷ ⁷³⁸ ⁷³⁹ ⁷⁴⁰ ⁷⁴¹ ⁷⁴² ⁷⁴³ ⁷⁴⁴ ⁷⁴⁵ ⁷⁴⁶ ⁷⁴⁷ ⁷⁴⁸ ⁷⁴⁹ ⁷⁵⁰ ⁷⁵¹ ⁷⁵² ⁷⁵³ ⁷⁵⁴ ⁷⁵⁵ ⁷⁵⁶ ⁷⁵⁷ ⁷⁵⁸ ⁷⁵⁹ ⁷⁶⁰ ⁷⁶¹ ⁷⁶² ⁷⁶³ ⁷⁶⁴ ⁷⁶⁵ ⁷⁶⁶ ⁷⁶⁷ ⁷⁶⁸ ⁷⁶⁹ ⁷⁷⁰ ⁷⁷¹ ⁷⁷² ⁷⁷³ ⁷⁷⁴ ⁷⁷⁵ ⁷⁷⁶ ⁷⁷⁷ ⁷⁷⁸ ⁷⁷⁹ ⁷⁸⁰ ⁷⁸¹ ⁷⁸² ⁷⁸³ ⁷⁸⁴ ⁷⁸⁵ ⁷⁸⁶ ⁷⁸⁷ ⁷⁸⁸ ⁷⁸⁹ ⁷⁹⁰ ⁷⁹¹ ⁷⁹² ⁷⁹³ ⁷⁹⁴ ⁷⁹⁵ ⁷⁹⁶ ⁷⁹⁷ ⁷⁹⁸ ⁷⁹⁹ ⁸⁰⁰ ⁸⁰¹ ⁸⁰² ⁸⁰³ ⁸⁰⁴ ⁸⁰⁵ ⁸⁰⁶ ⁸⁰⁷ ⁸⁰⁸ ⁸⁰⁹ ⁸¹⁰ ⁸¹¹ ⁸¹² ⁸¹³ ⁸¹⁴ ⁸¹⁵ ⁸¹⁶ ⁸¹⁷ ⁸¹⁸ ⁸¹⁹ ⁸²⁰ ⁸²¹ ⁸²² ⁸²³ ⁸²⁴ ⁸²⁵ ⁸²⁶ ⁸²⁷ ⁸²⁸ ⁸²⁹ ⁸³⁰ ⁸³¹ ⁸³² ⁸³³ ⁸³⁴ ⁸³⁵ ⁸³⁶ ⁸³⁷ ⁸³⁸ ⁸³⁹ ⁸⁴⁰ ⁸⁴¹ ⁸⁴² ⁸⁴³ ⁸⁴⁴ ⁸⁴⁵ ⁸⁴⁶ ⁸⁴⁷ ⁸⁴⁸ ⁸⁴⁹ ⁸⁵⁰ ⁸⁵¹ ⁸⁵² ⁸⁵³ ⁸⁵⁴ ⁸⁵⁵ ⁸⁵⁶ ⁸⁵⁷ ⁸⁵⁸ ⁸⁵⁹ ⁸⁶⁰ ⁸⁶¹ ⁸⁶² ⁸⁶³ ⁸⁶⁴ ⁸⁶⁵ ⁸⁶⁶ ⁸⁶⁷ ⁸⁶⁸ ⁸⁶⁹ ⁸⁷⁰ ⁸⁷¹ ⁸⁷² ⁸⁷³ ⁸⁷⁴ ⁸⁷⁵ ⁸⁷⁶ ⁸⁷⁷ ⁸⁷⁸ ⁸⁷⁹ ⁸⁸⁰ ⁸⁸¹ ⁸⁸² ⁸⁸³ ⁸⁸⁴ ⁸⁸⁵ ⁸⁸⁶ ⁸⁸⁷ ⁸⁸⁸ ⁸⁸⁹ ⁸⁹⁰ ⁸⁹¹ ⁸⁹² ⁸⁹³ ⁸⁹⁴ ⁸⁹⁵ ⁸⁹⁶ ⁸⁹⁷ ⁸⁹⁸ ⁸⁹⁹ ⁹⁰⁰ ⁹⁰¹ ⁹⁰² ⁹⁰³ ⁹⁰⁴ ⁹⁰⁵ ⁹⁰⁶ ⁹⁰⁷ ⁹⁰⁸ ⁹⁰⁹ ⁹¹⁰ ⁹¹¹ ⁹¹² ⁹¹³ ⁹¹⁴ ⁹¹⁵ ⁹¹⁶ ⁹¹⁷ ⁹¹⁸ ⁹¹⁹ ⁹²⁰ ⁹²¹ ⁹²² ⁹²³ ⁹²⁴ ⁹²⁵ ⁹²⁶ ⁹²⁷ ⁹²⁸ ⁹²⁹ ⁹³⁰ ⁹³¹ ⁹³² ⁹³³ ⁹³⁴ ⁹³⁵ ⁹³⁶ ⁹³⁷ ⁹³⁸ ⁹³⁹ ⁹⁴⁰ ⁹⁴¹ ⁹⁴² ⁹⁴³ ⁹⁴⁴ ⁹⁴⁵ ⁹⁴⁶ ⁹⁴⁷ ⁹⁴⁸ ⁹⁴⁹ ⁹⁵⁰ ⁹⁵¹ ⁹⁵² ⁹⁵³ ⁹⁵⁴ ⁹⁵⁵ ⁹⁵⁶ ⁹⁵⁷ ⁹⁵⁸ ⁹⁵⁹ ⁹⁶⁰ ⁹⁶¹ ⁹⁶² ⁹⁶³ ⁹⁶⁴ ⁹⁶⁵ ⁹⁶⁶ ⁹⁶⁷ ⁹⁶⁸ ⁹⁶⁹ ⁹⁷⁰ ⁹⁷¹ ⁹⁷² ⁹⁷³ ⁹⁷⁴ ⁹⁷⁵ ⁹⁷⁶ ⁹⁷⁷ ⁹⁷⁸ ⁹⁷⁹ ⁹⁸⁰ ⁹⁸¹ ⁹⁸² ⁹⁸³ ⁹⁸⁴ ⁹⁸⁵ ⁹⁸⁶ ⁹⁸⁷ ⁹⁸⁸ ⁹⁸⁹ ⁹⁹⁰ ⁹⁹¹ ⁹⁹² ⁹⁹³ ⁹⁹⁴ ⁹⁹⁵ ⁹⁹⁶ ⁹⁹⁷ ⁹⁹⁸ ⁹⁹⁹ ¹⁰⁰⁰ ventured that their best work was done in connection with the Canadian Patriotic Fund and the various regimental associations, the latter formed of relatives of men on service. Some $50,000,000 was raised by the Patriotic Fund by voluntary subscriptions for supplementing the allowances granted by the Government to the dependents of soldiers. It was administered locally through committees serving gratuitously. Many women were on these committees, and their work took them to the homes and brought them into constant association with the wives and children of the men in khaki. The same was true of the work carried on for the respective regiments by the regimental associations. The consequence was that hundreds of women, as well as men, gained much first-hand knowledge of how other people lived.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM

They are the people who today are generally found at the forefront of the efforts to solve the housing problem, which is a real one in most of the cities and towns of Canada. To the fact that there was very little house building during the war must be added the truth that many houses that served as such are not now fit for human beings to live in. The cost of materials is so high, however, that many who would like to build for themselves cannot finance the initial transactions. To help to relieve the situation the Canadian Government, backed by public opinion, has appropriated $25,000,000 to provide houses for workingmen. Not as a gift. The money is lent direct to the provincial Governments, who in turn lend it at low rates for twenty years to municipalities that will co-operate with them in securing homes at the actual cost of building and land acquired at a fair value. The plan is working very well so far, though some of the larger municipalities have not always waited for the application of the Government scheme and have started "on their own."

Before the Government plan of assistance in house building was in operation thousands of people had been driven by the constantly increasing rents to begin to buy their homes. To that movement the combination of Government and municipal aid has given a great fillip. The war will get the credit of making Canadians more than ever a people of home owners.

INCREASE IN SAVINGS

It is still the fashion to paint the allied countries as having plunged into an orgy of extravagance following the restraints of the years of conflict. Canada is not exempt from this criticism; but if there is flaunting prodigality on the part of the comparatively few, there is a strong strain of canniness in the actions of the many. The savings deposits in the banks in December of 1919 aggregated $1,138,086,691, an increase for the year of $179,613,134, and that despite the large withdrawals for investment in the Victory Loan of last Fall. Since November, 1918, there have been established throughout Canada 1,000 branches or agencies of the country's chartered banks, and there are now over 4,300 of these branches in all.

Another proof that not all are living high on the gains made from the war is afforded by the unparalleled new business written by the life insurance companies of the country for the year, totaling $560,000,000. The highest previous record was $313,251,556 in 1918. Life insurance in Canada now reaches well over two billions, of which 36 per cent. is in United States companies. For the immense new business of 1919, G. Cecil Moore, a Canadian expert, gives credit to several influences, among them the observation of the people as to the manner in which the insurance companies stood the strain of the "flu" epidemics and the payments arising out of war casualties, the soldiers' insurance undertaken by many Canadian municipalities, "and the colossal insurance scheme of the American Government" for its soldiers.

Even in Canada there are some who regard prohibition as not having proved particularly beneficial in wartime, and who look upon its retention by a majority of the provinces to this date as being nothing to cheer for. The bulk of public opinion has shown by its votes that it favors it, however, and the majority of people are convinced that it is one of the most vital of economic and social reforms. Another generation will be in a better position to review dispassionately its merits and demerits.

DEPORTING THE UNDESIRABLES

Several occurrences among the foreign-born population of the country since 1914 have revealed causes for anxiety as to Canada's immigration policy, an anxiety reflected in some changes already being carried out, now that the tide of newcomers is again setting in. The recent raids on the "Reds" in the United States brought forth an official statement that in the last twelve months 1,000 undesirable enemy aliens had been deported. These include 100 of the most active "Reds" in the West, who were quietly gathered up by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police in Winnipeg during the general strike there last Summer. It has been decided to keep up the barriers against Germans, Austrians, Turks, and Bulgarians.

For the present, encouragement is given only to farmers, farm laborers and selected domestics, and as the larger proportion of the newcomers are English-speaking there is no anxiety regarding them. Of the 91,420 immigrants in the last nine months, British and Irish people numbered 47,585, and those from the United States 38,711. The latter are said to be mostly farmers who have sold their lands at high prices in the Middle Western States and are bent upon taking up the cheaper land still available in the Canadian West.

It is in regard to large numbers of foreigners already in the country, however, many of whom have remained ignorant of the English language, or of modes of living other than their own, that misgiving arises. The Social Service Council of Canada has urged upon the people and all the Governments the absolute necessity of seeing that in the future these newcomers are not left to shift for themselves without an attempt being made to teach them elementary outlines of Canadian customs and laws, and enough English to enable them to understand what they should do if they want to become citizens in the real meaning of the word. The Toronto Globe, in a commendatory editorial on the measure passed by the United States Senate and aiming at the Americanization of all those within its borders, has this to say:

The proposal to make all aliens living in the country (the United States) learn its language is neither hysterical nor unjust. It is sound national business. It is a constructive step toward the solution of many of the social and industrial problems which confront the Anglo-Saxon nations of the New World.

It proceeds to say that the action taken "on the other side of the line" may well commend itself to the consideration of the provinces in Canada where education is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The signs indicate that this is to be done in conjunction with the Dominion Government when the latter's immigration policy is worked out in the light of the knowledge of late experiences.

The war has brought to Canada a realization that it should endeavor to find within its own borders inducements for the retention of the scientifically trained men and women who are drifting, largely, to the United States on their graduation from the colleges and laboratories of the country. Men like Professor J. C. McLennan of the University of Toronto, who was loaned to the British Admiralty during the war, and as a result of whose efforts helium gas was discovered in Canada, some of it being shipped overseas in time to be of use in the conflict, are leading in the agitation to educate the people to the need of science and industry walking hand in hand in the Dominion.

Much more could be said of the changes and the gains that war and its aftermath have brought to and promise for Canada. Its church life and work might furnish a theme; but, as elsewhere, that is a subject bristling with controversy. In a general way it can be said that the Church has striven and is striving harder now to keep abreast of the times and to fulfill its mission to humanity.

After the long night of war Canada hopes for an unbroken day of peace. She is confident of herself and her future, and is not blindly ignorant of the many difficulties that her people must meet. Canada will be true to herself and to the golden hearts who made her famous on the fields of France and Belgium.

New Postage Stamps—Thousands of Them

Products of New-Born States

THE new postage stamps issued in 1919, the first year of peace after the world war, were more numerous and of infinitely greater variety than those of any other year since the first adhesive stamp came into existence, eighty years ago. Since 1840, when Great Britain led the way with the "Penny Black," an unused specimen of which is now worth about $10, over 30,000 varieties of stamps have been issued by the Governments of the world, and about 2,500 of these appeared in 1919, as part of the aftermath of the war. Many of these were issued by new States—in fact, the only man now likely to pass a successful examination on all the new nations of Europe is the one whose hobby is philately.

The stamps of 1919 are in themselves a vivid chronicle of great events—for those who have mastered their meanings—and they embrace many types hitherto unknown to collectors. A correspondent of The London Times has been at pains to describe the most interesting issues of that year, including special series representative of victory, peace, war, armistice, reconstruction, conquest of the air, &c. Some of the most valued stamps are those issued in a hurry by new Governments, which adopted the easy method of printing a new design over the stamp already in use.

Newfoundland led the way on Jan. 1, 1919, says this writer, with a notable set of stamps commemorating the exploits of her soldier and sailor sons in the war, inscribed "Trail of the Caribou," and blazoned with the regimental crest, a caribou head, after the design of a Colonial artist. Alternate values bore the battle honors of the military contingent and the remainder the motto "Ubique," coupled with the name of the Royal Naval Reserve.

During January appeared also the first definitive stamp issues of the new-born free States of Europe—Czechoslovakia, with its picturesque allegory of dawn rising over the Hradschin of Prague (by Alfonse Mucha); Poland, with its crowned white eagle and equestrian portrait of King Sobieski; Jugoslavia, with its caryatid of Victory and Croat sailor proclaiming freedom from the masthead; while from Fiume came on Jan. 28 autonomous postage stamps of pictorial design by the artist, Giovanni Rubinovich, issued by the National Council, and eloquent of the Italian sympathies of its populace. In Turkey the abortive pictorial stamps prepared in anticipation of Essad Pasha's ill-fated invasion of Egypt were finally placed in circulation toward the end of January, with the addition of a three-line overprint signifying "Souvenir of the Armistice—30 Dulkanada 1334" (Oct. 30, 1918).

A figure of Victory flanked by trophies of flags of the allied nations formed the design of a much criticised commemorative stamp issued by the United States Post Office on Feb. 13, 1919.

About this time postage stamps came into use in the newly constituted Baltic States of Latvia (Lettland), Lithuania, and Esthonia, whose resources were in course of development under the direction of a British military mission. For the most part their first stamps were of an extremely primitive nature, locally designed and printed on paper of varying types and textures by reason of the acute shortage of regular printing paper. The stamps of Latvia, with the device of three ears of wheat in a sunburst, were originally impressed at Riga on the backs of German Staff maps, and subsequently at Libau on writing and cigarette paper. Lithuania's first issue was printed at Vilna and Grodnow from ordinary printers' type on coarse white paper, and when at length a more elaborate design representing St. Michael on horseback was obtained from Berlin the stamps had to be printed temporarily on thick gray paper that had previously been employed for printing German bread tickets.

The first aerial crossing of the Atlantic in May was marked by the use of special postage stamps provided by the Newfoundland postal authorities in limited numbers for franking the mails carried by the competitors for The London Daily Mail prize. A three-cent stamp of the current type overprinted "First Transatlantic Air Post—April, 1919," was affixed to the ninety-five letters forming the mail intrusted to Hawker and Grieve on their plucky attempt, which were rescued from the sea, while the Alcock-Brown post bore stamps of the 15 cent denomination of the 1897 series surcharged "Transatlantic Air Post—One Dollar." Stamps of several values bearing a distinguishing imprint were likewise prepared in connection with the Raynham-Martinsyde venture, but as this met with disaster at the outset were never used. The development of the air post also produced aerial stamps from Switzerland, Tunis, Japan, Colombia, and Germany.

BOLSHEVIST ISSUES

The red hand of Bolshevism has not failed to leave its imprint on the stamps of those countries that have come under its spell. The establishment of Bela Kun's Red Republic at Budapest was the cause of the overprinting with distinguishing inscriptions of the Hungarian stamps in use in other parts of the country, notably at Arad under French occupation, in the Serbian-controlled Banat of Temesvar, in Transylvania under Rumanian occupation, and at Szegedin, where the independent Magyar Government of Count Karolyi was installed. Paper shortage brought to a premature conclusion the printing of the distinctive stamps of the Bolshevik administration with their unprepossessing portraits of the Socialist leaders, Marx, Petofi, Engels, Doza, and Martinovics, the unrestricted sale of which was intended to bring grist to the mill of State. They were superseded by former Hungarian types of 1916, overprinted "Magyar Tanacs Koztarsasag" (Hungarian Red Republic) until the overthrow of Bela Kun and the re-establishment of the Hungarian State by the Allied Commission. In Bavaria and Württemberg the establishment of Soviet republics was signalized by the addition of the word "Volkstaat" or "Friestaat" on their contemporary postage stamps. The introduction of free postage by the Bolshevik Government of Russia rendered unnecessary the issue of some weird postage stamps in advanced futurist designs symbolical of Labor in all its phases, prepared by the State Printing Works at Petrograd.

The Transcaucasian Republic of Georgia was added to the roll of stamp-issuing countries on May 26, when a set of four stamps made its debut with a hieroglyphic reproduction of the national arms depicting St. George crossing the Black Mountains. Some curious stamps adorned with a vignette of a large tree were issued about the same period by the Provisional Government of the Black Sea port of Batum, under British military control. Three separate series of provisional postage stamps issued at Aivaly, Smyrna, and Rodosto resulted from the Greek occupation of Asia Minor by the mandate of the Paris Conference.

The deliverance of Riga from the Bolsheviks was duly commemorated on June 6 in the issue by the Lettish Government of a set of three celebration stamps portraying the reunion of Lettonia and Riga. The anti-Bolshevik campaign in both North and South Russia is denoted by the stamps of General Denikin's Government, inscribed "Russian Union," and issued at Sebastopol in June, the curious typeset adhesives of the Northwest Russian Army which appeared at Reval later in the year, and Finnish stamps overprinted "Aunus" for use in the district of Olonetz after the Soviet forces had been compelled to retire.

PEACE STAMPS

Japan was first in the field with "Peace" commemorative stamps, issued on July 1, in designs by S. Okada and Yuki, representing doves, and beautifully engraved by the Government Printing Bureau at Tokio. Uruguay followed suit on July 17 with a handsome vignette of Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty on a series of six special stamps inscribed "Paz—1914-1919." On Aug. 1 Switzerland added her quota of three "Peace" stamps in attractive symbolical designs by native artists. From Jamaica came on July 3 a single 1½d stamp recess printed in apple-green, commemorative of the departure of the West Indian contingent for the battlefields of France and Flanders.

Changes in the stamps of Far Eastern countries have been brought about by the phenomenal rise in the value of silver, including the overprinting for the first time of the stamps sold by the United States postal agency in Shanghai. The first postage stamps of the German Republic, in futurist designs symbolical of the rebirth of the Teutonic nation, were issued on the occasion of the National Assembly at Weimar in July. Austria has likewise been provided with a complete new series of postage stamps, designed by Josef Franz Jenner, and comprising four different types. Czar Boris figures on the latest Bulgarian issue, while Turkey has been compelled to resort to provisional surcharging pending the preparation of her new stamps.

An interesting set of commemorative postage stamps marked the opening of the first Polish Diet in Warsaw. Among the appropriate designs was a stamp portrait of President Paderewski. Czechoslovakia, the youngest nation of Europe, celebrated her first birthday on Oct. 28 by the issue of allegorical postage stamps sold in aid of the widows and orphans of fallen soldiers.

THE LEICESTER EXHIBITION

The first public stamp exhibition in Great Britain since 1914 was held at the beginning of the present year by the Leicester and Nottinghamshire Philatelic Societies. The collection shown was valued at more than $60,000 and included most of the types described above. This exhibit was especially rich in new Russian stamps. Before the Soviet Government inaugurated a free postage system for Russia the Bolsheviks were responsible for several stamps of such a weird Futurist type that it is difficult to imagine what they are meant to represent. All one can be certain about is that there has been an attempt to symbolize labor, and that one stamp shows a miner and another a sickle and no more than two ears of corn. A third may depict a factory, but surely such a factory never existed.

Saarín was among the artists who prepared a series of stamps for Kerénsky's Government, but of these only one, showing a sword cutting a chain, was issued to the public. Since then Romanoff stamps have been overprinted with various designs indicating liberty. The Ukraine has given philatelists a task by overprinting old stamps with a design, now generally described as the Ukrainian trident, taken from the arms of the Grand Duke St. Vladimir of Kiev.

The Leicester exhibit included a number of Lettland stamps, which are more interesting because of the paper on which they are printed than because of their design. When the republic was formed paper was so scarce that the stamps were printed on the back of war maps the Germans had left behind. These stamps used to command tremendous prices, but early buyers threw money away, as it is possible now to obtain complete sheets on different maps at quite reasonable rates. Lettland's second issue was on lined paper, and the third was on thin cigarette paper. Lithuania also has supplied a permanent record of the shortage of paper during the war by printing stamps on paper of the kind previously used for bread tickets. The exhibit also included stamps of the Don Cossacks, Georgia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, Fiume, and of Finland, the country which before the war used Russian stamps slightly altered by the inclusion of a few dots in the design. Now Finland proclaims her independence by stamps showing a lion tramping on the Russian sword. Turkey was represented by stamps intended to be used after the invasion of Egypt and kept from becoming waste paper by an overprint which interpreted means "Souvenir of the Armistice."

French Memorial Diplomas]

FRANCE is expressing her gratitude to the 112,422 American soldiers who died on French battlefields by a memorial diploma which was presented to the next of kin by the American Legion, in co-operation with the Army Recruiting Offices, on Washington's Birthday, Feb. 22, 1920.

These diplomas were sent by the French High Commission to the Adjutant General's Office for distribution, and the recruiting officers and Legion posts have been busy since November finding the addresses of the next of kin. This memorial is designed to supplement the special message of the French Government embodied in a pamphlet addressed "To the Homeward Bound Americans," which was not completed in time for distribution before our troops sailed for home. The diploma bears an engraving of a group adapted from the famous bas-relief of "La Marseillaise" on the Arc de Triomphe in Paris. This group is placed on a cenotaph, on which is engraved, in French, the tribute of France's homage, with President Poincaré's signature. The whole is reproduced in the rotogravure section of this issue of CURRENT HISTORY.

The Retreat of the Serbian Army

[LAST HALF]

By CAPTAIN G. GORDON-SMITH

[ROYAL SERBIAN ARMY]

Captain Gordon-Smith, the only English-speaking eyewitness of the historic retreat of the Serbian Army across the mountains of Albania to the Adriatic, here concludes his stirring narrative of that little-known chapter of the history of the war. This portion of the story embodies the thrilling climax of the drama which marked the lowest ebb of Serbia's fortunes.

FROM Nov. 24 to 26, 1915, we were occupied in making preparations for our departure from Prisrend.

The Headquarters Staff, headed by Field Marshal Putnik, numbered, with its escort, over 300 persons with more than 400 riding and baggage horses. The aged Voivode was a martyr to asthma and unable to mount on horseback or face the bitter cold of the Albanian mountains. It is, however, utterly impossible to traverse the mountain roads in a wheeled vehicle of any sort; a sedan chair was constructed, in which the veteran leader could be carried across the mountains on the shoulders of Serbian soldiers.

The French in Prisrend, consisting of the aviation and other units, numbering altogether nearly 250 officers and men, resolved to cross the mountains by the same route as the Headquarters Staff, starting the day before it, immediately behind the King and the royal household. This detachment was under the command of Colonel Fournier, the French Military Attaché, having as his Lieutenant Major Vitrat, the head of the French Aviation Section. This section had rendered immense services to the Serbian Army throughout the whole retreat. Major Vitrat is an officer who would do credit to any army. I have rarely met a man of more decision of character, and certainly none of greater courage. His example inspired the Aviation Corps from its pilots to the last of its transport chauffeurs.

The French detachment was composed of three sailors from the naval gun battery of Belgrade, 94 automobile mechanics, 125 officers and men of the Aviation Section, and five wireless operators. The personnel was utilized according to its aptitudes. A commission for the purchase of the necessary pack animals was formed of two observing officers of the Aviation Section, one a Captain of hussars and the other a Captain of artillery. The officers brought together what money they still possessed for the purchase of the provisions necessary for the journey, a matter of 18,000 francs.

This proved the most difficult part of the organization, as food and fodder were becoming rare. A certain amount of corn for the seventy pack horses of the expedition was found at a price of one franc the "oka" (the Turkish "oka" is about three pounds) and ten sheep which accompanied the column and were killed and eaten as occasion required.

SICK SENT BY AIRPLANE

The next difficulty was the question of transport of half a dozen sick men in the detachment. Horses for their transport could not be found, and it was out of the question that they could be carried on stretchers by their comrades. Colonel Fournier solved the difficulty by ordering their transport by airplane. The section still possessed six machines capable of flying, in spite of the fact that for two and a half months they had been exposed night and day without shelter to wind, rain and snow. On Thursday, Nov. 25, the six airplanes started off across the mountains on their flight to Scutari. This was the first time in military annals that the airplane had been pressed into the ambulance service; but the innovation was most successful, the machines arriving in Scutari in less than half the number of hours that it took the rest of the detachment days in its march across the snow-clad hills.

It was, indeed, with a certain envy that we watched the start of these ambulance-airplanes when we remembered the difficult task that lay before us before we could rejoin them in Scutari. Du Bochet and I arranged to travel with the French column, and handed to Major Vitrat the list of provisions which we could contribute to the common stock. The first étape, that from Prisrend to Lioum-Koula, is along a fairly good road. It was resolved to send on the pack animals the day before and to cover the thirty kilometers to Lioum-Koula, which is the last village on Serbian territory, in the automobiles of the Aviation Corps. As the road from this point onward is a mere sheep track across the mountains, utterly impracticable for wheeled vehicles, the automobiles would there be destroyed in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy.

BURNING THE AUTOMOBILES

It was 7 in the morning of Friday, Nov. 26, when we started on our march across the mountains to Scutari. Despite the depressing circumstances, the aviation detachment was in high spirits at the prospect of returning to France after a year of hardship in Serbian campaigning. At Lioum-Koula we were to destroy the automobiles, preliminary to starting on our 120-mile tramp. We had, however, to begin the ceremony prematurely, as six miles from the start one of the motors gave out. As there was neither time nor inclination to repair it, the vehicle, a ten-ton motor lorry, was run by hand into a field alongside the road, flooded with petrol and set on fire. An instant later it was blazing merrily while the irrepressible younger spirits of the detachment executed a war dance round it, solemnly chanting Chopin's "Funeral March."

But it was at Lioum-Koula that we had the grand feu d'artifice. Near a bridge across the Drin the right bank of the river drops precipitously nearly 150 feet. One after another the huge motors were drenched with petrol and set on fire. The chauffeurs steered straight for the precipice, jumping clear as the cars shot over. The immense lorries rolled crashing to the bottom, where they formed a blazing pile.

Twelve hours later I saw a crowd of 500 wretched Austrian prisoners gathered around the ruins. They had crawled down to warm themselves and to roast chunks of meat cut from dead horses at a blaze that had cost the French Republic a quarter of a million francs. The rest of the landscape was blotted out by the whirling blizzard through which the fiery tongues of flame were darting. Every now and then the explosion of a benzine tank would scatter the Austrians, but the temptation of warmth proved too much for them and they soon returned.

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS

Five minutes after the last car was over the precipice Major Vitrat formed up his men, told off his advance and rear guards, gave the word, "En avant, marche!" and the column swung off through the driving snow on the first étape of its long march. We had intended accompanying it to Scutari, but found that the bullock wagon with our baggage and our pack horse, which had left Prisrend the previous day, had failed to arrive. It did not put in its appearance until 5 o'clock in the evening, and as a violent snowstorm was then raging I did not care to tackle the mountain ascent in the dark to try to find the French bivouac. There was, therefore, nothing for us to do but to join the Headquarters Staff.

The event of the day was the arrival of the Voivode Putnik. The veteran Field Marshal, a victim of asthma, practically had not left his room for two years. A seven days' mountain journey in a sedan chair, carried by four soldiers, must have been a terrible experience for him; but the capture of their beloved Voivode by the Germans would have been regarded by the Serbians as a national disaster.

The next day it was still snowing, and the start for Scutari was delayed another twenty-four hours. As two years before, during the Albanian campaign, the Serbians had demolished all the houses in Lioum-Koula except four, accommodation was limited. I found lodgings in a huge ammunition tent. The gendarme in charge objected to my smoking cigarettes, which he said was strictly forbidden by the regulations, but he said nothing about the score of guttering candles burning on cartridge boxes, or the spirit-lamp on a box labeled "shells," over which the wife of the Colonel was preparing tea. When I drew his attention to this he declared the regulations were silent on the subject of candles and spirit-lamps, but distinctly mentioned cigarettes.

A CAPTAIN'S EXPERIENCES

All day and night the troops bound for El-Bassan poured through Lioum-Koula. As we had nothing to do, I went out for a walk about five miles along the road. Every five hundred yards or so I came on dead bodies of men who had succumbed to cold or exhaustion. Coming back I encountered Captain Piagge, an English officer in Serbian service, whom I had met at the Pristina Railway Station when he was leaving to take part in the last desperate effort to advance on Uskub. When I had last seen him his machine-gun section numbered about eighty-four men. At Lioum-Koula it had dwindled to twenty-six. He had all his guns intact, however, and delivered them, as I afterward heard, safely at El-Bassan.

The sufferings of the Serbians in the Katchanik Mountains had, he told me, been terrible. His section, after passing the whole day in the blizzard at Pristina Station, had, at midnight, with the temperature far below zero, been embarked on open trucks for its six hours' journey to the fighting line. The men had nothing to eat except some maize bread and a few raw cabbages. As soon as they left the train they had started on their march into the mountains. At first they were successful, driving the Bulgarians from one mountain ridge after another. But fatigue and privations soon told their tale, and in forty-eight hours his men had fought themselves to a standstill and nothing was left but retreat on Prisrend.

The sight presented by Lioum-Koula on the eve of departure was unique. On the mountain side for miles nothing could be seen but endless fires. They were made by the burning of the thousands of ox-wagons, which were unable to go further, as the road for vehicles ceases at Lioum-Koula. Fortunately the snowstorm had ended and had been followed by brilliant sunshine.

Next morning at nine o'clock the Headquarters Staff set out. The road wound along the banks of the Drin, which had to be crossed twice by means of picturesque old single-span Turkish bridges, since destroyed to impede the Bulgarian advance.

The first mistake made was that of transporting the sedan chair of Field Marshal Putnik at the head of the procession. Every time it halted to change bearers, which was every fifteen minutes, the whole two-mile-long procession, following in single file, had to stop also. As a result, instead of reaching Spas before sundown, we only reached a village at the base of the mountain after darkness had fallen.

Here a long council was held as to whether we should bivouac in the village or undertake the mountain climb in the dark. After a discussion lasting three-quarters of an hour, during which the mass of men and animals stood shivering in the freezing air, the latter course was decided upon. It was one of the most extraordinary adventures ever undertaken. A narrow path about four feet wide, covered with ice and snow, winds corkscrew fashion up the face of the cliff. On the one hand is a rocky wall and on the other a sheer drop into the Drin. This road winds and twists at all sorts of angles, and it was up this that we started in the black darkness, with the sedan chair of General Putnik still heading the procession. Every time it reached a corner it was a matter of endless difficulty to manoeuvre it around.

On one occasion we stood for thirty-five minutes in an icy wind, listening to the roar of the Drin, invisible in the black gulf 500 feet below. Horses slipped and fell at every instant, and every now and then one would go crashing into the abyss. It was a miracle that no human lives were lost.

It was 10 o'clock when, tired, hungry, and half frozen, we reached bivouac at Spas. Here we found that, though dinner had been ready since 4 o'clock in the afternoon, it could not be served because all the plates and spoons were on the pack animals, which had remained in the village below. Neither had the tents arrived, and as Spas contains only five or six peasant houses, accommodation was at a premium. Colonel Mitrovitch, head of the mess, told us he had reserved a room for us in a farm house a quarter of a mile away.

The house really was two hours' distant, over fields feet deep in snow. When we got there at midnight we discovered that there was already nearly a score of occupants; but at least we were able to sleep in some straw near the fireside, instead of in the snow outside.

CLIMBING THROUGH SNOW

Next morning we set out at 6 so as to get ahead of the main body of the Headquarters Staff. The day was magnificent and we slowly climbed foot by foot to the cloud-capped summits of the mountains. Up and up we went, thousands and thousands of feet. Every few hundred yards we came on bodies of men frozen or starved to death. At one point there were four in a heap. They were convicts from Prisrend penitentiary who had been sent in chains across the mountains. They had been shot either for insubordination or because they were unable to proceed. Two other nearly naked bodies were evidently those of Serbian soldiers murdered by Albanians.

By midday we reached the summit of the mountain, a wind-swept plateau several thousand feet above the level of the sea. For fifty miles extended range upon range of snow-clad mountains, the crests of which had never been trodden by the foot of man. Nothing could be seen but an endless series of peaks, glittering like diamonds in the brilliant sunshine. The scene was one of indescribable grandeur and desolation.

DEAD AND DYING SOLDIERS

After traversing the plateau we began the descent, skirting the edge of the precipices of enormous height and traversing narrow gorges running between towering walls of black basalt. Every few hundred yards we would come on corpses of Serbian soldiers, sometimes singly, sometimes in groups. One man had evidently gone to sleep beside a wretched fire he had been able to light. The heat of it had melted the snow, and the water had flowed over his feet. In the night during his sleep this had frozen and his feet were imprisoned in a solid block of ice. When I reached him he was still breathing. From time to time he moved feebly, as if trying to free his feet from their icy coverings. We were powerless to aid him, he was so far gone that nothing could have saved him. The only kindness one could have done him would have been to end his sufferings with a revolver bullet. But human life is sacred, and so there was nothing to do but pass on and leave him to breathe his last in these eternal solitudes.

On this part of the journey it was a matter of life and death to reach the end of the étape and find some shelter. If we had been surprised by darkness in the desolation of these windswept mountain gorges, where the narrow pathway ran alongside an abyss, our fate would have been sealed. In addition to the forces of nature we had also to reckon with the wild and lawless Albanian population. The hardy mountaineers who live among these fastnesses have many qualities, but the life of feud and strife of their savage clans does not make for the development of respect for human life.

We spent the night in an Albanian peasant's hut in the village of Fleti, a collection of half a score of houses, surrounded, like most Albanian villages, by a dry stone wall. The Albanian population refused to accept our Serbian silver money, and we were forced reluctantly to bring out our small store of ten and twenty franc gold pieces. In ordinary times one of these would represent a small fortune to the Albanian mountaineers, but they were evidently resolved to exploit the Serbian retreat commercially to the best of their ability.

KING PETER ON FOOT

We started next morning at dawn. Soon after midday we overtook King Peter and his staff. Despite his 76 years he marched on foot with a vigor a younger man might have envied. During all the four hours we marched with the Royal Staff his Majesty never once mounted his horse, which a soldier was leading behind him. When we stopped for the night at the village, Bredeti, the King had a march of ten hours to his credit.

It was at this point that we came across the first gendarmes of Essad Pasha, the ruler of Albania, who eighteen months before had driven the Prince von Wied, the marionette King nominated by the great powers at the instigation of Germany and Austria, from his throne. These gendarmes had been sent out by their iron-handed master to protect the journey of King Peter and his staff. They were a picturesque lot, many of them going barefooted in the snow, but there was no doubt of the first-class quality of their rifles and revolvers. For the most part they wore Serbian uniforms—that is, when they wore any uniform at all—of which the Nish Government had some months before made Essad Pasha a present of several thousand.

The attitude of the Albanian population toward the Serbs could not be described as friendly, but at the same time they gave no outward signs of hostility. They rarely saluted the Serbian officers and showed no desire whatever to offer hospitality. In the case of the members of the Serbian Government, the King and his suite and the Headquarters Staff, Essad Pasha had requisitioned accommodation in the rare Albanian villages, but any one not belonging to one of these units had every chance of faring badly. All we had to depend on were the "hans" or wayside taverns.

These huge, barnlike structures consist of nothing but four walls with a shingle roof, the latter generally far from watertight. Here men and horses are quartered pell-mell. Everybody annexes as much space as he can and lights a fire for warmth and cooking. As the "hans" have no chimneys and the smoke is left to find its way through the open doors or through the roof, the condition of the atmosphere may be imagined.

A MISERABLE NIGHT

As du Bochet and I had pushed ahead of the Headquarters Staff we had naturally lost the advantage of being billeted in the farmhouses requisitioned by Essad's gendarmes. On arriving at Bredeti we had therefore to claim the hospitality of the local "han." We lit our fire in the square yard or two of space we had been able to commandeer, but the atmosphere soon proved too much for us. I do not know by what means they arrive at it, but the eyes and lungs of the Serbian soldiers seem smoke-proof. They sit and converse cheerfully in a smoke cloud through which you cannot see a yard. As we had not acquired the smoke habit, in an hour's time we were driven to flight. Blindness and suffocation seemed the penalty of a more prolonged stay.

We therefore, in spite of the snow and freezing cold, fled to the exterior. Here, as some protection against the weather, we determined to put up a small tent we carried among our baggage. It was barely three feet high and open at one end, and was, in consequence, but an indifferent shelter against the inclement weather. However, having made Stanco build a blazing fire near the open end, we entered it and went to sleep.

Three hours later we awoke to find the wretched tent in a blaze. We struggled out with difficulty and managed to save most of our belongings from the flames; but the tent and sleeping-rugs were gone, and there was nothing for it but to remain seated around the camp fire till the advent of the dawn would allow us to resume our weary march.

NERVE-RACKING TRAVEL

On the next étape a new experience awaited us. The road ran for miles through a rocky gorge, through which a river flowed. The route lay along the bed of this, and the only means of travel was to step from one stone to another. There is nothing so nerve-racking as to have to keep one's eyes constantly glued to the ground, where each step presents a new problem. Of course, every now and then one of the stones would turn under our feet, and this meant a plunge up to the knees in the icy water of the stream.

As far as the eye could see there was nothing but this rocky stream winding for miles between towering basaltic cliffs. The task of transporting thousands of men and horses under such conditions was almost superhuman. If the Albanians had been openly hostile not one man could have come out alive. When we reached the village where we stayed that night we had the greatest difficulty to obtain accommodation, until it became known we were not Serbians. Then every hospitality was shown us, but prices were enormous. The Albanian, like most peasants, is grasping and fond of money, but once you cross his threshold your person and property are sacred. I never had the slightest fear once I entered an Albanian house.

But on the road everything is possible. The tribes live at war with one another and respect for human life is nonexistent. It would have been as much as our lives were worth to travel an hour after darkness, but in daylight an armed party inspires a certain respect.

The men physically are probably the handsomest in Europe. I have never seen anywhere such beautiful children as those in Albania, and their parents seem extremely fond of them, but the little people seem to lead very serious lives. I never by any chance saw half a dozen playing together. They sat around in silence, looking at us with wondering eyes, especially when du Bochet and I spoke French together. Not one Albanian in a hundred knows how to read or write, or has ever been more than twenty miles from home. And it was through such a country the Serbians had to transport an army, and that with the Germans and the Bulgarians in close pursuit.

THE LAST STAGE

The last stages of the march were probably the hardest, as fodder for the animals and food for the men were practically unprocurable. Money difficulties also increased daily, the Albanians refusing to accept Serbian silver or notes at any rate of exchange. They would, however, give food and lodgings for articles of clothing, shirts, underwear, socks, and boots. On the last stage we had, therefore, to resort to the primitive system of barter, buying a night's lodging with a shirt and a meal with a pair of socks.

In the mountains just before Puka I discovered the first trace of wolves. The carcasses of dead horses, which were now numbered by scores, showed signs of having been torn by them. A part of the French Aviation Corps, which was preceding us, got lost in the snow and darkness here, and had to spend the night in the open without protection. A dozen were frostbitten, but there were no deaths. After six days we finally reached the Drin again, now a broad and swiftly flowing stream.

Thence the march to Scutari may be summed up in the word mud—mud of the deepest and most tenacious kind, sometimes only reaching to the ankles, sometimes to the knees, but it was always there.

The twenty-five miles between the Drin ferry and Scutari represents physical effort of no mean order. It was the finish for scores of unfortunate pack horses. During the last two days they got practically no food. On these days we found dead horses every hundred yards. When at last, at 4 in the afternoon, we came in sight of the towers and minarets of Scutari every one heaved a sigh of relief.

IN SIGHT OF SCUTARI

Never, I suppose, since the Children of Israel crossed the desert, was any "promised land" ever looked forward to with such yearning as that felt by the remnants of the Serbian Nation for the first sight of Scutari. During the final étape, the "Tarabosh," the fez-shaped mountain which dominates the town and lake, was for it what the "cloud of smoke by day and the pillar of fire by night" was for the followers of Moses. The sight of the score of minarets denoting the actual position of the town created the belief that in an hour or so our long anabasis would be at an end. But this was more or less an optical illusion. The flatness of the plain makes objects seem nearer than they really are, and it was a long seven hours' tramp from our last halting place till we reached the banks of the river on the other side of which were the outlying suburbs of the town.

Our final day's march was not the least interesting one. After climbing our last hill and winding our way down a tunnel-like descent covered with immense boulders, we debouched on the plain of Scutari. Here we found grassy slopes covered with clumps of spreading trees, mostly walnut and oak. The miserable huts of the mountaineers had now given place to well-built houses. Instead of the poorly clad, half-starved inhabitants of the hills, we now met handsome, well-clothed men and tall and graceful women. We were in the country of the Myrdites.

We were again marching along the banks of the Drin, which is at this point a broad and imposing stream, pouring its meandering course toward the Lake of Scutari. As far as the eye could reach there was a succession of large, closely-wooded islands, canals, lakes and flooded prairies from which rose hundreds of poplar trees, bordered by immense banks of sand, over which we could see Serbian cavalry moving, reduced by the distance to little black dots.

AN ORIENTAL ATMOSPHERE

In the shops in the villages we now found tobacco, excellent coffee served à la Turque, and little bundles of smoked fish from the lake. The slow and soft language of the Turks made a curious contrast to the harsher and more nasal Albanian. Montenegrin soldiers, with their khaki-colored skullcaps and short cloaks à l'Italienne, had now replaced the truculent-looking gendarmes of Essad Pasha, with their belts full of revolvers and their general look of brigands d'opérette. We traversed the river in large boats with raised bows, reminding one of the gondolas of Venice or the caïques of Constantinople. After the rude and rich Serbia, the monotonous deserts of Macedonia, and the savage desolation of upper Albania we had now the Orient, with its curious charm.

Our final difficulty was getting across the river. The ferryman refused to accept Serbian paper money, and all our silver was gone. Fortunately at this moment a Montenegrin officer of gendarmerie rode up and to him we appealed. He settled the difficulty in summary fashion by a plentiful distribution of blows from his heavy riding whip to the men manning the boat. The latter, it appeared, had orders to transport every one coming from Serbia free of charge, so that their effort to extort money from us was only a gentle attempt at a "hold up."

Our first visit in Scutari was to the hotel where we knew the French Aviation Corps was lodged. Here we were given details of the journey of the corps, which had fared even worse than ourselves. Seventeen of their horses had died en route, so that the 250 officers and men composing the party had none too much in the way of food during the final étapes. A section of the company had also lost its way in the marshes outside Scutari, and only reached the town after tramping without stopping for over twenty hours. Twelve men had frost-bitten feet and had to go into hospital, but all had recovered. At Scutari they found the six comrades who had come by airplane with the sick men from Pristina. The journey by air had been accomplished in one and a half hours; the men on foot had taken nearly eight days.

OBTAINING QUARTERS

After indulging in the unusual—and very expensive—luxury of a whisky-and-soda we had luncheon with the equally unaccustomed luxuries of tablecloths and serviettes, and then went in search of quarters. These were not easy to find, as the Serbians were now pouring by thousands into the town. But du Bochet, during his previous visit, had made the acquaintance of the Governor of Scutari, the Montenegrin Voivode Bozha Petrovitch. We paid a visit to him at his official residence and he sent a non-commissioned officer with us to requisition a lodging.

The latter found us a room in the house of a "notable" of the town, a young Turkish Albanian. It was a typical Turkish edifice of the better class. We were given a large room on the ground floor. Around the whole room ran a low divan on which we could sit by day and sleep by night. The windows, Turkish fashion, were closely barred. Every evening at 8 o'clock a little Turkish servant, always silent but always smiling, arrived and, after carefully removing his shoes as a sign of respect, opened an immense cupboard, from which he took mattresses, pillows, and large and handsome silk quilts embroidered with large blue and yellow flowers, with which he proceeded to make up our beds. Our meals were sent to us from the staff headquarters, the Hôtel de Ville, by the ever-courteous but much-harassed Colonel Mitrovitch.

FUGITIVES POURING IN

The convoys which had struggled across the mountains were now pouring in. There were hundreds of Serbian oxen, with magnificent spreading horns, but starved and lame; thin-flanked pack horses, hardly able to drag themselves along under their heavy loads, and cavalry soldiers, tramping along on foot, leading their exhausted mounts.

Every barrack was full, all the private houses had been requisitioned, and still the flood of fugitives kept pouring into the town in a double stream, one arriving by the route we had followed, from Lioum-Koula, and the other by the Montenegrin road via Ipek and Andreyevitza. The placid Turks, the tall and sinewy Albanians and the Myrdite mountaineers in their barbaric costumes looked on in silence, but one felt that in them was rising a feeling of sullen rage mixed with fear.

This invasion had the same effect in Scutari that it had had everywhere else. Provisions began to run down and in a few days there was no more bread obtainable. Taken completely by surprise—for they had only two days' warning of the decision of the Serbians to retreat into Albania—the Montenegrin Government [which was keeping order in that part of Albania] had not had time to make preparations. Besides, what preparation could it have made? For months past Montenegro herself had been short of provisions. Time after time the inhabitants of the capital had been forced to look on helpless when, before their very eyes, Austrian torpedo boats "held up" and took off to the Bocche di Cattaro the ships laden with maize en route for Antivari.

BOMBED BY THE AUSTRIANS

In these circumstances it may readily be imagined that the inhabitants of Scutari were far from hailing the Serbian invasion with enthusiasm. The Austrians must have got wind of this, for every morning at 10, with clocklike punctuality, an airplane appeared over the town and began dropping bombs. The first day a number of people were killed and wounded. On the other visits the casualties were fewer, as everybody sought cover, but the material damage was considerable. The two points at which the bombs were aimed were the chief barracks and the Italian Consulate. These were about 150 yards from each other. As the house I was quartered in was exactly in the centre of this line, we got full advantage of all the bombs that missed. Fortunately, there was a stable with thick walls and strongly vaulted roof, which was practically bombproof, in which we could take refuge and from which we could watch the explosions in safety. As during the whole course of the war no aerial attacks had been made on Scutari, the object of the new departure was undoubtedly to render the Serbians unpopular with the inhabitants of Scutari, "Jonahs" whose presence had brought misfortune on the city.

WORK OF REORGANIZATION

As soon as the Headquarters Staff arrived in Scutari it began, with admirable energy, the work of reorganizing the wreck of the Serbian Army. It was without definite news of the various units, for the initiative regarding the operations of the retreat into Albania had been left in the hands of the individual commanders. The first necessity, however, was to collect provisions and arrange for their distribution. Then, as the debris of the army arrived, the men were placed in barracks, and, when these were full, in camps and bivouacs.

The guiding spirit of the Headquarters Staff was Colonel Zhivko Pavlovitch, an energetic and indefatigable Colossus, the Chief of Staff of Field Marshal Putnik. His influence was quickly apparent. Day by day the number of bivouacs on the hills behind Scutari became more numerous. With the renaissance of order the morale of the troops improved. The hundreds of soldiers wandering aimlessly about the streets disappeared. The division of the Danube had, by a miracle of energy, succeeded in bringing over the mountains, by the Ipek route, a number of batteries of field and mountain guns. These, in the most difficult places, they had dragged along by ropes.

The troops which had marched by the Dibra-El Bassan route in the hope of reaching Monastir and proceeding thence by rail to Saloniki to join the Allies failed to reach the former town before the Bulgarians. In forty-eight hours Colonel Zhivko Pavlovitch had succeeded in getting in touch with them and had concentrated them around Kavaya, Tirana and El Bassan. These troops were later embarked at Durazzo for Corfu.

A few hours after the entry of the Serbians into Scutari the officers of the British Adriatic Mission arrived in the town. The object of this mission was to take measures for feeding, re-equipping and re-organizing the Serbian army in Albania. This was also the desire of the Headquarters Staff. Unfortunately, the Italian Government was opposed to the idea. It declared that it was not in a position to assure the safe passage of the transports with food, clothing, arms, &c., across the Adriatic.

That this was precarious was proved by the action of the Austrian fleet at Durazzo and San Giovanni di Medua, when a squadron of eight vessels suddenly appeared on Dec. 9 in those ports and sank all the shipping, steamships and sailing vessels, then in the roads.

AUSTRIAN NAVAL ATTACK

When I arrived at Durazzo some days afterward, M. Gavrilovitch, the Serbian Minister Plenipotentiary in that town, gave me a description of this incursion, which I cannot do better than give in his own words:

I was sitting working in my office, [he told me,] when one of my attachés came in and announced that a squadron of warships was in sight. I went out to the terrace of the legation, whence I had a view of the Adriatic. With my fieldglass I distinguished a squadron of eight ships, cruisers and destroyers, steaming toward Durazzo. When they came nearer I could distinguish the Austrian flag. As I was convinced they were going to seize that town I immediately got out the archives of the legation, the cipher, &c., and burned the whole in the courtyard. I fully expected to sleep that night in Ragusa as an Austrian prisoner.

Half an hour later the warships arrived in the roads and cast anchor. We expected to see a landing party put off every minute, but hesitation appeared to prevail. The Austrian Admiral was probably doubtful of the forces at the disposal of Essad Pasha, and the resistance he might encounter. The ships lay there inactive for two hours, and then suddenly opened fire on all the shipping in the harbor. They sank two steamers and a number of sailing vessels. You can still see their funnels and masts emerging from the water. After that they weighed anchor and went off to San Giovanni di Medua, where they repeated their exploit. They then quietly returned to the Bocche di Cattaro.

What renders this affair so mysterious is that Brindisi, where scores of Italian warships of all categories are lying, is only two and a half hours' steaming for the swiftest Italian destroyers under forced draft. I crossed from Durazzo to Brindisi a fortnight later on the Italian destroyer Ardito, and we covered the distance in about three hours with, I was told, ten knots in the period of our full speed. As the Italian Legation at Durazzo possessed a wireless station that was in constant communication with Brindisi, the Italian Admiral there must have had news of the approach of the Austrian squadron five minutes after it appeared above the line of the horizon. How, under these circumstances, it was possible for it to cruise undisturbed in the Adriatic for five hours and bombard two Albanian harbors remains a dark and fearful mystery.

Italy's Gains in Africa

Enlargement of Colonies

THE Treaty of London promised Italy "equitable compensations" in case the German colonies in that continent came under French and British rule. Early in 1920 negotiations were in progress to carry out that promise of 1915. Great Britain and France are about to add generously to Italian possessions in Africa under Article XIII. of the treaty in question, which says:

Should France and Great Britain augment their African colonial dominions at the expense of Germany, those two powers recognize in principle that Italy will be entitled to claim some equitable compensations, notably in the regulation in her favor of questions concerning the frontiers of the Italian colonies of Eritrea, of Somaliland, and of Libya, and of the neighboring colonies of France and Great Britain.

Fronting on the Mediterranean, the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean, these three Italian colonies are destined to play an important part in the development of the African Continent. Libya is the largest and best known, including the ancient Tripoli and Cyrenaica. The former was originally a Phoenician colony and the latter was colonized by the Greeks, later coming under the dominion of the Ptolemies of Egypt. Tripoli was afterward dependent on Carthage. Both provinces fell to the Romans, were conquered by the Vandals in the fifth century, by the Byzantines in the sixth, and the Arabs in the seventh, when Christianity was displaced by Mohammedans, who ruled the country until the Spaniards took it in 1510. Eighteen years later they turned it over to the Knights of St. John, who were expelled by the Turks in 1553. Ahmed Karamanli in 1714 founded an independent dynasty, recognizing the sovereignty of the Porte, under which piracy flourished, tribute being paid by European Governments for exemption of their shipping from plunder.

Libya has a special interest for Americans because it was the scene of stirring incidents in our history. America's tribute to the Pasha for exemption from piracy was $83,000 a year and had been paid for five years when the Tripolitan Governor demanded an increase. War followed, the United States sending a fleet to blockade the capital. The frigate Philadelphia, one of the blockading squadron, was captured in 1803, and the next year Stephen Decatur led a daring expedition into the harbor, burned the vessel, and escaped under fire. Peace was made in 1805, the tribute being finally abolished for all countries—a debt which Europe owes to America.

Libya is bounded on the west by Tunis, a French protectorate since 1881; on the south by French Equatorial Africa, on the east by Egypt. The western boundary runs southwest from the Mediterranean at a point about ninety miles northwest of Tripoli, taking in the oasis of Ghadames. There it turns abruptly at right angles toward the southeast for 230 miles across the desert until nearly south of Tripoli, when it again bends at right angles toward the southwest and includes the oasis of Ghat, an important centre of the caravan trade between Nigeria and the Mediterranean. Then it turns east and northeast to the Egyptian boundary.

Direct communication for the southern portions of this region can be obtained only across French territory. To remedy this France has offered to cede all the intervening territory, making the border curve gently around to a convenient point on the caravan route. The Italian Government has accepted this offer, but still wants the Tibesti and Borku districts south of the Libyan Desert. France and Italy have also agreed upon a common colonial railway policy.

On the other hand the active and powerful Italian colonial party has much more extensive aims. The programs urged by the Naples Colonial Congress and the Geographical and Commercial Society of Milan would cut the French African possessions in two. They would extend the frontier more than 600 miles south to Lake Chad, taking in the caravan route on both sides, and then run the boundary through Borku to the Egyptian frontier and north to the Mediterranean, annexing part of the Libyan Desert and the whole oasis of Kufra. Their full demands, if granted, would more than double the size of Libya, adding about 600,000 square miles to its present area of 400,000.

IT IS PROPOSED THAT THE SHADED PORTIONS ADJOINING LIBYA, ERITREA, AND ITALIAN SOMALILAND BE ANNEXED TO THE ITALIAN POSSESSIONS AS COMPENSATION FOR THE EX-GERMAN COLONIES ACQUIRED BY GREAT BRITAIN AND FRANCE

The British negotiators, in arranging the eastern frontier, are willing to cede from Egypt the oasis of Jarabub, only 140 miles from the sea, which is the most sacred centre of the powerful Senussi sect, where its founder, the Sheik es Senussi, ruled, and where his tomb is located. The British expect to retain Kufra, another Senussi stronghold. During the war the Senussites attempted to invade Egypt, but were driven back west. The Italians are now at peace with the Senussi Sheik, but think it a matter of prudence to hold Jarabub.

With this territory in their possession the Italians will control the chief routes between the Mediterranean and trans-Saharan regions. One leads southwest to Timbuctu in the heart of the Sahara, the great exchange market for the products of North Africa and those of the fertile districts south and west of the Niger. Another goes directly south to Lake Chad, which is in the centre of a great game country, its shores being divided by treaty before the war between the British colony of Nigeria, the French Congo, and the German Cameroon. The latter is now administered by the Government of French Equatorial Africa, France regaining the districts ceded to Germany in 1911 as a result of the Algeiras conference, and the rest by the Government of Nigeria. A third important route is the old highway paralleling the coast from Tripoli to Egypt, which has been traversed by caravans since the days of the Romans. Camels, of course, are the chief means of transport.

Next in area to Libya is Italian Somaliland, which forms the eastern tip of Africa, facing the Indian Ocean, and is bounded by British East Africa, Abyssinia, and British Somaliland. Italy seeks to enlarge this colony on the south by annexing the province of Jubaland in British East Africa. The Juba River now forms the boundary of the two colonies, but Great Britain has offered to cede about a third of the province contiguous to the right bank of the Juba. This would give Italy the port of Kismayu, about ten miles south of the mouth of that river. Its harbor is not good, but is far superior to any in Italian Somaliland.

The rock-bound coast of the latter, which stretches for 1,200 miles along the Indian Ocean, does not contain a single good harbor. The acquisition of Kismayu would mean much to Italy, and British East Africa could afford to part with it, for that province has another harbor in Port Dunford, seventy miles further south. Italy has accepted the British offer, which more than doubles the value of her colony. She makes a reservation in favor of a greater extension of territory in Jubaland and a clause relating to railways similar to one concluded with France.

On the north, extending along the Red Sea to the strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, is the Italian colony of Eritrea. Between it and her sister colony are French Somaliland and British Somaliland, completely shutting off Abyssinia from the sea. Italy would like to have both these regions, so as to join her two colonies. In addition some extremists have laid claim to the Farsan Islands in the centre of the Red Sea and part of Yemen on the shore of Arabia, opposite Eritrea. This claim, however, has no official support from the Italian Government.

With regard to Abyssinia, Italy's aims are stated to be purely economic and to favor conserving the integrity of the Ethiopian Empire. The independence of Abyssinia is also the policy of France and Great Britain. The three powers concerned, by an agreement signed Dec. 13, 1906, undertake to respect and preserve the integrity of Abyssinia; to act so that industrial concessions granted to one may not injure the others, and to abstain from intervention in Abyssinia's internal affairs.

France has one port at Jibuti, connected by rail with Addis Abeba, the Abyssinian capital, while in British Somaliland there are two ports, Zeila and Berbera, giving access to Abyssinia. Neither power is likely to surrender its possessions here to Italy, especially as the latter possesses in Massowah, the commercial capital of Eritrea, what was for centuries the chief port of entry for Ethiopia and may again become so. It has been the policy of the French and British to allow free entry of goods for Abyssinia, but a discriminating tax is levied on goods passing through Massowah if not imported from Italy.

On the east of British Somaliland a small strip of territory has been offered to Italian Somaliland, rectifying the frontier. On the northwest of Eritrea the Italians have asked for part of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, including Tokar, Kassala, and the right bank of the Atbara, which flows into the Nile at Berber. The stream, however, is not navigable, and Kassala is the headquarters of the Morgani family, whose head is the chief religious Sheik of the Sudan; on his account Great Britain has hesitated to cede the territory. But with the accessions granted in Libya and Somaliland, Italy will receive the equitable compensations agreed to in the Treaty of London and have plenty of opportunity to assist in the development of Northern Africa.

The coast lands at the foot of Mount Cameroon were formerly British. As long ago as 1837 a native chief ceded part of the district to the British, and there in 1848 the Baptist Missionary Society established a station. Ten years later, on the expulsion of the Baptists from Fernando Po, Alfred Saker, the local head of the mission, founded in Ambas Bay a settlement for freed negroes which he named Victoria, and this has grown into a port of some consequence. And for three or four years where he might plant the German Imperial flag, Nachtigal came in the Summer of 1884 to that old haunt of slavers, the Togo lagoon, where Bremen merchants had trading stations. It was the only spot between Cape Verde and the Niger not claimed by some European power, and it was jammed in between the Gold Coast and Dahomey.

The Germans in consequence could only obtain for their new possession a coast line of thirty-two miles. They claimed a vast hinterland, but these claims were stoutly resisted by France and England and suffered a great reduction. Eventually an area about the size of Ireland was gained, a new port, Lome, was created, railways were built, and a fair trade was developed, though the good-will of the natives was never gained.

Conquered by Anglo-French forces in the first month of the war, Togoland now formally passes into their control. The colony has been divided between France and Great Britain in the manner shown on the map, something less than a third falling to Britain.

The lower Volta, part of the eastern bank of which was German, now becomes wholly British, together with the lower course of the Oti, while in the hinterland the new frontier gives to Britain that part of the once famous "neutral zone" which, after many disputes, was divided between Britain and Germany in 1899. The frontier now corresponds closely with tribal boundaries.

The French gain the whole of the coast of Togoland, with the ports of Lome (hitherto provisionally administered by the Gold Coast Government), Segura, and Little Popo (Anecho), the existing railways, and a new route to the Niger.

Togoland has a population of something over 1,000,000. The natives are, in the north, mainly pastoral; in the south, agriculturists and keen traders. Palm kernels, palm oil, and cocoa are the chief exports. Togoland already pays its way, and its prosperity seems assured.

after German sovereignty had been recognized in Cameroon, Victoria continued under British protection. The people, whose common tongue is pidgin English, have never forgotten the British connection, says The London Times, and the attribution of their country to Britain is welcomed as a return to the happier days before the arrival of the Germans.

Cairo to the Cape by Air

A Great British Enterprise

CECIL RHODES'S imperial dream of a Cape-to-Cairo railway traversing the whole length of Africa has not yet been realized, but with the dawn of the year 1920 the British Government, through its Air Ministry, stood ready to begin a regular aviation service from Cairo to Cape Town. The total flying distance is about 5,200 miles, most of it over the trackless jungle of equatorial Africa, yet the official announcement of the enterprise places the actual flying time at fifty-two hours, or, say, a week flying eight hours a day.

Throughout the year 1919 three British exploring parties were at work surveying and preparing the route, building aerodromes, acquiring landing fields from local chiefs—a year of hard and dangerous work of which the world knew little or nothing. Immediately after the armistice with Turkey in the Autumn of 1918 Sir J. M. Salmond of the Air Ministry seized the favorable opportunity to select parties to survey possible air routes across Africa. In December three parties, each consisting of six officers and the necessary assistants, went to work, each on a separate section of the route. The northern section, from Cairo to Nimule in the Sudan, about 1,500 miles, was in charge of a party under Major Long; the central section, from Nimule to Abercorn in Rhodesia, over 900 miles, was surveyed by Major Emmett, a well-known big game hunter from India; the southern stretch of 2,000 miles from Abercorn to Cape Town was covered by a party under Major Court-Treath, who had previously traveled through the Sahara to Timbuctu.

As a result of a year's hard work by these pioneers in the African wilderness, the most uninviting region for airmen in the whole world is now traversed by a fully equipped route, with aerodromes or landing grounds at intervals of 200 miles or less from the mouth of the Nile to the Cape of Good Hope.

The British Air Ministry, on Dec. 25, 1919, made known the results of the survey and some of its difficulties in a document which says in part:

The route follows the Nile from Cairo to Wady Halfa, thence the railway to Shereik, from which place it conforms to the course of the Nile to Khartum. From Khartum the course is to the west of the White Nile to Eleri, and then almost due south through the Uganda Protectorate to the northern shore of Lake Victoria. Partly owing to the extremely disturbed nature of the atmosphere above the lake the route skirts it on the eastern side, passes over what was formerly German East Africa to the southern end of Lake Tanganyika, and thence across Northern Rhodesia to Livingstone, whence a southeasterly course is followed to Bulawayo. The next town of importance on the route is Pretoria, and so by Johannesburg and Bloemfontein across Cape Colony by Beaufort West to Cape Town.

The preparation of many of the landing grounds has involved a great deal of labor. In places it has been necessary to cut aerodromes out of dense jungle, to fell thousands of trees and dig up their roots, while the soil of innumerable ant hills has had to be removed by hand, being carried in native baskets, as practically no barrows or other equipment were available. Moreover, where tsetse-fly prevailed no cattle could be utilized for cartage purposes. In this region ant hills are often twenty-five feet in height and between thirty-five and forty-five feet in diameter. As one cubic yard of ant hill weighs about 2,670 pounds, some idea may be gathered of the labor necessary to clear the ground at such a place as, for instance, that at N'dola, in Northern Rhodesia, where 700 natives were working from April to August of this year, and roughly 25,000 tons were removed from the ground cleared. Blasting was tried, but was found to be unsuitable.

Now that the initial work of clearing has been completed it is not anticipated that the cost of maintenance will be heavy. Native labor is generally abundant and cheap, and it is estimated locally that even in the worst cases, i. e., those of landing grounds situated in the fast-growing bush and forest country, only small annual changes will be incurred. In practically every case land was provided free of cost or at purely nominal rent by local administrations, who have arranged to guard the stores deposited at the aerodromes, and to assist in keeping the aerodromes and landing grounds cleared of bush.

In some cases landing grounds were prepared entirely by such local authorities. For instance, at Serowe, Chief Khama laid out such a ground at his own expense in order that his district should be linked up with the route. He also rendered considerable assistance in preparing that at Palapwe. It has been arranged for the survey parties to return shortly, and the intention is to organize the route into six areas, each under the personal supervision of a British official.

The first portion of the journey along the Nile Valley should present no particular difficulties to air traffic. Communications by telegraph, river, and railway are fairly good, and landing can be safely effected, if necessary, at many places apart from the prepared grounds. In the central zone, however, difficulties are more numerous. Most of this is covered with dense bush and tropical forest, and landings at other than the prepared grounds will be exceedingly dangerous, if not impossible. In some parts there is no land transport, with the resultant difficulty of providing the necessary stores at the aerodromes. Moreover, at some places tsetse fly prevents the use of cattle, so that, failing the provision of light motor transport—for which special roads would have to be prepared over some sections—native bearers will have to be used for the carriage of stores. Shortage of water and the frequent occurrence of areas infested by mosquitos and white ants increase the difficulties. The fact that the survey parties have, in the face of such obstacles, completed their work within twelve months is worthy of notice.

For most of the southern section, with the exception of Northern Rhodesia, conditions are considerably better. Railway and telegraph facilities are good, and stores can be distributed without much difficulty. The climate, too, is healthful, and forced landings could be negotiated in many places without serious danger. There are wireless stations at various points within touch of the chain of grounds. Generally speaking, cable and land line communications are good, with the exception of those across certain sections, such as that between Abercorn and Ndola and others in Central Africa, where considerable delay may be experienced.

In view of the saving of time which will be effected by the opening of this air route it is of interest to compare the time hitherto required to complete the journey overland. The distances and method of overland journey, following as nearly as possible the suggested aerial route, are:

Cairo to Khartoum by rail and steamer, 1,342 miles, $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 days.

Khartoum to Lake Albert by steamer and ground transport, 1,411 miles, 21 to 24 days.

Lake Albert to Lake Victoria by steamer and ground transport, 350 miles, 5 to 12 days.

Lake Victoria and Lake Tanganyika by ground transport, rail, and steamer, 810 miles, 15 days.

Abercorn to Broken Hill, over a difficult trail, 475 miles, 10 to 15 days.

Broken Hill to Cape Town by rail, 1,336 miles, $4\frac{1}{2}$ days.

("Ground transport" may include motor, horse, or bullock wagon, or any form of local transport.)

Thus the total distance by previous methods of communication is 6,223 miles, for which 59 to 75 days were required. Against this the total flying distance of the aerial route should not exceed 5,200 miles, as the pilot will stop only at the main stations. Taking 100 miles an hour as fair average flying speed under favorable conditions, and when the route has become firmly established, only 52 hours' actual flying time will be required to traverse the entire continent.

The survey parties everywhere met with assistance and co-operation from the various local authorities, who evinced the utmost enthusiasm for the project.

Egypt and the Milner Mission

Demands of the Nationalists

THE nationalist movement in Egypt, like that of Ireland, aims at absolute independence from British rule. In the Spring of 1919 it developed into open revolt, and acts of violence continued until General Allenby checked them by firm military measures in the Autumn. Then a British commission under Lord Milner went to Cairo in November to undertake a peaceful adjustment with the native leaders. The nationalists, however, adopted the policy of boycotting the commission, and throughout the Winter this form of opposition continued, so that Lord Milner has been able to accomplish comparatively little.

The attitude of the nationalists was explained by Dr. Hafiz Bey Afifi, a member of the Egyptian delegation that advised the use of the boycott. In an interview in Cairo he declared that a protectorate is an inferior and humiliating form of government wholly incompatible with the degree of civilization Egypt has reached. The nominal suzerainty of Turkey, he said, was but a shadow when England imposed upon Egypt a de facto as well as de jure supremacy in the form of a protectorate, and Egyptians felt that instead of going forward they were going backward. He urged that the great war, by the victory of right over might, had furnished an honorable occasion for British evacuation, repeatedly promised by Great Britain between 1883 and 1905. The nationalist movement, he declared, was the spontaneous expression of a people conscious of its dawning individuality. Recognition of the protectorate by the other allies, he argued, ought to make it easier for Great Britain to acknowledge Egypt's independence, British prestige having been saved by her diplomatic victory.

A manifesto confirming this attitude was issued by six Princes of the family of Mohammed Ali, the man who founded modern Egypt early in the last century. In it they say that different classes of the Egyptian Nation have expressed their desire for absolute independence; that the nation's acts are inspired solely by sentiment and patriotism, and that the signers of the manifesto are solidly with them in favor of the full independence of the country. Two generations of the house of Mohammed Ali are represented among the Princes who signed the manifesto. Prince Kamel-ed-Din, who heads the signers, is a son of the late Sultan Hussein Kamel, whom the British made Khédive on Dec. 19, 1914, deposing Abbas Hilmi after the latter had sided with Turkey in the war and fled from Egypt. Prince Kamel renounced the succession in October, 1917, when his father was on his deathbed, and the right passed to Sultan Ahmed Fuad, the present ruler. Prince Kamel was opposed to the policy of his father, who had been a lifelong friend of the British. Another signer was Prince Omar Toussoun, a great-grandson of Mohammed Ali. He is very wealthy, but was never a supporter of British control.

TWO FORMS OF UNREST

An Egyptian banker, H. A. Mackay, in a letter to The London Times, throws a flood of light on the situation when he explains that there are two forms of unrest in Egypt; one industrial, the other political. The former is due to the increasing cost of living and the indifference of the capitalists, both Egyptian and European, toward their employes. Tramway workers, bank clerks and store salesmen united to demand better wages from their employers, who were making vast fortunes. The political unrest is due to fear of Western innovations and suspicion of changes in the Egyptian Constitution. Egypt did much toward securing the British victory in Palestine, but according to Mr. Mackay got no thanks for it. He says it is obvious that the Egyptians are not fit to govern their country unaided, and not one of their leaders has ever put forward any scheme for the future native government of the country.

Regarding the Constitution, Lord Allenby, after the arrival of the Milner Commission in Cairo, declared that it had not come to inflict a Constitution upon Egypt, but to examine the views of all influential persons on what is best for the country. Everybody was invited to present his views freely and fully to the commission, and nobody would suffer in any way from so doing. In Lord Allenby's opinion the situation at the beginning of the new year was easier; time, tact and patience, he said, were all that was needed. Being charged with the preservation of order, he declared he would maintain martial law until it was unnecessary. There was no objection to any political opinions properly expressed and unaccompanied by violence.

At the time when the Milner Commission was first projected, in May, 1919, Earl Curzon announced its object in the House of Lords, and contended that, owing to Egypt's geographic position at the gate of Palestine, the doorway of Africa and the high road to India, Great Britain could not relinquish her control with safety to the empire. The work of the commission is merely preliminary. It is not authorized to impose a Constitution, and intends to consult all parties before forming an opinion. To the suggestion that the mission should be delayed until after the signing of the Peace Treaty with Turkey, Lord Curzon stated that, whatever terms were imposed upon Turkey, recognition of the protectorate would be an inseparable feature of the treaty.

So the Milner Mission was formed and went to Egypt in November. Meanwhile lawlessness, which had been dormant during the Summer, increased; the Nationalists continued their propaganda, and their organ announced that it was useless for individuals to confer with the Commissioners. The Grand Mufti, or religious chief of the Mohammedans in Egypt, told Lord Milner that no Egyptian would enter into a discussion except on the basis of independence.

Lord Milner, on Jan. 3, issued a proclamation, stating that his mission was not intended to deprive the Egyptian people of any rights, and asking all who had the good of the country at heart to come forward and state their views. His appeal brought forth no satisfactory replies, and, as a matter of fact, the Nationalist spirit continued to grow. It is supported by all sections of the people. Opposition to British control was increased by an irruption of excited British soldiers, who, pursuing some Egyptian students, entered the sacred precincts of the mosque of El Azhar without removing their shoes and armed with clubs. This is the seat of the great Turkish university, and the event, announced on Jan. 7, hastened a demand by the university authorities that Great Britain "recognize the complete independence of a country distinguished by a glorious heritage and a peculiar predominance in the Orient."

New Republics in the Caucasus

Armenia, Azerbaidjan, and Georgia: Their Mutual Relations and Their Present Status

AMONG the most interesting of the new republics born from the wreckage of the great war are the three in the Transcaucasus region—Georgia, Azerbaidjan and Russian Armenia. The possibility of making this mountain region a permanent barrier against the military advance of Russian Bolshevism has focused the eyes of the world upon it at the present juncture. The three peoples in question, though differing in race, language and traditions, all broke away from Russia after the Bolshevik revolution of Nov. 7, 1917.

At first they tried uniting their fortunes by organizing at Tiflis a joint Parliament or Seim of 132 members, elected on a basis of universal suffrage, which, on April 22, 1918, declared the independence of Transcaucasia under the name of Federal Republic of Transcaucasia. This republic, however, lasted barely five weeks, as the three component peoples soon developed conflicting tendencies. The Tatars of Azerbaidjan were in sympathy with their coreligionists, the Turks, in the great war which was still raging; the Georgians were looking to Germany for aid, while the Armenians throughout remained loyal to the Entente cause. Therefore, on May 26, 1918, the Seim declared the termination of the Federal Republic and laid down its authority. The same day Georgia proclaimed her independence, organizing a separate republic, with its centre at Tiflis. On May 28, 1918, Azerbaidjan and the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus likewise declared their independence.

Boundary conflicts began almost at once among the three former partners, and the limits of all three still remain to be defined by the Entente powers. The claims of each were presented by duly appointed delegates to the Peace Conference at Paris, but, with the Turkish settlement still in suspense, no decision was reached. All three peoples aspire to complete national reunion—that is, the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus desires to unite with the still larger Armenia that formerly belonged to Turkey; Caucasian Azerbaidjan wishes to unite with the adjoining Persian province of the same name and stock, while Georgia aspires to possession of Turkish Georgia.

The most serious friction arose between Armenia and Azerbaidjan. Mutual charges of territorial encroachment were followed by armed conflicts, until an important agreement was reached at Tiflis on Nov. 23, 1919, in which the Prime Ministers of these two States pledged themselves to cease all hostilities and to settle their differences by arbitration. About the same time Georgia and Armenia reached an agreement whereby the former withdrew its restrictions on railway traffic into Armenia. Both agreements were in part due to the efforts of Mr. Wardrop, the British High Commissioner in Transcaucasia. A small force of British and Indian troops occupied the Georgian port of Batum until the middle of February, 1920.

REPUBLIC OF AZERBAIDJAN

Of the three Caucasus republics the least widely known is Azerbaidjan. Occupying 94,000 square kilometers in Eastern Caucasia, in the "twilight zone" between Armenia and Russia, and bounded on the south and east by Persia and the Caspian Sea, Azerbaidjan, the "Land of Eternal Fires" of the ancient Persians, was independent for many centuries, then for nearly a century (from 1825 to 1917) was crushed under the iron yoke of the Czars. In an elaborate statement presented to the Peace Conference this young republic declares that its natural boundaries extend all the way across the Caucasus to Batum on the Black Sea, and that its population, under the law of self-determination, would amount to nearly

MAP SHOWING TENTATIVE BOUNDARIES OF GEORGIA, AZERBAIDJAN, AND THE ARMENIAN REPUBLIC OF THE CAUCASUS, WHICH IS ULTIMATELY TO BE UNITED WITH TURKISH ARMENIA

5,000,000, its territory to 150,000 square kilometers. Its spokesmen also express the hope that the day will come when the adjoining province of Northwest Persia of the same name, and of practically the same racial stock, will be allowed to add its 2,000,000 inhabitants to the Azerbaidjan Republic.

This part of ancient Azerbaidjan, overcome by the pressure of circumstances, recognized the sovereignty of the Shahs in the seventeenth century. Both here, however, and in the former Russian province, the Azerbaidjanians, a people of Iranian stock, related to the ancient Babylonians, neither Mongolian nor Semitic, have preserved their language and their national spirit despite their taking of the Mohammedan religion and their absorption by the Persians, Turks and Russians; they have always and especially resented the Russian Government's classification of them as "Caucasian Tatars" and the unenlightened public impression that they are Turks.

REDS DRIVEN FROM BAKU

After the breakup of the Caucasus Federation in 1918 a Ministry of twelve members was created by the new Government of Azerbaidjan, located provisionally at Elizabetopol, and immediate action was taken to clear the capital and great oil port, Baku, of the Russian Bolsheviks. Early in the Spring there had been clashes in Baku between the Bolsheviks and the Azerbaidjanians, and on March 17 a four-day struggle began which resulted in the killing of about 12,000 persons, many of them women and children, and in the total defeat of the Caucasians by the Bolsheviks. According to the statements of the Azerbaidjan representatives, the Bolsheviks were helped to win this victory by Armenians, eager to annihilate their old enemies and to seize their territory. The Azerbaidjan Government then asked aid from Georgia, but vainly, as the latter country was fully taken up with the task of driving back the Bolsheviks from its borders, so the Elizabetopol Ministry appealed to the Turks as coreligionists; with Turkish aid the Bolshevik army advancing upon Elizabethpol was driven back and Baku was retaken after a two-months' siege.

In firm possession of the capital the Azerbaijan Government sent a mission to the Persian town of Engeli to invite General Thomson, the British commander of the allied troops in that territory, to enter Baku. On Nov. 17, 1918, the allied forces entered the port; they were received with great ceremony and public acclaim. Shortly afterward General Thomson issued a statement to the inhabitants assuring them of the friendly intentions of the Allies and urging them to give their support to the Azerbaijan Government. The British occupation of Baku lasted until the end of the year 1919, when the British troops evacuated all the Caucasus, leaving only a diplomatic mission to represent British interests in this region.

NEW GOVERNMENT FORMED

The Azerbaijan Parliament was composed of 120 members elected by universal suffrage, including Moslem women. Among the Deputies were 21 Armenians, 10 Russians, and representatives of the Poles and Jews, as well as of various other races within the republic. One of the tasks prescribed for the Parliament was to arrange for a Constituent Assembly. The procedure adopted was as follows: The President chooses the Premier, who in turn picks his Ministers, all of whom are responsible to the Parliament. It was provided that at least one Russian and one Armenian should be members of the Cabinet. The national budget for 1919 was put at 665,000,000 rubles, with expenditures and receipts evenly balanced. The principal source of income was expected to be the taxes on the output of petroleum. The Azerbaijan Army was estimated at 50,000 well drilled men.

REPUBLIC OF GEORGIA

On the dissolution of the Caucasus Federation, the Georgian National Council, elected by the National Assembly, adopted an Act of Independence at the Georgian capital, Tiflis, on May 26, 1918, which read in part as follows:

For centuries past Georgia has existed as a free and independent State. Toward the end of the eighteenth century, being hard pressed by enemies on every side, she voluntarily allied herself with Russia, on condition that the latter undertook to protect her against her former enemies. During the great Russian revolution, interior troubles brought the dissolution of the whole Russian military front, and the Russian Army withdrew from Transcaucasia. Thus left to their own devices, Georgia and with her the whole of Transcaucasia undertook by themselves the direction of their country, and as a consequence they have begun to create the necessary State organization. Owing to pressure brought to bear upon them by external forces, the ties which united the people of Transcaucasia have been severed and political unity dissolved.* The present conditions imperatively dictate that Georgia should organize herself in order to escape enslavement to foreign forces, and lay a solid foundation for her free development.

The act further declared Georgia's right of independence, adopted a democratic form of government, a policy of strict neutrality in all international conflicts, and the maintenance of friendly relations with all nations, especially the neighboring peoples and States; equality of civil and political rights to all citizens, irrespective of nationality or religion, and free opportunity for development to all.

This Act of Independence was ratified by the Constituent Assembly of Georgia on March 12, 1919, at its first session, held in Tiflis that day. The session was attended by all the Ministry, the Patriarch of Georgia, and representatives of all the allied and many neutral Governments, including the Ukraine, Persia, Azerbaijan and Armenia. M. N. Tchkhéidze, former member of the Fourth Duma of the former Russian Empire and President of the Russian Duma

*The Bolsheviks, after initiating peace negotiations with Germany, invited the Georgians to participate in the discussions at Brest-Litovsk. The latter refused to consider this, on the ground that it would constitute treachery toward the allied and associated powers. In revenge for this refusal the Bolsheviks ceded to Turkey two Georgian provinces, Batum and Ardagh. Georgia's rejection of this cession and her announced intention to resist the occupation of these provinces by the Turks were the main causes of Georgia's defection from the Caucasus Federation, as her hostile attitude toward Turkey was unacceptable to the Azerbaijanians, co-religionists of the Moslem invaders.

after the first revolution of March, 1917, till the Bolshevik coup d'état, and President of the All-Russian National Assembly at Moscow in the Summer of 1917, was unanimously elected President of the Assembly.

THE GEORGIAN GOVERNMENT

The Government of the republic as then composed was as follows:

1. President of the Council—N. Jordania.
2. Vice President, Minister of Foreign Affairs and of Justice—E. Gueguetchkori.
3. Minister of the Interior, of War and Education—N. Ramishvili.

Under Secretary for War—General Guedevanishvili.

Chief of General Staff—General Odishelidze.

4. Minister of Finance, Commerce and Industry—C. Candelaki.

5. Minister of Agriculture, of Ways of Communications and of Labor—H. Khomeiriki.

The promises of the Act of Independence were fulfilled by the act of the new Parliament, and new reforms were instituted, including the establishment of an eight-hour working day, the nationalization of mines and forests and the creation of a Georgian University, long refused by the Russian Government. Georgian professors dispersed in various universities of Russia returned to offer their services to their native land. The Georgian University now possesses a Faculty of thirty-five professors and 1,000 students. The People's University of Tiflis was also reorganized, and a system of extension teaching adopted for its thirty-five local branches. The Georgian Army, which had consisted of 200,000 men mobilized in the Russian Army, was reorganized on an independent basis, a national guard was formed on the principle of voluntary service, and a regular army on that of obligatory service, applicable to all young men of military age. This system was adopted temporarily, pending the recognition of Georgia by the great powers and the guarantee of its neutrality under international law. The majority of Georgians belong to the Greek Catholic Church.

PROBLEMS OF NEW STATE

The first serious problem of the Georgian State was to defend itself against the encroachments of the Turks.

Georgia, being completely cut off from the Allies and defeated by Turkey, which had already invaded the western district of Ozourgheti, was faced by an ultimatum which threatened the occupation of the whole country by Turkish forces. In this critical position Georgia was compelled to accept the offer of help which came to her from the Germans, who proposed to stop the advancing Turks and to oblige them to retreat within the borders assigned by the treaty of Brest-Litovsk. This object, with German aid, was accomplished at the cost of heavy concessions to Germany.

The next problem was the defense of the new republic against Bolshevism. Riots had been fomented by soldiers returning from the Russian front and by Turkish-Bolshevist emissaries, but were easily put down, owing to the fact that they found no support among the Georgian people. Bolshevik armed bands, which came from the north and endeavored to enter Georgia, were also thrown back. But, though herself resisting the encroachments of the Bolsheviks, Georgia maintained her attitude of strict neutrality between the former and the anti-Bolshevik forces of General Denikin. In consequence hostility arose between Denikin and the Georgian Government, a hostility based on Georgia's fears of Denikin's design to occupy and annex Georgia to his domain and on the attitude of Denikin's military representatives in the Turko-Georgian district of Batum, the desire of whose inhabitants to ally themselves with the Christian Georgians was contested by the Russian military commander there.

DEFENSIVE LEAGUE WITH AZERBAIDJAN

With the crushing of Denikin's power the great menace to independence in Georgia and Azerbaijan is that presented by Bolshevism. It was this ever-growing danger which the delegates from both republics emphasized at Paris, urging military assistance against the Russian Reds.

The community of interests between Azerbaijan and Georgia, in respect to the repulse of Bolshevism from its borders, as well as in other respects, financial and economic, linking the two countries from Baku to Batum, has shown itself repeatedly. M. Gobetchia, the Georgian delegate, appeared with the delegate from Azerbaidjan before the Supreme Council on Jan. 19 and presented a strong plea for the integrity of their territory and its eventual defense against attacks by the Bolsheviks. On the following day M. Gobetchia expressed himself as follows:

Any attempt on the part of the Bolsheviks to force an entry into our countries, which are leagued together by ties of strong friendship, will undoubtedly be resisted to the utmost of our power. Our armies are not numerous, but they are well-trained. If the Allies send the necessary supplies, munitions and material we shall be able, with the help of the mountainous country in Northern Georgia, where two or three strategic points are strongly held, to command large areas and to hold our own against a possible Bolshevik advance.

To accomplish this purpose more effectually Azerbaidjan and Georgia had negotiated and ratified a treaty of mutual defense and protection covering the wide scope of "all attacks menacing the independence or the territorial integrity of one or both of the contracting parties." Not merely the Bolsheviks but also the Armenians were aimed at in the further proviso: "If any of the neighboring States in the course of hostilities begun in accordance with Paragraph 1, attack either or both of the allies for the purpose of settling the question of the disputed frontiers by means of arms, such State or States are to be considered as belligerents." At the time this treaty was drawn Georgia feared occupation by the military forces of General Denikin; now only the Bolshevik menace is feared. Azerbaidjan, on her part, feared the territorial ambitions of the new Republic of Armenia, between which country and Azerbaidjan bad feeling had long existed.

FRICION WITH ARMENIA

A report received in Paris by the American Red Cross on Sept. 25, 1919, said that Colonel William Haskell, High Commissioner in Armenia for the four great powers, had negotiated with the Secretary of State of the Azerbaidjan Republic with the view of submitting to the Armenian Parliament a treaty transferring some Armenian territory to Azerbaidjan in return for the withdrawal of Kurdish and Tatar troops from the eastern and southern fronts of Armenia.

In a statement issued on Sept. 17 by the American Committee for the Independence of Armenia, headed by James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany, urging American aid to prevent further outrages upon the Armenians, it was asserted that "3,000,000" Azerbaidjan Tatars, tools of the Turks," were working hand in hand with 2,000,000 Georgians to help the Russian Bolsheviks and the Turks. In their statement published in Paris last Summer, the representatives of Azerbaidjan pointed out, on the contrary, that they had fought the Bolsheviks and driven them from Baku, with the aid of Turkish regulars, and accused the Armenians of playing the rôle of Bolsheviks for the purpose of seizing territory naturally belonging to the Azerbaidjanians. The Armenian territorial claims, it should be stated, reach far into Azerbaidjanian territory, but there have been no indications that these maximum demands will be granted by the great powers when they come to settle the whole question of Caucasian boundaries.

Meanwhile the national aspirations of two of these young republics were gratified on Jan. 13, 1920, when the Supreme Council, in the name of the allied Governments, conceded a de facto recognition to both Azerbaidjan and Georgia.

REPUBLIC OF ARMENIA

Armenia before the war consisted of two distinct sections—Turkish Armenia and Russian Armenia—being parts, respectively, of the Ottoman and Russian Empires. Since the armistice each section has organized separately as a republic though both aim at union as early as possible. Turkish Armenia at this writing is still in the formative stages, but the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus is a fully organized State, which has its seat of Government at Erivan, and which was formally recognized by the United States Government on Jan. 26, 1920. The republic as yet has no written Constitution and no President, but its Ministry is as follows:

Premier and Foreign Minister—Dr. Alexander Khatissian.

Minister of Justice and the Interior—A. Gulhandanian.

Public Instruction and Fine Arts—N. Ahballian.

Minister of Finance—S. Araratian.

Relief and Repatriation—A. Sahakian.

Minister of War—General Araratian.

The drawing up of a Constitution is reserved for the future Constituent Assembly, which is to be called when both portions of Armenia shall have joined in one State. Pending that event the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus is operating under modern democratic methods through an elected Parliament and an Executive Cabinet, the powers of the President being exercised in part by each of these bodies.

NATURE OF THE GOVERNMENT

The following information regarding the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus was furnished to CURRENT HISTORY by Arshag Mahdesian, editor of The New Armenian, New York:

"Sovereignty resides in a Parliament of one house. The Parliament consists of Deputies elected by the entire people. The right to vote and to hold office is common and equal to all the people. Every citizen of Armenia of full age has an equal right to participate in all elections, without regard to sex, race or religion. The method of voting is direct and secret, and the elections are based on the proportional principle. The Parliament now in session, composed of eighty members, was elected in June, 1919, and commenced its session in August, 1919.

"The Cabinet is composed of eight Ministries: (1) Foreign Affairs, (2) Interior, including public health; (3) Public Works, (4) Posts and Telegraphs, (5) Army, (6) Finance, including commerce and industry; (7) Education, (8) Relief and Repatriation, this last being of a temporary nature.

"The Prime Minister is at the head of the Government and is the President of the Council of Ministers. The Prime Minister is elected by Parliament. He designates the Ministers, and presents their names, as well as the platform of his Ministry, to the approval of the Parliament. Approval of the platform by Parliament acts also as approval of the proposed Ministers.

"The Government (the Cabinet) is responsible to Parliament. If Parliament, by a majority vote, should pass a resolution of lack of confidence, the Cabinet must submit its resignation to Parliament, which then commits the formation of a new Government to some other person.

"The present Prime Minister and President of the Council of Ministers is Dr. Alexander Khatissian, who for many years was the Mayor of Tiflis, the capital of Transcaucasia. The other Ministers are men of university education, and prominent in the public and political life of Transcaucasia.

"The language of the republic is Armenian, but citizens not acquainted with this language are permitted to use their mother tongue or the Russian language. All religions enjoy entire freedom and equal rights under the republic.

"The system of Russian jurisprudence and administration of justice is temporarily continued in force, except in so far as it is modified or repealed by acts of Parliament or is in conflict with the spirit and order of a democratic-republican system of government. During its life of fourteen months the Parliament has enacted a number of special statutes, supplementing the body of Russian laws in force at the birth of the republic.

AN ARMY OF 18,000

"The Army of the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus is formed on the Russian system, and is administered according to the regulations of the Russian Army. The officers have been educated in the technical schools of Russia, and the greater part of the soldiers have received their training in the Russian Army. The troops, like the people, remained unaffected by the Bolshevik movements in Russia. Discipline in the army is satisfactory, and the morale of Armenian soldiers is exemplary.

"The army is composed of all branches of the service. The number of troops under arms in July, 1919, was 18,000.

The country needs and has the capacity of raising double that number, but the lack of equipment, arms, clothing, food, supplies, &c., prevents enlargement of the army. Even the equipment of the troops now under arms is inadequate, and is tolerable only because the Armenian is a hardy and sturdy soldier.

"For political reasons military service is not obligatory upon Mohammedans; this was also true under the former Russian régime. There are no Mohammedans in the Armenian Army.

"The Commander in Chief is Lieut. Gen. F. Nazarbekian, formerly one of the most brilliant officers of the Russian Army, well known for his deeds of military valor in the Russo-Japanese war and on the Caucasian front in the late war. Major Gen. Araratian, the Minister of War, was also one of the learned and experienced officers of the Russian Army and is very popular with the Armenian troops. The General Staff and the commanders of the line are disciplined officers, many of whom have high military decorations from the Government of Russia.

PROBLEMS OF FINANCE

"The sources of revenue of the republic are the direct and indirect taxes and income from the properties and enterprises of the State and from monopolies. Income taxes are now imposed at lower rates than in normal times, particularly on incomes from agricultural pursuits. As the country is in great need of manufactured articles, no duty is imposed on imported goods.

"In addition to the ordinary disbursements the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus has been confronted with extraordinary disbursements due to the existence of a state of war and the ravages caused by the war. These are for the relief of sufferers and for the reconstruction of the economic life of the people. Food, clothing, and shelter must be provided for orphans and those unable to work, the deported and exiled people must be repatriated, ruined villages must be rebuilt, and seed and agricultural implements must be furnished to the despoiled farmers.

"The average monthly gross income of the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus during the first five months of 1919 was 1,950,000 francs; the average monthly ordinary disbursements in the same period also amounted to 1,950,000 francs, so that all ordinary expenses were met by the regular revenues. On the other hand, in the same period of five months the extraordinary disbursements amounted on an average to 4,650,000 francs per month. These were met by the issuance of Transcaucasian bonds of that amount. The bonds are issued and guaranteed by the Armenian, Georgian and Azerbaidjan Republics. This large use of bonds caused a depreciation of their rate of exchange, but there was no other available means for meeting those disbursements.

"The people have cheerfully paid all taxes without any compulsory measures. On June 1, 1919, 90 per cent. of all taxes then due had been paid. Taxes are imposed only by acts of Parliament. No money can be paid out of the Treasury except in pursuance of an act of appropriation passed by the Parliament upon estimates submitted by the Government. There is a Board of State Control which exercises supervision over the legality of the acts and the disbursements of the Government. This board is under the Presidency of the State Controller, who is elected by Parliament and is accountable only to Parliament direct. All revenues must pass to the State Treasury and all disbursements must be made through the Treasury."

TERRITORY AND PHYSIOGRAPHY

The extreme territorial claims of the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus include the following parts of Transcaucasia, using the names of the former Russian administrative divisions:

- (A) The Province of Erivan, in its entirety;
- (B) The Province of Kars, excepting the northern section of the district of Ardahan;
- (C) The southern part of the Province of Tiflis, comprising the entire district of Akhalkalaki and the southern section of the district of Borchalou;
- (D) Those parts of the Province of Elizabetopol (Gantzag) comprising the southern section of the districts of Cossak and Elizabetopol, the entire district of Zangezür, and the upland regions of the districts of Jivanshir, Shousha and Kariakin (Jibrail), known as the Armenian Karabagh.

The boundaries of the republic are not definitely settled. Certain outlying regions are involved in disputes, Georgia claiming certain regions lying within the former province of Tiflis, and Azerbaidjan claiming a large portion of the former province of Elizabetopol. The territory described above contains 67,000 square kilometers, or about 26,130 square miles.

According to Russian official statistics, the number of people inhabiting the territory of the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus in 1917 was approximately 2,159,000, of whom 1,293,000, or 60 per cent., are Armenians; 670,000, or 31 per cent., are Mohammedans, and 73,000, or 3 per cent., are people of unclassified religions.

About 85 per cent. of the people in the Armenian Republic of the Caucasus are engaged in agricultural pursuits, such as the cultivation of grain, cotton, garden produce, vines and the breeding of cattle and other animals, and the production of milk. There is also manufacturing on a small scale. The mineral resources are largely undeveloped. Large cities and large industrial establishments, with few exceptions, do not exist. Armenian mercantile and manufacturing houses of considerable magnitude have their central locations outside the limits of Armenia, at Tiflis, Baku, Rostov, Moscow and Petrograd.

TURKISH ARMENIA

The Armenians in the former Ottoman Empire are still fighting their ancient enemies, the Turks, and are trying to help themselves, despite the long delay of America and the Allies in solving their problem. An Armenian military mission, headed by Captain Jacques Pakradooni and the famous General Antranik recently arrived in the United States to raise Armenian troops here for the struggle toward independence. The whole question of Armenia's ultimate fate remains to be settled. On Jan. 8, 1920, the British Armenia Committee, through Viscount Bryce, presented to the British Government a memorandum in which the two main propositions are thus expressed:

The committee ask that the whole of ex-Ottoman Armenia be finally and completely separated from the Ottoman Empire, and that, failing an American mandate over the entire country, the Ottoman Armenian provinces which border on the Erivan Republic be at once united with that republic, together with a port on the Black Sea. The Government's reaffirmation of their previous assurances gives the committee confidence that these ends, which in their opinion are the minimum demanded by considerations of humanity as well as by the interests of the British Empire, will be attained in the peace settlement.

In Turkish Armenia the Armenians will be in the minority, even after the repatriation of the refugees—because the Turks have destroyed a million or more of the inhabitants—but with the union of Russian Armenia with Turkish Armenia the Armenians will constitute the majority population. Armenia will require considerable economic aid during her reconstruction period. The Armenians suffered terrible losses because of their fidelity to the powers of the Entente, and they rendered considerable military services to the winning of the war.

Sentiment in the United States, as indicated by the press, is unfavorable to assuming the burden of a mandate over Armenia. The drift of events is toward inclusion of Armenia in the French or Italian sphere of influence.

The Partition of Turkey

Secret Anglo-French-Italian Agreement of 1916-17, Now Made Public, Divided Up the Near East

TURKEY'S entry into the war on the side of the Central Powers at once opened up the possibility of the partition of that country among the Allies in case the latter were victorious. This fact was formally recognized in Article IX. of the secret treaty of London, negotiated with Italy on April 26, 1915. But it was not until early in 1916 that Great Britain and France got together to arrange their differences in the Levant and to divide the Sultan's domains between themselves in the event of victory. That they did make such a partition, and that all Turkey had been carved up and served out two or three years before the Peace Conference met, has only recently become fully known to the world. The invitation to the United States to become involved in the Near Eastern situation by accepting a mandate over Armenia takes on a new aspect in the light of the map and the agreements presented herewith.

SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT

The first result of the British and French decision to get together was the secret treaty known as the Sykes-Picot agreement, drafted in February or March, 1916, and concluded on May 9 and 16 of that year. The text is as follows:

The French and British Governments, having acquired from information at their disposal the conviction that the Arab populations of the Arab peninsula, as well as of the provinces of the Ottoman Empire, are strongly opposed to Turkish domination, and that it would be actually possible to establish an Arab State, or a confederation, both hostile to the Turkish Government and favorable to the Entente powers, have opened negotiations and have examined the question in common. As a result of these discussions they have agreed upon the following principles:

1. France and Great Britain are prepared to accord recognition and protection to an independent Arab State or a Confederation of Arab States in the Zones "A" and "B" marked on the annexed map, under the suzerainty of an Arab chief. In the Zone

"A" France and in the Zone "B" Great Britain shall have a right of priority in regard to enterprises and local loans. In the Zone "A" France and in the Zone "B" Great Britain shall have the exclusive right to provide advisers or foreign officials at the request of the Arab State or Confederation of Arab States.

2. In the blue zone France and in the red zone Great Britain shall be authorized to establish such administration, direct or indirect, or such control as they desire or as they shall judge convenient to establish after agreement with the State or Confederation of Arab States.

3. There shall be established in the brown zone an international administration of which the form shall be determined after consultation with Russia, and later in agreement with the other Allies and with representatives of the Sherif of Mecca.

4. There shall be accorded to Great Britain:

(1) The ports of Haifa and Acre;

(2) The guarantee of a definite quantity of water from the Tigris and Euphrates in the Zone "A" for Zone "B."

His Majesty's Government on its part undertakes never to enter into negotiations with a view to the cession of Cyprus to a third power without the previous consent of the French Government.

5. Alexandretta shall be a free port in so far as concerns the commerce of the British Empire, and there shall be no differential treatment in port dues, and no special advantages shall be refused to British ships or merchandise; there shall be free transit for British merchandise via Alexandretta and on the railways traversing the blue zone, whether such merchandise be destined for or originate from the red zone, Zone "B," or Zone "A"; and no differential treatment, direct or indirect, shall be established against British merchandise on any railway, or against British merchandise or ships in any port serving the above-mentioned zones.

Haifa shall be a free port as regards the commerce of France, her colonies, and her protectorates, and there shall be no differential treatment or advantage in port dues refused to French ships and merchandise. There shall be free transit for French merchandise via Haifa and the British railway across the brown zone, whether such merchandise originate from or is destined for the blue zone, Zone "A," or Zone "B"; and there shall be no differential treatment, direct or indirect, against French merchandise on any railway or against French merchandise or ships in any port serving the above-mentioned zones.

6. In the Zone "A" the Bagdad Railway shall not be prolonged southward beyond Mosul, and in Zone "B" northward beyond Samara, until a railway joining Bagdad and Aleppo by the valley of the Euphrates has been completed, and that only with the co-operation of the two Governments.*

7. Great Britain shall have the right to construct, administer and be the sole proprietor of a railway joining Haifa to Zone "B." Further, she shall have a right in perpetuity to transport troops at any time along the railway. It is understood by the two Governments that this railway is to facilitate the junction of Bagdad and Haifa, and it is further understood that if technical difficulties or the cost of maintaining this line of junction in the brown zone render its construction impracticable, the French Government will agree to consider that the line may traverse the polygon Barries-Kels-Maril-Silbrad - Tel - Hotsda - Mesuire before reaching Zone "B."

8. For a period of twenty years the Turkish customs' tariff shall remain in force throughout the blue and red zones as well as in Zones "A" and "B," and no increase in rates or alteration of ad valorem into specific duties shall be made except with the consent of the two powers.

There shall be no internal customs between any of the above-mentioned zones. Customs duties leviable shall be levied at the ports of entry, and shall be transmitted to the administration of the zone for which the goods are destined.

9. It is understood that the French Government will never enter upon any negotiations for the cession of its rights and will never cede its rights in the blue zone to any third power other than the State or Confederation of Arab States, without the previous consent of his Majesty's Government, which on its part shall give a similar assurance with regard to the red zone.

10. The British and French Governments, as protectors of the Arab State, agree not to acquire, and will not consent to a third power acquiring, territorial possessions in the Arabian peninsula, nor to construct a naval base in the islands off the east coast of the Red Sea; but this shall not prevent such rectification of the frontier of Aden as may be considered necessary in view of the recent aggression of the Turks.

11. The negotiations with the Arabs in regard to the frontiers of the Arab State or Confederation of States shall proceed in the same way as before in the name of the two powers.

12. It is further understood that measures for controlling the importation of arms into Arab territory shall be considered by the two Governments.

An early draft of this document was submitted to the Russian Government at Petrograd on March 10, 1916, and has recently been found in the archives there and published.

The key map so frequently mentioned in the foregoing agreement did not become public until it was reproduced by The Manchester Guardian on Jan. 8, 1920. In its original form the map showed only the regions assigned to British and French influence, but later it was further elaborated by the addition of the sphere allotted to Italy. In its later and more complete form it is reproduced in the present pages.

THE ITALIAN AGREEMENT

Italy thus far had no part in this division of prospective spoils, and the fact was soon reflected in the manner of Baron Sonnino toward the Allies. On Sept. 30, 1916, the danger of this situation was pointed out by M. Barrère, French Ambassador at Rome, in a letter to M. Briand, the French Foreign Minister. He said that Sonnino was in a delicate situation, being attacked by the whole opposition press because he had failed to secure for Italy a share of Asia Minor. France and England therefore took the necessary steps a few months later to include Italy in the plan for the partition of Turkey in accordance with a principle already admitted in the pact of London. As a result the Sykes-Picot agreement was supplemented by another equally secret, which assigned to Italy a broad zone in the south of Asia Minor and centring at Adalia. The text of this agreement is as follows:

Memorandum on the result of the negotiations between the Governments of France, Great Britain and Italy at St. Jean de Maurienne and of the subsequent conferences concerning Asia Minor. [Date lacking.]

Subject to the consent of the Russian Government:

1. The Italian Government gives its assent to the provisions contained in Articles 1 and 2 of the Franco-British agreements of May 9 and 16, 1916. On their part the French and

*The draft submitted to Russia added a note to Article VI: "This article has been included to prevent the completion and the organization of the German railroad to Bagdad." The projected British line up the Euphrates Valley was completed as far northward as Bagdad on Jan. 15, 1920, when the first train from Basra arrived there.

Reproduction of the original map attached to the Anglo-French-Italian agreement concerning the partition of Asia Minor, as it finally stood after Italy had entered the secret pact. The shaded zones were to belong to the nations indicated in the key at the top of the map, and the lettered zones were to be further "spheres of influence" for the same nations. The green zone referred to in the treaty is the Italian zone, the red is British, the blue is French, and the brown is international.

British Governments recognize Italy's rights—on an identical basis as to conditions of administration and interest—to the green and the "C" zones indicated in the map attached hereto.

2. Italy undertakes to make of Smyrna a free port in so far as the trade of France, her colonies and her protectorates, as well as that of the British Empire and its dependencies, is concerned. Italy will enjoy the rights and privileges which France and Great Britain have reciprocally guaranteed each other in the ports of Alexandretta, Haifa and of Saint Jean d'Acre [Akka] by Article 5 of the agreements mentioned heretofore. Mersina shall be a free port with regard to the trade of Italy, her colonies and her protectorates, and there shall be no difference of treatment nor any advantages in port duties which may be refused to Italian ships or goods. Italian goods destined to or coming from the Italian zone shall obtain free transit through Mersina and on the railway crossing the vilayet of Adana. There shall be no difference of treatment, direct or indirect, as against Italian goods on any railway line nor in any port along the Cilician coast and serving the Italian zone at the expense of Italian ships or merchandise.

3. The form of the international administration in the brown zone, which forms the object of Article 3 of the said arrangements of May 9 and 16, 1916, shall be decided in agreement with Italy.

4. On her part Italy adheres to the provisions concerning the ports of Haifa and Akka contained in Article 4 of the same agreements.

5. Italy adheres, in so far as the green and (C) zones are concerned, to the two paragraphs of Article 8 of the Anglo-French agreements referring to the customs system to be maintained in the blue and red zones, as well as in the zones "A" and "B."

6. It is understood that the interests possessed by each power in the zones falling to the lot of the other powers shall be scrupulously respected, but that the powers concerned in such interests shall not make use of them for political action.

7. The provisions contained in Articles 10, 11 and 12 of the Anglo-French agreements concerning the Arabian Peninsula and the Red Sea are considered as equally applicable to Italy as if that power were named in those articles together with France and Great Britain as one of the contracting parties.

8. It is understood that, in case it should not be possible at the conclusion of the war to secure to one or more of the said powers the whole of the advantages contemplated in the agreements concluded by the allied powers concerning the allotment to each of them of a portion of the Ottoman Empire, the maintenance of the Mediterranean equilibrium shall be fairly taken into consideration, in conformity with Article 9 of the Pact of London of April 26, 1915, in any change or arrangement affecting the provinces of the Ottoman Empire as a consequence of the war.

9. It is understood that the present memorandum shall be communicated to the Russian Government in order to enable it to express its opinion.

INSTRUCTIONS TO M. PICOT

Along with the foregoing secret agreements The Manchester Guardian published the text of the instructions sent by the French Foreign Minister to F. Georges Picot, the French Commissary in Syria and Palestine. M. Picot was to have a small contingent of troops, and his mission was to leave the French trade mark, so to speak, alongside the British trade mark throughout the newly conquered territory. The text of this document is as follows:

Paris, April 2, 1917.

The victorious advance which has taken the British army beyond the boundaries of Palestine on the way to Jerusalem called for some step on the part of the power which has always possessed a preponderant position in the Ottoman Empire, and whose special rights in Armenia and Syria have just found confirmation in the agreements recently concluded with England and Russia. The Government of the republic has not overlooked this, although intensely engaged in other directions by the urgent duty of defending the French soil. It has therefore notified the Cabinet of St. James's of its decision to dispatch to the occupied territories a representative, with a small contingent of troops, whose functions shall be to show the populations the complete agreement existing between the Allies, as well as to establish the joint character of the action pursued in those regions.

Your designation as Commissary of the republic in the occupied territories of Palestine and Syria and the placing at your disposal of a military contingent which shall carry our flag are prompted by that preoccupation. The task intrusted to you is thereby clearly defined. You will have, on the one hand, to organize the occupied territories so as to insure to France a situation equal to that of England in all relations with the native populations. On the other hand, while our troops will join the English army in attacking the Turks, you will have to endeavor, by all the means for propaganda among Arabs which you may possess, to facilitate the advance of the allied forces by creating diversions threatening to the enemy army, and thereby shaking its morale.

SIGN OF PERFECT AGREEMENT

The presence of our flag side by side with that of Britain will be a sign not to be overlooked, which should impress upon all the perfect agreement existing between France and England. Wherever, therefore, occupation may follow from the achievement of one or the other contingent, you will have to see that the colors of both countries shall be immediately flown. In that way will be made manifest the agreement which exists between our allies and ourselves in this as in all other war zones, and which has made possible precisely in the East the settlement of questions hitherto seemingly unsolvable.

Since you are come to deliver the populations of Palestine and Syria from the oppression of the Turks and to call them to a life of liberty, you will have to resort for the organization of the occupied territories exclusively to native elements, and respect as fully as possible local customs and traditions. For nothing could more clearly establish the spirit in which we intend to carry out our action than such disinterested conduct. For the rest, the country will supply you with all the elements necessary, whose assistance you will have no difficulty in enlisting, always striving, in making your choice, to take into account in each particular case the racial and religious elements whose government will be in question.

You are to put yourself into touch for that purpose with the political officer which the Royal Government will have sent to Palestine, keeping in mind that there is for the time being no question of creating a final situation, but merely of insuring the good administration of the conquered territories while preparing the ground, however, for the application of recent agreements upon the conclusion of peace. In this respect you will have to distinguish between the various regions affected by these agreements. While it will be right to allow your colleague greater freedom of action in the Zone "B," which is to come one day within the English sphere of influence, he ought to grant us equally favorable treatment in the Zone "A," which is to be subjected to our supervision. Finally, in the coastal zone, which one day will be placed under our protectorate, your direction should have a more exclusive character, so as to give the populations clear intimation of the future which is in store for them.

During the advance of the French corps you will have to face problems of a more special character. A long tradition has given France everywhere in the East, and especially in Palestine, a unique position which carries, together with certain privileges, imperative duties. The war with Turkey has with one stroke put an end to the past. You should after your arrival at once resume the interrupted customs, and insure the protection of the establishments which have always been connected with our country. You should specially endeavor to secure, in so far as possible, the reopening of our schools and of our hospitals, so that the first result to be derived by the local populations from the advance of our soldiers shall be the revival of the civilizing and beneficent work of France interrupted for a while by the war.

POLICY IN PALESTINE

In entering Palestine you will come into contact with numerous Jewish colonies. It is desirable to grant them from the outset a large measure of protection and to mark the new situation by intrusting them with the administration of their communities and with a share in the government of the country. For you are no doubt aware that the policy pursued toward them is destined to create a profound impression, not only among their co-religionists residing in allied and neutral countries, but even among those living in enemy countries. It would therefore be in our interest to inspire them with the greatest expectations concerning that which the Allies intend to do for them on the soil to which they are attached by a millennial past, and to which some of them desire to return in order to establish settlements.

However important this part of the task intrusted to you, an altogether different significance attaches to the activity which you will have to develop among the Mohammedan Arab elements with a view to inducing them openly to declare in our favor. In fact, it has to facilitate in the most effective way the northward advance of the allied troops and to attach to us energetic populations whom old sentiments as well as recent events in the East cause to turn their eyes more willingly toward England. The recent allied operations against Turkey, considered in the East as formidable failures, and, so far as France is concerned, not yet made good by victories such as those of Bagdad and Gaza, have seriously affected the prestige of our country in the eyes of these populations; while opposition to the Christians, our old protégés, has always caused Mohammedan Arabs to regard us with suspicion. Since the beginning of the war their delegates have often pressed upon the French representatives the fact that a unique opportunity was offered us to appear in their eyes as liberators. It is incumbent upon us not to neglect it.

ATTITUDE TOWARD THE ARABS

Lacking the immediate dispatch of a somewhat strong contingent, allowing our flag to appear before the eyes as it should, you must endeavor to invest our present action with all the importance and impressiveness of which it is capable. For the rest, the agreements recently signed will indicate to you in broad lines the policy to be followed toward the Arabs. What we want to do is to liberate a people long subjected by the Turks and render it the privileges to which it is entitled. Our action must tend to restore its brilliance to a civilization which has not been without greatness, differing in that from the policy of the rulers at Constantinople, who persecuted the most illustrious of the Arabs and tried to exclude their language even from sacred books. You are to emphasize these sentiments in the proclamation which you will have to address to them.

You will lay weight especially on the point that there is no intention of imposing upon them foreign Governors, but solely of assisting them to create national institutions capable of insuring ordered government. For the purpose of inducing the Arabs actively to operate against the Turks, with a view to cutting their communications and disorganizing their army, you will have, moreover, various other means at your disposal. You will reward with money the desertions they may cause, and the raids against railways or lines of supply. You will create bands capable of harassing our enemies and of keeping the mountain by distributing arms and ammunition to the tribes which shall have expressed sentiments favorable to our cause. You will direct and co-ordinate their movements by an intelligent service, keeping in close contact with the Arabs. Finally, you will direct their aspirations by forming at your headquarters a council composed of delegates of the various chiefs.

These general lines once laid down, it will rest with you to settle details of execution and the difficulties which you may have to face. I leave it to you, especially, to settle with General Murray on your arrival in Egypt the conditions under which the troops at your disposal are to be employed, with a view to giving our co-operation the greatest possible importance in the eyes of the populations.

The task hereby intrusted to you is a complement to the work you carried out in the course of the negotiations with which you were charged last year in London and Petrograd. You will have, therefore, constantly to refer to the text of the signed arrangements, in order to follow out their spirit in every circumstance and thereby prepare the early realization of our agreements. The Government of the republic relies upon your tact to achieve this work and harmony in the common action with our allies, as well as upon your energy to safeguard the interests with the defense of which you are hereby intrusted.

A more blunt and businesslike memorandum on the same subject was submitted to the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs on April 10, 1917, by Count Vitalis, head of the Department of Public Works. It outlined some very definite claims which France ought to make and threw further light on the intimate connection between foreign colonial policy and financial interests in the minds of the Allies.

SMYRNA GIVEN TO ITALY

The final division of Asia Minor among the Allies was arranged nearly five months after the United States entered the war, yet our Government was not consulted; on the contrary, it was carefully prevented from learning what was going on. Nor is there any evidence that the Kerensky Government in Russia, which, like ours, was an advocate of self-determination of nationalities, was ever communicated with on the subject, though the document given below contains a provision for such action. The most striking feature of this further elaboration of the secret treaty is that it gives Smyrna to Italy. At present this port is in the hands of the Greeks. The Italian Government claimed it at Versailles and is claiming it now. The authority on which it bases this claim was made public for the first time by a correspondent of The New York Globe and Chicago Daily News on Feb. 9, 1920. It is a letter from Arthur Balfour, British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to the French Government, and reads as follows:

Foreign Office, Aug. 18, 1917, Sir:—I have the honor to inform you that in reply to a note addressed to me on the 18th inst. by the Italian Ambassador in London, I have officially notified his Excellency that his Majesty's Government agree that the following provisions embody the results of the conversation between the Governments of France, Great Britain, and Italy at St. Jean de Maurienne and of subsequent conferences concerning Asia Minor.

I have at the same time informed Marquis Imperiali that these provisions should remain secret.

"Subject to Russia's assent.

"1. The Italian Government adheres to the stipulations contained in Articles 1 and 2 of the Franco-British agreements of May 9 and 16, 1916. On their side the Governments of France and of Great Britain recognize for Italy, under the same conditions of administration and of interests, the green zones and 'C.'

"2. Italy pledges herself to make Smyrna a free port as far as concerns the commerce of France, her colonies and her protectorates, and also the commerce of the British Empire and dependencies. Italy will enjoy the rights and privileges that France and Great Britain have reciprocally assured to themselves in the ports of Alexandretta, of Haifa, and of St. Jean d'Acre, as per Article 5 of the said provisions. Mersina will be a free port as far as concerns the commerce of Italy, her colonies and protectorates, and there will be no difference of treatment nor advantages in the rights of port, which are not to be refused to the navy or merchandise of Italy. There will be free transit through Mersina and by railroad across the vilayet of Adana for Italian merchandise bound to and from the Italian zone. There will be no difference of treatment, direct or indirect, at the expense of Italian merchandise or ships in any port along the coast of Galicia, in supplying the Italian zone.

"3. The form of international administration in the brown zone mentioned in Article 3 of the said agreements of May 9 and 16, 1916, will be decided together with Italy.

"4. Italy, as far as she is concerned, consents to the dispositions relative to the ports of Haifa and of Acre contained in Article 4 of the same provisions.

"5. Concerning the green zone and zone 'C,' Italy adheres to the two paragraphs of Article 8 of the Franco-British agreements regarding the customs system which shall be maintained in the blue and red zones, as well as in zones 'A' and 'B.'

"6. It is understood that the interests which each power possesses in the zones controlled by the other powers shall be scrupulously respected, but that the powers controlling these interests will not use them as means for political action.

"7. The dispositions contained in Articles 10, 11 and 12 of the Franco-English agreements, concerning the Arabic peninsula and the Red Sea, will be considered as equally applicable to Italy as if that power were named in these articles with France and Great Britain with the title of a contracting party.

"8. It is understood that if, at the conclusion of peace, the advantages embodied in the agreements contracted among the allied powers as to the handing over to each of them a part of the Ottoman Empire could not be entirely assured to one or more of the said powers, then in whatever alterations or arrangement of provinces of the Ottoman Empire made as a consequence of the war, the maintenance of the equilibrium in the Mediterranean will be given equitable consideration, in conformity with Article 9 of the London agreement of April 26, 1915.

"9. It has been agreed that the present memorandum will be communicated to the Russian Government, so as to allow it to make known its views."

I have the honor, &c., BALFOUR.

This communication was addressed to M. de Fleuriau, French Chargé d'Affaires at London, who transmitted it to Foreign Minister Ribot in Paris on Aug. 24, 1917, with injunctions as to its secrecy. The memorandum contained in Mr. Balfour's letter had been drawn up in London on Aug. 8, and had already been communicated to the Italian Ambassador at Paris. On Aug. 22 M. Ribot wrote to the Italian Ambassador acknowledging the receipt of the text and map in question, and adding: "I agree with his Excellency, Baron Sonnino, on the terms of the said memorandum, which must remain secret."

It is along the lines of these secret agreements that events have been moving in Asia Minor ever since the war; in fact, the subjoined map throws a flood of clarifying light on the medley of annexationist activities in that region. With the additional element of a Greek force at Smyrna edging its way into the territory originally assigned to Italy, the whole situation is made clear; each nation is proceeding to occupy as large a portion as possible of the region mapped out for it in the secret agreement. The map likewise contributes to an understanding of the long delay in deciding what is to become of Anatolian Armenia and of the remnants of Turkey.

Japan and China

China, Still Hostile to Shantung Clauses of Peace Treaty, Rejects Japan's Overtures

[PERIOD ENDED FEB. 15, 1920]

THE strained situation between Japan and China over the rights acquired by the Japanese in Shantung Peninsula through the peace settlement was not relieved during January and February by the unceasing utterances of Japanese publicists and statesmen insisting that it was Japan's irrevocable intention to restore Shantung in full sovereignty to China, and that she intended to retain only the economic concessions which she had taken over from Germany. China continued its determined boycott of all Japanese commodities, though it entailed enormous loss to Japanese and Chinese merchants alike. This boycott was considered by the Japanese authorities to threaten the gravest economic consequences.

The firmness of the new attitude of the Chinese Government toward Japan was brought into strong relief by disorders at Fuchow on Nov. 16, in which many Chinese were attacked, killed or wounded by Japanese residents. The Chinese Foreign Ministry on Dec. 1 presented a note to the Japanese Legation dealing with these assaults, and making the following demands: That the Japanese Consul at Fuchow be removed; that the Japanese pay an indemnity for the loss of all Chinese lives at this port as the result of the attacks, and also pay the cost of all medical expenses incurred by the Chinese wounded; that adequate punishment be meted out to all the Japanese ringleaders; and that the Japanese Consul at Fuchow make an apology to the Chinese authorities of that city.

Meanwhile it was reported at Peking on Dec. 2 that the whole of China was aflame over the Fuchow incident. Keen resentment was expressed by the Chinese press over the arrival of four Japanese warships at Fuchow, following the disorders. The Japanese marines, after landing and parading in the Foreign Concession, attempted to enter the native city, but were prevented by the local authorities. Charges were made that the Japanese aggression at Fuchow heralded Japan's intention to seize Fukien, which territory she was said to covet as much as she did Shantung. Many protests poured in at Peking, including that of seventy-two guilds in Canton, and public feeling, reflected in the tone and in the demands of the Chinese Government's note to Japan, was at white heat. A conciliatory spirit was shown in an official announcement issued by the Japanese Legation at Peking on Dec. 31, which said that the Japanese warships stationed at Fuchow would be withdrawn, as order had been restored. This note continued:

In co-relation with this voluntary step, the Japanese Government hopes the Chinese authorities will further exert their utmost efforts to insure protection to Japanese, as well as preservation of peace and order throughout China, with a view to avoiding a recurrence of such unpleasant events.

As a consequence of the presence of the Japanese warships at Fuchow the economic boycott had been universally intensified. The Japanese announcement of the ships' withdrawal, therefore, was interpreted in Chinese quarters as a proof of the effectiveness of this boycott, as well as of the firm stand taken by the Chinese Government in its official note, and the Chinese attitude of hostility underwent no visible change.

JAPANESE DENIAL

The Japanese, however, both in Japan and abroad, continued to insist that their intentions toward China were grossly misunderstood. Viscount Y. Uchida, for instance, in an article called "Plain Facts on Shantung," which appeared in The Independent on Jan. 1, reiterated Japan's intentions to act in good faith in restoring Shantung to China, and added:

If the people of America would consider this question in its true light, if they would delete the specious argument of the active propagandist in America, they should have no difficulty in finding safe ground for assurance that for every reason Japan must keep faith with her friends, and that in fact China will benefit by the decision with regard to Shantung as reached by the conferees in Paris.

Before the ink was dry upon the signatures of the representatives of the Emperor of Japan to the Treaty of Peace, the cry was raised against the Shantung award in that treaty. A widespread and suspicious propaganda was built upon the hypothesis that Japan entered the war without a scintilla of the better or higher motives of her allies, solely for the purpose of self-aggrandizement, and that finally the representatives of the Emperor of Japan signed the treaty with their tongues in their cheeks, intending to carry out their part in letter, perhaps, but not in spirit. In other words, the logical conclusion would be that the Japanese Government was a treacherous conspirator against the peace of the world at the very moment she signed and ratified the Treaty of Peace.

Impossible! The assertion is false; it is dangerous. It is being urged by press agents for an ulterior purpose, but there can be but one fair conclusion, based upon all the facts. That conclusion was reached by the conference in Paris, namely, that Japan as one of the five main powers signatory will keep faith and abide by the treaty as she always has kept faith with other nations. * * *

Japan is determined to restore Tsing-tao to China in full sovereignty. What Japan intends to retain are only the economic privileges granted to Germany, which she will share with China, and she has no intention to hold or demand any right whatsoever which is likely to affect China's territorial sovereignty.

Japan is ready and will not hesitate to enter upon negotiations with the Government of China as to arrangements for the restitution of Tsing-tao as soon as possible after the Treaty of Versailles comes into force.

In an address delivered at the opening of the Japanese Diet on Jan. 21 the Japanese Premier, Mr. Hara, similarly insisted on Japan's intention to fulfill exactly the clauses of the Peace Treaty affecting Shantung, and further announced that the Japanese Government was already taking active steps to translate this intention into reality. Kiao-Chau and Tsing-tao, he declared, would be returned to China, and the Shantung Railway would be operated in union with China, in accordance with the terms of the Chino-Japanese agreement of 1918.

NEGOTIATIONS BEGUN

Yukichi Obata, the Japanese Minister to China, on Jan. 19 notified the Peking Government that Japan, having succeeded to Germany's rights in Shantung on Jan. 10 in accordance with the provisions of the treaty, was ready to negotiate with China at any time for their return, and for the retrocession of the leased territory. When arrangements were completed, it was further stated, Japan, granting the existence of normal conditions, would withdraw her railroad guards from Shantung. The full offer, given out officially by the Tokio Foreign Office on Jan. 25, contained the following provisions:

1. The Japanese Government desires to open negotiations regarding the retrocession of Kiao-Chau Bay and other measures with the view of effecting a sincere and speedy settlement, and hopes that the Chinese Government will make necessary preparations.

2. With regard to troops along the Shantung Railway, Japan intends to withdraw them as soon as possible, even before reaching an agreement with China, unless the absence of other railway guards affects the security of communications and the interests both of Japan and China, her partner, in which case the Japanese will garrison the railway until the Chinese Government has organized a railway police force. Since, however, Japan desires to withdraw even before a Japanese-Chinese agreement has been reached, Japan hopes for the earliest organization of Chinese railway police.

CHINA REFUSES PARLEY

An unexpected development arose when the Chinese Cabinet, at a meeting held on Jan. 26, decided to refuse to negotiate with Japan on the ground that such action would be equivalent to acceptance of the Peace Treaty with Germany, which China had refused to sign. This decision was referred to the Foreign Office. Numerous telegrams were received from the provinces opposing any discussion favoring the submission of the question to the League of Nations, and condemning any action equivalent to recognition of the German treaty. These telegrams were still pouring in on Jan. 30; even the hostile Canton Government had joined in the universal protest and appeal. Practically every district in Shantung had telegraphed the Government to stand by the original policy and refuse to comply with the wish for parley which Japan had expressed. Up to the time when CURRENT HISTORY went to press, however, no official refusal to negotiate had been sent to the Japanese Government by China.

CHINA LOAN CONSORTIUM

The obstacles in the way of an international and interallied loan to China, which was in sore financial need, were at least provisionally smoothed away, and discussions between the representatives of Great Britain, France, Japan, and the United States continued. The great stumbling block had been Japan's insistence on the exclusion of Southern Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia from the application of the consortium and the refusal of the United States to permit the withdrawal of any such special spheres of influence from the scope of the projected international loan.

The American attitude had been clearly stated by the Washington Government on Nov. 22, when it maintained that all legitimate interests would be conserved if it were shown that there was no intention on the part of the consortium to encroach upon established industrial enterprises or to compel the pooling of existing Japanese options for their continuation. On Nov. 29 Mr. Lansing sent to the British Foreign Office an explanation of the firm resolution of the United States to stand for the maintenance of the "open door" policy and the rejection of all claims for special spheres of interest.

JAPAN CAUSES DEADLOCK

Japan's refusal to waive her special claims brought the whole question to a deadlock, which continued through the Winter, with Great Britain using her good offices to bring about an understanding between the two opposing elements. The attempt of a group of Chicago bankers, meanwhile, to negotiate a Chinese loan independently proved futile owing to a dispute over security, and the prospect of China's receiving financial assistance grew ever fainter, owing to the inability of Japan and the United States to agree on the consortium. On Feb. 12 Thomas W. Lamont and other American financiers left New York for a trip to Japan and China with the object of persuading Japan to recede from its present position in regard to our financing China.

Meanwhile, as announced in Washington on Jan. 29, the diplomatic representatives in Peking of the four nations involved had been authorized by their respective Governments to proceed with negotiations with the Chinese Foreign Office on the question of an emergency loan of £5,000,000, normally about $25,000,000. It was stated at this time that by a series of such emergency loans, instead of one large loan, China's pressing needs would be satisfied, and neither Japan nor the United States would be compelled to abandon its official stand regarding the "open door." It was understood that the United States and Japan would carry the quota of Great Britain and France in this first emergency loan, in view of the depletion of the treasury of both of the last-named countries, and that Italy, Belgium and Russia might be admitted to the consortium later on. The completion of negotiations anticipatory to delivering the £5,000,000 of the first loan was expected within two months.

BRITISH-JAPANESE ALLIANCE

The Anglo-Japanese alliance will expire in July, 1921, and the subject of its renewal was widely discussed in Japan during the closing months of 1919. Viscount Kato, who was the Japanese Ambassador to the Court of St. James's when the alliance first originated, said in an article in the Jiji Shimpō of Dec. 2:

There can be no doubt that the alliance has for some twenty years had a great influence, both direct and indirect, on the relations between the two nations, and it is not advisable that the alliance which has this great history should be abolished as a mere relic of the past. It is practicable to continue the alliance if both contracting powers desire it. Even if it became merely an agreement or a mutual declaration, it would be better than nothing. I believe it is of vital necessity and opportune that our Government should lay great stress on the question, and at once exchange views with the British Government. Not only I but the whole nation desires to know what the Government intends to do.

The Japanese press, as a whole, was similarly in favor of a renewal of the alliance. One exception was the Niroku, which openly declared that the Anglo-Japanese combination was unnatural, and that Japan should go to China to form a yellow-race alliance as against the white races.

The discussion brought out a distinct note of hostility to the United States, based on the anti-Japanese utterances in the Senate during the discussion of the Shantung settlement; this feeling had been intensified by proposals of anti-Japanese legislation in California and by the discussion of Federal legislation against Japanese immigration to the United States. New sparks were added to the fire by publication of the Japanese budget estimates, which include excessively large sums for the army and navy, particularly for the latter, the United States being blamed for this new burden on the Japanese Nation. Various papers have published articles intended to show that the United States is determined to block Japan's path in various directions.

The most virulent article was published by the Osaka Mainichi, which categorically enumerated sixteen points to show that the United States had been inimical to Japan ever since the latter country entered into relations with the West.

JAPAN'S INTERNAL POLICY

A campaign to reduce Government expenses and the high cost of living was undertaken by the Japanese Government at the initiation of the Emperor toward the end of November. The annual cherry blossom and chrysanthemum parties were curtailed of the customary banquets. The cotton speculators were pursued by law, but no effective result was obtained either in this case or in that of other profiteering, which had aroused a great public clamor. The Tokio Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution asking the Government to deflate currency as the only effective measure, to remove restrictions on the import of certain useful commodities, and to put an absolute embargo on necessary staples and material.

Premier Hara, on the eve of the formal opening of the Diet on Dec. 23, asserted that "many problems exist, some of them not easy of solution." Among these he cited extension of the franchise,* "the eternal food problem," and foreign diplomacy, especially with reference to China. Regarding the first, the Japanese Government, he said, was ready to meet the will of the people.

One aspect of foreign policy which came into prominence at this time was Japan's raising of the question of racial equality at the Peace Conference as affecting the Japanese right of immigration to former German islands in the Pacific which had been allotted to the British. A delay asked by Baron Matsui in order to consult his Government before agreeing to the allocation plan was granted by the Supreme Council on Dec. 24. Regarding Siberian policy, Japan's firm resolve to keep the Bolshevik armies west of Lake Baikal was expressed by Premier Hara on Dec. 26. The Japanese Premier on this occasion specifically denied rumors that Japan was negotiating with the purpose of acquiring special territories in Mexico, and on Jan. 22 Viscount Uchida, the Foreign Minister, stated that Japanese immigration to Mexico was being prohibited in accordance with an agreement with the United States.

In Seoul, Korea, on Dec. 5, the Supreme Court confirmed the decision of the Court of Appeals, convicting the Rev. Eli Miller Mowry, a Presbyterian missionary from Mansfield, Ohio, of sheltering Korean agitators during the suppressed Korean revolt. He was sentenced to pay a fine of 100 yen or go to prison for twenty days, and was given thirty days to decide which alternative he preferred.

Official dispatches received in Washington on Feb. 9 announced the beginning of active rebellion in Korea, fostered by Russian Bolsheviks. A clash between 2,000 Koreans and a Japanese army post of 700 men in Northern Korea, the message said, had resulted in defeat of the Japanese, 300 of whom were killed and the remainder routed. Details of the fight were not reported.

DEVELOPMENTS IN CHINA

A new commercial relationship was inaugurated between China and the United States in December, 1919, by the establishment of a Chinese-American Industrial Bank, with many branches, and with Peking as the head office. The undertaking was capitalized at $10,000,000, subscribed for equally by Chinese and American groups. Of the directors, six are Chinese and five are Americans. Among the Americans interested are E. P. Bruce, President of the Pacific Development Company; G. F. Stone, President of Hayden, Stone & Co., and A. H. Wiggins of the Chase National Bank, New York. Among the Chinese group are the President of the republic, Hsu Shih-chang; Marshal Tuan Chi-jui, former Prime Minister Chien Nun-hsum, former Presidents Li Yuan-hung and Feng Kwo-chang; also the Military Governors of Kiangsu, Kiangsi and Hupeh.

In a note presented by the British Minister to the Chinese Government toward the end of December it was recommended that China discontinue the use of sycee silver (pure uncoined bullion used as currency) and establish a uniform dollar standard of currency, with subsidiary silver and copper coins, in order to overcome the disadvantages resulting from currency depreciation and the discredited status of Chinese bank notes. The Chinese Government had considered these recommendations favorably, and was planning the opening of a central mint in Shanghai for the free coinage of silver. Chow Tsu-chi, former Minister of Finance, was appointed Director General of Currency about the middle of January, and was charged to place Chinese exchange on a sound and uniform basis.

A new Cabinet was formed at this time with General Chin Yun-peng, formerly Acting President, as Prime Minister and Minister of War. The other members were:

Minister for Foreign Affairs, Lou Tseng-shiang.

Minister of the Interior and Minister of Commerce and Agriculture, Tien We-lioh.

Minister of Finance, Li Hsu-ho.

Minister of the Navy, Admiral Sah Cheng-ping.

Minister of Justice, Chu Shen.

Minister of Communications, Tseng Yuchun.

The organization of a permanent Cabinet marked the end of a long period of political strife between factions in Peking and demonstrated the ascendancy of Tuan Chi-jui, one-time Premier and considered the most powerful politician in North China. General Chin, according to Far Eastern experts, owed his accession to the permanent Premiership to Tuan. With the establishment of this permanent Cabinet it was believed that the way toward a resumption of negotiations between the warring Governments of North and South China, and the conclusion of domestic peace, had been definitely opened.

Under orders of Yang Tien-fu, a notorious outlaw who, with some 5,000 followers, had been operating in the Kochin Mountains, Dr. R. A. Shelton, an American missionary, was seized by bandits near Yunnan-fu on Jan. 3 and held for ransom. The American Legation at Peking was instructed by the Washington Government on Jan. 12 to request the co-operation of the French Consul at Yunnan-fu, and of the Governor of the Province of Yunnan, in efforts to obtain Dr. Shelton's release.

Japan's Policy in China

By MARQUIS OKUMA*

[FORMER PREMIER OF JAPAN]

OF course, we cannot deny that Japan's policy in China is likely to be misunderstood by the United States. The American people are all the more disposed toward a misunderstanding because of their desire always to sympathize with the weaker party to a dispute. It has long been a feature of American policy to oppose the strong in favor of the weak. * * * It is a noble spirit, this; and we cannot find any fault with it. But what if it may prove misplaced?

As all the world knows, China is now in rather a bad state, having lost her central authority and thrown her people into confusion. Entertaining doubts as to whether Japan is not trying to take advantage of China's weakness and disorder to gain her own ends, and making unjust demands on China, America, with characteristic spirit, is sympathizing with China and not afraid to snub Japan and ask her to stand back a bit.

In addition, there is the menace of unscrupulous merchants and traders in China, who, in their race for favors and concessions, want to drive Japan out of the country, so that they may have a free hand. They are jealous of her as a dangerous rival in the commerce of China. The Americans are a fine people; but all Americans are not good; they all do not love justice, any more than all Japanese do. Too many of these are operating in China, and they engage in propaganda calculated to injure international relations. Exaggerated rumors and insinuations are circulated in China and sent back to America and over to Japan, and do a lot of harm.

As for the Chinese, they know not what to make of it all; and they take advantage of every small difficulty to excite international interest and suspicion, often making mountains out of molehills. They go to British and American merchants with their complaints and try to induce them to act against Japan.

Japan certainly has no designs on any territory of China. On the contrary, it is Japan's main desire and policy to preserve the territorial integrity of China. If Japan has no desire to menace the territory of China she just as certainly does not desire to see any other country menace it. She does not intend to permit others to do in China what she would not do herself. This is the duty of one neighbor to another, to say the least.

While thus guarding the safety of our big neighbor, for our own sakes as well as for the sake of China, we do not deem it improper to desire the economic and commercial development of China, which would mean mutual profit to all. Japan has always had this ambition for China, but it is only since Japan revealed her greatness in the wars with China and Russia that western nations began to entertain suspicions as to our motives in China. Recently the West has been casting jealous eyes on Japan. The unduly suspicious West forgets the reason of Japan's war with China and now connects it with some ulterior motives on our part. Some even dare to dub Japan a second Germany, ready to practice atrocities on the weaker peoples of Asia; while the Chinese, quick to seize on these slanders, strive to provide foreigners with further ground for apprehension. But Japan, being aware of this disposition, should carefully guard her actions in China, so as to give no ground for misunderstanding. The anti-Japanese propaganda thus carried on is very disadvantageous to this country.

Unlike the English and Americans, Japan is not clever at carrying on propaganda in her own defense, and certainly she does not spend as much money on it as they, which must be put down to our inefficient diplomacy. Japan is no match for the West in diplomacy. She understands none of the arts by which a thing at one time may mean one thing and at another time another thing. At the Portsmouth conference Japan lost a great deal just because she would not spend vast sums on propaganda; and at Versailles she had the same experience. In this device China easily scored over Japan. China not only dispatched men of eloquence and learning to the Peace Conference, but backed them up with all the usual forces for powerful propaganda, while Japan was satisfied simply to send gentlemen to represent her. It is all very well to be represented by gentlemen, but if the gentlemen's notion of their duty is to refrain from saying and proclaiming even what they ought, it is a futile policy. * * *

It cannot be denied that there are some Japanese in China who do not behave toward the Chinese as they ought; and, though two wrongs do not make a right, we cannot refrain from asking whether all the British and Americans in China behave properly? As for looking after number one and obtaining the spoils wherever possible, the Japanese in China have nothing on their British and American rivals. If Japan is misunderstood because of her nationals in China, how is it the other nations are not misunderstood in the same way? Is this due to more careful propaganda, or what? Japan does not condone the ill-behavior of any of her people who offend in China. She constantly warns them against besmirching the character of their country by ill deeds. In this matter Japan would be greatly obliged if the English and Americans, who are from Christian countries, would show the Japanese a better example. People of Christian countries should be the last to force themselves on others. It is Christian, no doubt, to recommend good things, but is it Christian to force others to accept them?

No one can wonder that all the world now has its eyes on China, because China has an area as large as all Europe, awaiting development of vast and wealthy resources. It is right that the various nations of the world should desire to participate in developing China, but there is no need to bite and devour one another over it. Can they not agree to co-operate in assisting China and bringing her into line with modern progress? How can Japan, which is not as powerful as her rivals, be suspected of trying to get the lion's share of profit out of China? And as for her attempting to play the tyrant in China, the idea is too absurd for honest consideration!

With the conclusion of peace the League of Nations has been established, and now surely all international bickerings and feuds will be at an end. It is to be hoped that the League will justify our expectations. But suppose China should take advantage of the League to propose something absurd or unreasonable; it would make more trouble than peace. Japan has been proclaimed one of the five great powers fathering the League of Nations; but Japan has no great power. China is always disposed to despise Japan as a country with no great influence in the world. Thus she pretends to rely on England and America, who have more power than Japan. What China cannot forget is the fact that for long ages she regarded Japan as an inferior nation of no great significance in the world. But so long as China is led to believe, because England and America are so powerful, that she can take refuge under their wings while defying and insulting Japan, there will be trouble.

There is no need that the habits and condition of China should be allowed to create bad feeling between Japan and America. If such a feeling is fomented it is the work of unscrupulous persons who are anxious to make trouble for us. Any difference of opinion between America and Japan in regard to China can only lead to the injury of all concerned, and, most of all, to China herself.

There is really too much of a disposition in America to agree with China that since Japan is a small country of no great power she may be ignored or despised. For instance, when Japan appeared in the south seas America was much excited, and even raised objections, yet nothing at all was said when the Germans occupied these islands. If it is a crime for Japan to be there, why was it a virtue for Germany to be there? Thus Japan is left to infer that America did not oppose Germany because that country was thought to be powerful, but she opposes Japan because she thinks Japan is not powerful.

With the labor movement producing increasing unrest in America, that country ought to have its hands full in dealing with domestic problems for the present. Japan, too, has her social and industrial problems to solve. The two countries should treat each other fairly and squarely in all their relations, so that justice may inevitably be expected and received on both sides. Revolution is in the air, as may be seen from conditions in Russia and Germany, with echoes in more settled lands. It therefore becomes even the most powerful countries to look to themselves and see that their own affairs are in order, seeing that even the most powerful are not exempt from the dangers that threaten the present age!

I took from my window the flag today,
The flag of the bleeding heart,
And folded it up and laid it away,
While my Country stands apart.

I have laid it away in the black steel box,
With his cross and record won,
While the wily spoliator coolly blocks
The road he died upon.

He had volunteered, and died, to save,
In the Summer of Seventeen;
But they have dug him out of his battle grave—
Ah, the ghoul of war is lean!

And I think I see the gold-star eyes,
And the eyes of friendly States,
Gaze with wonder, distress—surprise,
As my Country hesitates.

We painfully left the flag in the sun
Till the treaties were exchanged;
That day is here—Peace has begun,
Yet my Country stands estranged.

So we have laid it away with his childhood locks,
(The blue star turned to gold,)
With the other things in the black steel box—
Ah, the ghoul of war is old!

Bernstorff on the Witness Stand

German ex-Ambassador's Testimony on Why President Wilson's Peace Efforts Failed

BY virtue of Article 34 of the new German Constitution the Reichstag passed a resolution on Aug. 21, 1919, creating "A Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry Into Responsibility in and for the War." This commission is divided into four sub-committees; the first to deal with responsibility for bringing on the war, the second with neglect of opportunities to end it sooner, the third with acts of disloyalty, and the fourth with acts of cruelty or atrocity in the conduct of the war. Only the second of these sub-committees has thus far held sittings. Its work in examining prominent witnesses, from Ludendorff and Hindenburg down to minor officials, has been summarized in the news dispatches; but some of the testimony, as printed verbatim in Vorwärts of Berlin, deserves to be presented to American readers more fully—notably that of Count von Bernstorff, former German Ambassador, giving his version of the inside of events at Washington before the entry of the United States into the war.

The Reichstag sub-committee, which is not empowered to punish anybody, but can call witnesses and examine them on oath, consists of seven members: Warmuth (National Party), President, until he resigned when the majority insisted on fining Dr. Helfferich for contempt of court; Gothein (Democrat), Vice President and later President; Joos (Centre), Secretary; Sinzheimer (Majority Socialist), Reporter; Cohn (Independent Socialist); Frau Pfülf (Majority Socialist); Professor Schücking (Democrat). The expert advisers include Dr. Spahn, Dr. Quarck, Professor Bonn, Professor Otto Hoetsch and Professor Schäfer. All parties are represented.

For a proper understanding of the evidence it is necessary to remember these dates: May 7, 1915, the Lusitania torpedoed; Aug. 27, 1916, Rumania enters the war; Dec. 12, 1916, the German peace offer; Dec. 18, President Wilson's peace note; Dec. 25, Germany's answer; Dec. 30, Entente answer to German peace offer; Jan. 9, 1917, decision at Pless to announce unrestricted submarine warfare; Jan. 10, Entente's answer to Wilson; Jan. 22, Wilson's peace message to the United States Senate; Feb. 1, unrestricted submarine warfare begins; April 5, 1917, America declares war on Germany.

FIRST EFFORTS FOR PEACE

Count Bernstorff's testimony on Oct. 22 and 23, 1919, as reported in Vorwärts and translated by The Contemporary Review of London, was in part as follows:

Immediately after the outbreak of war, at the beginning of 1914, Wilson made his first attempt at peace mediation. In September he caused a second attempt to be made, which failed because, as I know, the Entente never answered at all. In August Wilson issued a proclamation to the American people in which he suggested that they should remain neutral; this was in consequence of the state of public excitement prevailing, which was threatening the relations of private individuals. In this proclamation he already declared the American people to be the sole people able to end the war, granted that it stood out from the quarrel; it was the only great power possessed of sufficient means and influence to be able to bring this consummation about. Such was Wilson's policy. When the second peace offer came to nothing, he thought it necessary to show a greater reserve. However, he sent Colonel House during the Winter of 1914-15 to Paris, London, and Berlin, which latter city he visited in March. He was to prepare Wilson's peace mediation. On his return from Berlin he said that the moment was not yet come. Nobody was as yet prepared to consider peace; but he would later return to Europe to see whether anything could be done.

Wilson first mentioned peace to me when I had an audience with him after the Lusitania affair; the danger of war with Germany was extremely threatening. On that occasion he said we ought to make an appeal to moral forces by giving way about the submarine war, as the war could only finally be decided by means of a mutual understand ing, and no longer by the arbitrament of arms. If we would agree to give up the submarine war, he for his part would urge on England the giving up of the starving of Germany, the English Cabinet would agree, and he hoped that this would be the beginning of peace action on a great scale. This was on June 2, 1915.

After the first exchange of telegrams about the Lusitania, war seemed inevitable. I went to Wilson and agreed with him, with the object of gaining time, that Herr Meyer-Gerhard should go to Berlin. Wilson consented and promised that, until this mission should have resulted in something, he would defer all steps likely to lead to a breach. The exchange of notes about the Lusitania continued, but meanwhile another English ship was torpedoed and it all but came to war a second time. Our side gave way by admitting that passenger steamers should not be torpedoed without previous warning.

On Nov. 5 there followed a note to England, in which the English blockade was declared to be indefensible. For the third time the Lusitania negotiations brought us to the brink of war, as we were asked to admit that the torpedoing had been a breach of faith. We categorically refused to admit this expression. Finally Wilson gave way. He said he would be satisfied with our admission that such reprisals must not inflict injury on neutrals. His declaration was already drawn up and was to be exchanged, when a more intense submarine war was declared at Berlin; nothing came of this solution. Soon afterward the Sussex was torpedoed. Thereupon a permanent agreement was established; the submarine war was to be carried on on the principles of a cruiser war.

COLONEL HOUSE'S ROLE

In January, 1916, House paid his second visit to Berlin. On his return he told me that the chief opposition to peace was at present in Paris; in England he had found a certain willingness. In Berlin, too, he had been told: "We would be ready to respond to an American peace mediation at a suitable opportunity." The first I heard of the intentions of the German Imperial Government to respond to Wilson's wishes was a telegram which Ambassador Gerard sent to Washington after the Sussex affair had been settled. This telegram stated that the German Government was now prepared to accept peace mediation by Wilson. I thereupon inquired from Berlin whether this was correct, and was answered to the effect that a certain amount of time must be allowed to lapse on account of the state of public opinion in Germany, but, generally speaking, it was desired to accept Wilson's peace mediation; however, a condition would be that Wilson should first call England to book.

It is perhaps a cause for remark that I should have negotiated about these matters with a private person like Colonel House.

It would have been impossible to keep any Washington negotiations secret; the White House there was besieged by journalists. Therefore it was Wilson's wish that I should carry on these absolutely confidential negotiations with his intimate friend House at New York. House told me Wilson no longer had the power to oblige England to obey the practices of international law; American trade was so intimately tied up with the Entente that Wilson could not possibly disturb these trade relations without evoking a terrific storm. On the other hand, he was in a position to obtain a peace without victory, and he intended to do so as soon as an opportunity offered itself. But seeing that such a step would now universally be called pro-German in America, he could only do it when public opinion about relations with Germany had somewhat calmed down. He proposed a pause, and hoped without fail to be able to make a beginning of peace mediation toward the end of the Summer. Then Rumania entered the war.

EFFECT OF RUMANIA'S ENTRY

The instructions communicated to the Ambassador on Aug. 18 were then read, to the effect that the German Government declared itself ready to accept mediation by President Wilson, and urged that definite encouragement be given to such activity on the part of the President, but stated that it could not as yet bind itself to any kind of concrete conditions. Count Bernstorff continued:

After I had communicated the gist of these instructions to Colonel House, he told me that any mediation by Wilson was now impossible, and must be deferred because, in consequence of Rumania's entry into the war, the Entente was now quite sure of victory and would therefore refuse Wilson. * * * I can only repeat that Colonel House told me Wilson's peace mediation must be deferred because the Entente was sure of its victory now that Rumania had come into the war. This declaration of Colonel House's, even at a later date, always seemed to me to be a particularly important one, because, when Wilson did take some real peace steps, I believed he must now be frankly persuaded that they would be accepted by the Entente. Otherwise there would have been no sense in Wilson's previous declaration that mediation seemed to him to have no prospect of success. * * *

In this connection a memorandum also seems to me important, written by the Kaiser himself, and brought by Gerard to America when he came on leave. * * * In my recollection this memorandum made the deepest impression in America. It is dated Oct. 9, and was the outcome of an interview which Mr. Gerard had with the Kaiser in Charleville. This memorandum, which is addressed to Gerard, runs:

"Your Excellency has informed the Kaiser at an interview at headquarters in Charleville that President Wilson would be ready to offer us his good services to obtain peace toward the end of the Summer. The German Government has no information as to whether the President still entertains this idea, or as to the date at which he will take this step. Meanwhile, the conduct of the war has assumed such a form that the German Government believes it to be its duty to inform your Excellency that it would consider it essential to hasten the President's proposed action so that it should not take place too late in the year."

IMPORTANCE OF MEMORANDUM

Dr. Cohn—In what way did this memorandum make so great an impression in America?

Count Bernstorff—Naturally, the American public knew nothing of this memorandum; but it made a great impression on the American Government in this way: from now onward a firm conviction grew up in America that the German Government would be willing to accept a peace mediation by Wilson. The Presidential election took place on Nov. 7. It took a very long time to establish the final result. This delay explains why President Wilson could not initiate his peace step until a considerable time had elapsed. Later, I learned the peace note which Wilson dispatched on Dec. 18 had been composed as far back as the middle of November, but had been thrust by Wilson into his writing table, because another wave of anti-German feeling swept through the country on account of the Belgian deportations. Colonel House told me that the peace offer which was already drawn up by the middle of November was not sent off by Wilson because he could not be responsible for it in the state of public feeling. * * *

Dr. Sinzheimer—Your telegram, reaching here Dec. 4, is also important. "Lansing spoke to me with most particular emphasis about the American protest against the Belgian deportations; they are imperiling the whole system of Belgian relief. Thus the temper of the public is again being poisoned just at the moment when it seemed as though peace negotiations might begin."

* * * Finally, there is a private letter from Secretary of State Jagow to you, dated Nov. 20, saying that now, as before, we were in sympathy with the efforts toward peace of President Wilson; of course, such efforts must not go as far as concrete conditions, because these could not be favorable to us. To this you answered, in a telegram of Nov. 24, as follows: "Wilson has commissioned Colonel House to tell me in the strictest confidence that he would undertake an effort for peace as soon as possible, presumably between now and the New Year. But meanwhile he made it a condition that we should discuss peace as little as possible, and that we should allow no new submarine controversies to spring up, in order to prevent a premature refusal by our enemies." So that was just before our peace action of Dec. 12. * * *

BERLIN'S ACTION A HINDRANCE

Katzenstein—Did the American Government regard the German peace offer of Dec. 12 as a help or a hindrance to its own peace action?

Count Bernstorff—It was regarded as a hindrance. Colonel House was commissioned by the President to tell me so, because it was interpreted as a sign of weakness on our side. * * *

Professor Bonn—When did you receive information that peace action would be undertaken from our side?

Count Bernstorff—The documents include two telegrams, one dated Nov. 18.

Professor Bonn—So you had no time to draw the attention of Berlin to the fact that a peace offer from us would be felt as a great hindrance to the American step?

Count Bernstorff—As far as I remember I had not time to telegraph. * * * It is clear also from other reports and telegrams of mine that the Americans always took the view that any peace action could only succeed at a moment when Germany was strong. Thus I had always to influence things to prevent both the home press and my home Government from discussing peace at all, as that would invariably be to hamper any steps taken by Wilson.

Katzenstein—Up till now the opinion has always been that the German peace offers, with their enumeration of German victories, had frightened off the enemy. Apparently the American reception was the exact opposite of this.

Count Bernstorff—I can remember with exactness how, in a conversation I had with House, he regretted our having taken any action for peace. He was afraid it would interfere with Wilson's efforts. All the same, Wilson would perhaps take other steps. * * *

Dr. Cohn—Did you receive the impression that the Americans were annoyed about the Dec. 12 peace offer for reasons of prestige?

Count Bernstorff—I received the impression that the Americans were pretty disappointed because it robbed them of the chance of taking the first step.

Professor Bonn—Colonel House told you that a German peace offer would be taken as a sign of weakness?

Count Bernstorff—House once told me that Wilson's peace action was being interfered with, because among the Entente the idea was that we should not have made this peace offer had we not stood in such need of peace. (Excitement.) * * *

Dr. Sinzheimer—In the course of today's evidence we have reached the date of Dec. 12. I now sum up as the outcome of that evidence: Did you interpret your instructions as instructions to encourage or influence President Wilson or Colonel House to undertake a peace action in our favor?

Count Bernstorff—Yes. (Excitement.)

Dr. Sinzheimer—Was Wilson prepared to take account of these wishes?

Count Bernstorff—Yes.

Dr. Sinzheimer—Was Wilson prepared, within the limits which were imposed on you, to agree to a peace conference on an international basis, even without concrete conditions being proposed by us?

Count Bernstorff—Yes. (Excitement.)

[From Vorwärts, Oct. 22, morning edition.]

PRESIDENT WILSON'S NOTE

The President—We now come to the period beginning with the American peace offer.

Count Bernstorff—In spite of our peace offer Wilson stood by his peace mediation. The reason why the Wilson peace offer caused so much excitement in America was because it followed directly on our own offer, so that color was given to the idea that we had encouraged Wilson. It was in consequence of this that Wilson had stated in his note that his offer had nothing to do with the German offer, that, on the contrary, it had been intended a long time back. Public opinion in America looked on Wilson's step as absolutely pro-German. The entire press expressed itself to this effect, and the feeling at Washington was the same.

I then asked Lansing in what form he conceived further methods of procedure. I had an exhaustive conversation with him on this point. As I now know things, I believe that there was a contradiction between the German answer to Wilson's note and my reading of it. At that time I assumed that the German answer conveyed our readiness for a peace mediation to the extent of the calling of a conference which might negotiate; but I did not conceive that therewith an end was to be put to the Wilsonian peace action. Now I am obliged to assume that our answer of Dec. 26 was intended completely to put an end to the Wilson peace mediation. My present assumptions are due above all to a telegram of the Kaiser to the Foreign Office asking why I still went on speaking about Wilson's peace mediation, seeing that no such mediation now exists.

The President—From what do you infer that the German Government did not want to know anything of a peace mediation by Wilson? It is stated quite expressly in the Wilson peace offer that no peace is to be proposed, that he was not even offering mediation, but that he only wanted to take soundings. If that was so, then the German Government was not obliged to interpret this step as an offer of mediation. How do you come to impute to the German Government an intention of being averse to a peace mediation?

Count Bernstorff—I can only repeat that my opinion at that time was that our note of Dec. 25 implied no alteration in the attitude of our Government, and that all it conveyed was that we did not desire any interference from Wilson on territorial questions; but today I am of another opinion.

The President—Wilson did not greatly stress communication of the terms of peace; so that the German refusal to communicate terms could not be any hindrance to peace?

Count Bernstorff—But, of course, Wilson believed that we should in the end communicate our terms.

Dr. Sinzheimer—In reply to the President, I beg to draw attention to the fact that the heart of the Wilson note of Dec. 18 to all belligerents is the request to communicate concrete terms of peace. In the German note, which was an answer to this, there is no mention at all of this request of Wilson's for communication of peace terms. Thereupon Count Bernstorff telegraphed that Lansing had begged him at any rate to communicate our peace terms to him in confidence.

Count Bernstorff—That is so.

Dr. Sinzheimer—When this request of Lansing's was conveyed, Secretary of State Zimmermann answered on Jan. 31,* that is, two days before the submarine war, that Count Bernstorff was to drag the matter out.

Count Bernstorff—I directly inferred from that answer that everything was to remain as before.

KAISER RATTLES THE SWORD

Dr. Sinzheimer—You mentioned a telegram from the Kaiser. This telegram is dated Jan. 16, and addressed to Secretary of State Zimmermann. It runs: "His Majesty thanks you for the information. In regard to the contents of the telegram, his Majesty observes that he puts no value at all in Wilson's peace offer. If a breach with America is unavoidable, it cannot be helped; we proceed." (Excitement.) It is on the basis of this telegram and of disclosures now being made that you have come to the conclusion that Wilson's peace mediation was to be thrust aside by us?

Count Bernstorff—Undoubtedly. * * *

Professor Bonn—Were the concrete peace terms of Jan. 20† communicated to you?

Count Bernstorff—No.

Professor Bonn—Were the German peace terms communicated to you not in a concrete form?

Count Bernstorff—No, except for the telegram which said that Belgium was not to be annexed.

The President—It has always been said the peace terms were very moderate compared with the senseless demands made by the Entente.

Count Bernstorff—They were very moderate. In America people asked why the peace terms were not published; I answered that as they were so moderate they would, in contrast with the enemy, cause an impression of weakness. Lansing answered me that he was unable to understand why we did not ask as much as the others; then a middle line compromise could be arranged. * * *

*The German text has "Jan. 1," which is an obvious mistake.

†There were two sets of German peace terms, those in connection with the Dec. 12 peace offer, and those formulated when the unrestricted submarine war was to start.

Dr. Cohn—When were the Dec. 12 peace terms communicated?

Count Bernstorff—At the same time as the unrestricted submarine war was declared.

Dr. Cohn—Did Lansing's statement about the peace terms, that they were too moderate, and that there ought to be a compromise along a middle line, refer to Belgium?

Count Bernstorff—No. An American peace mediation which should not include the restoration of Belgium was wholly excluded.

DISCREPANCY IN PEACE TERMS

[Dr. Sinzheimer here proved that the peace terms which were communicated to President Wilson on Jan. 28, and which referred to the peace offer of Dec. 12, did not correspond with the Foreign Office records.]

Dr. Cohn—Were you informed on your return to Germany that the terms which you were to have communicated to Wilson were other than those which were agreed upon on Dec. 12?

Count Bernstorff—This is the very first I heard of that. In any case, the peace terms had no longer any effect, as the same day that I got them I also got the declaration of the unrestricted submarine war, and this meant the breaking off of diplomatic relations.

Dr. Cohn—Did the terms communicated appear to be moderate?

Count Bernstorff—I considered them moderate. But I put no further value on them as I knew that diplomatic relations must be broken off. * * *

The President—Did not Wilson always pass as the man who stood for humanity and justice? Did Wilson express himself as to these purely human questions?

Count Bernstorff—I often discussed this question, for example in connection with the Lusitania and the Sussex affairs. He thought the starvation blockade illegal.

Dr. Sinzheimer—Do you believe in Wilson's true intention to mediate for peace?

Count Bernstorff—Yes.

Dr. Sinzheimer—Was it to be a peace favoring the Entente?

Count Bernstorff—On Jan. 22 Wilson said that a peace without victory should be concluded; I understood this to mean that Germany was to retain her world position undiminished. I held Wilson to be an honest broker. * * * (Questioned by Dr. Sinzheimer) Not once did the Americans discuss a peace with me in which even the smallest surrender of territory was suggested to us. * * * (Questioned by Professor Bonn) My point of view is that Wilson's peace action of 1918 had nothing whatever to do with his peace action of 1917. Nor has this anything to do with Wilson's failure at Versailles. These undertakings were quite separate ones, and no inference can be made from one to the other. * * * It must always be remembered that on Jan. 31, 1917, Wilson's whole attitude underwent a change. Until Jan. 31 Wilson believed us to be wishing for a peace by agreement; after Jan. 31 he was convinced we would only accept the so-called German peace. * * * Such is the psychological explanation of this change.

[From Vorwärts, Oct. 23, 1919, morning and evening editions.]

GERMAN PEACE TERMS OF DEC. 12, 1916

The German peace terms were read to the sub-committee by Dr. Sinzheimer in his capacity as reporter to the sub-committee. They were as follows:

Recovery of those parts of Upper Alsace occupied by France.

Delimitation of a frontier securing Germany and Poland, strategically and economically, against Russia.

Colonial restitution in the form of an agreement which secures to Germany such colonial possessions as correspond with her population and the importance of her economic interests.

Restoration of French territory occupied by Germany, with a reserve as to strategic and economic frontier rectifications and as to financial compensations.

Restoration of Belgium accompanied by definite guarantees securing Germany, to be agreed upon by negotiation with the Belgian Government.

Adjustment of economic and financial claims on the principle of mutual exchange of territories conquered and restored at the conclusion of peace.

Compensation to German businesses and German nationals for losses occasioned by the war.

Renunciation of all economic compacts and measures which would prove an obstruction to the normal course of trade or of communications after the conclusion of peace, and conclusion of commercial treaties on these principles.

Guarantees for the freedom of the seas.

The peace terms of our allies were set between similarly moderate limits in harmony with our own point of view.

TESTIMONY ON SUBMARINES

In sessions reported by Vorwärts Nov. 7-12, 1919, the failure of the submarines was thrashed out. Dr. Struve, attacking the Admiralty, said that in March, 1916, there were 23 submarines in commission, of which 11 were in the North Sea. In January, 1917, Germany still had only 20 U-boats fit for use, though the number on paper was 152. Later the proportion was 54 fit for service out of 208. "When the unrestricted submarine warfare was determined upon," said Dr. Struve, "Secretary of State von Capelle told the Main Committee that we had 160 submarines, * * * but only 20 were fit for the front. This contrast is so great that Herr von Capelle ought to have drawn attention to it."

Later the number of submarines fit for service rose to 36, 43, 47, and even higher in the course of 1917 and 1918, said Dr. Struve, but under Herr von Capelle the situation did not develop as it should. When the latter was sharply criticised by members of the Main Committee he had declared that Germany then had nearly 400 submarines. "This figure was incorrect," said Dr. Struve. "Even counting in all lost submarines and all submarines not yet built, it was never 400, but at most 300." The witness went on to accuse the Admiralty of continued neglect of submarine building in favor of cruiser building.

Herr von Capelle appeared before the committee to answer both charges—that he had not built enough submarines and that he had deceived the Main Committee. He said in part:

I have obtained from the Admiralty the latest figures relating to the number of submarines built during the war and immediately before the war. This Admiralty report, which is dated May, 1919, proves that 810 submarines in all were built during and before the war. Of these 810, 45 date from the period preceding the outbreak of war. One hundred and eighty-six submarines were placed by the orders of Admiral Tirpitz, and 579 were placed by my orders during my two and a half years' tenure of office. I should think that these figures tell their own story.

After further details on this subject and a review of the delays in submarine construction due to exchange of peace notes with America, Herr von Capelle added:

I have been reproached with having deceived the Reichstag. It is said I gave the number of completed submarines as 160, concealing the fact that a smaller number only were in commission. The idea that as the number of submarines rises, the number of submarines in commission rises, too, is quite topsy-turvy. The only thing that matters is the tonnage figure of vessels sunk; I made that quite clear in the Reichstag. It's not my fault if some gentlemen have been incapable of assimilating facts foreign to them. We guaranteed 600,000 tons and reached 750,000 in February. How can it then be said that I deceived the Reichstag? I hope Dr. Struve will withdraw this harsh reproach. * * *

RESPONSIBILITY FOR FAILURE

The discussion then turned to the question why the whole submarine campaign had failed. The nearest that the committee came to getting any definite statements on this subject was in the following portion of the proceedings:

Deputy Schücking—Wasn't it notorious that, in spite of the unrestricted submarine war, these (English munition) transports crossed the Channel without the slightest interference?

Admiral Koch—No, not without the slightest interference, only at the narrowest point. Small steamers there kept on carrying munitions across at night.

Dr. Sinzheimer—How was it that the big American troop transports were not hindered?

Admiral Koch—Each submarine had her range and had to take everything that came along, whether transport or not.

Dr. Sinzheimer—But this is a crucial point. Capelle said we need have no fear of American transports; they would be a very welcome booty for the submarines.

Deputy Gothein—One American troop transport and one only was sunk. Surely this contradicts the prospects which were opened up. Apart from the climax of the month of April or May, there was a continual decline of the amount of tonnage sunk. What is the cause of this failure of the submarines?

Admiral Koch—We are still in ignorance of what was the real trend of affairs. In the first place we must consider the English countermeasures, their different inventions, such as boats of increased speed, which forced the submarines to keep under water all the time, then the convoy system and the continued change of harbor for arrival and departure. The submarines never slackened. * * *

Deputy Dr. Cohn * * * (in the Reichstag Main Committee)—Herr von Capelle was of opinion that hundreds of ships would be needed to bring an American army over to France, and that, further, it would be difficult for America to put her hand on 100,000 volunteers, seeing that war enthusiasm had died down in England. Again, this army would have to be trained and finally transported. No better booty could be imagined for our submarines than such a transport fleet. The danger from America amounted to zero.

Admiral Koch—The Admiralty Staff never underestimated the military importance of a war with America.

Deputy Dr. Cohn—Do you know the figures

o. the man power transported by America?

Admiral Koch—No.

Deputy Dr. Cohn—The English quote them at 1,800,000.

Admiral Koch—I had estimated them higher.

Von Capelle—The naval command was throughout of opinion that the unrestricted submarine war would bring the war to an end within five or six months. This thought is like a red thread drawn through all memoranda, statements, and even through the negotiations in the Reichstag committee. What I said about America referred to this limited period only, not to what America might be able to do in a period of eighteen months or two years. My words have not been proved wrong for a limited period. We did not discuss in the Reichstag Committee what America might be able to do in case the war were to last another two years. Nor did anybody seriously consider such a possibility. As regards the sinking of the transports, I am credited with saying that not a ship would get across. That is not true. If I said that they would require roughly 100 boats, and where were they to get them considering the cry for tonnage, and that there could be no better booty for our submarines to hunt down on the high seas, I meant that out of these 100 vessels we should be able to torpedo a great many. Everybody must have thought the same. Only the naval command can answer the question why we never attained these results.

President Warmuth—I will now ask Admiral Koch to tell us what were the reasons which justified the naval authorities in holding the opinion that an unrestricted submarine war begun on Feb. 1 must, after a period of five months, force England to surrender.

Admiral Koch—We did not get the results we had hoped for from the submarine war; but from the purely technical point of view the results were, nevertheless, greater than we had expected. I cannot find that the work of the navy in any way failed to come up to standard; the leadership of, and self-sacrifice of, the crews are beyond all question. The causes of the final balance must be sought elsewhere.

Austria's Peace Offer in 1917

Hitherto Unpublished Details of the Prince Sixtus Episode —A Chapter of Secret Diplomacy

ONE of the dramatic moments of the war was that of the lightning-swift and crushing reply of Premier Clemenceau to the charge made by Count Czernin, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, in an address delivered in Vienna on April 2, 1918, that France had made peace overtures to Austria shortly before beginning the new offensive in the west. The net result of Czernin's statement, when shorn of diplomatic verbiage, had been to place France in the light of having made a secret and unsuccessful petition to the enemy for peace.

To this charge Premier Clemenceau made a characteristic and historic rejoinder: "Count Czernin lies!" There followed a somewhat extended controversy on the subject, in the course of which the French Government gave official evidence of the continuous peace intrigues conducted by Austria, notably by Count Revertata, a personal friend of Emperor Charles, with Commandant

Armand of the French General Staff, in Switzerland. Charges and counter-charges as to who was the initiator in these negotiations prolonged the dispute. Finally, on April 8, in a reply to Count Czernin, M. Clemenceau disclosed the fact that the Austrian Emperor himself had put such overtures in writing on March 24, 1917, in a letter (the first) which the French Premier gave out for publication on April 12, 1918. This letter, written by Emperor Charles to Prince Sixtus of Bourbon on March 24, 1917, proved conclusively that overtures of peace had been made by Austria, not by France—overtures which had never been accepted. As a result of this revelation the political career of Count Czernin was brought to an abrupt end. Before his fall he obstinately denied the authenticity of this letter, and on Dec. 11, 1918, he declared that he would never have concluded a separate peace, and that such a peace was a physical impossibility. In his published memoirs he treats this whole episode with great reticence.

The Austrian Emperor, on his part, at once sent a formal denial of the authenticity of these documents to Emperor William, saying that the charges were "too low" for refutation, and declaring: "My cannon in the west will be our best reply." To this message the German Emperor sent a cordial expression of thanks, embodying assurance of his complete belief in the Austrian Emperor's repudiation of the French charges.

In the issue of Jan. 3, 1920, of the French review, L'Illustration, are published the positive and visible proofs of the Austrian offer, proofs which M. Clemenceau himself, when, in defending France, he stigmatized the false-speaking of Count Czernin, did not possess in their entirety. Facsimile reproductions are given by L'Illustration of the two letters written (in French) by Emperor Charles to Prince Sixtus and of the note (in German) in the handwriting of Count Czernin, appended to the second imperial letter, as well as of passports issued by the French and Belgian Governments to allow Prince Sixtus to proceed to Switzerland, where the secret negotiations were initiated, and finally of the note verbale written by Prince Sixtus and read by him to Jules Cambon on April 22, 1917. From the accompanying text explaining these reproduced documents is extracted for CURRENT HISTORY the following translation and summary of this historic episode:

WHY SIXTUS WAS CHOSEN

If the notes written by Prince Sixtus of Bourbon-Parma to Emperor Charles of Austria, and his repeated negotiations with the highest representatives of the French and British Governments during the year 1917 had been crowned with success, it has been said, the whole face of Europe would have been changed. The reasons which impelled Emperor Charles to select this young Prince to act as his intermediary in the opening and conducting of negotiations with France and later England were by no means remote. The Prince's personality, his family ties with Austria, his love for France, were all factors in the making of this choice.

Sons of the reigning Duke of Parma, who had been dispossessed of his estates in Italy, Prince Sixtus and his brother Xavier had of their own volition left Austria, where the family had taken refuge, while still mere youths, and had taken up their residence in France, which they considered as their fatherland. When the war broke out they were staying temporarily in Austria. They resolved to flee and to regain France in order to perform their military duty. The Archduke Charles, their brother-in-law, helped the two brothers to escape by automobile beyond the Austrian frontier. Unable to gain admission either to the French or British Army, they enlisted in the army of Belgium.

While performing their military duties in Belgium, they received in December, 1916, a letter from their mother, transmitted by diplomatic channels from the Duchy of Luxemburg. In this letter the Duchess asked her sons to come to Switzerland, as she had important matters to confide to them. Bearing the authorization of King Albert and a diplomatic passport of the French Government, they arrived in Switzerland on Jan. 23, 1917. There Prince Sixtus learned that his brother-in-law, Emperor Charles, wishing to give peace to his people and thus fulfill his promises made on his accession to the Austrian throne, asked him to act as mediator in negotiations with France, first of all, and later with the Entente. A letter from his sister Zita, the Austrian Empress, confirmed the Emperor's desire for peace.

THE FIRST OVERTURES

The Prince declared at once that he could not undertake such a mission without the authority of the French Government, and without the certainty that the demands of France would be fully met, including the right of France to Alsace and Lorraine, the neutralization of the left bank of the Rhine, and the complete restoration of Belgium. He then informed the French Government of the proposals that had been made to him, and received permission to continue the discussions.

Meanwhile, Count Erdoedy, one of the oldest and most devoted servitors of Emperor Charles, brought to Switzerland a note verbale dictated by Count Czernin, with an addendum of the Emperor. A letter from the Empress, addressed to her brother, implored him to make every effort to end the martyrdom of millions of combatants. Orally Count Erdoedy described the formal desire of the Emperor to bring to an end the sombre drama that was bathing Europe in blood.

This meeting with Count Erdoedy was the object of a memorandum which Prince Sixtus, on his return to Paris, read to M. Poincaré on March 5, in the first interview which he had with the Chief of State. The President of the republic also took cognizance of the Czernin note and of the Emperor's commentaries. The first did not seem to him worthy of consideration, but the latter seemed to indicate in the Emperor a sincere desire for peace. Such was also the opinion of M. Briand, President of the Council and Minister for Foreign Affairs, whom M. Poincaré consulted. They both, however, expressed the need of receiving something more formal, more explicit, which could be conveyed officially to France's allies.

At this juncture the Russian revolution broke out. Prince Sixtus wrote to his imperial brother-in-law a letter in which he begged him to prove his good-will by making great concessions. To his letter he joined a possible plan of peace. Both letter and plan were placed in the hands of Count Erdoedy, whom he met again in Geneva. The Count, however, begged Prince Sixtus and his brother Xavier to come at once to Vienna, where the Emperor was awaiting them. The latter he reported as saying: "An hour's conversation will accomplish more than ten journeys." Count Czernin also insisted on meeting the Prince personally. All was ready; absolute secrecy would be maintained; orders had been given at the frontier to eliminate all obstacles. The Princes allowed themselves to be persuaded.

JOURNEY TO VIENNA

This journey to Vienna (says the writer in l'Illustration) is one of the most interesting pages of the Prince's notes.

The Emperor appears to us in his castle of Laxenburg. We hear him express, with moving sincerity, his desire for peace. He suffers physically from the massacres caused by this war, which he did not initiate, and which his duty to God and man orders him to terminate. The Empress joins him in the same pathetic plea. Suddenly Count Czernin appears, embarrassed, reticent, displaying the simulated coldness and all the conventional traits and maladroitness of the would-be diplomat in whom all is calculation, and who wishes to play the rôle of Machiavelli.

To show his good-will the Emperor hands his brother-in-law a letter written in his own hand—the same letter which M. Clemenceau, wishing to unmask the impudence of Count Czernin, was destined to publish on April 12, 1918.

Prince Sixtus, feeling that the negotiations had made considerable progress, returned to Switzerland on March 25, 1917, and from there went to France. M. Poincaré, on March 31, received him for the third time. He read the Emperor's letter, and also an explanatory note drawn up by the Prince the day before.

EMPEROR'S FIRST LETTER

The text of the Emperor's letter is given in translation herewith:

(March 24, 1917,
at Laxenburg.)

My dear Sixtus:

The end of the third year of this war, which has brought so many deaths and so much sorrow to the world, approaches. All the people of my empire are united more closely than ever in the common wish to safeguard the integrity of the monarchy, even at the cost of the greatest sacrifices. Thanks to their participation in the generous emulation of all the nationalities of my empire, the monarchy has been able to resist now going on three years the most formidable onslaughts. No one can contest the military successes won by my troops, especially on the Balkan front.

France, on her part, has shown a splendid power of resistance and a magnificent spirit. We all unreservedly admire the traditional gallantry of her army, and the spirit of sacrifice of the whole French people. It is, therefore, especially agreeable to me to see that, though temporarily adversaries, no real divergence of views or aspirations separates my empire from France, and I am, therefore, justly fied in hoping that my deep sympathy for France, joined to that which prevails throughout all my realm, will forever preclude a return to that state of war for which I personally have no responsibility. To this end and in order to demonstrate concretely the sincerity of these sentiments I beg you to transmit secretly and unofficially to M. Poincaré, President of the French Republic, my assurance that I will support in every way and by the use of all my personal influence with my allies the just claims of France concerning Alsace-Lorraine.

As for Belgium, she must be restored to full sovereignty and retain all her African possessions without prejudice to the reparations she may receive for the losses she has endured. Serbia must also be restored to full sovereignty, and as a pledge of our good-will we are ready to assure her a fair and natural outlet on the Adriatic, as well as wide economic concessions. On her part Austria-Hungary will ask as a fundamental and absolute condition that the Kingdom of Serbia shall cease in future from all relations with—and shall suppress—all societies or groups whose political object tends to the dissolution of the monarchy, especially the Narodna Obrana; that it shall loyally prohibit by all means in its power all kinds of political agitation in Serbia or beyond its frontiers tending to the same end, and that it shall give this assurance under the guarantee of the Entente Powers.

The events that have occurred in Russia compel me to reserve my ideas on this subject until the day when a legal and stable Government shall have been established there.

After this explanation of my views I will ask you to inform me in your turn, after having discussed the matter with these two Powers, of the opinions, first of all, of France and England, so that a basis of agreement may be reached and official negotiations may begin and end to the satisfaction of all.

Hoping that by our mutual efforts we may put an end to the sufferings of so many million men and so many families in sadness and anxiety, I beg you to receive the expression of my deep and fraternal affection.

THE PROBLEM OF ITALY

With the concessions yielded in the Emperor's letter there remained only the question of Italy and that of Rumania. On April 6 Jules Cambon, delegated by M. Ribot, who had succeeded M. Briand as Premier, discussed the claims of these two countries with the Prince. Subsequently M. Ribot, in a visit to Folkestone, explained the situation to Mr. Lloyd George. On his return the Prince was again summoned, and in the presence of M. Poincaré and M. Ribot, the question of Italy was specially discussed. M. Ribot stated that in agreement with Lloyd George he held the view that the negotiations for peace could no longer be concealed from Italy. The Prince warned him to be prudent, saying that he would not guarantee the Emperor's life a week if Berlin learned of the negotiations. M. Ribot promised to present the matter to Foreign Minister Sonnino in the light of overtures made by the Austrian Embassy in Switzerland.

Meanwhile, however, there occurred the famous meeting between Emperor William and Emperor Charles at Homburg. The German press gave the interview great publicity, declaring that there had been perfect harmony between the two monarchs and declaring their intention to open negotiations with the Russian Revolutionary Government. Believing that Emperor Charles was playing a double game, President Poincaré was very much irritated by these reports. Nevertheless the projected conference with Sonnino was arranged at St. Jean-de-Maurienne on April 19. On his way to this conference Lloyd George saw Prince Sixtus in Paris. The interview was most cordial, and the English Premier showed plainly his eagerness to separate Austria from Germany. "We have nothing against Austria," he said, "and France also has no fundamental hostility toward her. To conquer Germany is our only aim. But what will Italy demand? The demands of our allies are by no means inconsiderable."

SONNINO INFLEXIBLE

On April 20 Mr. Lloyd George, on his return from the conference, with visible regret informed the Prince that he had found Italy inflexible; Sonnino refused to yield any of Italy's ambitions. But Lloyd George urged the Prince to continue his efforts and to come directly to him in London if there were any new developments. Encouraged by the British Premier's attitude, the Prince again saw M. Cambon and read to him the following note verbale:

I will transmit the results of my mission to the Emperor. I will urge him strongly to consider the friendly spirit shown him by France and England. But it is for him to decide what he can and should do.

My personal mission is purely in the interest of France, and only for her advantage. It is for this reason that I have insisted on having very clear expressions regarding Alsace-Lorraine, of capital importance to us as a tangible and irrefutable argument that Austria was acting independently of Germany. These I obtained.

I understand how delicate and difficult the Italian question is. I have no knowledge as to how the Emperor may solve it taking account of the opinion and the desires of his country. The great difficulty will lie in this direction.

It is a question which depends on the inner situation of Austria, which we do not know. I can have no personal opinion on this subject myself.

Paris, Quai de Bethune, April 22, 1917.

In addition to the presentation of this note verbale, Prince Sixtus dispatched a letter to Emperor Charles urging him to make the most supreme concessions to attain the end proposed.

SECOND VISIT TO VIENNA

Informed by Count Erdoedy at Zug that the Emperor again wished his presence in Vienna, Prince Sixtus paid his second visit to the Castle of Laxenburg. The Emperor showed himself extremely optimistic; Italy had made overtures of peace through General Cadorna on condition of the cession to her of the Italian-speaking Trentino. The Emperor declared that he would not treat directly with Italy, but only through the Entente. In regard to other matters Charles was ready to satisfy all demands. Count Czernin also showed a strong desire for peace, a shift of attitude occasioned by the Emperor's report of a virtual rupture between himself and Emperor William at Homburg after Charles had declared that Austria could not follow Germany after the coming of Autumn.

EMPEROR'S SECOND LETTER

Prince Sixtus again departed for Paris, bearing a second letter from Charles, dated May 9, and a note in German, written by the hand of Czernin. Charles's second letter (hitherto unpublished) is here translated:

May 9, 1917.

My Dear Sixtus:

I note with satisfaction that France and England share my views regarding what I consider as the essential basis of the peace of Europe. They state, however, that they will not conclude peace unless Italy participates therein. Italy has just expressed her desire to make peace with the monarchy and has abandoned all the inadmissible aspirations of conquest which she had hitherto manifested regarding the Slavic countries of the Adriatic. She now reduces her demands to the Italian-speaking portion of the Tyrol. I have deferred examination of this request until I know through you of the response of France and England to my offers of peace. Count Erdoedy will transmit to you my own views and those of my Minister concerning these different points.

The harmony between the Monarchy and France and England on so many essential points will, we are convinced, make it possible to overcome the last obstacles to an honorable peace.

I thank you for the aid which you are giving me now in this work of peace conceived by me in the common interest of my country. This war has imposed on you, as you told me on your departure, the duty of remaining faithful to your name and the great past of your house, first of all in succoring the wounded heroes on the field of battle, and, secondly, in fighting for France. I have understood the motives of your action, and although we have been separated by events for which I have no personal responsibility, my affection for you has not been shaken. With your permission I wish to reserve the privilege of communicating to France and England, through you as my only intermediary, my direct and personal opinions. Believe me, affectionately and fraternally yours, (Signed) CHARLES.

COUNT CZERNIN'S NOTE

The German note written by Count Czernin is given herewith in the form in which it was translated, according to L'Illustration, by Prince Sixtus himself, and as reproduced in the body of L'Illustration article:

I. Austria-Hungary cannot consent to any cession of territory without compensation. In case of compensation it must be borne in mind that no territory will ever have for the Monarchy the value of a land watered by the blood of its soldiers.

II. Outside of this rectification of the projected frontier the integrity of the Monarchy must, from now on, be guaranteed by the Entente, so that it shall be assured when the general peace conference is opened.

III. As soon as the two above-mentioned conditions (compensation in the rectification of frontier and guarantee of the integrity of the Monarchy) have been accepted by the Entente, Austria-Hungary will be able to make a separate peace with the Entente. Then only will it inform its allies of the situation.

IV. In all cases Austria-Hungary is ready to pursue, as in the past, negotiations with a view to concluding with the Entente an honorable peace, and subsequently to prepare the way for a general and definite peace.

NEGOTIATIONS FAIL

All obstacles to the conclusion of a separate peace with Austria seemed to have been overcome. Prince Sixtus hoped to persuade M. Poincaré of Charles's sincerity, his belief in which had been shaken by the Homburg interview, and to overcome the incurable skepticism of M. Ribot. But the French Premier showed more and more hesitation. The views of Rumania, Italy, and Poland seemed to him important. Interviews with the King of Italy, King George, and M. Poincaré were suggested. Prince Sixtus went to London. He saw Mr. Lloyd George and the King of England. A meeting of the three heads of States was arranged.

And then—silence. All negotiations were brought to an abrupt end. No answer was made by the Entente to the Austrian request for peace; and the speech of M. Ribot on Oct. 12, 1917, by its resolute and categorical refusal of peace until victory, threw Vienna again into the arms of Germany. The war went on, Italy triumphed over Austria, and the Austro-Hungarian Empire collapsed; the rest is known. The motives that led the Entente statesmen to reject the Austrian peace offer still remain officially unpublished, but the strongest implication was given at the time that there was lacking a belief in the sincerity of the Austrian Emperor's overtures, and that a suspicion of trickery lurking behind the offer existed in the minds of the Entente diplomats concerned.

CZERNIN'S LATEST DENIAL

A new chapter in the whole controversy was added by Count Czernin in a statement given by him to the Vienna press on Jan. 13, 1920, in which, replying to the article in L'Illustration just reviewed, he first admitted that the oral negotiations with Prince Sixtus had taken place under his responsible direction, but declared that "their object was the preparation of a general peace for our entire group." He then pointed out that the French translation given by L'Illustration of the aide-mémoire in German written by himself, and accompanying the second letter of Emperor Charles, was incorrect in Article III, which in the original German read as follows:

Thirdly, a definite answer cannot be given before the foregoing two points are replied to, as only then can Austria-Hungary enter into pourparlers with her allies.

The statement further denied that the responsible Austrian Government had any intention of making a separate peace, and pointed out that the aide-mémoire betrayed no such intention in its correct translation. The obtaining of tolerable peace terms, said Count Czernin, would have made it possible for Austria-Hungary to work with more success in Berlin for a general peace settlement. Count Czernin further denied that during his term of office he had ever received a peace offer from the Italian Government, and also declared that the responsible Government was absolutely unaware of any of the Imperial letters and notes now published, in proof of which he referred to his possession of two documents, one a record of a conversation with the Emperor on April 10, 1918, in Bucharest, and the second a letter written him by the Emperor on April 12, 1918, reiterating Charles's denials to the Kaiser of ever having promised the Allies in any peace negotiations the independence of Alsace-Lorraine. Both of these documents, declared Count Czernin, showed clearly that he had no knowledge of the existence of the letters which L'Illustration had published.

The Kaiser's Letters to the Czar

German Emperor's Portion of the Famous "Willy-Nicky"
Correspondence Throws Light on the War's Causes

FOR twenty years preceding the world war the German Kaiser and the Russian Czar carried on a private correspondence, which, by some imperial whim, was written always in English, and which discussed especially such events as the Boer war, the Russo-Japanese war, Austria's annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the German Emperor's trips to Jerusalem and the Mediterranean. The Czar's letters in reply to the Kaiser were left in the palace at Potsdam when Wilhelm fled to Holland, and there they were destroyed—so it is now stated—by ex-Empress Augusta and Prince Eitel, who burned all papers before the palace could be searched. The Kaiser's letters, however, seventy-five in all, were found in the Czar's secret archives at Petrograd after the first Russian revolution in 1917, and have recently been published in full in England, France, Italy, Scandinavia, Germany, and the United States.

This series of letters, beginning in November, 1894, and ending in February, 1914, furnishes a new key to the mind and character of the German Emperor and to the Hohenzollern ambitions that led to the war. M. Hanotaux, former French Minister for Foreign Affairs, is authority for the statement that a knowledge of the existence of this secret correspondence contributed to the suspicion of German policy which prevailed in European Chancelleries in the years preceding the conflict. The publication of the Kaiser's letters in full now throws new light on the forces that led to the creation of the Triple Entente, as well as on the whole trend of the Kaiser's European policy, long a matter of shrewd surmise.

That policy, as revealed by these letters, was one involving a persistent effort to detach the Czar from his French allies, and to induce him to mistrust, despise and hate them; to excite his animus against "perfidious Albion"; to persuade him to constitute himself the champion of the West against the "Yellow Peril," and to embroil him with all three of the Kaiser's chief enemies, England, France and Japan, with the inevitable result of weakening Russia herself and leaving the Kaiser paramount over land and sea. In nearly every letter of the series the Kaiser's mania for "sabre-rattling" and his self-conceived mission as military and political arbiter of the affairs of Europe are apparent.

ATTACKS ON FRANCE

In Letter No. 6 (Sept. 26, 1895), taking some suggested reforms in French Army organization as his text, the Kaiser admonishes his royal cousin on the danger of his association with the French, whom he characterizes as "damned rascals." In Letter No. 18 (Nov. 9, 1898), written from Damascus, he is horrified at the ignominious retreat of the French from Fashoda, and charges the French Nation, especially the army, with "co-optio", lying and dishonor."

"One fine day," he warns the Czar, "you will find yourself, nolens volens, suddenly embroiled in the most horrible of wars Europe ever saw." This warning proved to be prophetic, but not in the sense in which the Kaiser understood his prophecy. The hatred of the English, he declares, is growing ever stronger in the East.

In this letter the German rapprochement with Turkey is already apparent. Turkey, he declares, is not dead, but very much alive. Discussing the Koweit incident, in which Sheik Mabarak, summoned to appear before the Sultan in Constantinople, appealed to Great Britain to support his independence, and in which a British gunboat commander hauled down the Turkish flag hoisted over the recalcitrant Sheik's home, the

FACSIMILE OF FIRST AND LAST PAGE OF ONE OF THE EARLIEST OF THE KAISER'S LETTERS TO THE CZAR IN THE "WILLY-NICKY" CORRESPONDENCE

Kaiser congratulates the Czar on the arrival in this region of the Russian warship Variag, and hints that Great Britain intended by this action to remain permanently in Persia, "which would have meant paramount rule of all the trade routes of Persia leading to the Gulf, by this of Persia itself, and by that 'ta-ta' to your proposed establishment of Russian commerce, which is very ably begun by the conclusion of the 'Zollverein' with Persia by you."

POLICY TOWARD JAPAN

The first example of the Kaiser's policy with regard to Japan occurs in Letter 4 of the series (April 26, 1895), in which, referring to the protest of Russia, France and Germany against the Sino-Japanese treaty of April 24, which forced Japan to give up the Liao-tung Peninsula and Port Arthur, he expresses himself as follows:

I thank you sincerely for the excellent way in which you initiated the combined action of Europe for the sake of its interests against Japan. It was high time that energetic steps were taken and will make an excellent impression in Japan as elsewhere. * * * I shall certainly do all in my power to keep Europe quiet, and also guard the rear of Russia so that nobody shall hamper your action toward the Far East! For that is clearly the great task of the future, for Russia to cultivate the Asian Continent, and to defend Europe from the inroads of the Great Yellow race. You have well understood the call of Providence. * * * I hope that, just as I will gladly help you to settle the question of eventual annexations of portions of territory for Russia, you will kindly see that Germany may also be able to acquire a port somewhere were [sic] it does not grieve you.*

In Letter No. 5 (July 10, 1895) the Kaiser again sounds this note of a Christian crusade to be headed by Russia, predestined to this end by Divine Providence for "the cultivation of Asia and the defense of the cross and the old Christian European culture against the inroads of the Mongols and Buddhism." He then repeats and emphasizes his promise to support Russia while engaged in this great task, and to see that she should suffer no attack from the rear. In this connection he says:

It was natural that if Russia was engaged in this tremendous work you wished to have Europe quiet and your back free; and * * * it was natural and without doubt that this would be my task and that I would let nobody try to interfere with you and attack from behind in Europe during the time you were fulfilling the great mission which Heaven has shaped for you. That was as sure as Amen in Church.

A SYMBOLIC DRAWING

In Letter No. 6 (Sept. 26, 1895) the Kaiser, pursuing ever this fixed idea of the defense of Christianity against the pagan forces of the yellow races, describes a symbolical drawing he has made which embodies this conception in concrete form. On this subject he says:

The development of the Far East, especially its danger to Europe and our Christian faith, has been greatly on my mind ever since we made our first move together in Spring. At last my thoughts developed into a certain form and this I sketched on paper. I worked it out with an artist—a first-class draftsman—and after it was finished had it engraved for public use. * * * It shows the powers of Europe represented by their respective Genii called together by the Archangel Michael—sent from Heaven—to unite in resisting the inroad of Buddhism, heathenism and barbarism for the Defense of the Cross.*

In Letter No. 26 (Sept. 2, 1902) the Kaiser suggests the naval combination of Russia and Germany with a view of curbing Japanese ambitions in the East. As evidence of this naval solidarity he mentions the fact that the secret plans of his latest ships had been handed over to the Russian naval authorities. An interesting sidelight on this alleged revelation of Germany's naval secrets is contained in the memoirs of Grand Admiral von Tirpitz, who states that the "secret" plans made over to the Russian Admiralty were not the original plans, but quite useless ones, an admission made to counteract German criticism. Referring to the appointment of the Japanese General Yamai to train the Chinese Army, the Kaiser says:

Twenty to thirty millions of trained

Chinese helped by half a dozen Jap. Divisions and led by fine undaunted Christian-hating Jap. Officers, is a future to be contemplated not without anxiety; and not impossible. In fact it is the coming into reality of the "Yellow Peril" which I depicted some years ago, and for which engraving I was laughed at by the greater mass of the People.

In Letter No. 29 the Kaiser sends the Czar certain information which he has received about the clandestine arming of Chinese forces by the Japanese—information which he describes as "signals" from the Admiral of the Atlantic to the Admiral of the Pacific. In Letter No. 30 (Jan. 3, 1904) he further, and in the most emphatic way, encourages the Czar in the belief that Russia must annex Korea, though the Russian note of Oct. 3, 1903, had recognized Japan's preponderating interests in that province; he takes occasion to attack the British press for "fanning the flames" (of Japanese resistance) and expresses the hope (Letter 31, Jan. 1, 1904) that "the Japs" may listen to reason, "notwithstanding the frantic efforts of the vile press of a certain country" (England). In anticipation of the coming conflict, finally, which he himself has done so much to bring about, he sends to the Czar (Letter No. 31) "confidential" plans of two Russia, a beautiful woman with a wealth of hair, leans her arm as if in close friendship on the shoulder of her martial companion. Beside this group Austria stands in resolute pose. She extends her right hand in an attitude of invitation as if to win the co-operation of still somewhat reluctant England in the common task. * * * In front of this martial group of many figures stands unmailled the winged Archangel Michael, holding in his right hand a flaming sword. At the foot of the rocky plateau stands the vast plain of civilized Europe. In the foreground is the Castle of Hohenzollern, but over these peaceful landscapes clouds of calamity are rolling up. The path trodden by Asiatic hordes in their onward career is marked by a sea of flame proceeding from a burning city. Dense clouds of smoke twisting into the form of hellish distorted faces ascend from the conflagration. The threatening danger in the form of Buddha is enthroned in this sombre framework. A Chinese dragon, which at the same time represents the demon of destruction, carries this heathen idol. In an awful onset the Powers of Darkness draw nearer to the banks of the protecting stream. Only a little while and that stream is no longer a barrier. (North German Gazette: Berlin Correspondent, Morning Post, Nov. 11, 1895.)

 KNOWN AS THE "WILLY-NICKY" CORRESPONDENCE

warships, the Rivadavia and the Moreno, built originally by England for Argentina, and ultimately given to Japan.

The war between Russia and Japan, which the German Kaiser had done so much to foment, at last broke out; the Japanese Government severed diplomatic relations with Russia on Feb. 5, 1904;
 Admiral Togo attacked the Russian fleet outside Port Arthur on Feb. 8, and the Mikado formally declared war against Russia on Feb. 10. The day after the Japanese declaration of war the Kaiser wrote the Czar a letter of sympathy on his first naval defeat, congratulating him, however, on the possession of a good conscience—Letter No. 32 (Feb. 11, 1904). In this connection he says:

The outbreak of hostilities has had sad consequences for your brave navy, which have deeply moved me! How could it be otherwise, seeing that I am a Russian Admiral and proud of this rank, too! Evidently the serious events show that the warning news I could send you through my ciphers was absolutely correct and that since long the Japanese Government was in the utter earnest and decided to have

In Letter No. 33 (March 29, 1904) the Kaiser, switching suddenly from light chatter about "lovely and bewitching Naples," which he has just visited in the course of the Mediterranean cruise, virtually demands the speedy conclusion of the famous Treaty of Commerce which was to place Russia economically at the mercy of Germany, suggesting that "a promise of a nice picnic in Siberia" would hurry the reluctant Russian negotiators. This scarcely veiled ultimatum had its effect, and the treaty was signed on July 28, 1904. Thus, at a time when Russia was plunged in war with a formidable opponent, the Kaiser extorted concessions of the greatest economic advantage to Germany, and took the first step in his project of the commercial and economic subjugation of his Slavic "ally."

UNDERMINING FRANCE

In Letter No. 34 (June 6, 1904) the Kaiser sows seeds of distrust in the Czar's mind regarding his ally, France, by intimating his discovery that the reason why France had not sent her fleet down to keep Port Arthur open until the Russian Baltic fleet arrived was the existence of an Anglo-French agreement, which had prevented France from moving to aid Russia. He also seizes the opportunity to put a spoke in the wheels of England, in her project of mediation between Russia and Japan, already revealed. This attempt, he declares, "is most presuming on her part, seeing that the war has only just begun—she is afraid for her money, and wants to get Tibet cheaply." He further says that he will try to dissuade "Uncle Bertie" (King Edward) from "harrassing" the Czar with any more such proposals. The whole tone of this letter indicates his reluctance to have Russia bring the war with Japan to a close.

In Letter No. 35 (Aug. 19, 1904) the Kaiser discusses the course of the war with Japan. He admits the seriousness of the situation; but assures the Czar that he must conquer eventually, though it will cost both money and men. He sketches a plan of amateur strategy for the Czar to follow. By no means averse to weakening Russia's naval power, he strongly advises the Czar (Oct. 10, 1904) to send his Black Sea fleet out to meet the Japanese Navy in conjunction with the Baltic fleet; to prepare it secretly, and "then at the moment you think right, calmly and proudly steam through the Dardanelles." The Sultan, he declares, will offer no resistance; as to England, he says:

I have not the slightest doubt that England will accept it, too, though the press may fume and rage and their squadrons steam about a little, as they often do in the Mediterranean. But they won't [sic] stir in earnest when they see that the rest of the powers remain quiet.

THE SECRET TREATY

In Letter No. 36 (Oct. 30, 1904) the Kaiser, for the first time in this correspondence, mentions the momentous subject of the secret treaty between Russia and Germany, the ultimate object of which was the isolation of England. This secret treaty was ultimately signed by the two Emperors at Björkö on July 24, 1905. This portion of the "Willy-Nicky" correspondence, notably the series of telegrams bearing on the secret treaty, was published by The New York Herald in September, 1917. The treaty was modified from its original draft form, to tone down the obviousness of its intention to isolate England, but even as drawn it was incompatible with the Franco-Russian Alliance, a fact which explains the Kaiser's eagerness to conclude it before its contents were revealed to France. The treaty was not countersigned by the Russian Foreign Minister, but only by Admiral Birilev, Minister of Marine, who is said to have admitted that he signed it at the Czar's request without any idea of its contents. The Russian statesman, Count Witte, who died in March, 1915, asserted that the treaty was annulled at his instigation. It was long believed that the Wilhelmstrasse had no share in it, but in Letter No. 37 the Kaiser declares that the work of drafting this treaty was done by himself and von Bülow personally.

THE KAISER'S TELEGRAM

The first conception of such a secret alliance is found in a telegram of the Czar in answer to one sent by the Kaiser on Oct. 27, 1904, the text of which is given herewith:

For some time the English press has been threatening Germany that she must on no account allow coals to be sent to the Baltic fleet, now on its way out. It is not impossible that the Japanese and British Governments may launch joint protests against our coaling your ships, coupled with a summons to stop further work. The result aimed at by such a threat of war would be the absolute immobility of your fleet and its inability to proceed for want of fuel. This new danger would have to be faced in common by Russia and Germany together, who would both have to remind your ally France of the obligations she took over in the treaty of the Dual Alliance with you in the case of a casus foederis arising. It is out of the question that France on such invitation would try to shirk her implicit duty toward her ally. Though Delcassé is Anglophile and would be enraged, he would be wise enough to understand that the British fleet is utterly unable to save Paris. In this way a powerful combination of the three strongest Continental powers would be formed, to attack which the Anglo-Saxons would think twice. Before acting you ought not to forget to order new ships, so as to be ready with some of them when the war is over. They will be excellent persuaders during the peace negotiations. Our private firms would be most glad to receive contracts.

THE CZAR'S REPLY

The Czar telegraphed back on Oct. 30, 1904. In his reply, a copy of which was found in the Petrograd archives, he referred indignantly to the famous Dogger Bank episode, in which Admiral Rozhdestvensky had fired on English trawlers on the ground that enemy ships were screened among them. The outcry caused by this action was finally appeased by the Czar's referring the matter to The Hague tribunal. In his telegram the Czar says:

Of course, you know the first details of the North Sea incident from our Admiral's telegram. Naturally, it completely alters the situation. I have no words to express my indignation with England's conduct. I agree fully with your complaints about England's behavior concerning the coaling of our ships by German steamers. Whereas she understands the rules of keeping neutrality in her own fashion, it is certainly high time to put a stop to this. The only way, as you say, would be that Germany, Russia, and France should at once unite upon arrangements to abolish English and Japanese arrogance and insolence. Would you like to lay down and frame the outlines of such a treaty? As soon as it is accepted by us France is bound to join her ally.

The Kaiser replied to the Czar on Oct. 30, stating that he had sent the draft of the proposed treaty together with a letter (No. 37). In this letter the Kaiser discusses the probable effect of the treaty on America and France. Roosevelt, he declares, owing to the innate American dislike to all colored races, has no special partiality for Japan, despite England's attempts to work upon American feeling in favor of Japan; furthermore, a powerful Japanese fleet is a menace to the Philippines. England, he adds, counts on France's remaining passive, the radical and anti-Christian parties favoring England, but being opposed to war "because a victorious General would mean certain destruction to this republic of miserable civilians." As usual, the Kaiser loses no opportunity to inspire the Czar's distrust of his French ally. "I positively know," he says, "that as far back as December last the French Minister of Finance, Bouvier, from his own accord told the financial agent of another power that on no account whatever would France join you in a Russo-Japanese war, even if England should take sides with Japan." France's attitude, declares the Kaiser, was what gave English policy "its present unwonted brutal assurance." Germany and Russia must stand shoulder to shoulder; that consummation reached, the Kaiser says, "I expect to be able to maintain peace and you will be left a free and undisturbed hand to deal with Japan."

DRAFTS OF TREATY

The draft of the treaty sent by the Kaiser to the Czar bore two forms. The first had three provisions; the later form three provisions and a secret article. In the first form the purpose of the treaty is laid down as being "to localize as much as possible the Russo-Japanese war." Article I. in both drafts, providing that if either contracting party should be attacked by a European power the other party would give support with all its land and sea forces, and that France would be reminded of her duty as Russia's ally, is virtually identical. The same applies to Article II., which provides that neither party would make a separate peace with any common adversary. Article III. in the first draft, however, dealing with support in the case of acts—such as delivering coal to a belligerent—which might give rise to complaints after the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese war, is replaced in part by a "secret article" which embodies a clause to the effect that "Germany will not associate herself with any action whatsoever which might imply hostile tendencies toward Russia."

The meaning and interpretation of the two drafts were explained by the Kaiser in Letter 40 (Nov. 17, 1904); in this letter the psychology of the German Emperor is brought out in strong relief; his first view that the projected treaty could be revealed to France was changed with the conclusion of the Anglo-French agreement, on which the entente cordiale was based, which eventually became the Kaiser's undoing, and on the Czar's telegraphing for permission to show the treaty to France, the Kaiser withheld his consent, hinted darkly of the terrible consequences that would ensue if the treaty became known, and urged insistently (Letter 41, Dec. 7, 1904) that Russia should agree to the coaling clause. To this the Czar did not agree, and the matter was dropped until the Björkö meeting of July 24, 1905, when the treaty, stripped of this provision, was ultimately signed by the two Emperors. It never became effective.

In Letter No. 43 (Jan. 2, 1905) the Kaiser, who had prophesied Russia's victory, offers his condolences over the fall of Port Arthur and expresses the hope that in rebuilding the Russian fleet the Czar's advisers will not forget "our great firms of Stettin, Kiel, &c." So the great Russo-Asiatic war drama which the Kaiser had helped to stage was brought to an end, and the series of letters in which the German Machiavelli had revealed his persistent purpose to embroil his Russian cousin with the latter's ally, France, and with Great Britain and Japan, found here the logical close of its first stage. The other letters of the series deal with events up to the beginning of the year that brought with it the world war, but they merely add new details to the foregoing self-revelation of the German Kaiser and his disquieting machinations as a secret diplomatist.

The Rumanian Minorities Treaty

Text of Rumania's Pact With the Allies Guaranteeing Liberty to All Classes of Citizens

WHEN the Allies gave national independence to Poland, Czechoslovakia and other new countries, and when they practically re-created Rumania with enlarged boundaries that included Transylvania and a part of the Banat of Temesvar, they exacted as the price of this service a promise that these countries would give all the privileges of individual freedom to every citizen within their boundaries, regardless of race, religion, or language.

The promise took the form of a treaty with the Allies, which bound the new States to maintain the institutions of modern political liberty under the aegis of the League of Nations. Poland signed such a treaty when she signed the peace with Germany, and Rumania was told that she must subscribe to a similar one before she could be allowed to sign the Austrian peace of St. Germain. When the Austrian Treaty was signed by the other powers in September, however, Rumania held back, both because she refused to guarantee the rights of minorities and because she was still defying the Allies by keeping troops in Hungary.

For three months Rumania maintained this recalcitrant attitude; finally, on Dec. 9, 1919, after receiving an ultimatum from the Paris Peace Conference, the Rumanian delegate, General Coanda, affixed his name to the minorities treaty and to that of St. Germain.

The full text of the Rumanian instrument promising equal rights to Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, Saxon, Czechler and Rumanian is as follows:

His Majesty the King of Rumania: General Constantin Coanda, Corps Commander, A. D. C. to the King, formerly President of the Council of Ministers;

Who have agreed as follows:

CHAPTER I.

ARTICLE 1—Rumania undertakes that the stipulations contained in Articles 2 to 8 of this chapter shall be recognized as fundamental laws, and that no law, regulation or official action shall conflict or interfere with these stipulations, nor shall any law, regulation or official action prevail over them.

ARTICLE 2—Rumania undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Rumania without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race or religion.

All inhabitants of Rumania shall be entitled to the free exercise, whether public or private, of any creed, religion or belief, whose practices are not inconsistent with public order and public morals.

ARTICLE 3—Subject to the special provisions of the treaties mentioned below, Rumania admits and declares to be Rumanian nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality all persons habitually resident at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty within the whole territory of Rumania, including the extensions made by the treaties of peace with Austria and Hungary, or any other extensions which may hereafter be made, if such persons are not at that date nationals of a foreign State other than Austria or Hungary.

Nevertheless, Austrian and Hungarian nationals who are over 18 years of age will be entitled under the conditions contained in the said treaties to opt for any other nationality which may be open to them. Option by a husband will cover his wife and option by parents will cover their children under 18 years of age.

Persons who have exercised the above right to opt must within the succeeding twelve months transfer their place of residence to the State for which they have opted. They will be entitled to retain their immovable property in Rumanian territory. They may carry with them their movable property of every description. No export duties may be imposed upon them in connection with the removal of such property.

ARTICLE 4—Rumania admits and declares to be Rumanian nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality persons of Austrian or Hungarian nationality who were born in the territory transferred to Rumania by the treaties of peace with Austria and Hungary, or subsequently transferred to her, of parents habitually resident there, even if at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty they are not themselves habitually resident there.

Nevertheless, within two years after the coming into force of the present treaty, these persons may make a declaration before the competent Rumanian authorities in the country in which they are resident, stating that they abandon Rumanian nationality, and they will then cease to be considered as Rumanian nationals. In this connection a declaration by a husband will cover his wife, and a declaration by parents will cover their children under 18 years of age.

ARTICLE 5—Rumania undertakes to put no hindrance in the way of the exercise of the right which the persons concerned have, under the treaties concluded or to be concluded by the allied and associated powers with Austria or Hungary, to choose whether or not they will acquire Rumanian nationality.

ARTICLE 6—All persons born in Rumanian territory who are not born nationals of another State shall ipso facto become Rumanian nationals.

ARTICLE 7—Rumania undertakes to recognize as Rumanian nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality Jews inhabiting any Rumanian territory, who do not possess another nationality.

ARTICLE 8—All Rumanian nationals shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language or religion.

Differences of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Rumanian national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as, for instance, admission to public employments, functions and honors, or the exercise of professions and industries.

No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Rumanian national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the press or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings.

Notwithstanding any establishment by the Rumanian Government of an official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Rumanian nationals of non-Rumanian speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the courts.

ARTICLE 9—Rumanian nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the other Rumanian nationals. In particular they shall have an equal right to establish, manage and control at their own expense charitable, religious and social institutions, schools and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein.

ARTICLE 10—Rumania will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Rumanian nationals of other than Rumanian speech are resident adequate facilities for insuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Rumanian nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision shall not prevent the Rumanian Government from making the teaching of the Rumanian language obligatory in the said schools.

In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Rumanian nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of the sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal, or other budget, for educational, religious or charitable purposes.

ARTICLE 11—Rumania agrees to accord to the communities of the Saxons and Czechs in Transylvania local autonomy in regard to scholastic and religious matters, subject to the control of the Rumanian State.

ARTICLE 12—Rumania agrees that the stipulations in the foregoing articles, so far as they affect persons belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the council of the League of Nations. The United States, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan hereby agree not to withhold their assent from any modification in these articles which is in due form assented to by a majority of the council of the League of Nations.

Rumania agrees that any member of the council of the League of Nations shall have the right to bring to the attention of the council any infraction, or any danger of infraction, of any of these obligations, and that the council may thereupon take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances.

Rumania further agrees that any difference of opinion as to questions of law or fact arising out of these articles between the Rumanian Government and any one of the principal allied and associated powers or any other power, a member of the council of the League of Nations, shall be held to be a dispute of an international character under Article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations. Rumania hereby consents that any such dispute shall, if the other party thereto demands, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The decision of the permanent court shall be final and shall have the same force and effect as an award under Article 13 of the covenant.

CHAPTER II.

ARTICLE 13—Rumania undertakes to make no treaty, convention or arrangement and to take no other action which will prevent her from joining in any general convention for the equitable treatment of the commerce of other States that may be concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations within five years from the coming into force of the present treaty.

Rumania also undertakes to extend to all the allied and associated powers any favors or privileges in customs matters which she may grant during the same period of five years to any State with which since August, 1914, the allied and associated powers have been at war, or to any State which in virtue of Article 222 of the treaty with Austria has special customs arrangements with such States.

ARTICLE 14—Pending the conclusion of the general convention referred to above, Rumania undertakes to treat on the same footing as national vessels or vessels of the most-favored nation the vessels of all the allied and associated powers which accord similar treatment to Rumanian vessels. As an exception from this provision, the right of Rumania or of any other allied or associated power to confine her maritime coasting trade to national vessels is expressly reserved.

ARTICLE 15—Pending the conclusion under the auspices of the League of Nations of a general convention to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit, Rumania undertakes to accord freedom of transit to persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails in transit to or from any allied or associated State over Rumanian territory, including territorial waters, and to treat them at least as favorably as the persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails respectively of Rumanian or of any other more-favored nationality, origin, importation or ownership, as regards facilities, charges, restrictions, and all other matters.

All charges imposed in Rumania on such traffic in transit shall be reasonable having regard to the conditions of the traffic. Goods in transit shall be exempt from all customs or other duties.

Tariffs for transit across Rumania and tariffs between Rumania and any allied or associated power involving through tickets or waybills shall be established at the request of the allied or associated power concerned.

Freedom of transit will extend to postal, telegraphic, and telephonic services.

Provided that no allied or associated power can claim the benefit of these provisions on behalf of any part of its territory in which reciprocal treatment is not accorded in respect of the same subject matter.

If within a period of five years from the coming into force of this treaty no general convention as aforesaid shall have been concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations, Rumania shall be at liberty at any time thereafter to give twelve months' notice to the Secretary General of the League of Nations to terminate the obligations of the present article.

ARTICLE 16—Pending the conclusion of a general convention on the international régime of waterways, Rumania undertakes to apply to such portions of the river system of the Pruth as may lie within, or form the boundary of, her territory, the régime set out in the first paragraph of Article 332 and in Articles 333 to 338 of the treaty of peace with Germany.

ARTICLE 17—All rights and privileges accorded by the foregoing articles to the allied and associated powers shall be accorded equally to all States members of the League of Nations.

The present treaty, in French, in English and in Italian, of which in case of divergence the French text shall prevail, shall be ratified. It shall come into force at the same time as the treaty of peace with Austria.

The deposit of ratifications shall be made at Paris.

Powers of which the seat of the Government is outside Europe will be entitled merely to inform the Government of the French Republic through their diplomatic representative at Paris that their ratification has been given; in that case they must transmit the instrument of ratification as soon as possible.

A procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up. The French Government will transmit to all signatory powers a certified copy of the procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications.

Done at Paris, the ninth day of December, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, in a single copy which will remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the French Republic, and of which authenticated copies will be transmitted to each of the signatory powers. Plenipotentiaries who in consequence of their temporary absence from Paris have not signed the present treaty may do so up to Dec. 20, 1919.

In faith whereof the hereinafter-named plenipotentiaries, whose powers have been found in good and due form, have signed the present treaty.
